Mr. Pym's Death and this Year, was by the Death of that great Senator and Patriot John Pym, Esq; who for his eminent Qualities, Wisdom, Courage, Learning, Zeal and Constancy, deserv'd every Man's good Word. He had the Spirit of Cato, and the Eloquence of Tully. Curtius lov'd not his Country, nor Bru- rus Liberty better than Mr. Pym: He wore himself out in the Cause of both, and carry'd to his Grave, the Respect, Love and Esteem of every good English Man, and good Protestant, yet the Picture the Earl of Clarendon has drawn of him is more ugly and deform'd than that of Cerberus. To crown it, he affirms Mr. Pym dy'd of the Lowsy Disease, which is well known to be as false as that he did die is true. Whitlocke tells us, The Multitude of Business and Cares so broke his Spirits, that it brought his Death. Rushworth speaks of it thus, Whereas it is reported he died of that loathsome Disease, the same was not true; and for publick Satisfaction herein his Corpse was expos'd to the View of many Hundreds. Ludlow says the same. And Echard owns, that the Abuse on his Memory is not true, but the Lord Clarendon is positive in that false Abuse against them all.

We have mentioned the Ordinance for raising the general Contribution this Year, and there past another Ordinance for sequestering the Estates of Delinquents, as were all who were then in Arms against the Parliament, against which the King, as usual, publish'd a Proclamation, which had no more Effect than his offer of Par- Proclama- don to the REBELS, now in Arms under the Earl of Essex, or any other Proclamations. There was one against the Oppression of the Clergy, which was intended to prevent the Proceedings of the Committee for ejecting scandalous Ministers; but they went on, and so did the Parliament notwithstanding another Proclamation not to obey their Votes, Orders and Ordinances. This Proclamation had also an offer of Pardon in it, with the Exceptions already mention'd. Another Proclamation was publish'd at Oxford, forbidding People to trade with London, which had as much Effect as if it had forbidden them to eat and drink.

It is necessary for both Writer and Reader to divest themselves of all Passions, and to write and read with the most determin'd Serenity of Mind, or 'tis impossible not to be ruffled at the following Incident, the most surprizing and terrifying they ever met with; though the bare telling it has these Effects, yet one cannot pass it over without some Remark.

His Majesty being ready to receive the Sacrament from the Hands of the Lord Archbishop Usher, at Christ Church in Oxford, rising up from his Knees, and beckoning to the Archbishop for a short Forbearance, said,

My Lord,

I Espy here many resolved Protestants, who King's Pro-may declare to the World the Resolution I do restation now make. I have to the utmost of my Power before the prepared my Soul to become a worthy Receiver. Sacrament And may I so receive Comfort by the blessed Sacrament, as I do intend the Establishment of the true Reformed Protestant Religion, as it stood in its Beauty in the happy Days of Queen Elizabeth, without any Connivance at Popery. I bless God, that in the midst of these publick Distractions I have still liberty to communicate, and may this Sacrament be my DAMNATION if my Heart does not joyn with my Lips in this Protestation:

And the very next Day was Peace given to the Ms. Fr. bloody Irish REBELS by the Cessation then agreed on at Oxford. See his Letter to the Marquis of Ormond, Dec. 15, 1644. speaking of the Irish Papists, gives my Lord Muskerry and Plunket my particular Thanks. Their Nation in general, and this in particular, shall have Comfort in it. And to shew that this is more than Words, I do hereby promise them, that the penal Laws

A. D. 1643. Laws and Statutes shall not be put in Execution; and if they assist me, &c. I will consent to the Repeal of them by a Law; instead of conniving, this is Encouraging with a Witness. In another Letter of the 9th of January following he calls the Rebellion in Ireland, the first War, and the Civil War in England the Rebellion. In another of the 27th of February, 1644. he will consent to the present taking away of the Penal Laws against Papists.

Rushworth, 978, 979.

I thought to have remark'd on this astonishing Incident, but it will not bear it: There's the Fact; and the Reflection upon it is but too plain.

Judge Barkley fin'd.

In September this Year, that busy Medler in the Ship Money Grievance, Judge Barkley, was fin'd 20,000 Pounds, to be incapacitated for Places and Honours, and imprison'd in the Tower during Pleasure. An Ordinance pass'd about the same Time for seizing the King and Queen's and Princes Revenues, and for appointing a Committee to raise Money for the Defence and Preservation of the County of Northampton. Sir John Dryden, Sir Christopher Telvorton, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir Rowland St. John, Sir Edward Nichols, Sir John Norwich, Sir Humphry Orme, Sir Richard Samwell, Sir Samuel Danvers, Edward Montagu, Esq; William Fitz Williams, Esq; John Crew, Esq; John Cartwright, Esq; Zouch Tate, Esq; Richard Knightly, Esq; John Blencoe, Esq; Edward Farmer, Esq; Edward Hanbury, Esq; John Claypool, Esq; Robert Mildmay, Esq; Edward Bagshaw, Esq; Richard Knightley of Fawcley, Esq; Edward Shuckburgh, Esq; John Norton, Esq; Richard Samwell, Esq; John Barnard, Esq; Edward Harbey, Esq; Edward Only, Esq; Philip Holman, Esq; John Wirley, Esq; William Lisle, Esq; Thomas Elmes, Esq; Francis Quarles, Esq;

Northamptonshire Committee.

King's Commissioners for Nottingham and Lincolnshire.

Rushw. 306.

As several Counties associated for the Parliament, and had their Committees to manage the Affairs there: So did the King appoint Commissioners in those Counties where his Power prevailed, as these for Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire, out of which had been squeez'd 200000 Pounds by them, in little more than a Year. Lord Chaworth, J. Cobham, Sir John Digby, Sir Edward Hussy, Sir Robert Markham, Sir William Thorold, Charles Hussy, Esq; Ger. Nevile, Esq; Anthony Eyre, Esq; Roger Cooper, Esq; Thomas Holden, Esq; Hugh Cartwright, Esq; Robert Tredway, Esq; John Burrell, Esq; Edmund Thorold, Esq; Thomas Harrington, Esq; Chr. Berisforde, Esq; We have observ'd how his Majesty valu'd himself on the Number and Weight of the Gentry. The Reader will better judge of it by comparing the Committee of the single County of Northampton with the Commissioners of the two Counties of Lincoln and Nottingham.

Brook and Riley's Plot.

About the latter End of the Year there was discover'd a chimerical Design carry'd on by Sir Basil Brook, Treasurer for the Papists. One Read, an Officer among the Irish Rebels, taken Prisoner at Dublin, sent to England and imprison'd in the King's Bench, Thomas Vile, a Goldsmith, his Fellow Prisoner, and Theophilus Riley, Scout Master General of the City Militia, by whose help Read and Vile got their Liberty by Exchange. The Design was to procure a Treaty between the King and the City, exclusive of the Parliament, the Preliminaries to secure the Protestant Religion, pay the publick Debts, and a general Pardon on both sides. Digby, that eternal Contriver of fruitless Conspiracies, manag'd this. Vile, the broken Goldsmith, got to Oxford, and confer'd with the King; and when he return'd to London, disclosing the Matter to Sir David Watkins, the latter discover'd it to the Parliament, who order'd Brook and Riley to be committed close Prisoners to the Tower, of which Isaac Penington, Esq; Lord Mayor, was appointed Governor, and Vile to some other Prison.

A. D. 1643.

I chuse to begin the Year according to the common Computation, at the the first of January, for that it is not only more Historical, but is better known than the Computation from the 25th of March, which is more peculiar to Law and Traffick.

The Scots had all Things in Readiness to enter England with the New Year. Their Army Scots Army consisted of 18000 Foot, 3000 Horse, and 600 my. Dragoons, commanded by

The Earl of Leven, General.

John Bayley, Lieutenant General.

David Lesley, Major General of the Horse.

Sir Alexander Hamilton, General of the Artillery.

Colonels of Foot.

Earl of Cassils, William Stewart, Earl of Lindsay, Sir Patrick Hepburne, Lord Cowper, Earl of Loudon, Lord Maitland, Sir David Home, Lord Levingston, Earl of Buccleugh, James Rae, Earl of Dumfermllyn, Sir Alexander Hamilton, Lord Gask, Earl of Lothian, Douglas of Kelhead, Lord Dunkope, Master of Tester, Earl Marshall, Arthur Eykin, Lord Sinclair.

Colonels of Horse.

His Excellency the Earl of Leven, Major General David Lesley, Earl of Eglinton, Lord Kirkcubright, Earl of Dalbousy, Lord Balcarras, Michael Welden, Lord Gordon, Marquiss of Argyle.

Dragoons.

Colonel Freiser.

Among the inferior Officers were several Persons of Quality, as Sir George Douglas, Sir John Browne, Sir Robert Adaire, &c. The Army began their March in the Middle of January, when the Snow was Knee deep. The General was attended by Committees of the English and Scots Parliaments, and enter'd England the 19th of January, when the Committees wrote a Letter to Sir Thomas Glenham, Col. Gray, and the rest of the Commanders and Gentlemen of the County of Northumberland, inviting them to concur with them in the Defence of the true reformed Religion, which was in danger by a Popish and Prelatical Faction. Sir Thomas Glenham, in his Answer declared, If they meant the Common Prayer, and the nine and thirty Articles by the true reform'd Religion, he and his Friends were ready to defend them with their Blood. How illuminated their Zeal was. Otherwise they would not suffer themselves to be made Slaves without Opposition.

Newcastle summoned.

On the 3d of February General Leven came before Newcastle, into which Place the Marquis of that Name had thrown himself; and the Committees sent the Marquis of Argyle, and Sir William Armine, with a Summons to the Mayor and Aldermen, who answer'd, That the King's Governor being there, the Power was in him; but if he was not, they would venture their Lives and Fortunes for the King's Honour, to which they set their Names. John Morley, Mayor, Nicholas Cole, Thomas Lyddel, Lionel Maddison, Alexander Davison, Mark Milbank, Francis Bowes, Francis Anderson, Henry Maddison, Ralph Cock, Leonard Carr, Robert Shafte, Cuthbert Car, Ralph Grey, John Emerson, Dr. Rowcastle, Charles Clarke.

The Scots were not willing to waste their Time before this Town: So they past the Tyne at

A. D. 1644. at Ovingham, Bydwell, and Altringham. From thence they march'd to the Darwent, and past that River at Ebchester. March the Second they past the River Weare near Lumley Castle, and on the Fourth enter'd Sunderland. The Marquis of Newcastle being join'd by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Colonel Fenwick, and others, made up an Army of 14000 Horse and Foot, with which he secur'd Durham. The Scots took South Shields, and Lieutenant Colonel Bellantine, of the General's Regiment, surpriz'd a Troop of the Marquisses Horse at Chester on the Street, near which Place Newcastle drew up his Army, and the Scots did the like on a Hill towards the Sea: Both Armies fac'd each other, and there happen'd some Skirmishes with alternate Success. The Marquis return'd to Durham, and the Scots march'd to Quarendon Hill within two Miles of it, where we must leave them awhile to see what pass'd at Oxford and Westminster.

The Mongrel Parliament at Oxford.

The King summon'd the Members of both Houses of Parliament, as well those who had been expell'd for Misdemeanors as those who out of Cowardice or Bigotry, had deserted their Duty at Westminster to meet him at Oxford, the 22d of January, to shew, as he said in his Proclamation, how far the major Part of both Houses were from approving of the Proceedings of the Lords and Commons at Westminster, and in Order to this, there was a Meeting of 118 Members of the House of Commons at Oxford, who were to let the World see they were the major Vote to 222, then assembled in St. Stephen's Chapel. The Lords at Oxford sent a Letter to the Conservators of the Peace in Scotland to protest against the Invitation made by the Parliament of England for the Scots Army to come to their Assistance, and the Conservators of the Peace sent them the solemn League and Covenant for an Answer.

The Names of the Lords and Commons assembled at Oxford, called by King Charles the First, his Mongrel Parliament.

I do not mention the other Members who were absent in Service or with Leave, because there were Members of the House of Commons in the same Circumstances on the Parliament side, and had all those other Members been at Oxford, those at Westminster would have been a very great Majority. Some of the Oxford Members, as Digby, Jermin, Piercy, lay under Impeachments of High Treason; very many of them had been regularly expell'd for Delinquency, or for Desertion, or for being Monopolizers; and having no Seat in the other Senate, were glad to sit in a Mongrel One. Had they been all together, they were but 175, and there were at Westminster, as by our last Tale, 222; yet Eschard, an admirable Teller, assures us the 175 were superior in Number to the 222. It exceeded the other in Number. This Assembly consisting of upper and lower Houses, had, with great Formality, their two Speakers; the Lord Littleton for the Lords, and Serjeant Evers for the Commons. The first Work they went upon, was to write a Letter to the Earl of Essex, to conjure him to procure a Treaty. But he excus'd himself, for that they had made no Address to the two Houses, whose Privileges he and his Army were resolv'd to maintain at the Expence of their Blood. He also sent them the solemn League and Covenant. They then got the Earl of Forth, the King's General, to write a Letter to the Earl of Essex, for a safe Conduct for two Gentlemen, whom the King would send to the Parliament concerning a Treaty. Essex answer'd, That when his Majesty desir'd a safe Conduct, he would shew his Willingness to further any Way that Happyness which honest Men pray'd for; upon which, the King sent a Message to the two Houses, with a Preamble that was sure to render it ineffectual.

A. D. 1644. festual, by the Advice of the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Oxford, proposing a Treaty; but the Parliament at Westminster took Exceptions at his Majesty's putting those Deserters, Delinquents, Monopolizers, and expell'd Men, on an equal Foot with themselves; and if the Oxford Counsellors really intended Peace by this Step towards it, their Wisdom did not appear much in starting this Difficulty, which they could not but know, with a moderate Knowledge of Things, would never be gotten over. For the Parliament at Westminster would as soon have treated with a Convocation as with the Assembly at Oxford, whose main Business was to raise Money if they could, tho' every Penny that was taken by Virtue of any Act of theirs was a downright Robbery. They endeavour'd to soften it by terming their Act a Letter, to which their two Speakers set their Hands. It was directed to such Persons as they thought were able and willing to lend a certain Sum mention'd in that Letter. They began with themselves, and wrote Letters to one another, by which a considerable Sum of Money was collected, and 'tis certain the King had not without it been able to take the Field the next Campaign. They also laid an Excise upon Wine, Beer, Ale, Cyder, Perry, Grocery, Drugs, &c. as the Parliament had done by an Ordinance; which Excise was high enough, as Commissioners of the Excise.

John Towse, Esq; Alderman of London, Thomas Foot, Esq; Alderman of London, John Kendrick, Esq; Alderman of London, Thomas Cul-lum, Esq; Alderman of London, Simon Edmonds of London, Esq; John Lamot of London, Esq; Edward Claxton of London, Esq; John Langham, Esq; one of the Sheriffs of the City of London.

Auditors of the Excise

Thomas Falconbridge, Esq; William Bond, Esq;

I have not seen the Oxford Excise Act, but I suppose it to be very much like this, which the Cavaliers had exclaim'd against as a Burthen that in a Year or two would break all the Backs in England. The Mongrel Parliament voted also, that the Scots and all who assisted them were TRAYTORS. They had got two Names amongst them, REBELS and TRAYTORS, and they made the most they could of them. Tho' the King could not get them to vote that the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament at Westminster were no Parliament, which he earnestly press'd them to do; yet he got these Votes out of them, and the Reader will easily judge of what Use they were to him; That the Lords and Commons who consented to the raising an Army under the Command of the Earl of Essex, are guilty of High Treason; That the Lords and Commons who consented to the making of a new Great Seal are guilty of High Treason; That the Lords and Commons who invited in the Scots are guilty of High Treason; That the Lords and Commons ought to be proceeded against as TRAYTORS, and hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd; and, That all his Majesty's Offers of Peace had been refus'd by them. The Two Houses at Westminster publish'd a Declaration, shewing why they could not accept of the Overtures made from Oxford for a Treaty, wherein they say, "As it hath always been and ever shall be our earnest and faithful Endeavours to put an End to the Troubles and dangerous Distempers of this Kingdom, by a happy and well-grounded Peace; so is it our settled Resolution, in Discharge of the Trust reposed in us, never to purchase it with the Loss and Ruin of our Religion and Liberty, having before our Eyes the sad Spectacle of that woful Kingdom of Ireland, which, after the spilling of so much innocent Blood in Defence of the Protestant Religion, is under the false Gloss of Peace, subjected and brought under the Power of Popery and Superstition; and those BLOODY REBELS having effected their Ends in that Kingdom, are brought over hither to bring us under the same Yoke, &c."

Some of those bloody Rebels came from Ire-Irish Re-land with Forces under Monk, who had engag'd some in the Parliament Service against them, had now into Eng-betray'd his Trust, and brought over those very land. Men he had commanded for the Parliament to fight against them. But we shall find that he betray'd every Power that employ'd him, except Cromwell. Monk made a Shew at first of being sensible of the Treachery of his quitting the Parliament's Service, and bringing over their own Soldiers to destroy them. The Marquis of Ormond was jealous of him, and put him in Prison, but it was all Affectation. A short Con-Monk de-finement conquer'd all his Scruples, and he with some the other English Officers, and 3 or 4000 Soldiers, Service a-landed at Chester, and join'd the Lord Byron's gainst the Army before Nantwich, which it had storm'd in Irish Re-bels. five several Places, but was beaten off with the Loss of Lieutenant-Colonel Bolton and Captain Sandford, the Bully of Byron's Army, who sent 2 Summons to the Townsmen, threatening Man, Woman and Child with Wounds and Death, Sword and Fire. The gallant Defence of the Town gave Sir Thomas Fairfax an Opportunity to come up to its Release. On the 21st of Ja-Siege of nuary Sir Thomas began his March from Man-Nant-chester with 2500 Foot and 1400 Horse. The wyche Enemy's Forces were about 3000 Foot and 1800 rais'd by Sir T. on Delamere Forest, and took 30 Prisoners. Fairfax. About six Miles further 200 of them maintain'd a Pass, which Sir Thomas Fairfax's Men, com-manded

A. D. 1644. manded by Col. Morgan, forc'd. As he was marching between Acton and Nantwyche, the Cavaliers pass'd the River and fell upon his Rear, where were Col. Holland's and Col. Booth's Regiments, while another Body of the Enemy charg'd them in Front, and were oppos'd by Sir William Brereton and Col. Ashton, who with Col. Lambert and Major Copley did very good Service. The Besieg'd at the same Time made a Sally with 800 Men: The Horse under Sir William Fairfax was expos'd to great Danger to encourage the Foot, tho' the Lanes were so narrow they could afford little Help. The Fight was very smart for above two Hours, and then the Royalists gave Ground. The Parliament's Forces drove their Foes to Acton Church, where they were caught as in a Trap, as Sir Thomas Fairfax wrote the Earl of Essex, and yielded themselves Prisoners, with all their chief Officers, Arms, Colours, and Ammunition. Their Horse retreated in better Order towards Chester without much Loss. Of the Parliament's Forces not above 50 were slain; of the King's above 200; and the following List of Prisoners was sent to the Lord-General Essex: Major-General Gibson, Sir Michael Eruley, Sir Richard Fleetwood, Col. Monk, Col. Warren, Sir Francis Butler Lieutenant-Colonel, Lieutenant-Colonel Gibbs an Irish REBEL, Major Hammond, 14 Captains, 20 Lieutenants, 26 Ensigns, 2 Cornets, 2 Muster-Masters, Sir Ralph Done, Mr. Sherlocke Chaplain to a Regiment, 41 Serjeants, 40 Drums, 4 Cannoneers, 22 Colours, 1500 Common Soldiers, 6 Pieces of Ordnance, whereof 5 Brass, 20 Carriages, and several Waggon; 120 Women that follow'd the Camp, of whom many had long Knives, with which they were said to have done Mischief. Col. Monk and Col. Warren were sent to Hull, and from thence to London, where they were imprison'd in the Tower. Monk some Time after engag'd with the Parliament again, and after with Cromwell against them, and after that with the Parliament again, and after that with the King's Son against them, and had all this Treachery with as little Capacity as ever Man had who pretended to be a General and an Admiral.

More Irish Rebels in England. Some of the Forces sent from Ireland, with Irish Rebels among them, landed in the West, and were order'd to reduce Warder Castle in Wiltshire, where Major, afterwards General Ludlow commanded; but the Majority of these Forces had not forgot their Religion and their Country so shamefully as those under Monk and others; for understanding that the Governor was a Protestant, and that his Government was to fall into the Hands of a Papist if the Castle was taken, they refus'd to be employ'd against it.

Warder Castle. Col. Rowland Langhorn, who was Governor of Pembroke for the Parliament, was very much streighten'd by the Garrisons which the Earl of Carberry, his Majesty's Lieutenant in that Part of South Wales, had put into Tenby and Haverford West; but upon the Arrival of Capt. Swanley with a Squadron of Ships and Supplies of Ammunition, Langhorn taking with him 200 Seamen, sally'd out of Pembroke, and took Stackpool House, belonging to Mr. Lorr, and garrison'd it for the King. Some Days after he march'd to Treffloin, another garrison'd House, which he took, and in it about 40 Horse and 150 Foot. He then pass'd over to Rouse Side, and attack'd the Fort at the Pill, in which he was assisted by Capt. Swanley, upon the firing of whose Guns the Garrison cry'd out Quarter. Here were taken Mr. John Barlow Master of the Ordnance, 5 Captains, 24 Pieces of Cannon, and 300 Common Soldiers. The Close of this Expedition was merry, for Sir Henry Vaughan, who lay with 300 Horse and Foot at Haverford West, had order'd a strict Watch for Intelligence if the Enemy approach'd nearer; and one Wheeler a Grafter having a Drove of Cattle feeding on the Hills, they happen'd in the Evening to graze somewhat nearer the Town, upon which the Strict Watch cry'd out The Roundheads are coming, and Sir Henry Vaughan and his Party immediately quitted the Town, leaving behind Vaughan him 10 Pieces of Ordnance and Store of Provisions, which Col. Langhorn took Possession of, and a few Days after attack'd Tenby, which was bravely defended by Commissary Gwyn; but a great Part of the Town being beaten down by Langhorn's Battery, he storm'd and took it, putting very few to the Sword; an Instance of Generosity not to be met with on the Part of the Royalists in the whole Course of this unnatural War. Col. David Gwyn, High Sheriff of the County of Pembroke, and about 300 Soldiers, were made Prisoners, their Arms taken, and several Pieces of Ordnance. With the Reduction of this Town and Carew Castle, all Pembrokehire fell under the Command of the Parliament.

Colonel Hastings in Leicestershire carry'd on the War for the King with great Safety and Glory, for hearing that about 200 Ministers, Church Wardens, and other Officers of that County, were repairing to Leicester to take the Covenant, he lay in wait for them about Diston and Lutterworth, took near 100 of them, and carry'd them Prisoners to Hinckley, which the Garrison of Leicester hearing of, a Party of them march'd away immediately, fell upon Hastings's Quarters in the Night, routed his Soldiers, rescu'd all the Ministers and their Companions, took 50 of the Cavaliers, 150 Horses, with some Arms and Ammunition. About the same Time, the latter end of March, there was an Action at Newark which was much for the King's Advantage. The Commissioners for Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire before mention'd, sent a Remonstrance to Oxford of the Distress and Danger they and that Town were in, unless Relief was speedily sent them, who being Persons of Condition, their Memorial had so much Weight as to procure Assistance under Prince Rupert, who came unexpectedly upon the Parliament's Forces before that Town, commanded by Sir John Meldrum, who had no Time to prepare to receive him, yet Colonel Rositer, Major Lilburne, Captain Bethel and Captain Hunt, gallantly charg'd and routed the Prince's right Wing, led on by himself; others of Meldrum's Troops did not play their Parts so well, 500 of them deserted the great Fort before they were assaulted, secur'd their Arms, and went away to Lincoln. Prince Rupert had double the Number of Meldrum's Men, and the latter could ill spare so great a Desertion; by which Means his Highness became Master of that Fort, and of the Island, where he entrench'd himself, and cut off all Provisions from coming to Meldrum, who had Newark Garrison at his Back, and Prince Rupert's Army in Front. In this Extremity the brave Scot desir'd a Parley, and Commissioners were appointed to treat on both sides. For the Prince, Sir Richard Crane, and Sir William Neal: For Meldrum, Sir Michael Hubbard, and Sir John Palgrave, who agreed that all Cannon, Arms, and Ammunition, should be deliver'd up, the Soldiers to march away with Swords, Colours and Drums; the Officers and their Servants with Arms, Bag and Baggage; but, contrary to the Articles, their Colours, Swords and Pikes were taken away, which is not worth taking

A. D. taking Notice of: For those who were fighting to enslave their Country Men, could not scruple to plunder them. The Parliament lost here 3000 Muskets, a great Quantity of Pistols, 11 Brass Guns, and two Mortar Pieces. In this little Victory there are two or three Falsities, as Mr. Archdeacon tells it. The Prince's Number was inferior to the Enemy's. Rushworth says, He had an Army of 7000 Men, and Meldrum not half that Number at the Time of raising the Siege. Meldrum's Men had Leave to lay down their Arms. The Officers and Servants had all their Arms. The Soldiers their Swords, Pikes, Colours and Drums. This Action, as great as it was, is much magnify'd by Echard, who seems to put it in Ballance with the two Victories obtain'd by Sir Thomas Fairfax, at Nantwyche and Selby, where Sir John Meldrum soon after reveng'd the Affront he met with at Newark.

Sir Thomas Fairfax having spent some Days before Latham House in Lancashire, defended by the Countess of Derby, left Sir William Fairfax, Colonel Ashton and Colonel Rigby, to carry on the Siege, and himself return'd to Yorkshire to observe Colonel John Bellasis, afterwards Lord Bellasis, whom the Marquis of Newcastle had left to command in and about York, while himself attended the Motions of the Scots. After the Junction of Sir Thomas Fairfax's Troops with those under the Lord Fairfax his Father, and some Forces brought him by Sir John Meldrum, they march'd to Selby, where they were inform'd Colonel Bellasis lay with 1500 Horse and 2000 Foot. The two Fairfax's had about the same Strength. Their forlorn Hope beat a Party of Bellasis's Horse, and follow'd them into Selby, and the next Day, April the 11th, the Lord Fairfax drew out his Army, and attack'd the Town in three Places, himself led one Division, Sir John Meldrum a second, about a Fortnight after his Retreat from Newark, and Lieutenant Colonel Needham the third, Sir Thomas Fairfax with the Horse being ready to support the Foot. The Cavaliers made a resolute Defence for two Hours. At length the Lord Fairfax's Troops beat them from the Line, but could not advance further, because of the Horse within. Sir Thomas Fairfax got a Barricado open which let in his Horse betwixt the Houses and the River. Here he was encounter'd by the Enemy's Cavalry, who after one Charge fled over a Bridge of Boats to York, but another Party of Horse came and charg'd Sir Thomas's Men again, himself was overthrown, being single, a little before his Men, who presently reliev'd him, and forc'd the Enemy back. Colonel Bellasis was wounded and taken, and the Parliament's Foot entering now on all sides, the Enemy was entirely defeated. As many as could do it sav'd themselves by flight, some towards Carwood, some towards Pontefract, and the rest towards York. The Lord Fairfax's Troops pursu'd them every way, and that Lord sent the Parliament the following List of the Officers taken Prisoners; Colonel John Bellasis, Sir John Ramsden, Colonel; Sir Thomas Strickland, Lieutenant Colonel Tyndal, Lieutenant Colonel Forbes, Major Hasketh, Major Wentworth, Major Sadlington, Major Rogers, Captain Horsefield, Captain Beversham, Captain Washington, Captain Grimston, Captain Cholmley, Captain Scudamore, Captain Williamson, Captain Merrit, Captain Turner, Captain Skelton, Captain Briggs, Captain Waterhouse, Captain Kirk, Captain Hardcastle, Captain Lister, Captain Nevil, Captain Covers, Captain Lieutenant Salvyne, Captain Lieutenant Covers; Elias Walker, Master of the Magazine, Richard Ludlow, Provost Marshal. Serjeants,

Fairf. Mem.

Trumpets, Drums, four Brass Ordnance, seven A. D. Barrels of Powder, 16 Bundles of Match, 2000 1644. Arms, 1600 common Soldiers, many Ships and Boats in the River, all their Bag and Baggage. This Victory was a terrible Blow to the Marquis of Newcastle, who before was not strong enough to make Head against the Scots, and being now Scots apprehensive that he might be shut up between Marquis of the Scots Army, within two Miles of him, and Newcastle. the Fairfax's, he made haste into York. The Earl of Leven fell on his Rear, kill'd several, and took 80 Prisoners. The Marquis arriv'd at York a Week after the Rout at Selby, and the next Day the Fairfax's join'd the Earl of Leven at Tadcaster. But the Marquis having near 5000 Horse with him, the two Armies when join'd were not sufficient to invest the City of York on all Sides, and they durst not divide themselves, the Marquis of Newcastle's Horse being ready to attack that part of them which should be weakest on a Division; Thus they were obliged to send for the Earl of Manchester and Lieutenant General Cromwel out of the associated Counties. The Earl of Manchester in his March Lincoln Northward took Lincoln by Storm, and in it Sir Francis Fane the Governor, Sir Charles Dallison, Colonel Middlemore, Colonel Bandes, two Lieutenant Colonels, two Majors, 20 Captains, 700 private Soldiers, 100 Horse, all their Arms and Ammunition, eight Pieces of Ordnance, with the Loss only of eight Men. On the King's Side about 50 were kill'd, and the rest crying out Quarter it was given them. Another generous Example, which was never given nor taken on the Part of the Enemy, whose Swords had never been drawn, had they been sensible of Principles truly generous, the Chief of which is, the Love of one's Country. The Earl of Manchester laid a Bridge of Boats over the River near Gainsborough, to hold Communication with the Lord Fairfax and General Leven, whom he join'd before York the 3d of June. The City being now invested, a Battery was rais'd near Walingate to play upon the Castle. On the 6th of June the Besieg'd fir'd most Part of the Suburbs, and the Besiegers endeavouring to quench the Fire a hot Skirmish ensu'd, but the latter succeeded not in it. There were daily such Skirmishes between the Parties on both Sides. The Royalists were animated with Hopes of Relief, and the Parliament's Forces with Hopes of putting an End to the War in the North, if they could reduce York the Capital.

Prince Rupert after raising the Siege of Newark march'd into Shropshire and took Longford House, thence he came to Stopworth in Cheshire, where the Parliament had a Garrison, which he also reduc'd, and took some Hundreds of Prisoners, with their Arms and Ammunition. This Success made the Besiegers at Latham House quit their Enterprize, and Prince Rupert with an Army of 10000 Men appear'd before Bolton, which Place he attack'd with his wonted Fury, and was repuls'd, but at a second Attack a Party of his Horse entering the Town at a Place call'd the private Akers, which Passage is suppos'd to have been betray'd to them, every one within the Town began to shift for himself, and the Prince's Troops rush'd in on all Quarters. By what follows out of Rushworth the Reader will see in what Manner the Cavaliers made War in Defence of the LAWS OF THE LAND, THE KNOWN LAWS OF THE LAND, &c. "They put about 1200 to the Sword, pursuing their Victory not only in the Town, but some Miles round, in Out-houses, Fields, Highways and Woods, killing, destroying and spoiling almost all they met, denying Quarter,

The Massacre there.

A. D. 1644. "ter, and using other Violences, besides totally plundering the Town, and slaying four Ministers." This Massacre and Robbery were so infamous, that the Party who before was hated only, was now abhorr'd, and the Falsity with which Mr. Archdeacon excuses this Butchery adds to the Guilt of it. The Garrison had hang'd up one of the Prince's Captains. Mr. Rusworth inquir'd into this Matter, and says, As I find not this Captain's Name any where mention'd, so the other Party wholly deny'd that Part of the Story. Colonel Rigby, a Member of Parliament, who commanded in Bolton, escap'd with some scatter'd Forces to Bradford in Yorkshire.

And Liverpool. Prince Rupert advanc'd to Liverpool, where Colonel Moore was Governor, who finding it was not tenable against so great a Force, drew off his best Ordnance, Arms and Ammunition, and at last most Part of his Soldiers, and richest Goods in the Town, and safely conveyed them Aboard the Ships in the Poole, after which Prince Rupert's Men enter'd the Place, and being disappointed of Plunder reveng'd themselves upon the Inhabitants, and those Soldiers who were left behind, whom they butcher'd. As the Prince march'd to Blackburn he was skirmish'd with by Colonel Shuttleworth, but his Power was too great for such Opposition. His Army being increas'd to near 20000, with which he advanc'd to the Relief of the Marquis of Newcastle, who in the mean Time had amus'd the Parliament's Generals with a Treaty to surrender Tork upon Articles, till he had Advice of his Highness's Approach with so powerful an Army.

Commissioners were appointed on both Sides; for the Marquis of Newcastle were, the Lord Widdrington, Sir Thomas Glemham, Sir William Wentworth, Sir Richard Hutton, Sir Thomas Mottam, and Sir Robert Strickland. For General Lesley were appointed, the Earl of Lindsey, and the Lord Humbee. For the Lord Fairfax, were Sir William Fairfax, and Colonel White. For the Earl of Manchester, Colonel Russel, and Colonel Hammond. A Cessation of Arms was agreed upon, and the Place of Treaty a Tent between two Forts. The Marquis's Commissioners would not accept of the Conditions offer'd by the Besiegers, but behav'd with great Haughtiness, and the Treaty was broken off. On the 16th of June Major General Crawford sprung a Mine in the Earl of Leven's Attack, by which a Tower belonging to the Manor near Botham Bar was blown up, and in the Fall of it many Town's Men and Women kill'd; 200 Scots enter'd at the Breach and took the Manor, but the Garrison taking the Alarm their Forces flock'd thither from all Parts and surrounded the Scots, who fought resolutely as long as their Powder lasted, but were most of them kill'd or taken. There were only a few light Skirmishes afterwards, and on the first of July the three Generals drew off their Armies to meet and give Battle to Prince Rupert before his Conjunction with the Marquis and the Garrison of Tork. Warwick, whose Invention is not so good as the Earl of Clarendon's, though his Will is, assures us they drew off, not with an Intention to fight him, but out of Fear, and to quit the Siege.

Battle of MAR-STON
Moor.

The Earls of Manchester and Leven, and the Lord Fairfax, march'd to Hessam Moor, commonly call'd Marston Moor, and drew up in Battalia, expecting the Prince would have made that his Way to Tork, but his Highness, intent on the Relief of the City, caus'd only a Party of his Horse to face the Enemy on the Moor, near a Bridge, where they might at Pleasure secure their Retreat, and in the mean Time himself, with about 200 Horse march'd to Tork on the other Side of the River, but his Foot and Ordnance quarter'd that Night in the Forest of Gortrey, within five Miles of the City. The Parliamentarians finding themselves disappointed, and that the Prince had relieved Tork without fighting, quarter'd that Night at Long Marston and the adjacent Towns, a great part of their Horse staying on the Moor. The next Day they resolv'd to march to Tadcaster, Carwood, and Selby, partly to possess the River, and thereby hinder him from furnishing Tork with Provisions out of the East Riding, and partly to obstruct his March Southwards; his Highness having scarce any other Way left, the Earl of Denbigh, and the Lancashire Forces being advancing from the West, whence he came.

Accordingly on the 2d of July, the Parliament's Foot and Artillery were commanded to march towards Tadcaster, the Scots in the Van, but before they were arriv'd within a Mile of that Town notice was given them, that the Prince with the Van of his Army was come upon Marston Moor, and press'd close upon their Rear as if his Resolution was to draw on a Battle, upon which the Foot and Carriages were order'd back with all speed. The Prince had possess'd himself of so much of the Moor, and advanc'd so near them, that they had not Room enough to draw up there, but were forc'd to do it in a large Field of Rye, which being a rising Ground the Prince sent a Party to hinder them of that Advantage, but they were beaten back, and the Corn Field possess'd by the Parliamentarians, whose Pioneers made way to get Ground whereon to extend the Wings of their Army, placing their right Wing just by Marston Town side, the Town on their right Hand, fronting on the East, and as their Foot and Horse came up form'd their Battalia and left Wing, endeavouring to gain as much of the left Point as they could; thus their Army at last fronted to the Moor, from Marston to Topwith, a Mile and half in length. The Prince having part of his Foot behind Owse, was as late as they before he had fully drawn up, but about three a Clock both Armies were pretty well form'd. When the Forces had join'd him out of Tork he had about 14000 Foot and 9000 Horse, and 25 Pieces of Ordnance, himself led the right Wing, consisting of 100 Troops, in all 5000 Men; the left Wing of the Royalists was led by Sir Charles Lucas and Colonel Hurry, who had deserted the Parliament's Service; their main Body was left to the Command of General Goring, Major General Porter, and Major General Tellier. The Marquis of Newcastle had no general Command, and it is certain he was against Fighting, as well as disgusted at the Prince's coming, and Carriage towards him. He was of Opinion, not to give Battle till Colonel Clavering came up with 3000 Foot, which he expected every Day out of the North, but his Highness declar'd he had a Letter from the King, commanding him to fight the Enemy, and he would not miss that Opportunity.

The Parliament's three Armies had been so diminish'd by Detachments into Lancashire, and other Counties, that when join'd they exceeded not the Prince's in Number, being about 24000 Men Horse and Foot. The two Armies made near 50000 Men, and the Armies in the West, the Midland Counties, the Forces in the Garrisons, and other Places, were at this Time computed to amount on both Sides to above 100000 Men. The right Wing of the Parliament's Horse consisting of 80 Troops, was commanded by

Sff

A. D. 1644. by Sir Thomas Fairfax, being his own, and part of the Scots Horse; their Body was under the Command of the Earl of Leven and the Lord Fairfax, and their left Wing, consisting of about 70 Troops, was commanded by the Earl of Manchester and his Lieutenant General Cromwel. The Prince's Army extending farther in Front than the Parliament's, a Party of Scottish Dragoons were posted there under the Command of Colonel Frizel. The Field Word given by the Prince was, God and the King; that of the Parliament's Army, God with us. The Connonading lasted two Hours without considerable Execution. About five a Clock there was a general Silence, each Side expecting who should begin the Charge, there being a small Ditch and a Bank between the two Armies, though their Wings were within Pistol Shot. They continu'd so long in this Posture that it was thought there would have been no Action that Night; but about seven a Clock the Parliament's Generals resolv'd to fall on, and the Signal being given, the Earl of Manchester's Foot, and the Scots of the main Body advanc'd in a running March, soon made their way over the Ditch and Bank and gave a smart Charge. Prince Rupert with his Division of Horse advanc'd against that Division of the Enemy where Cromwel was in Person, and put him hard to it, his Highness having with him his best Men, who charg'd Cromwel's both in Flank and Rear, and stood at Swords Point a pretty while hacking one another, but at last Cromwel broke through, and at the same Time the rest of his Horse of that Wing, and Major General Lesley's Regiments, which behav'd very well, had wholly broken all that right Wing of the Prince's, and were in Chase of them beyond their left Wing. Thus we see that it was not his Highness's too great Intrepidity and Precipitation here which lost the Victory, as at Edge-hill and Naseby. The Earl of Manchester's Foot on the right Hand of them went on by their Side almost as fast as they, dispersing and cutting down the Prince's Foot. The Marquis of Newcastle's Regiment of White Coats were almost wholly cut in pieces; they scorn'd to fly, and were slain in Rank and File. The rest of that part of the Prince's Army which escap'd killing or being taken fled in Confusion towards Tork.

But the Prince's left Wing under Colonel Hurry had better Success, he did as much to the Parliament's Right, for though Sir Thomas Fairfax with 5 or 6 Troops charg'd through them, and went to their own left Wing, the rest of his Forces were defeated; and the Lord Fairfax's Brigade being furiously attack'd, and at the same Time disorder'd by some of Sir Thomas Fairfax's new rais'd Regiments, who wheel'd about, and being hotly pursu'd flying back upon them, and upon the Reserve of the Scottish Foot, broke them wholly, and trod many of them under Foot. Thus their right Wing, and part of their main Body were routed, and fled out of the Field several Miles towards Tadcaster and Cawood, giving out that all was lost. The Royalists were pursuing, and just ready to seize all the Carriages, when Cromwel with his Horse, and Manchester's Foot, came back from the Chase, and finding their Friends had in the mean Time been worsted, he advanc'd in good Order to a second Charge with all the Prince's Horse and Foot that had thus disorder'd their right Wing and main Battle. The Royalists seeing them approach gave over the Pursuit, and prepar'd to receive them, both Sides not being a little surpriz'd to find they must fight the Battle over again, for a Victory which they each thought they had already gain'd; however, the Royalists march'd with great Resolution down the Corn A. D. Field, the Face of the Fight being exactly 1644. chang'd, for now the King's Forces stood on the same Ground, and with the same Front which the Parliament's right Wing had before; and the Parliament's Forces on the same Ground, and with the same Front which the King's had before. The Fight being renew'd grew desperate, but in fine, after the utmost Efforts of Strength and Courage on either Side, Victory wholly inclined to that of the Parliament, who before Night had clear'd the Field, and not only recover'd their Ordnance and Carriages, which were in so much Danger, but took all the Prince's Train of Artillery, and follow'd the Chase with great Slaughter within a Mile of Tork, into which City Prince Rupert got by the Goodness of his Horse. Of the King's Forces above 4000 were slain, and 1500 taken Prisoners, among whom were Sir Charles Lucas, Major General Porter, Major General Tillier, Mr. Goring, Son to the Lord Goring, Colonel Bwre, Son to the Lord Bwre, Mr. Edward Talbot, Brother to the Earl of Shrewsbury, Major Vavasor, the three latter Papists, and 100 other Officers, 10000 Arms, 100 Colours, and all their Bag and Baggage. Some of the Colours were sent up to the Parliament by Captain Stewart, and among them were several with notable Devices and Motto's. I shall only mention one of them, to shew the good Will, good Sense, and good Manners of the Cavaliers. In the middle of it was a Lion Couchant, and behind him a Mastiff seeming to snatch at him; and in a Label from his Mouth was written KIMBOLTON, at his Feet little Beagles, and before their Mouths P Y M, P Y M, P Y M, and out of the Lion's Mouth a Label with these Words, Quo usque tandem abutere patientia nostra. There was also taken the Marquis of Newcastle's Cabinet of Papers, where were found several Letters from Sir John Hotham, with the Marquis's Commission of General, empowering him to raise Men and Money, and to make Knights. Of the Parliamentarians not above 300 were slain. This glorious Victory was owing chiefly to the Valour and Conduct of Lieutenant General Cromwel, who was wounded in the Neck, Sir Thomas Fairfax in the Face, Major Fairfax, of his own Regiment, received 30 Wounds, of which he died at Tork, and Sir Thomas's Brother, Mr. Charles Fairfax, being mortally wounded, died, and was bury'd at Marston, Ætat. 23. Captain Micklewhaite, a very brave and honest Gentleman, was slain; as also a Lieutenant Colonel, whose Name is not remember'd, and a few other Officers. The very next Morning after the Battle the Marquis of Newcastle took a Resolution to leave the Kingdom, as if he was afraid of that Liberty for which his Country Men were fighting. Having taken his Leave of Prince Rupert he was conducted by a Troop of Dragoons to Scarborough, where he embark'd aboard a Ship bound for Hamburg, together with his two Sons, Charles Lord Viscount Mansfield, Henry Lord Cavendish, Lord Falconbridge, Lord Widdrington, Earl of Elnhyne, Earl of Carnwarth, Sir Charles Cavendish his Brother, Dr. Bramhall, Bishop of Londonderry, Sir William Carnaby, General King, Colonel Basset, Sir William Vavasor, Sir Edward Widdrington, Sir Hugh Cholmley, Sir Francis Mackworth, Colonel Moxon, and about 80 other Persons, who doubted not but that Battle was decisive, and would put an End to the War, but the Earl of Essex's ill Success in Cornwall continu'd it a Year longer, though the King's Condition grew every where worse, and the Continuance of it only made more Sacrifices

Marquis of Newcastle, and other Lords, leave England,

A. D. 1644. to Spiritual and Temporal Tyranny. Almost all the Accounts given of this Battle by the Earl of Clarendon, and the Writers on that Side are wrong, and a sure Proof of it is, that they all differ from one another, and therefore cannot be right. The Earl of Clarendon, who is always foremost on those Occasions, says, the Scots General the Earl of Leven, ran away so far from the Place of Battle, that he was taken hold of by a Constable as if he had been a Vagabond. Orleans assures us, Prince Rupert, according to his usual Custom, pursu'd those that fled too far, whereas Prince Rupert's Wing was the first part of the Royalist's Army that was routed and fled. Echard says, his Highness gave the Command of the right Wing to the Marquis of Newcastle, whereas he had no Command at all, but engag'd in the Battle as a Voluntier, if the Marquis's Wife, who wrote his Life, knew any Thing of the Matter, for she tells us, His Friends advis'd him not to engage, the Command being taken from him. Salmonet says, He had no Command in the Army, and that after the Defeat Prince Rupert took away his Commission. He is false as to the latter, for Newcastle refus'd to serve in England, and his Commission was found in his Cabinet, and the Battle was actually begun before he came into the Field. Sanderson affirms the Parliament Army had all the Choice of the Ground; and we have seen that they were so far from having such Choice that they had no Ground at all till the Pioneers made it for them; but there is a Letter in Rushworth, written by a Gentleman Soldier on the same Side still, which shews us what Sort of Accounts the Cavaliers gave of their Battles; 'tis from one Serjeant Francis, to his Father in Somersetshire.

Dear Father,
THESSE are to signify unto you certain Occurrences here: Prince Rupert hath utterly defeated the bonny Scots and REBELS, that besieged York; taken General Leshley; and that ARCH-REBEL Sir Thomas Fairfax Prisoners; slain the Earl of Manchester, and taken 48 Pieces of Ordnance, and 10000 Arms; and not left them so much as a blue Bonnet. Time will not give me leave to send you the Particulars; but it is certify'd by an Express, and under his Highness Prince Rupert's own Hand, and therefore you may credit it and make it known.

Yours, &c.

As wild as this Relation is, it is very common for their best History Writers to assert Things on no better Authority, as I have prov'd and could further prove out of Clarendon and Echard.

Prince Rupert left Sir Thomas Glemham, Governor of York, and went to Burrough Bridge, where he rally'd his scatter'd Forces, join'd Col. Clavering, and thence march'd into Lancashire. The Parliament Army return'd to the Siege of York, July the 4th, and after having lain 11 Days before it, Sir Thomas Glemham surrender'd the City upon Articles. Then the Earl of Leven march'd with the Scots Army to Newcastle, which he took by Storm; and therein the Earl of Crawford, the Lord Maxwell, and Dr. Wisbart, a Divine, who had been as resolute as any one in Defence of the Town against the Parliament.

York surrender'd.

Earl of Manchester.

The Lord Fairfax was made Governor of York, and the Earl of Manchester return'd to the associated Counties, where he was commanded to recruit his Army. He sent Lieut. Colonel Lilburn to take in Tickhill Castle, and Major General Crawford to reduce Sheffield Castle: Both which surrender'd on moderate Articles.

Fretchville House and Bolsover Castle follow'd A. D. their Example, as did also Wingfield Manor, 1644. and Welbeck House, belonging to the Marquis of Newcastle.

Having taken a View of the War in the North, where the Dispute is pretty well over, we must do the like by that in the South and West.

Early in the Year the Earl of Forth and the Lord Hopton, with an Army of 13 or 14000 Men enter'd Hampshire, with a Design to break the Strength of the Southern Association: This Cheriton Army was met March the 29th, on Cheriton Down, near Allresford, by that of the Parliament, consisting of about 10000 Men under the Command of Sir William Waller, General, Sir William Balfour, Sir Arthur Haslerigge, Sir Michael Livesey, and Major General Browne. The Field Word of both Armies happen'd to be at first, the same, God with Us; which by some Accident being made known to Waller, he chang'd it on his Side to Jesus help Us. Hopton's Forces for a while seem'd to have the better of it, but were afterwards totally routed. The Lord John Stuart, Brother to the Duke of Richmond, and Colonel Sandys were kill'd in the Fight, as were Sir John Smith, who recover'd the King's Standard at Edgehill, Colonel Richard Manning, Lieutenant Colonel Scot, Captain Rookwood, all Papists; Colonel Appleyard, Sir Edward Stawell, and Sir Henry Bard, lately come out of Ireland, were taken Prisoners; his Regiment and another newly come from that Kingdom were the first that ran away. The other Foot Regiments stood stoutly to it on both Sides, and came up to push of Pike. The London Regiments drove the Enemy from the Hedges, which they had lin'd with Musketeers, and gain'd the Passage to a Wood, which stood the Parliament's Forces in great stead. The Royalists were soon after put to an entire Rout, scarce ten of them being left together. Their General Forth, and the Lord Hopton fled to Basing, Part of their Ordnance, their Arms, Bag and Baggage were left to the Parliament, 500 of them were slain in the Battle, and many more in the Pursuit, on the Parliament's Side about 100 were slain, Colonel Dalbier wounded, and Colonel Thompson's Leg shot off. Amidst the Rejoicings at Oxford for the raising the Siege of Newark, came Advice of this signal Defeat given the King's Forces, under his Captain General, which damp'd their Joy, and their glad Hearts became exceeding sorrowful. Waller coming to Waller Winchester had the Gates open'd to him: Sir William Balfour took Andover; and receiving chester, Notice that the Lady Hopton was about Newbury, he sent out a Party, who surpriz'd her, Hopton with two Coaches and 12 Horses, and near 200 Persons in Company. The Lady was dismiss'd, and sent to Oxford, with her own Plate, Jewels and Baggage, but the rest were made Prize.

On the 19th of April a Common Hall was City of holden in the City of London, to whom repair'd London. a Committee of both Houses of Parliament, to stir up the City to contribute towards a speedy recruiting the Armies. The Earl of Warwick said, As A Cause of God, and the publick Liberty, so you will there. not be wanting now in drawing your selves into the Field, with all our Armies, to defend God's Cause and the publick Liberty. The Cause against that of God and the publick Liberty, is that which has the Blessing of Mr. Archdeacon Echard, and the Panegyrics of the Earl of Clarendon. Sir Henry Vane told them, Their Troops had behav'd themselves with so much Gallantry, that the Enemy apprehends no Forces like unto those that were out of this City, being

A. D. 1644. ing Persons, who for Religion, for Faithfulness to the Cause, and for Publickness of Spirit to the Parliament, have ever shewn themselves as firm and as forward as any whatsoever. The Earl of Essex, Lord General, said, You have been inform'd of the Victory which God hath given Sir William Balfour and Sir William Waller. He put Sir William Balfour first, though Sir William Waller was General of that Army, and this is the best Proof we have of the Earl of Essex's Jealousy of Waller's Greatness, and that Disagreement between them, which sometime after occasion'd the dividing of their Forces, which expos'd the Earl of Essex to the Danger and Disgrace he met with in Cornwall. He concluded, Whatsoever Forces you are pleas'd to draw out, I shall venture my Life with them, and be ready to give a quick End to this Cause. The Earl of Pembroke ended his Speech thus, I doubt not but your Care, and your Love, and your Fidelity, will make that Issue that will quit the Kingdom of all those VILLAINS who have been the Cause of so much Effusion of Blood. These very Men, so term'd by his Lordship, are in the Earl of Clarendon's History, the Pious, the Noble, the Warlike and Wife, to a Man.

Essex jealous of Waller.

Col. Holles said, The Parliament depend upon your Affections, and desire you to offer your selves as one Man; for it is to no Purpose to go by little and little; it is but as a little Water thrown on the Fire, that does but enrage and will not quench it. The Recorder Glyn was the last who spoke; and all their Speeches had such an Effect, that there were no less than 8400 Auxiliaries rais'd, half of which was sent to Waller, and the other half join'd the Lord General's Army, which was speedily recruited and rendezvouz'd at Beconsfield, from whence he march'd to Wickham the 14th of May, where we must leave him some Time to take a little Notice of what is done at London, where Archbishop Laud had been brought to his Trial, which we shall abridge after Pryn's Account of it.

Archbishop Laud's Trial.

This Trial commenc'd the 12th of March, when the Archbishop was brought to the Bar of the House of Lords, where he kneel'd down, and was commanded to rise by the Lord Grey of Werke, Speaker of that most Honourable House, and then Mr. Serjeant Wylde, by Way of Introduction, related the Heads of his Offences. "If all the Oppressions, all the pernicious Practices and Machinations which have been in each Time to ruin our Religion, Laws and Liberties, were lost, I think here they might be found and drawn out again to the Life. His Faults are so wilful, so universal, so destructive to the Laws of God and Man, so comprehensive of all the Evils and Miseries which now we suffer, the Sin would be upon our own Heads if we should not call for Justice, &c." The Serjeant proceeds, "How Churchmen in all Ages, as hath been observed, should come to be the archest Seedsmen of Mischief, and principal Actors in all the great Distractions and Alterations that have happen'd, is a Destiny that may seem strange. But the Reason is, ex bono Theologo malus Medicus. Their intermeddling with temporal Things, and Matters heterogenous to their Calling, wherein God is pleas'd to smite them with Blindness, and to insatuate their Counsels, whereof a perfect Pattern we have in this great Prelate, who, by abusing his Profession, and making the Business of State the customary Subject of all his Endeavours, became the Author of all the illegal and tyrannical Proceedings in the Star-Chamber and High Commission Court and other Courts, of all the Innovations in Doctrine and Discipline, of the suppressing of godly Ministers and Preaching, of the advancing of others who were the Promoters of Popery and Arbitrary Power, and indeed of all the Concussions and Distractions in Church and State, whereby Religion hath been justled out, Laws and Parliaments trodden down under Contempt, &c." When the Serjeant had done, the Archbishop desir'd Leave to speak, and it being granted, he made a long premeditated Oration, which he had written in his Hand, of which nothing is more remarkable than this; I do here challenge whatsoever is between Heaven and Hell, that can be said against me in Point of my Religion. What was said against him, is by the Parliament in the first Article, That he hath traiterously endeavour'd to subvert God's True Religion by Law establish'd in this Realm, and instead thereof to set up Popish Superstition, which was prov'd upon him by Sir Nathaniel Brent Vicar-General to Archbishop Abbot, and Dr. Featly Household Chaplain to that great Prelate, by whose Evidence it appear'd, that no Chapel in Rome could be more idolatrous than his at Lambeth, nor more full of offensive Pictures and Images, taken from the Images and Pictures in the Mass-Book. The like Idolatry and Superstition were introduc'd by him in the King's Chapel, as was testify'd by Sir Henry Mildmay. His causing the Communion-Table to be remov'd to the East End of the Church, to be rail'd in and plac'd on an Ascent for Adoration, was another Evidence of his Idolatry. But he deny'd, when Sir Nathaniel Brent made Oath to it that he had ever given Directions to him about it; Upon which Sir Nathaniel said, My Lords, on the Oath I have taken, I receiv'd express Command from the Archbishop himself to remove and rail in Communion-Tables in his Metropolitick Visitation. The Archbishop reply'd, I protest I never gave him any, and I wonder Sir Nathaniel dares be so bold as to assert it upon Oath, since I can prove he formerly deny'd it. To this Sir Nathaniel answer'd, My Lords, since the Archbishop so confidently denies that he ever gave me any such Directions, I shall humbly desire that this Letter of his, sent to me while I was visiting at Maidstone, may be read, for it will soon end the Controversy. The Letter was as follows.

Sir,

I Require you to command the Communion Table to be placed at the East or upper End of the Church, and there rail'd in; and that the Communicants there shall come up to the Rails to receive the blessed Sacrament; and the like you are requir'd to do in all Churches.

W. CANT.

This Letter being read, says my Author, much daunted and discredited the Archbishop in the Opinion of all the Auditors, he having nothing to reply but that he had forgotten it.

The impious Book of Sports on the Lord's Day was his own Work. Sir Nathaniel Brent prov'd that he gave him special Charge to suspend Mr. Culmer, Mr. Players, Mr. Hieron, three eminent Ministers in Kent, for not reading the said wicked Book. Mr. Wilson, another Minister, being conven'd before the Archbishop himself, and ask'd by him, Whether he had publicly read the Book of Sports in his Church? Upon his saying, No, the Archbishop said, I suspend you for ever from your Office and Benefice till you read it.

Another

A. D.

Another Instance of his Endeavours to introduce Popery, was his prosecuting Mr. Henry Gellibrand and his Servant William Beale, in the High Commission Court, for publishing an Almanack, in which the Names of the Popish Saints were left out, and some holy Martyrs put in their Place, according to Mr. Fox's Calendar. Mr. Gellibrand was Professor of the Mathematicks at Gresham College, and his Man Beale learn'd enough under him to compose an yearly Almanack for the Stationer's Company. Laud was then Bishop of London, and he carry'd on the Prosecution with great Violence; but Archbishop Abbot and the general Vote of the Commissioners acquitted Gellibrand; upon which the Bishop stood up in a Fury, and told the Court, The Queen her self sent for him, and specially complain'd to him against this Almanack, which gave great Offence to those of her Religion, and desir'd him to prosecute the Author of it, and suppress the Book; and therefore he hop'd he should not pass unpunish'd in that Court. However the Court acquitted him, and the Bishop in a great Rage said to Gellibrand, Sir, you have made a Faction in this Court, for which you ought to be punish'd; and know that you are not yet discharg'd hence; I will sit upon your Skirts, (a very common Menace with him) for I hear you keep Conventicles at Gresham College after your Lectures there. Accordingly he gave Order for a second Prosecution against him in the High Commission Court, which so affected that pious and learned Professor, that it threw him into a Fever, of which he dy'd. Here Laud frankly confesses he was an Agent for the Queen and her Papists, and it was too notorious to be controverted by Men of Integrity and Modesty.

One Dr. Pocklington, a Creature of his, publish'd a Book call'd Altare Christianum, wherein that Author stil'd those Popish Legendary Saints, left out by Mr. Fox in his Calendar, Holy Martyrs and Confessors of Jesus Christ, and reviles Mr. Fox's Protestant Martyrs as Traytors, Murderers, Rebels, Hereticks; which godly Book was found curiously bound and gilt in the Archbishop's Closet, being an acceptable Present from his Friend Pocklington.

His causing Auricular Confession to be preach'd up, with Penance and Absolution, after the Romish manner, was too easily prov'd upon him to admit of the least Doubt, especially in the Case of Mr. Adams of Cambridge, who made a Sermon on Purpose to restore the Popish Confession and Absolution, in which he was oppos'd by those eminent Divines Dr. Ward, Dr. Brownrigge, Dr. Love, Dr. Beacherot, Dr. Holdsworth, Dr. Bambridge, and encourag'd and supported by Dr. Cofins, Dr. Sterne, Dr. Collins, Dr. Smith, Dr. Cumber, Dr. Lany, Dr. Martin, Dr. Eden. But the major Vote was against Adams, and he was order'd to recant; which he was so far from submitting to, that he maintain'd Auricular Confession in his Act Questions. Thus we see how furiously they were driving towards Rome.

That the Doctrine of Transubstantiation was approv'd by Laud, appears by a Speech of his in the Star-Chamber. Purgatory, Processions, Oblations, Monkeny, Prayers to the Virgin Mary, Ave's, Celibacy of Priests, Consecrations, Tapers, Candlesticks, Bowings, Altars, and the like, were fix'd upon him by a Cloud of Witnesses; as was his Hatred to the Reform'd Churches abroad and their Brethren in England, which appear'd to the Scandal of the Christian Church, in his opposing Contributions for the Maintenance of the exil'd Ministers, driven out of the Palatinate by the Spaniards. The Queen of Bohemia had sent one Mr. Ruly into England to promote that charitable Deed, and he procur'd a Patent by the Favour of the Lord-Keeper Coventry and Secretary Cooke; but when he carry'd it to Lamberth for the Archbishop's Licence to have it printed, Laud refus'd it, because it was said in the Patent, that the Charity was for Persons of the same Religion, which he would not allow, and complain'd of it to the King, who sent for the Lord-Keeper Coventry and Secretary Cooke, and they acquainted his Majesty, that the Patent was made Verbatim according to former Precedents, and it was now pass'd the Seal, and could not be alter'd. The King reply'd, It must be alter'd, for the Archbishop will have it so, and another must be drawn according to his Mind; which was done, and these Words left out, This Extremity is fallen upon them for their Sincerity and Constancy in the True Religion, which we together with them do profess, and which we are all bound in Conscience to maintain to the utmost of our Powers. Laud would not allow that we are all bound in Conscience to maintain the Reform'd Religion abroad, or indeed that it was the True Religion, for he struck out the Word True. To this he made a very weak Defence, and urg'd his Reason for leaving out those Words, because by the Religion of the Palatines the Pope was declar'd to be Antichrist, which had never been determin'd by any Council, whereas it was prov'd that the Synod of Gap in France, A. D. 1603. the Synod or Convocation of Ireland, A. D. 1615. the Synod and Parliament of England in the Act for the Subsidy of the Clergy, 3 Jac. define the Pope to be Antichrist. Most of his Defences are turn'd against him as directly as this, and there is no need of enlarging on the Second Branch of the Parliament's Charge touching his Endeavours to reconcile the Church of England to the Church of Rome, the First Branch including the Second; for by traiterously endeavouring to subvert the Protestant Religion, he of course endeavour'd to re-establish Popery.

As to State-Matters, the Charge against him was, That he hath traiterously endeavour'd to subvert the Fundamental Laws and Government of the Kingdom, and instead thereof to introduce an Arbitrary Power; which grand Article was spread into several Branches.

His traiterous Endeavours to subvert God's True Religion by Law establish'd.

His Usurpation of a Papal Power in Derogation of his Majesty's Royal Prerogative, and the Subjects Liberties.

His traiterous Endeavour to subvert the Rights of Parliament.

The first Part of the Evidence was manag'd by John Maynard, Esq; March 13th, 16th, 18th, and 28th: The Forenoons for the Evidence: The Afternoons for the Archbishop's Answers, and Mr. Maynard's Replies. The Second Part of the Evidence was manag'd by Robert Nicholas, Esq; which took up April 16th, May 4th and 16th. The third Part concerning Religion, was manag'd by John Wylde, Esq; Serjeant at Law, May 20, 27. June 6, 11, 17, 20 and 27th. and July 20 and 24th. The fourth and last Part of the Evidence was manag'd by Mr. Nicholas the 29th of July, and concluded the same Day.

The Archbishop had three Council allow'd him, Mr. Chute, Mr. Herne, and Mr. Hale, and after all the Evidence was given, and the Answers and Replies severally made, the Archbishop desir'd he might make a general Recapitulation of his whole Defence before the Lords, which accordingly he perform'd on the 2d of September.

A. D. 1644. To which Samuel Browne, Esq; reply'd, and on the 11th of September summ'd up the principal Parts of the Evidence against him at the Lords Bar, answering the Archbishop's Allegations and Defences. This Browne was that eminent Lawyer afterwards Sir Samuel Browne, made a Judge of the Common Pleas by King Charles the Second, of whom Rusworth says, he invalidated all the Archbishop's Defences and Allegations. Now see how modest Mr. Echard represents it; The Innocence of this Prelate, and the Malice of his Enemies, are hardly to be match'd in any Account of primitive Persecution. Prynne tamper'd with the Witnesses. The Earl of Cork, Sir Nathaniel Brent, Sir Henry Mildmay, Captain Mildmay, Thomas Challoner, Esq; Dr. Featly, were some of the Witnesses with whom Echard tells us Mr. Prynne tamper'd; and then to shew he is as wise as modest, he adds, The Archbishop reckon'd it a particular Hardship, that a Man doubly stigmatiz'd, for which the Archbishop is now going to receive his Reward, should be trusted with the Witnesses and the Evidence against him. All the World knew that this imperious Prelate had spirited up the bloody Prosecution against Mr. Prynne, who was innocent in the Judgment of the whole Kingdom, except the corrupt Part of the Clergy and their Disciples, and the Voice of his Country so far declar'd him innocent, as to return him a Member in all the succeeding Parliaments which were regularly chosen, and trust'd him with every Thing that was dear to English Men. I take no Notice of the rest of the Archbishop's Trial and Condemnation, as 'tis reported by Mr. Archdeacon, because 'tis one continued Misrepresentation, and shall have recourse to Rusworth, whose Sincerity has not yet been question'd.

The Archbishop pray'd the Lords, that his Counsel might be heard in point of Law, and their Lordships consented to it. The Managers for the House of Commons desir'd they might first have Notice, What Matter of Law the Archbishop's Counsel would insist upon, which was, Whether in all, or any of the Articles charg'd against him, there was any Treason contain'd. Which was argu'd at the Lords Bar by John Herie, Esq; as the Mouth of his Counsel, and reply'd unto by the Managers, October 11th.

The Commons finding their Proceedings, in Case of the Archbishop, met with new Difficulties daily in the Lords House, and it having hung too long already, order'd an Ordinance to attaint him of High Treason upon the Evidence given against him. In pursuance of this Ordinance he was brought to their Bar, where Mr. Browne in his Presence repeated that Evidence. In answer to which the Archbishop made a Speech of some Hours in length, which so little satisfy'd the House, that they the same Day, Nov. the 11th, pass'd the Ordinance for his Attainder with but one dissenting Vote. They sent it up to the Lords, and their Lordships voted that the Archbishop was guilty of the Charge as to Matters of Fact. They voted, that he had traiterously endeavour'd to subvert the Religion, Laws, Rights and Liberties of the Kingdom. That he had usurp'd an arbitrary, tyrannical Power, in Derogation of that of the Sovereign, and they wanted only to be satisfy'd, whether all this was Treason. It was not indeed within the Statute of 25. Edward III. which determines the Government in the Person of the King, and all Treason within that Statute is only against his Person. But is it not within common Sense to know that he who would destroy the Constitution, the Religion, Laws, Rights and Liberties of the People, is a Traitor in the worst Interpretation of the Word. The Commons appointed a Committee to draw up Reasons to satisfy the Lords therein, which were communicated at a Conference Jan. the 2d. by Mr. Serjeant Wyld, Mr. Browne, and Mr. Nicholas. But the wise Warwick assures us, they were all frivolous, and whoever believe that his admirable Memoirs cannot but know how well able he was to distinguish between the Frivolous and the Important. On the 4th of Jan. the Lords pass'd the Ordinance, by which the Archbishop was to suffer Death, as in Cases of High Treason, to be drawn, hang'd and quarter'd. Mr. Archdeacon, who does really believe that the Posterity of those Lords would be asham'd of what their Fathers had done against this Prelate, prints the Names of six of them, in which I shall imitate him, with a quite different Intention, Henry Earl of Kent, Philip Earl of Pembroke, William Earl of Salisbury, Oliver Earl of Bolingbroke, Lord North, Lord Grey of Werke.

The Lords, at a Conference with the Commons, inform'd them of a Letter and a Petition from the Archbishop, and a Pardon granted him by the King, which was drawn up at Oxford by Sir Edward Hyde, who, some say, drew up the History of the Rebellion. This was like the rest of the sage Counsels at Oxford. What Heads must they have, who could think that a Piece of Paper would keep the Archbishop's Head upon his Shoulders after the Pains the two Houses of Parliament had been at to condemn him. Thus as every one else believ'd it would be, 'twas over-ru'd and rejected. The Archbishop then petition'd, that if he must die, he might have Dr. Sterne, Dr. Heywood, Dr. Martin, three of his Chaplains, who, as it appears by his Trial, had been the principal Instruments of his Tyranny and Superstition, to administer Comfort to his Soul; and that he might not be Hang'd but be Beheaded, which the Commons agreed to but not without great Difficulty. The Parliament recommended two Divines, Mr. Marshall and Mr. Palmer, to him, on this melancholy Occasion; but as he never allow'd the Presbyterian Ministers to be of the Christian Religion in his Life-time, so he would not be pray'd for by them at his Death. He was brought to the Scaffold on Tower-hill the 10th of January, where he made a Sermon on that Text, Let us run beaded with Patience, &c. wherein he endeavour'd to clear himself of the Charge against him, of a Design to introduce Popery. I have always, says he, liv'd in the Protestant Religion establish'd by Law. He would have satisfy'd all that heard him, had he said, I die in the true Protestant Reform'd Religion as it is now settled in Christendom, according to the Word of God, the Practice of the Apostles, and the primitive Church of Christ. He did not forget the Churches Patrimony in his last Prayer. Which shews us what deep Impression worldly Wealth had made on his Mind, so deep, that the Terrors of Death could not efface it. What Bishop Burnet writes of him, gives one further Reason to believe he was far from being so heavenly minded as the Lord Clarendon, and his Shadow, Mr. Archdeacon, represent him. "He was a hot, indiscreet Man, eagerly pursuing some Matters that were either inconsiderable or mischievous, as the Altar, the Walloon Churches, Book of Sports; his Severity in the Star-Chamber and the High Commission Courts, was such a visible Blemish, that nothing but the Manner of his Death could have rais'd his Character. His Diary shews him to be an abject Fawner on the Duke of Buckingham, and a superstitious

But is Be-

He intended in that to make an Appeal to the World. In most Particulars he excuses himself by this, That he was but One of Many, who either in Council, Star-Chamber, or High Commission, voted illegal Things.

Before I had seen Bishop Burnet's Character of him, I could not but have Pity for so miserable an Excuse, when there was not a Man who ever heard of him, but knew he was the Contriver, Prosecutor, and Finisher, of the illegal and inhumane Sentences in those tyrannical Courts. The Bishop of Sarum again,

" Now though this was true, that he was but one, yet a chief Minister, in high Favour, determines so much, that they are little better than Machines acted by him. On other Occasions he says, the Things were prov'd by one Witness only. Now how strong soever this Defence may be in Law, it is of no Force in an Appeal to the World, for if a Thing is true, it is no matter how full, or how defective the Proof is. The Thing that gave me the strongest Prejudice against him in that Book is, that after he had seen the ill Effects of his violent Counsels, and had been so long shut up, and so long at leisure to reflect on what had past in the Hurry of Passion, in the Exaltation of his Prosperity; he does not in any one Part of that great Work acknowledge his own Errors, nor mix in it any wise or pious Reflections on the ill Usage he met with, or the unhappy Steps he had made.

In April this Year the Parliament remitted 66000 Pounds to the Forces in one Province of Ireland that stood out against the Irish Rebels, notwithstanding the Cessation which his Majesty had made with them, for the Preservation of those Protestants whom those Rebels had not yet massacred.

His Serene Highness the Prince Elector Palatine wrote a Letter to the Parliament, Of the great Want he and his Mother were in, their Stipend from England being stopp'd. He bewail'd the Courses which his Brothers Prince RUPERT and Prince MAURICE took in fighting against them, and rejoiced to hear of the Covenant. For as the Royal House of Bohemia always possess'd the Affections of the good People of England, who always made their Succession to the Crown the Subject of their most zealous and devout Prayers, to have those good People been ever in the best Wishes of that princely Family, the Conduct of Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice for a few Years only excepted.

Some Weeks before this, Ambassadors from the States General of the United Provinces to the Parliament arriv'd at London, and were honourably receiv'd by the two Houses and the City. They brought with them Letters from the Divines in those Provinces to the Assembly at Westminster, expressing their Satisfaction in the Parliament's and their Proceedings with respect to the Covenant, and desiring there might be a Union of the Nations. Mr. Strickland, the Parliament's Minister at the Hague, having discover'd certain English Merchants, Webster, Bainham, Manning, Ford, Tard, who had been assisting in borrowing Money for the Queen on the Jewels, and buying Arms and Ammunition, they were voted Incendiaries and Enemies to the State. The Dutch Ambassadors had a publick Audience in the House of Lords, and afterwards in the House of Commons, where Chairs were set for them. They first were carry'd into the Inner Court of Wards, prepar'd for them as a Withdrawing Room; from thence they were conducted by the Serjeant at Arms with his Mace, and two Members of the House were sent to accompany them: When they came into the Parliament House, the Speaker and all the Members stood up in their Places uncover'd, and the Ambassadors saluted them as they past by them. Then they sat down in their Chairs, and the Members sat down also. When the Ambassadors were cover'd the Speaker and the House also cover'd. The former made a short Speech of their Master's Affection to these Kingdoms, and their Desire to mediate an Accord between the King and his Parliament. After their Speech was ended they return'd with the same Ceremonies as at their coming thither. During the Time of their being in the House, there lay upon the Table in their View 48 Colours taken from the King's Forces at the Battle of Marston Moor. The French Ambassador, Prince Harcourt, had no Negotiation with them, on Account of his refusing to make his Addresses in the regular Stile and Manner.

Before we follow the Parliament's Army into the West, we must take a View of the King's Affairs, which were not in a very flourishing Condition. The Mungrel Parliament at Oxford were gone home. The Scots and the Parliament's Forces had shut up the Marquis of Newcastle in York, before Marston More Fight: The Lord Hopton had been routed at Allresford, and the King had no considerable Body in the Field, but that under Prince Maurice, before Lyme. The King therefore draws his Troops out of his Garrisons to form an Army for himself; and the Queen being very near her Time left Oxford, April the 17th, to be deliver'd with more Quiet and Safety at Exeter. Queen leaves Oxford.

The Parliament had an Army of 10000 Horse and Foot under Sir William Waller, about Farnham, and another of near the same Force at Reading, under the Earl of Essex, who took Possession of Abington; and Sir Samuel Luke, Governor of Newport Pagnel, whom Butler abus'd by the Name of Hudibras, detach'd Captain Temple with a Party of Horse, to observe the Motions of the Lord Hopton in his March from Abington to Worcester. Temple was order'd not to engage, but being too forward, he fell upon three Troops of Hopton's Horse at Islip, took 50 of them, a Captain and 17 Troopers, with some good Booty; but he was question'd for not obeying Orders, and his good Service could scarce save him.

Had there been a right Understanding between Essex and Waller, there had now been an End put to the War, and they might have taken Oxford with the King in it, he having no Army to relieve him. But their Jealousy of each other hinder'd their joining heartily in the same Service. Waller's Instructions were to reduce the West, and Essex wanted that Commission himself, by the Persuasion of the Lord Robarts, who assur'd him that upon his Appearance in Cornwall the Royalists would throw down their Arms. But the Parliament order'd the two Generals to join their Armies, and besiege Oxford, if the King was there; if not, to pursue him where-ever he was, and disperse his Forces, which were in no Condition to oppose them, what they were lay about Wodstock, Kidlington, Bladon, Wolvercot. The Lord General Essex gain'd the Pass at Ainslow Bridge, and Waller that at Newbridge, the former with the Loss of Captain Dean. Lieutenant Colonel Cunningham having one Arm shot off, held up the other and cry'd out, I have one yet left to fight for the Parliament.

A. D. 1644. The King left Oxford the 3d of June, about 9 a-Clock at Night, and the next Morning muster'd his Army at North Lye, about 3000 Foot and 4000 Horse. From North Lye he march'd to Beurton on the Water, where he and the Prince lodg'd at Dr. Temple's, one of the Prince's Chaplains. From thence he march'd to Evesham, and thence to Worcester. Effex, upon Intelligence of the King's Departure, march'd to Chipping Norton; and Waller advanc'd to Stow on the Wold. By which Stations they entirely cut off the Communication between the King and Oxford; and his Majesty had no Prospect of any Help from the North. It was then debated in Parliament whether the Earl of Effex or Sir William Waller should march into the West to relieve Lyme, the Siege of which was prest by Prince Maurice, recover Exeter and succour Plymouth; but before their Pleasure was known, the Earl of Effex had drawn off his Forces for his Western March, and left Waller to pursue the King. Their Matters being thus ill concerted for Want of a good Understanding between those two Generals; the Earl of Effex met with the greatest Disgrace that happen'd to the Parliament's Party in the whole War; and Waller, if he was not beaten, was render'd incapable of acting effectually against the King. The Earl of Effex was advanc'd as far as Salisbury, when he receiv'd Orders to march back again towards Oxford, and only to send a Detachment to relieve Lyme. Much better Counsel than he took. Waller was to follow that Detachment, and himself, with the main Army to pursue the King: But Effex continu'd his March Westward; and the two Houses finding it was too late to prevent it, agreed to it. But this Conduct of theirs, and the Disagreement between him and Waller, was good Cause for the Parliament to put their Armies on another Foot, and under other Command the next Year; and from this Time their very great Reverence to the Earl diminish'd, and their Affections cool'd.

Parliament Generals ill Conduct saves the King.

In the mean while Major General Browne had a Commission granted him to command in Oxfordshire, Berkshire and Buckinghamshire, and assist in reducing the King's Garrisons about Oxford. He had 4200 Men, most of them City Auxiliaries; as the Red Regiment, under Colonel Harsnet, the Blue under Colonel Pindar, and the White under Colonel Shepherd. While he was advancing towards Oxford, Sir William Waller took Sudely Castle, where Sir William Morton, high Sheriff of Gloucestershire, Lieutenant Colonel Pareyer, Major Oldham, Major Floyd, 5 Captains, 250 common Soldiers, were made Prisoners.

Waller takes Sudely Castle.

His Majesty being inform'd that the Earl of Denbigh, Colonel Mytton, and Sir Thomas Middleton had besieg'd Dudley Castle, in Staffordshire, he sent the Lord Wilmot, with the Earl of Northampton, and the Earl of Cleveland's Brigade of Horse, and 1000 Foot to raise the Siege. Wilmot charg'd the Parliament's Forlorn, under Mytton, with such Fury that his Forces were all like to be cut off; and several Officers advis'd Denbigh not to quit his Trenches to relieve his Friends, but there to abide the Coming of the Royalists. The Earl, who had sent out Mytton to meet them, resolv'd, at all Ventures, to assist him, and drawing out his Troops, led them on in Person, giving the Cavaliers so smart a Charge, that he not only reliev'd his Friends, but repuls'd the King's Party.

Earl of Denbigh before Dudley Castle.

From Worcester his Majesty march'd to Bewdley, and Waller came to Bromesgrave and Kidderminster, within 2 Miles of him. He there expected to be join'd by Colonel Massey, and the Forces from Gloucester, by the Earl of Denbigh, Sir Thomas Middleton, Colonel Mytton, Colonel Rigby, Sir William Brereton, with the Forces out of Lancashire, Cheshire, Staffordshire, which would have made a formidable Army. And the King being apprehensive of their Junction, took a sudden Resolution to return to Oxford. To conceal his true Design he order'd some Troops of Horse to shew themselves along the Severne, towards Bridgnorth, as if he meant to march directly to Shrewsbury; upon which Waller dislodg'd, and made all the Haste he could to get before him; but his Majesty suddenly turn'd back with his Foot, and came, before Night to Worcester, whether his Horse soon after follow'd, leaving Waller two Days March behind him. This was a fine Stroke of Military Politics; and it is very plain that the King out-general'd Sir William Waller. His Majesty the next Day march'd to Evesham, where he took some of the Magistrates, for having exprest too much Kindness to the Parliament's Army, and proceeded to Broadway and Burford; from whence he sent to Oxford for his Ordnance, Arms and Ammunition, and as many Men as could be spar'd. From Burford he came to Whitney, and quarter'd his Horse in the Villages, near and upon the Banks of the River Thames, from Newbridge to Letchlade, where having staid three Nights, he held a general Rendezvous at Campfield near Woodstock; from whence he advanc'd to Buckingham, and thence made Incurfions into the neighbouring Parts, as Bedford, Dunstable, Laiton, which much alarm'd the associated Counties; and 'twas believ'd the King design'd to advance farther. This was one of the finest Marches and Expeditions during the whole Course of the War; and had it been against the common Enemy of Englishmen, would have deserv'd more Praises than even the Earl of Clarendon could bestow upon it. Waller perceiving himself dup'd, endeavour'd to recover by Speed what he had lost by Incaution. He march'd from Wardsey, near Dudley to Saltwyche, thence to Perthore, thence to Tewksbury, lately taken by Colonel Massey, thence to Stow, Shipson upon Stoure, Banbury and Chipping Norton. The King hearing he was so close to him, march'd from Buckingham to Brackley, and the next Day to Culworth. Waller quarter'd the same Night at Hanwell, and the next Day, the 28th of June, drew up his Forces in Battalia, under Crouch Hill, about half a Mile West of Banbury. The King's Army fac'd him all Day: The River Charwell between them.

A. D. 1644.

The next Morning Waller appear'd again in Copredy Battalia, and stood so, till perceiving his Majesty drew off towards Daventry, leaving a Guard of Dragoons at Copredy Bridge, he commanded Lieutenant General Middleton with two Regiments of Horse, and some Companies of Foot to fall upon his Rear. Middleton soon beat off the Guard at the Bridge, and marching over, charg'd the King's Forces, supposing them to be the Rear. But the Horse having pursu'd them a while, found a greater Party of the Royalists yet behind them. The latter had got between the Bridge and the Foot, who came over with the Horse. These Cavaliers took several Pieces of Ordnance which were brought over the Bridge, and not sufficiently guarded; so that the Parliamentarians could not make their Way back without great Loss and Difficulty, but at last they forc'd it; the Bridge being made good and secur'd for their Retreat, by the Regiments of the Tower Hamlets: The Service was very hot, while Copredy Bridge Fight.

A. D. while it lasted. On the King's Side were slain two Kentish Knights, Sir William Boreler, and Sir William Clarke. The Lord Wilmot was wounded and taken Prisoner, but rescu'd by Sir Frederick Cornwallis, and Mr. Robert Howard, who was Knighted for it. On the Parliament's side Colonel Weems, a Scots Officer, General of the Artillery, was taken Prisoner; as also Lieutenant Colonel Baker of Sir William Waller's Regiment, Lieutenant Colonel Baines, and several Officers; Colonel Middleton was dismounted amongst the King's Forces, of whom one taking him for a Commander of theirs, mounted him again, and had him make haste and kill a Roundhead. The Royalists, says Rushworth, gave out that they lost but 14 private Soldiers. Echard, who writes after the very worst of those Royalists, affirms there were but 14 common Soldiers kill'd on the King's Side. Rushworth assures us there were 100 kill'd, and 60 taken. Waller maintain'd the Bridge, and kept his Men drawn up on the other Side, both Armies facing one another the rest of that Day, and the Cannon play'd on both of them. In the Night they alarm'd each other, but little Execution was done; and in the Morning the King's Army being drawn off, Waller march'd over Copredy Bridge to Towcester. Echard's History of this Engagement is extremely merry: Waller was defeated; Waller was routed; Waller quitted the Ground; so many Soldiers ran away from him that the King was prevail'd with to send a Pardon to the rest of them, notwithstanding these Pardons had never any Effect or were more minded than old Almanacks. Sir Edward Walker, Garter King at Arms, was to carry this Pardon; but Walker would not stir till a Trumpet had been sent for a safe Conduct; and Walker said he had no Power to receive any Message from the King without Consent of Parliament. The City Regiments, after the Skirmish at Copredy Bridge, return'd to London to be recruited, and Waller following them was receiv'd more like a General who had obtain'd a Victory, than one who had been so shamefully beaten as Mr. Archdeacon represents it.

Before the Earl of Essex could reach Lyme that Town had been reliev'd by the Earl of Warwick, and the Fleet; Essex detach'd Sir William Balfour for that Service, and in his March took Dorchester, as Sir William did Weymouth, where the Lord General came the 19th of June; and the Earl of Warwick landing there, they had a Conference about the Operations of the Campaign.

The Jealousies and Misapprehensions increas'd between the Parliament and their General Essex: The latter prest for Money for his Army, and it was suggested, as if more Care was taken of supplying Waller than him. On the other hand, some of the Members seem'd to disapprove of his Conduct in marching into the West, alledging Lyme might as well have been reliev'd by a Party of Horse, without carrying the whole Army so far: To which the Earl answer'd pretty warmly, concluding one of his Letters thus; Your innocent though suspected Servant.

On the 26th of June, Essex having summon'd Wareham in vain, advanc'd to Chard in Somersetshire, where he receiv'd a Message from the Queen, who 10 Days before had been deliver'd of a Daughter, the Princess Henrietta Maria, at Exeter, she who was afterwards the beautiful Dutcheß of Orleans; 'twas to desire a safe Conduct to Bath for the Recovery of her Health; and afterwards by another Message, she desir'd a safe Conduct for Bristol, to which he return'd Answer to this Effect; That if her Majesty pleas'd, he would not only give her a safe Con- A. D. duct, but wait upon her himself to London; 1644. where she might have the best Advice and Means for restoring her Health; but as for either of the other Places, he could not obey her Majesty's Desire without Directions from the Parliament: Upon which her Majesty not judging her Person safe at Exeter, as soon as she was in a Condition to travel, remov'd from thence on Sunday the 14th of July, and took Shipping at Falmouth <sup>Queen</sup> for France, her Month being just up. The Earl leaves of Warwick had order'd several Ships to attend at England. Torbay, to intercept and hinder her Passage; yet her Majesty, with a Flemish Man of War and 10 other Ships, ventur'd out, and by the Advantage of the Wind avoided any Annoyance from the Parliament's Fleet, which however pursu'd with all the Sail they could make; and one Frigate came up and discharg'd several Shot at the Ships under Convoy of the Flemish Man of War; but the Queen's Ship being fresh and clean, out sail'd the Parliament's, and her Majesty landed safe at Brest, never seeing England again till after the Restoration.

From Chard the Earl of Essex march'd to Tiverton, where he heard that Prince Maurice having sent a Party to Barnstaple, the Town shut their Gates against them, and slew several of them. Upon this the Earl dispatch'd the Lord Roberts, with a strong Party, to secure and settle the Town. Here was one Captain Howard, who had been formerly Lieutenant to Captain Pym, in the Parliament's Service, which he deserted, and carry'd off with him 19 Horse, for which he was now try'd before a Council of War, condemn'd and executed: In Revenge of whose Death, Sir John Berkley, Governor of Exeter, having in Custody one Captain Turpin, a Sea Commander, who attempted to relieve that City when the Earl of Stamford was besieg'd in it, and for the same being indicted, was condemn'd, but hitherto repriev'd, he hang'd <sup>Capt. Tur-</sup> him up by Command of Prince Maurice. The pin bang'd Parliament took this Man's Death very ill, alledging his Case was quite different from Howard's, the latter being a Run-away, the former a fair Prisoner of War; and therefore having Serjeant Glanville in their Custody, who sat on the Bench when Turpin was condemn'd, they order'd him and the other Judges, Heath, Foster and Banks, to be impeach'd of High Treason, July the 22d. This Business and the hanging of 12 of the Parliament's Party, said to be Clothiers, soon after at Woodhouse in Wiltshire, gave occasion for preparing and hastning the Ordinance for erecting a Court Martial. The Jargon of levying Arms against the King, two Years after the King had levy'd Arms against the Parliament is so absurd, that nothing but the laudable Clemency of the two Houses could have sav'd Glanville from the Gallows, for having been accessary to the Murder of Turpin. Indeed the Creatures of the Court, in this and the following Reigns, till the Revolution, shew'd a strong Appetite to hanging, and carry'd their Point more by the Halter than by Reason and Justice.

About this Time Sir Robert Pye and Colonel Blake, afterwards the victorious Admiral, took Taunton Dean; and the Parliament Con- Taunton voy, who went with the Cavalier Soldiers to taken by Bridgwater, had Serjeant Francis's Letter a-Blake. bout Prince Rupert's Victory at Marston Moor, shewn them to mortify them; and though that Letter is one Lye from the Beginning to the End, yet it is better grounded than most Facts in their Histories; for after the Royalists had worsted one Wing of the Parliamentarians, they

A. D. immediately dispatch'd an Express to Oxford of a compleat Victory; and there was ringing of Bells upon it, and other Demonstrations of Joy; which News was carry'd as far as Bristol before that of Prince Rupert's Rout arriv'd there. Serjeant Francis's Letter is already inserted, and was so thoroughly believ'd that the Lord General Essex having receiv'd a Copy of the three Generals Relation of the Princes Defeat, he sent it by a Trumpet to Sir John Berkley, offering him a Sort of Bet that if Serjeant Francis's Letter was true, he would engage his Honour to deliver up Weymouth and Melcomb, if Sir John would engage to surrender Exeter, in Case the Account in the three Generals Letter was true: To which Sir John return'd an Answer so modest and handsome, that it is worth reading.

My Lord,

*I*N the Posture we are, 'tis very possible I may be deceiv'd in our Intelligence, and considering the Practice of some, not impossible but your Lordship may be. I am confident your Lordship hath no Intention to abuse the People. I am most sure I have not. It must be acknowledg'd your News is very unpleasant to Men of my Affection, and will not prove very prosperous to those of your Lordship's, if I am not mistaken in them, or my Arguments of them. I still incline to believe our own Account, but not to that degree of Difference as there is between Exeter and Weymouth; however, I shall receive the Assurance of either with the most equal Mind, and in the worst Event shall never want the Satisfaction of having discharg'd my Duty to my Country with an Heart as untouch'd of private Ends and Respects as any Man living, and as much

Your loving humble Servant,
John Berkley.

Irish Rebels in the King's Army taken and hang'd. On the 11th of July Colonel Obrian sent out a Party of 240 Horse and Foot from Wareham to Dorchester, who fac'd the Town several Hours, but the Inhabitants stood on their Guard, and sent to the Parliament's Garrisons at Alderbury and Weymouth for Relief; accordingly Colonel Sydenham, Major Sydenham, and other Officers, came thither with some Forces, fell upon the Cavaliers, put them to flight, and pursu'd them almost to Wareham, slew 12, and took 60 Horses, and 160 Prisoners, of whom 8 being Irish Rebels, seven of them were immediately hang'd, and the eighth was spar'd for hanging his Fellows. It was said to be in Revenge of this that the Cavaliers hang'd up the twelve Wiltshire Clothiers. Colonel Obrian was Brother to the Earl of Inchiquin, and hearing not long after that his Brother had declar'd for the Parliament, in Opposition to the odious Cessation with the horrid Massacres in Ireland, he quitted the Service he was in, and return'd to Ireland to serve under his Brother.

King's Message for Peace.

The King after the Action at Copredy Bridge intended to march Northwards and join Prince Rupert, but hearing of that Prince's Defeat he thought fit to change his Measures and go into the West, Waller being in no Condition to pursue him. From Evesham the Marquis of Herrford sent a Copy of a Message to the Earl of Essex, who communicated it to the Parliament, and 'twas intimated that the French Agent had the Original to deliver. A preposterous Way of doing Business, to send a Copy only of a Message, and to leave the Original to be deliver'd by a Person who had render'd himself obnoxious to them, with this Error in the Address, To the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Westminster, and not to the Parliament of England. His Majesty tells them, no Success of his shall divert him from endeavouring to restore Peace. This Success is the Skirmish at Copredy Bridge, and the Parliament had just receiv'd the News of the entire Rout of his Armies in the North; he promises to maintain the true Reformed Religion establish'd by Law, by which is meant, Spiritual Courts, Lay Chancellors, Excommunications, and the like, which they resolv'd to abolish, the Liberty and Property of the Subject, according to the LAWS OF THE LAND, according to the same Laws as when the Subjects were prest for Soldiers, and their Property forcibly taken from them by Ship Money, Loans, Tonnage and Poundage, and the like. The very same Laws were then in the Land, and there has been so little Appearance of real Sorrow for the unparallel'd Violation of them, that a Promise to maintain them could not but have wonderful Effects on those who were in Arms to prevent their being again violated. The Parliament had never been offer'd the least Guarantee for the Keeping of this Promise, but the same Royal Inclinations that had before so often broken it. Their Answer was, that they were considering of Propositions of Peace, and could take no farther Notice of that Message, it being but a Copy, and they not own'd as the two Houses of Parliament; any more than the Mungrel Parliament at Oxford. His Majesty had a Design upon Tewkesbury, but Colonel Massej, Governor of Gloucester, having strongly reinforc'd the Garrison, the King on a sudden made up the Hills, march'd in View of Sudely Castle over the Downs to Cobberly, Beverston Castle, Sudbury, and so to Bath, Massej continually skirmishing his Rear. At Bath the King appointed a Meeting of the Inhabitants of Somersetshire at Kingsmore, near Ilchester, where he made a long Speech to them on the 22d of July, and told them, The Parliament were ready to devour them, and to destroy the true Protestant Religion, their Liberty and Property, adding, These I am come to defend, and he that dares not venture his Life for these, I had rather have his Room than his Company. Though the Somersetshire Men were no greater Politicians than they were 40 Years after, when so many Hundreds of them were hang'd for the Protestant Religion, Liberty and Property, as the Duke of Monmouth told them, and many of them did not march away with the King, yet it is incomprehensible how they could be impos'd on to believe the Parliament of England were about to beggar and enslave them.

From hence the King march'd to Exeter, and Cherring-Essex made a Motion as if he intended a counter-ton skirmish to the East and meet him, which Prince Maurice having Intelligence of, he march'd with 4000 Horse and Foot after him, but Essex remain'd in his old Quarters about Tiverton, and hearing that the Lord Pawlett's Regiment of Horse was advanc'd to Cherrington, he sent a Party to beat up their Quarters, which they did in the Night, kill'd one Captain, some Troopers, took 60 of their Horses and all their Baggage. Essex found himself in great Perplexity by the King's getting between him and all Supplies of Men from London, and other Places. There was no way left for him but into Cornwall, whether the King seems to drive his Army before him, as a Covey of Birds are driven into a Net. The Lord Robarts indeed promis'd that he should be sufficiently supply'd there, and enabled to attack the King in Front, while Waller, or some other Parliament General, fell upon his Rear, and thus having coop'd him up they might cut

A. D. 1644. cut off his Army at Pleasure; but no Parliament Army came that way, and the King's increas'd daily by Reinforcements from Prince Maurice's Troops and his Garrisons, and by the coming in of the West Country Men, who, as Acherley observes, liv'd so far off from London, that they might not know but that Laud was really the true Protestant Religion, and Sirafford the Liberty and Property of the Subject, it being Laud's Religion, and Stafford's Politicks, which the King was fighting for.

Sir Richard Greenville's ill Practices.

Essex in his farther March Westward drove the King's Garrisons out of Mount Stamford, Plympton, Saltsb. and Greenville House, near Tavistock, belonging to that Mirror of Chivalry, Sir Richard Greenville, who was every Way equal to the Service to which he was revolted: He began it with Perfidy and Ingratitude, and continu'd it with Brutality and Cruelty. He endeavour'd to maintain the Pass at Newbridge to keep the Earl of Essex out of Cornwall, but the Parliament Army soon forc'd their Way, and the Earl possess'd himself of Launceston, where he found Store of Ammunition. He earnestly solicited the Parliament for Succours, and Major General Middleton was order'd into the West with 2500 Horse and Foot; he took some of the King's Carriages in Somersetshire, but came too late to effect any Thing for the Relief of the Earl, to whom his Majesty wrote a Letter with his own Hand the 6th Instant, and sent it by the Lord Beauchamp, the Marquis of Hertford's Son, Nephew to Essex, to propose their joining together, and obliging the Parliament to put an End to the War, but without naming any Terms, unless he took the Offer of Advantage to his Lordship and his Army to be Terms. The Earl, though very desirous of Peace on honourable Conditions, would not hear of a Treaty without Consent of his Masters, and it was a vain Proposal to a Man of his known Honour: Minds truly noble, as they are incapable of espousing a bad Cause, so are they of deserting a good one; and Heaven and Hell are not more distant than Treachery and a publick Spirit. Such Sort of Addresses must be inconceivably Shocking to a generous Soul, that had stak'd every Thing which it held dear, for the Defence of the Protestant Religion and Liberty.

King writes to the Earl of Essex

This Letter from the King was back'd by another from Prince Maurice and the Earl of Brentford, advising the Earl of Essex gravely to take his Majesty's Letter into Consideration, and that was follow'd by another from the Lord Hopton, and the Officers of the King's Army, for Commissioners on both Sides to meet and settle Matters between them, without giving the Parliament any further Trouble about it. How full of Wisdom and Honour were the then prevailing Counsels? The Earl of Essex answer'd the Earl of Brentford, That whereas he had received a Letter from his Majesty, another from his Lordship, and a third from some other Commanders, by all which a Treaty was desir'd, he thought fit to acquaint his Lordship, that it was not in his Commission to be concern'd in any such Treaty; nor could he betray the Trust repos'd in him by the Parliament. If I had not made my self so well acquainted as I am with the Reverend Historian's Notions of Religion and Honour, I should have wonder'd at his passing by this History without the least Reflection on the Perjury the Earl was tempted to commit; instead of which, he blames him, and insults him for not breaking his Oath so solemnly taken in the Covenant, and renouncing the many Protestations he had made to be faithful to the Cause he was engag'd in. 'Tis Matter of great Lamentation, that the paltry Interests of this World should so blind the Consciences of Men, whose Function it is to preach up the next, as to render them insensible not only of pious, but of moral Sentiments; and nothing could be more immoral and impious than the Earl's entring into a Treaty without the Consent of the Parliament, who had entrusted him with the Command of their Armies. True it is, the Temptation was the stronger on Account of the Difficulties he had precipitated himself into by suffering the Enemy to shut him up in a Nook of the Kingdom. The General sent up these Letters to the Parliament, and they were read at a Conference in the Painted Chamber, August the 14th. The two Houses approv'd of his Lordship's Conduct so well, that they order'd him Thanks for his Fidelity.

About this Time the Lord Wilmot, Lieutenant-General of the King's Horse, fell into his Majesty's Displeasure, and was sent Prisoner to Exeter, upon which, his Lordship being well belov'd in the Army, the old Horse Officers presented a Petition to the King, to know the Reason of his Disgrace. In Answer to which a Charge was drawn up against him, and offer'd to them for their Satisfaction. The Main of the Charge was, That by the Messenger who went with his Majesty's Letter to the Earl of Essex, the Lord Wilmot sent also a Message, to commend him kindly to the Earl, and tell him from him, he had many good Friends in the Army, that he should lay hold of this Opportunity, and then they would shew themselves, and the Court should not have Power to hinder it. Wilmot in his Reply speaks very soberly and reasonably, though Echard represents him as always in his Cups; I never had a private Treaty, nor did ever speak any Thing to the Prejudice of the Publick Cause, yet if there could be a Means found out to reconcile the just Interests of the King and Kingdom, such as becomes an honest and well affected Man to appear in, I am sure I should be very ready to engage all my Assistance, thinking it an Action that may be very well justify'd to God and all honest Men.

In the mean Time Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper Wareham and Colonel Sydenham, with about 1200 Horse taken by and Foot, drawn out of the Garrisons of Lyme, Sir A. Ash, Weymouth and Pool, came before the Town of Weymouth, and began to storm the Out-works, &c. upon which Colonel Obrian desir'd a Parley, and the Place was surrender'd on honourable Conditions; the Chief of which was, that Obrian and those Forces there that had been brought out of Ireland, should return to that Kingdom, to serve against the Irish Rebels.

As the King had out general'd Waller before Essex at Copredy Bridge Skirmish, so he did the same now by Essex, and both in one Campaign: He coop'd the latter up in a Corner, from whence there was no way left for him to escape but by Sea. Ludlow blames him for not fighting the King's Army before the western Forces had join'd him, he being till then, at least equal in Number to his Majesty's; and he adds, much Superior in Courage and Affection to the Cause. If the Parliament did not take so much Care as was expected in sending him Supplies, his Care ought to have been the greater in preventing the Want of them. And Posterity will not think the Advice of the Lord Robarts, though a Cornish Man, sufficient to justify his giving the Enemy such an Advantage over him.

There are various Accounts of the Disgrace which befel the Earl of Essex's Army in Cornwall; but Whitlock assures us his is true; and Echard's Account being almost the Reverse of it, I shall give it in the Words of the Memorialist.

A. D. 1644.

A. D. 1644. Whitl. p. 98. Effex leaves the Army. His Majesty came to Leskard, 8 Miles from Leſtrewithie, where Effex lay, and was there encompass'd by the King and Prince Maurice at Boconnoc, Sir Richard Greenville at Bodmyn, and Sir Jacob Aspley at Hull. The King's Party was desirous to fight, but upon Consultation it was held more advisable to starve the Parliament's Forces, to which End Goring with a Party of Horse, and Sir Thomas Basset with 1500 Foot, were sent Westward to stop all Provisions from the Land's End Side, and to streighten Effex by keeping his Horse and Foot close together. Effex drew his Cannon and Baggage towards Foy, but in those bad Ways his Carriages stuck, and they were much hinder'd by it. In this Distress the gallant Sir William Balfour, having a strong Body of Horse, near 3000, under his Command, and scornit to submit to an Enemy he had always hitherto been us'd to conquer, broke thro' all the King's Quarters, and got safe to Saltaſh and from thence to Phymouth, with no Loss. This is the most glorious Event in the whole War, and the disarming the Earl of Effex's few Foot by the King's powerful Army of both Horse and Foot, with all the Advantages of Ground, was so far from covering the Shame of this Insult of Sir William Balfour's, that the Glory of the King's taking away the Earl of Effex's Mens Arms is lost, in the Disgrace he suffer'd by Balfour's Horse breaking thro' all his Army, Cavalry and Infantry: And whatever Advantage his Majesty would have had the World believe he had gain'd by disarming Effex's Foot, People talk'd more of Sir William Balfour's Gallantry than of the King's Victory. The Parliament's Foot made a brave Defence some Time after their Horse was gone; but Effex's leaving them, and taking with him the Lord Robarts, Sir John Meyrick, and other Officers, it was too great a Discouragement for them to defend themselves longer. It is true Major-General Skippon propos'd it to them in this Speech.

Major Gen. Skippon's Speech to them. Gentlemen, "YOU see our General and some chief Officers have thought fit to leave us, and our Horse are got away. We are left alone upon our Defence. That which I propound to you is this, that we having the same Courage as our Horse had, and the same God to assist us, may make the same Trial of our Fortunes, and endeavour to make our Way thro' our Enemies as they have done, and account it better to die with Honour and Faithfulness, than to live dishonourable."

But few of the Council of War concurr'd with him in this Resolution, alledging the Horse had many Advantages to break through which the Foot had not, who now were also dismay'd by the going away of their General; and several other Reasons they urg'd for a Treaty which they had receiv'd Intimation from the King's Army his Majesty was willing to accept.

Accordingly Commissioners were appointed to treat.

Treaty between the King and the Parliament's Army in Cornwall. For the King. Prince Maurice, the Earl of Brentford, the Lord Digby.

For the Parliament. Col. Barclay, Col. Whitchcot, Col. Butler.

Articles were agreed upon the 2d of September to this Effect; To deliver up to the King their Artillery, with all their Bag and Baggage: No Person under a Corporal to wear any kind of Weapon: All Officers above to wear only Sword and Pistols. In Pursuance of this Treaty his Majesty had Possession of 40 Pieces of Brass Ordnance, 200 Barrels of Powder, Match and Bullet proportionable, 9000 Arms for Horse and Foot. Some of the private Soldiers lifted themselves in the King's Service, and some of the rest as they march'd forth being pillag'd by the Cavaliers, Major-General Skippon rode up to the King, who stood to see them pass by, and told him, It was against his Honour and Justice that his Articles should not be perform'd, his Soldiers pillaging some of the Parliament's Soldiers contrary to those Articles, and desir'd his Majesty to give Orders to restrain them, which was done, and Skippon with his Men march'd to Pool under Convoy of Col. Adrian Scroope, who sign'd a Certificate of the good Behaviour of the Parliament's Forces in their March, and Major-General Skippon did the same for his generous Deportment towards him and his Soldiers, and gave him a safe Conduct to Bridgwater. This worthy Gentleman Lieutenant-Colonel Adrian Scroope had a Kinsman in the Parliament Army, who with Col. Ingoldsby sat on the Bench at the Trial of the King; but at the Restoration Col. Ingoldsby was made a Knight of the Bath, and Col. Adrian Scroope was hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, notwithstanding the good Services of his Kinsman and Namesake for his Majesty, and the good Services of many of that ancient Family in several Parts of England, who took Arms for the King.

The Officers of the Parliament Army in Cornwall who surrender'd, were Major-General Skippon, Col. Whitchcot, Col. Barclay, Col. Gower, Col. Tyrrel, Col. Butler, Col. Hunter, Col. Francis, Col. Dean, Col. Fortescue, Col. Weare, Lieutenant-Colonel Martin, Lieutenant-Colonel Moore, Lieutenant-Colonel Draper, Lieutenant-Colonel Ingoldsby, Lieutenant-Colonel Mackensy, Lieutenant-Colonel Floyd, Lieutenant-Colonel Webb, Lieutenant-Colonel Pride, Lieutenant-Colonel Everſhot, Lieutenant-Colonel Bulstrode, Lieutenant-Colonel Traberne.

Whitlock informs us several who were no Friends to Effex inveigh'd against him as one that had quitted his Command, and deserted his Army in the greatest Danger. Others excus'd and commended him for this Action, by which Means only he could preserve himself, his Officers and Soldiers to do the Parliament further Service. Others condemn'd Waller, Manchester and Middleton, for not making more haste to the Assistance of their General. Every one vented his own Fancy and Censure; but there seems to be great Reason to charge the Earl with Want of Vigour and Foresight in his Western March. He propos'd his coming to London to justify himself; but the Parliament wrote him, They were fully satisfy'd that he was not wanting to use his utmost Endeavours in that Service, and were well assur'd of his Fidelity, desiring him to entertain no Thoughts of Discontent or Discouragement, but to go on in the managing of the War, Sir William Waller's and other Forces being ready to join him. Notwithstanding this civil Letter, it is evident that from this Time their mutual Civilities were affected, and the Cordiality of their Friendship daily diminish'd. The Parliament were desirous of Peace in the best Acceptation of the Word, and were resolv'd to bring the King to a Necessity of the same Interpretation of it. They were jealous that their General the Earl of Effex took it in too unlimited a Sense, and was willing enough that the Laudable Hierarchy should stand, and the Prerogative sex. be what the King would have it, provided himself, and the House of Peers were secur'd in their Privileges, and the Commons were kept in the same same or a greater Inferiority. The Two Houses were for the general Rights, Liberties and Properties of the People, and a thorough Reformation. To effect this, they resolv'd as soon as conveniently they could to put their Military Affairs under the Management of Officers who were intirely of their own Sentiments, and for a vigorous Prosecution of the War till those good Ends could be obtain'd.

The King, according to Echard, after this glorious Success, look'd upon Plymouth, and receiv'd a rude Answer to a most gracious Message; for my Lord Robarts, who was left Governor there, was not so frighted at this Glory as to part with so considerable a Place for a kind Word or two. His Majesty put the Two Houses in Mind of his Message from Evesham about Peace, but this Message too wanting the necessary Form of Address, had no more Effect than the other, and with good Reason, for the Stile of all these Messages were eternally the same; The Religion as establish'd by Law; The Prerogative according to the Laws of the Land; The Rights and Privileges of Parliament according to Law: All which he administer'd for 15 or 16 Years in the Manner the Two Houses justly fear'd he would again interpret those Laws, when he was restrain'd by no Power but the Royal Will and Pleasure.

His Majesty march'd back thro' Somersetshire, where the Inhabitants presented a Petition to him, offering to spend their Lives in assisting him to obtain such a Peace as he was contending for. There was much Dependance to be made on these worshipful People, who not long after were some of the first who petition'd the Parliament to bring the Grand Delinquent to Justice.

During the King's Stay at Chard, says Echard, the brave Col. Gage, a Papist, undertook from Oxford to relieve Basing House, a strong Place in Hampshire, valiantly defended by the Marquis of Winchester, another Papist, against the Parliament for above three Months. All which he perform'd after a most soldierly Manner, tho' it was near 40 Miles from Oxford; and soon after this great Action, &c. I repeat this short Piece of History, because it is an Epitome of his Way of telling Story. Whitlock informs us this Gage attempts to relieve Basing.

Gage "took about 1500 of the King's Foot "out of several Garrisons, and mounting them "for Dragoons, march'd by Night towards Basing House. Col. Norton and Col. Morley, "who were then in a kind of Blockade, took "the Alarm: Norton charg'd his Troops and "broke thro' them, but they with great Courage wheel'd about, and charg'd Norton's "whole Body, who retreated into Col. Morley's "Quarters. In the mean while they got some "Supplies of Ammunition and Provisions into "the House. Morley and Norton fac'd them, "but they would not fight, and retreating back "again, were pursu'd, 150 of them kill'd and "taken, as many Men as they had reliev'd. "Among the Prisoners was a Major and other "inferior Officers. Norton lost but one Man. "Gage's Party gave an Alarm to Major-General Brown at Abington, who shortly after in "Revenge alarm'd Oxford it self, and "brought away four Drove of Cattle from under "the Walls.

Another merry Story of the Archdeacon's, is as follows Verbatim. "The fearless Goring being now possess'd with great Gaiety, earnestly advis'd the King to march with all Speed and "beat Waller, who lay at Andover with 3000 "Horse and Dragoons. This was agreed to, but "the March was not manag'd with all necessary

"Punctuality by those about the King. Yet "they came not within four Miles of Andover "before Waller had Notice of their Motions; "and taking a View of their Strength and good "Order, durst not stand a Battle, but drew back "into the Town, leaving a strong Party of Horse "and Dragoons to make good his Retreat. But "the King's Van charg'd and routed them with "considerable Execution, pursu'd them thro' the "Town till the Darkness of the Night secur'd "the Remainder. They were very much shatter'd.

The plain Truth of the Fact is no more nor no less than what Whitlock writes thus Verbatim. "The King's Army march'd to Andover, where "some Skirmishes were betwixt them and Sir "William Waller's Forces, and about 20 kill'd "on both Sides." I should not much commend the Archdeacon and his Brother Historians for making the most of every little Success in case it had came to any thing, and their noble Cause had been a whit the better for it. But since a few Months only are to pass before they are to be beaten out of every Field and every Town in England, it is a very childish Piece of Vanity to represent those to be always Heroes, who are so soon to be always Runaways. It would be endless to pretend to give an Account of every petty Advantage obtain'd by the Parliament's Forces over the King's. But what would the Archdeacon have made of a Skirmish between 80 of the Garrison of Leicester, Convoy to some Carriers, and Colonel Hastings with 120 Men, who set upon those Carriers? But their Convoy kill'd 8 of the 120, took 60 Prisoners, and most of their Arms.

At the same Time Sir Thomas Middleton having taken Montgomery Castle in North Wales, was forc'd to leave it at the Approach of the King's Army in those Parts, against which it was not long tenable, and to look out for Help to rescue the few Parliamentarians whom he had left in the Castle, which the Lord Byron immediately besieg'd with 5000 Men. Middleton being join'd by Sir William Brereton, Sir John Meldrum, and Sir William Fairfax, advanc'd with about 3000 Men against the Enemy, who Montgomery met and engag'd them, Sept. 18. both Parties came presently to push of Pike, and the Cavaliers worsted the Parliament's Horse, which so encourag'd the King's Soldiers, that, as it was a very common Thing with them, they shouted and cry'd, The Day's our own, The Day's our own; and their Shouting and Crying so enrag'd the Parliament's Forces, that they came on again with fresh Courage and entirely defeated the Royalists, took Major-General Broughton, Sir Thomas Tildesley a Papist, Lieutenant-Colonel Bludswell, Major Williams, 9 Captains, as many Subalterns, and 1500 private Centinels. On the King's Part were slain 300, and 500 wounded. On the Parliament's Part about 40 were slain, and about 60 wounded. The Lord Byron made his Escape by the Goodness of his Horse. But the Parliamentarians had little Reason to value themselves on their Victory, since they purchas'd it so dearly as with the Loss of Sir Will. Fairfax, Sir Will. who was kill'd with nine Wounds, of whom with much Sincerity and Plainness may be said, there was not a braver Officer, nor a better Englishman, nor a more zealous Protestant in the Kingdom. His Zeal for Religion and Liberty engag'd him in this, the Good Old Cause, and no doubt he could with great Comfort say in the Agonies of Death, Dulce est pro Patriâ mori.

A Trumpet who had deserted Prince Rupert on some Discontent, came to Sir William Brereton and inform'd him that Col. Baines, Col.

Coniers,

A. D. 1644. Coniers, and Sir Marmaduke Langdale, all three Papists, with 1000 Men, were marching towards Chester by Malpas to join the Prince, upon which Brereton drew out 8 Troops of Horse, and 7 Companies of Foot, every Footman mounted behind a Trooper. When they came within two Miles of Malpas the Foot alighted, and the Horse march'd before the Foot. The King's Forces sent out a forlorn Hope to observe them; but Brereton's Horse not coming the Way they expected, wheel'd about, and got between the Town and the Cavaliers, kill'd or took most of them, and defeated also a Party from Malpas. Col. Baines, Col. Coniers, Major Harborn a Papist, and Major Hesketh another Papist, were slain; Major Masey, Major Cromwel, and Major Crathorn, were taken Prisoners, together with other Officers, and most of the Soldiers.

Malpas.

These and a great many other fine Actions on the Parliament's Side are intirely omitted in the Earl of Clarendon's and Mr. Archdeacon's Histories, or are loosely flurr'd over; the Former gives his Reason for it, and I think it the sincerest Thing in the Book, when he speaks of the Rout at Marston Moor. He took no Delight in telling it.

The King.

After the Skirmish at Andover, his Majesty march'd to Whitechurch, and sent the Earl of Northampton with his Brigade of Horse to raise the Siege of Banbury Castle, which Col. John Fiennes had besieg'd three Months to little Purpose. Accordingly on the 25th of October the Earl, having join'd some Horse and Foot from Oxford under Col. Gage, came to Banbury and rais'd the Siege, doing considerable Execution on Fiennes's Men, who did not behave as their Fellow-Soldiers had done on the like Occasion. He had much ado to make good his Retreat to Warwick, leaving behind him some of his Ordnance, and three Waggon-Load of Arms and Ammunition. But by this Service his Majesty was depriv'd of the Assistance of this Brigade of Horse at the second Battle of Newbury, which happen'd two Days after,

The Parliament had been diligent to recruit Essex's Army, and had sent 6000 Arms by Sea, for his Foot that came out of Cornwall. They had also new cloath'd them, and furnish'd them with a new Train of Artillery, which was sent by Water as far as Reading to be convoy'd thence by Manchester's Army to the Earl of Essex's, who took the Field on Thursday Oct. 17. about 6 Weeks after his Disgrace in Cornwall. He advanc'd from Portsmouth to Petersfield, and on the 21st his Forces, Manchester's, and Waller's join'd near Basing, making an Army much superior to the King's, who now saw that his Advantage in the West had more Honour than Profit in it. For there were also marching to join the Earl of Essex, the City Brigade, commanded by Sir James Harrington, being the Red and Blue London Regiments. The Red Regiment of Westminster, the Yellow Regiment of Southwark, and the Regiment of the Tower Hamlets, making in all 5000 Men. On the 22d of October his Majesty, who had fac'd the Parliamentarians with a Party of Horse, drew off his Infantry from Kingsclear, and march'd to Newbury, as the Parliament Army did to Reading. The next Day the Latter came to Aldermarston, and two Days after to Bucklebury Heath, about five Miles from Newbury. They made a very good Army, and the Parliament wrote to the Generals to agree among themselves, and take for Example the good Understanding between the General Officers in the North. But whatever was the Reason of it, if it was not Indisposition, as the Earl of Essex gave out, his Lordship absented himself from the Army at this important Juncture, and without imputing it to the Intrigues of Cromwel, and the Finesse of some leading Members of the House of Commons, that Assembly would not have deserved the Character of Wise, which is given them by all sober Writers, had they ever put him again at the Head of their Armies. It was thought the King, whose Army was inferior in Number to the Parliament's, would have declin'd fighting till Prince Rupert had join'd him with 3000 Horse and Dragoons, or at least till the Earl of Northampton return'd with his Brigade of Horse and the Foot from Oxford; and it was the best Counsel his Majesty could take. He had cast up Works about Newbury, fortify'd the Avenues, lin'd the Hedges, and kept within the Town, guarded with his Artillery; so that what Advantage the Parliament Generals had by Numbers, the King would have had as much by Situation, if he had kept it; but he caus'd his Horse and Foot to draw out into Speen Field, the Midway between Newbury Town and Dennington Castle, as well to make his Army seem more numerous, as to embattle them as advantageously as possible. Little pass'd the first Day, the 26th of October, for the River Kenet was between them, only the two Armies cannonaded each other, tho' with no great Execution, and some Skirmishing and Picqueering happen'd between the Horsemen; so the greater Part of the Parliament Army retreated to Cheveley, and quarter'd there that Night in the Field. Here it was resolv'd at a Council of War to divide their Forces thus: All General Essex's Horse and Foot, and most of the Forces under the Command of Waller, with the City Brigade, should march to Speen Hill, and the Earl of Manchester's Foot and Part of his Horse to continue in the Field near Shaw, a small Village, where the House of Mr. Doleman was fortify'd by his Majesty's Forces; and it was agreed, that as soon as the Latter should by discharging of the Cannon understand that those at Speen were engag'd, Manchester should fall on to gain the Passage at Shaw, and give a Diverfion to that Part of the Army design'd for Speen. The Horse were commanded by Sir William Waller and Sir William Balfour, the Foot by Major-General Skippon, who by Break of Day on Sunday the 27th of October was on the March. He fetch'd a Circle to avoid the Fire from Dennington Castle, where Part of the Garrison fall'y'd on his Rear, and took some Prisoners, and Skippon intercepted some Carts loaden with Provisions for his Majesty's Use. In four Hours Time his Foot made their Approach on the West Side of Newbury. It was near Three a Clock in the Afternoon before they could get themselves into Battalia. Then the forlorn Hope of Horse began the Fight, seconded by the Foot, and for three Hours together the Battle was maintain'd with as much Resolution, Bravery, and even Desperateness, on both Sides, as had been known since the Commencement of the War; but in Conclusion the Parliament's Forces beat the King's from the Works at Speen, and out of the Village, and took nine Pieces of Cannon, among which were six of those they lost in Cornwall, which the Foot that were then disarm'd ventur'd desperately to regain, and when they had got them, embrac'd them for Joy, saying, We'll give you a Cornish Hug. Orleans assures us, that all those Troops having taken an Oath in Cornwall never to serve against the King, were perjur'd by fighting against him in this Battle; which is false, for the Parliament's Soldiers there disarm'd took no such Oath, and they now sufficiently reveng'd themselves for the Affront then put upon them.

Night

A. D. 1644.

A. D.

Night coming on prevented further Action. On the other Side of Newbury the Earl of Manchester the same Sunday Morning commanded a Party of about 400 Musketeers to pass the Kennet on the left Hand of Shaw, and thereby divert the King's Strength from attending Speen Hill. These Musketeers advanc'd accordingly, and beat the King's Forces out of two of their Works, and took some Prisoners, but were at last beaten back with considerable Loss. Towards Four a Clock, Manchester hearing the Cannon play from Speen Hill, play'd also on Doleman's House at Shaw with two small Pieces of Ordnance, and commanded a Party of 500 Musketeers as a Forlorn Hope to attack it, which they did, and beat those who sall'y'd out of the House into their Works. The Reason why they did no more, was said to be because Night came on. The Action on this Side is generally condemn'd as imperfectly perform'd, and gave Occasion of Complaint against one another by Manchester and Cromwel, and that the King's Army was not as entirely routed as ever was any Army, is imputed wholly to the bad Service on Shaw Side. The King's Forces left the Field in exceeding Haste and Confusion, which is hardly worth mentioning; for the Parliament Army was much more numerous. Skippon had broke in upon the King's Forces on the West Side, Manchester might more easily have done it on the East Side, Doleman's House being nothing to Dennington Castle, and the Cavaliers must then have been intirely cut to Pieces. The King march'd out of Newbury Town in the Night, and securing what Cannon he had left, his Carriage and Baggage in Dennington Castle, he retreated by Wallingford to Oxford. The Loss was little or nothing on the Parliament's Side: On the King's about 200 were kill'd, among whom were Mr. Goring, Sir Anthony St. Leger, and Major Trevillian, Col. Thomas Dalton, Capt. Thurstan Anderson, Capt. Samway, Capt. Wells, the four last Papists. Three hundred of the King's Forces were taken Prisoners, and among them Thomas Wentworth Earl of Cleveland. Major-General Skippon wrote thus to the Committee: "The King, Prince Charles, and Prince Maurice, with about 7 or 800 Horse, got Westward, as we are credibly inform'd. The rest of his Forces leaving the Train at Dennington, went towards Oxford, all much shatter'd. General Ruthen, and the Earl of Brentford's Lady, were taken 7 Miles off, himself narrowly escaping, thro' our own Party's unadvisedly sounding of a Trumpet when they were near the Place where he was. We had 50 Soldiers slain, and no Officer of Note but Capt. Gauler of my Lord General's Regiment. The Wounded are scarce 100. Whitlock informs us that the King march'd out of Newbury an Hour after Midnight with an Attendant Troop of Horse only. The Parliament's Forces took 1000 Arms, and had they had but one Hour more of Day-light, would in all Probability have routed and dispers'd the King's whole Army, which was in so great Distraction, that they retreated three several Ways at once in great Confusion." General Ludlow, who was in this Battle, tells us, "The Usage our Men met with in Cornwall being fresh in their Memory, caus'd them to charge with such Vigour, that some of them ran up to the King's Cannon and clap'd their Hats on the Touch-holes, falling so furiously on the Enemy, that they were not able to stand before them, but were forc'd to quit their Ground, and ran under the Shelter of Dennington Castle." Mr. Archdeacon, with whose Sincerity and Judgment the Reader must by this Time be as well acquainted as I am, assures us, "Sir John Cansfield, another notorious Papist, Colonel of the Queen's Regiment of Horse, charg'd the Parliamentarians with so much Gallantry, that he routed them, and pursu'd the Execution of them near half a Mile. General Goring and the Earl of Cleveland charg'd the Left Wing of the Parliament's Horse so furiously, that they forc'd them over a Hedge in great Confusion, and follow'd them. At Shaw House Sir John Browne with the Prince's Regiment drove 1200 Horse and 3000 Foot of the Earl of Manchester's Men before him with great Execution, till meeting with another Body of their Horse, he retir'd to the Foot in Doleman's Garden, who oblig'd Manchester's Horse to wheel about, when Sir John fell upon their Rear, kill'd many, and kept that Ground all the Day, while Col. Thelwell's Reserve of Foot gall'd their Foot with several Volleys, and then fell in with the But-End of their Muskets till they beat them quite out of the Field, leaving two Drakes, some Colours, and many dead Bodies behind them. At this Time a Body of their Foot attempted Shaw House, but were so briskly receiv'd by Colonel Page, that they were soon forc'd to retire with such Confusion, that they left 500 dead upon a little Spot of Ground, so they drew off the two Drakes into the House. The Enemy being beaten off, and retiring from all that Quarter, it was now Night, which neither Party was sorry for." This excellent Portion of History, of which hardly one Word is literally true, is however a poor Imitation of a more famous Historian on the Cavalier Side, who wrote Mercurius Aulicus, the Court Paper, at Oxford, Mercurius Aulicus and was the best Hand that could be pick'd out in that University, where once a Week it diverted and edify'd the illustrious Assembly then in that City.

This News-Book was publish'd the Saturday after Newbury second Fight, and contains a Relation of it at large, every whit as florid as the Lord Clarendon's History, and a little more impartial. "The REBELS sent out several Parties to have fallen upon his Majesty's Quarters, but they were every one beaten; 1100 of the REBELS on the Hill before Shaw came down to pass the River Kennet; they got over, and then advanc'd with much Confidence, till that gallant Gentleman Sir Bernard Astley came up with 400 Musketeers, and charg'd them with such Judgment and Courage, that he routed all those 1100 REBELS. While he was upon the Execution of the REBELS, two other Bodies of REBELS hasten'd over the River to second the first; but the brave Knight so follow'd his Blow, that he made the first REBELS rout the second REBELS, who all ran thro' the River in such Distraction and Confusion, that abundance of them were drown'd, besides the Slain." There are several following Pages of the like History on his Majesty's glorious Victory at Newbury in this State Paper, which is but a faint Resemblance of Falstaff's Account of his Prowess in Shakespeare, I shall only give one Instance more. Col. Lisle gave the REBELS three most gallant Charges. In the First his Field Word was For the Crown, and then he beat them back and knock'd them down both with Bullet and Musket Shot. In the Second Charge his Word was For Prince Charles, and then he cut them off as they came on, and hewed them down sufficiently as they ran away. In the Third Charge it was For the Duke of York, and

A. D. 1644. "and then he slash'd them so home, that they troubled him no more, for had they come on again, he had resolv'd to have gone over all the King's Children, and have knock'd them down, and hew'd them down, and slash'd them down For the Duke of Gloucester, the Princess Mary, the Princess Henrietta, till he had not left one REBEL to fight against the Crown or the Royal Progeny." This Cavalier History-Writer, whose Manner is equally polite and sincere, modestly rebukes a News-Writer at London for saying Mr. Charles Goring was kill'd, tho' he was ready for another Charge against the REBELS; but then he unfortunately commits the like Slip himself, Their General the Earl of Essex is now in the Chirurgion's Hands, whereas the Earl of Essex was not in the Battle. He upbraids the Parliamentarians, Sir William Waller, Sir Arthur Haslerigge, Sir Philip Stapleton, Col. Fortescue, Sir William Balfour, &c. with the Meanness of their Quality; and having just mention'd the Earl of Manchester, he says, I have not met with a Right Honourable REBEL, except the Honourable Mr. Fiennes. The Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Archdeacon have not suffer'd so delicate a Remark to escape them.

I doubt not we shall be excus'd for this long Digression, it being so undeniable a Proof of the Dependence we are to make on these Gentlemen's Histories, and of the Necessity of our own to set People right, if they would know any thing of these Matters. It is certain there was not the same Vigour shewn on Shaw Side as there was on that of Speen by the Parliament's Forces, and that the Appearance of the King's Army again at Newbury a few Days after, gave too great Reason to the Two Houses to be apprehensive of the ill Effects of the Misunderstandings and Jealousies among the chief Generals, and to provide against them as well as they could.

The Parliament Army, after the Fight, summon'd Boys Governor of Dennington Castle to surrender it, and that resolute Officer defying them, they march'd towards Oxford, but were hinder'd advancing farther than Hanwell by the bad Ways, so they return'd to Newbury; and two or three Days after they receiv'd Advice by their Scouts that the King's Army very much increas'd by the Junction of the Forces under Prince Rupert, and those from Banbury was on the March to relieve Dennington, which the King effected, tho' the Parliament's Army was more numerous than his. General Ludlow writes of it thus. "The King in the Face of an Army twice as numerous as his, had Time to send his Artillery from Dennington Castle towards Oxford, without any Opposition, to the Astonishment of all those who wish'd well to the Publick; but by this Time it was clearly manifest, that the Nobility had no further Quarrel with the King than till they could make their Terms with him, having for the most Part grounded their Dissatisfaction upon some particular Affront, or the Prevalency of a Faction about him. But tho' it should be granted that their Intentions in taking Arms, were to oblige the King to consent to redress the Grievances of the Nation, yet if a War of this Nature must be determin'd by Treaty, and the King left in the Exercise of the Royal Authority, after the utmost Violation of the Laws, and the greatest Calamities brought upon the People, it doth not appear to me what Security can be given them for the future Enjoyment of their Rights and Privileges." Here the Republican was too hard for the Englishman. The Propositions of the Uxbridge Treaty, if the King had comply'd with them, were sufficient Security, as will be seen hereafter. But the Over-carnestness of some Parliament Lords for Peace before such Security was obtain'd, oblig'd both Houses to change Hands in carrying on the War, and to employ those Officers who thought it their Duty while their Swords were drawn, to make the best, and that was the quickest Use of them.

Soon after this the King resolv'd to relieve Basing, and to oppose him therein the Parliament's Forces drew from Newbury that Way, but those before Basing rais'd the Siege of their own Accord, and nothing of Moment happen'd between the Two Armies, and nothing was like to happen till the Parliament's was put under other Management: For tho' the Earl of Essex was a Man of too much Honour to betray his Trust, yet he was for doing the Parliament's Business in his own Way, and not in theirs, which made it absolutely necessary for them to take other Measures before the next Campaign.

The King's Forces took up their Quarters at Oxford, Narborough, Basing, Odisham, Blewbury, &c.

The Parliament's at Reading, Henley, Abington, Farnham, &c.

His Majesty returning to Oxford, the Archdeacon pursues him with a Panegyric Congratulation on his Successes this Summer, in which he nobly display'd his Genius, and shew'd himself a most vigilant and valiant Commander. When he has not the Earl of Clarendon's Abundance of Words, which are the Character of his Lordship's Characteristicks, Mr. Echard's Eulogy is extremely laconick and barren; for tho' a small Invention will serve to falsify Fact, it must be a large one to adorn it. I do with Pleasure read the Story of the King's admirable Conduct, through the whole Course of this Campaign. In the Beginning of which he was shut up between two Armies under Essex and Waller, each of them as numerous as his own. One of them he so ruffled at Copredy Bridge, as to render it impotent; the other he disarm'd in Cornwall. And when they were both recruited and rejoin'd, he fought and clear'd himself of them with little more than half their Forces at Newbury, where in ten Days Time he appear'd again to give them Defiance; and to deny him the Glory of a great intrepid General, is to do him Injustice. If the same Courage and Conduct had been shewn in so good a Cause as that of King William's at the Boyne, his Fame and his Memory would have been equally glorious and immortal. What a deplorable thing is it to think on, that a great King should be environ'd and govern'd by desperate and criminal Counsellors, and to save them, be hurry'd on to his own Destruction? For it is certain by his Conduct in the War he was capable of heroic Actions, if, instead of Heroism, Laurel and his Brethren had not fill'd his Royal Breast with Bigotry, a Weed which grows fast, takes deep Root, and choaks all the good Seed which otherwise would spring and flourish in a good Soil.

During these Transactions between the greater Armies, some Things memorable were transacted between the Less. Col. *Masse*y, with a Detachment of the Garrison of Gloucester, having join'd Col. Purefoy with his Regiment of Horse, they made an IncurSION into Herefordshire, and fac'd Hereford. Prince Rupert having Intelligence of it, advanc'd towards Evesham Bridge, intending to pass it, and get between *Masse*y and Gloucester, while Col. Myn, and Sir John Winter a Papist, held him in Play on Herefordshire Side. But *Masse*y hearing of his Approach, drew back in Time, and got safe into Gloucester. Four Days after, May the 7th, he march'd

D. 1644. out of that City with 900 Musketeers, 100 Pikes, Col. Puresfoy's and Part of his own Regiment of Horse towards the Forest Side, where he fell upon Westbury, a Garrison of Sir John Winter's, who held the Church and a strong House adjoining. At Acton in Lancashire we found the Cavaliers behind their great Guns in the Church, at Westbury in Gloucestershire they are posted on the same holy Ground, and the Roundheads must beat the Church about their Ears to come at them: But whenever the Parliamentarians get into a Church, it is made a Stable, it is profan'd, 'tis Sacrilege, and a damnable Sin. Massey order'd his Soldiers to fling their Granades into that consecrated Place, which was soon surrender'd, and Capt. Bret and 60 Prisoners taken, while a Party of his Troops beat up the Enemy's Quarters at Little Dean, where Lieutenant Colonel Congreve, a Papist, was slain, Capt. Wigmore and others taken Prisoners. Thence, May the 8th, Massey march'd to Newnham, where another Party of Sir John Winter's kept Garrison in another Church, into which Massey's Forces presently running after them, the Cavaliers cry'd out Quarter, but at the Instant one Tipper, a Papist, Servant to Sir John Winter, blew up a Barrel of Gun-powder in the Church, which however had no other ill Effect than to finge some of the Soldiers. Tipper had been taken Prisoner before, and broken his Parole, which made him afraid of a Gibbet, and that put him upon this mischievous Design, which so enrag'd Massey's Men, that they flew him and 20 of his Companions. All the rest had Quarter, except one Capt. Butler an Irish Rebel, whom a Common Soldier knock'd o' the Head. Here were taken Capt. Malory, Capt. Michael Morgan, Capt. Halford, Capt. Blany, 3 Lieutenants, 4 Ensigns, Store of Powder, Match, and 4 Pieces of Ordnance, without the Loss of one Man on Massey's Side, who hearing Col. Myn and Sir John Winter had join'd the Forces of the Lord Herbert, another Papist, to oppose him, got again safe into Gloucester. Soon after, May the 22d, he surpriz'd Beverston Castle in Wiltshire, while Oglethorpe the Governor was abroad courting his Mistress, and thence marching to Malmsbury he sent a Summons to Col. Henry Howard the Governor, who, to his Honour be it spoken, return'd an Answer which no Cavalier Governor had the Wit or Courage to send before or after it, I keep the Town of Malmsbury for the King and Parliament assembled at Oxford. Upon which Massey's Foot got into the Suburbs, broke their Way thro' the Houses till they came almost up to the Works, and the only Place of Entrance into the Town, which is built on the Level of a Rock. Massey caus'd a Blind to be made cross the Street to bring up the Ordnance, loaden with Carbine Shot; but in the Heat of the Business the Fancy of an Alarm seiz'd upon his Men, that those in the Town were falling out upon them. There was nothing in it, yet so prevalent was their Apannick. Pannick, that those very Men who at other Times would brave it in the Face of an Enemy, venture on Breaches, and even Mouths of discharging Cannon, were now smitten with such Distraction and Fear, that they all fled when none pursu'd them, and left their Ordnance deserted in the open Street. The Garrison, by Reason of the Blind, perceiv'd not this Advantage, which otherwise had prov'd fatal to the Assailants. This Incident shews us that Cowardice as well as Courage has its critical Minute, and that Terror and Temerity possess Men sometimes like Dæmons, and produce the most involuntary Actions. Massey had much ado to rally his amaz'd Soldiers, but at last they recover'd both their Courage and their Ground, and the next Morning a Forlorn Hope, seconded with a good Reserve, advanc'd to the only Passage which had no Drawbridge, only a Turnpike; at which they flung in their Granades. Those within made a Random Shot, but by the Disadvantage of a rainy Night, their Muskets lying wet on the Ground, were little serviceable; and Massey's Men thronging into the Town, got Possession of it May the 24th. Malmsbury Col. Howard was taken at the Works, making as brave a Defence as was possible. Massey gave Wiltshire strict Orders that the Town should be preserv'd taken from Plunder, as he always did on the like Occasions, giving this Reason, I cannot judge any Part of England to be an Enemy's Country, nor Generosity any English Town capable of Devastation by English Soldiers. A Saying worthy a great Commander, who was in Arms for the Defence of the Liberties and Properties of English Men.

About ten Days after, June the 5th, Colonel Massey drew out a Party of Men, 120 Horse and 30 Dragoons under Major Hammond, and 300 Foot, with which he made himself Master of Tewkesbury, his Horse and Dragoons coming up to the Main Guard before the Alarm was taken, overturn'd the Enemy's Ordnance, and charg'd thro' the Streets as far as the Bridge, Worcester Way, where they took the Governor Col. Myn, who had deserted the Service in Ireland. Col. Godfrey, Col. Vavasor Quarter-Master General, and a Lieutenant, all three Papists, with other Officers of the Garrison, were slain. Massey's Horse and Dragoons, the Foot not yet come up, supposing themselves to be wholly victorious, some of the Officers and Soldiers dismounted and went into the Houses, others dispers'd themselves, all neglected both making good the Bridge they enter'd at, and disarming the Main Guard, for tho' they charg'd and routed them, yet they were now rally'd again, and observing the Enemy not seconded with Foot, and in Confusion, they fell upon them, beat them out of the Town, and took several Prisoners. But Myn the Governor was secur'd and sent over Severne as soon as he was taken, and by this Time Massey was advanc'd with his Foot to the Bridge towards Gloucester, which he found drawn up and the Works mann'd on that Side. He posted his Dragoons there while he drew up his Men round the Town, it being now dark Night; but before he could reach the farther End, where he enter'd, those of the Town having lost their Governor and several Officers, and despairing to maintain it, fled towards Worcester about Midnight, leaving behind them 18 Barrels of Powder, Store of Match, 200 new Pikes, two Brass Cannon, &c. The taking of this Place was of great Consequence, it being a strong Frontier Town, securing that Side of the County of Gloucester, and commanding a good Part of Warwickshire, by which his Majesty's Measures were broken, who intended to have made a Stand at this Pass against Waller's Army. I am the longer Massey about this Progress of Massey, for that there are several surprizing Turns in it, which doubtless will be Entertainment for the Reader, especially considering that this active Officer endeavour'd afterwards to turn his Activity as well as Person on the other Side, tho' not with the like Success and Reputation. It is not unnatural to impute it to the Cause on both Sides.

The taking and keeping of these Places so drain'd away Massey's Men, that he could no longer keep the Field, till recruited by the Arrival of Col. Stephens with three Troops of Horse and two Troops of the Regiment of Col. Harley, a very worthy Gentleman, Father of that most excellent Protestant and Patriot Mr. Robert Harley.

A. D. 1644. ley, to whose pious Memory is owing the Honour of having put a Stop to the Victorious Arms of England against France. Massey being inform'd that the King's Forces of Herefordshire and Worcestershire were to join about Cosselawn to waste the Country about Gloucester in Harvest Time, a Work the Cavaliers most delighted in, he resolv'd to prevent this Junction, and with 200 Horse and 300 Foot was preparing to march; but just as they were ready an Accident happen'd, which had like not only to have spoil'd the Design, but to have ruin'd the whole Garrison of Gloucester; for there having that Morning at a Council of War some Words pass'd between Major Gray, who had distinguish'd himself at the Siege of Gloucester, and Major Hammond, the former began now to question the latter for his hasty Language, and requir'd Satisfaction. His Challenge being either refus'd or slighted, Gray gave Hammond a Box on the Ear; upon which both drew, and after a Pass or two Gray, who began the Quarrel, receiv'd his Death's Wound by a Thrust in the Neck, and expir'd on the Spot. His Soldiers being then in Arms, not only refus'd to march, but threaten'd to be reveng'd on Hammond for the Death of their Major. The Governor, Col. Massey, was forc'd to use all the Art he was Master of to appease them, and after an Hour's Perswasion and Treaty, they were somewhat qualify'd, and content to march. Major General Myn, another Irish Deserter, with 160 Horse and 800 Foot, quarter'd at Red Marley, with whom next Morning, July the 27th, Col. Massey engag'd, and after a sharp Encounter, Major General Myn was slain, with about 170 of his Men; Major Butler, 7 Captains, 4 Lieutenants, 5 Ensigns, and 300 Common Soldiers taken Prisoners: In the Pursuit of whom Massey's Forces met 150 Horse and 300 Foot coming from Worcester under Lieutenant Colonel Passie to join Myn. Passie, who commanded them, rode away before, not expecting an Enemy, and just at the Beginning of the Fight was coming up to Myn's Brigade to give Notice of the Approach of his Men; but meeting with some of Massey's, he was wounded and left for dead, by which each Party knew nothing of the other's Condition; but during the Time of Action the Worcester Men were advanc'd near, while Massey's Men were scatter'd in the Pursuit of Myn's, whom they had routed. The first Discovery of these Men was made by Col. Broughton and Capt. Backhouse, upon whom a blunt Trooper charg'd up from the Head of the Main Body in the Entrance of a Cross Lane. Him they surpriz'd in the Name of Friends, drew him aside, and inform'd themselves of the Strength at Hand. After which they made a sudden Outcry, as if they had a great Body ready for a Charge. The Worcester Men suspecting an Ambuscade, stopp'd and retreated, which gave Massey an Opportunity to rally his dispers'd Troops, and content with the Success he had gain'd, to make his Retreat to Gloucester, where he gave honourable Burial to the Body of Major General Myn.

I cannot yet leave the Company of this victorious Officer Col. Massey. After the Rout at Marston Moor some of Prince Rupert's scatter'd Troops got towards Wales, and quarter'd about Hereford: These he had a Mind to draw into the West; but apprehending lest Massey might intercept them, he to facilitate their Passage over Severne at Aust, sent a Party of 500 Horse and Foot to fortify Beachley for a lasting Guard, being a Place of difficult Approach, a Gut of Land running out between Severne and Wye, but a commodious Passage from Wales to Bristol, and the Western Parts. Four Days after they had begun their Fortifications, and drawn their Trench half-way from the Bank of one River to the other, the rest being well guarded with a high Quickset Hedge lin'd with Musketeers, a Ditch within, and a fair Meadow beyond, in which was made an Entrenchment, Massey with about 600 Horse and Foot advanc'd thither, and lighting on a Party of Horse from Chepstow, skirmish'd and made them retreat. He fac'd the new Works that Evening, and next Morning waited an Opportunity to assault them, for at high Water the Place was inaccessible, by Reason of the Ships which guarded each River with Ordnance lying level with the Banks, and clearing the Face of the Approach from Wye to Severne. He therefore took the Advantage of the low Water, and drew forth a Party for the Onset. He selected 10 Musketeers out of the Forlorn Hope to creep along the Hedges, and there fall on. These gave the first Alarm, and caus'd those in the Works to spend their first Shot in vain; which being done before they could re-charge, the Forlorn Hope went on, and the Reserve following, they ran up the unfinish'd Works, and got Possession of them, killing several, and taking many Prisoners; but some recover'd Boats and made their Escape, and others were drown'd.

His next Expedition was the taking of Monmouth, which was indeed deliver'd to him by Lieutenant Colonel Kyrle, who had revolted from the Parliament's Party on the Loss of Bristol, and weary of the Cause he was engag'd in, was willing to purchase his Peace of them at the Price of this important Town. Kyrle propos'd to Massey to pretend a sudden Return to Gloucester with his Forces from Beachley, and the Lieutenant Colonel would come out, as to fall on his Rear, which should beat him back, and enter the Place with him. Massey accordingly gave out the Necessity of a Retreat, and having march'd back three Miles, lodg'd his Forces in a Thicket of the Forrest of Dean, sending out Scouts to prevent Discovery. The Intelligence soon reaches Monmouth, Lieutenant Colonel Kyrle draws out his Men, and is surpriz'd at Highborough House about Midnight with 30 Horse. Tho' as little Noise as might be was made, yet Col. Kyrle's Cornet escaping gave the Alarm to Monmouth, and the Garrison stood upon their Guard when Massey came up to it, yet Kyrle arriving there with 100 select Horse, and pretending to return with many Prisoners, perswaded the Guard at the Drawbridge to let it down with Col. Holtby the Governor's Consent, but with much Jealousy, and a strong Guard, and the Bridge presently drawn up again; inso-much that this first Party were like to be made Prisoners, and began to suspect that Kyrle, instead of betraying the Town, had betray'd them. However they declar'd themselves, fell on, over-power'd the Guard, and made good the Bridge, some of 'em keeping a strict Eye on Kyrle's Department, who fought as heartily as any of them, to let in the main Body, who soon master'd the Town, Sept. the 26th; but by the Favour of the Night, dark and rainy, the Governor and most of the Garrison got off over the dry Graft.

The Surprize of Monmouth, the Key of South Wales, the only safe Intercourse for the King's Army between the West, Wales and the North Parts, alarm'd all the King's Party thereabouts, especially the old Marquis of Worcester, a zealous Papist, in his Castle of Ragland. He rais'd the Country, and call'd in some of Prince Rupert's Horse to his Assistance, who with Sir William Blaxton's Brigade of 500 Horse, and above 1000 Foot, march'd towards Monmouth and beat up a Quarter of Massey's, but after a brisk Skirmish

But he could not hinder the Recovery of Monmouth by the King's Forces, who took the Town at a Disadvantage when Lieutenant Colonel Throgmorton, whom he had left Governor there, was march'd with 300 Men to take Chepstow. The Marquis of Worcester's Tenants in Monmouth presently sent Notice of his having drawn off so many Men, upon which Colonel Rogers, Sir Trevor Williams, the Lord Charles Somerset, the Marquis's Son, with a strong Party came to the Town, and easily master'd it, taking the Committee Men, Colonel Broughton, Colonel Stephens, Mr. Catching of Trelleck, and Mr. Jones of Uske Prisoners, together with 4 Captains, 150 common Soldiers, 14 Pieces of Ordnance, 15 Barrels of Gun-powder. Thus was this important Place lost by the Rashness and Vanity of Throgmorton, that as Rushworth says, He might have the Honour of doing something, or there would not have been any General in this War, who had begun, prosecuted and ended a Campaign with more Glory than Colonel Massey did this.

Monmouth re-taken.

Liverpool taken by Sir John Meldrum.

One of the last Actions this Year was the Reduction of Liverpool by Sir John Meldrum, who had lain some Time before it and reduc'd it to great Straits, yet the Officers refusing to surrender the Town to the Parliament, 50 of the Garrison escap'd out of it, and drove away before them what Cattle they could to Meldrum, which those that remain'd in the Town perceiving, and being most of them Irish, and fearing they should be exempt from Quarter, they to make their Peace seiz'd on their Officers on the 1st of November, and deliver'd them Prisoners to Meldrum, who took Possession of the Town, where were taken two Colonels, two Lieutenant Colonels, three Majors, 14 Captains, and great Store of Ordnance, Arms and Ammunition. The Royalists had shipp'd their best Goods to convey them to Beaumaris, but the Soldiers had Notice of it from the well affected in the Town, and manning out long Boats brought the Booty back again. We shall have too much Occasion to speak of the Divisions and Sub-Divisions in the Parliament and Army hereafter. What Echard says of them at the Close of this Year's military Actions, is to represent both as Men of addle Pates, guided by Faction and Enthusiasm, while the Counsels at Oxford were the most sober and the most sage that human Policy could produce, though there were such miserable Divisions and Distractions, the unavoidable Effects of Distress and Despair among them, and the sage and sober Counsellors so persecuted the King with Advices and Demands, that Mr. Locke tells us, he had scarce the Liberty of Choice, whether to remain in their Hands, or put himself into the Hands of the Parliament Army. Nay, the King himself says in a Letter to his Queen dated at Oxford, April 9th, 1645. If thou knewest what a Life I lead in point of Conversation, which in my Mind is the chief Joy or Vexation of one's Life, I dare say thou wouldst pity me, for some are too wise. Those are the Counsellors so often spoken of by the Earl of Clarendon, who was himself one of them. Some are too foolish: These are the Counsellors so often spoken of by my self. Some too busy, others too reserv'd, many Fantastick, &c. Echard hides all this as carefully as can be, that none of their Wisdoms may be brought into Suspicion, which he learn'd from the Lord Clarendon. This Letter was sent to the Queen by Binion, the London Silkmán, who though a Bankrupt at London made a rare Courtier at Oxford. The Misunderstandings among the Cavalier Officers had already shipp'd near 100 of them for Hamburg, and foreign Parts, which is no great Wonder, for Persons under Disappointment and Calamity seldom agree well together, nor is there often more Agreement among Persons flush'd with Success. Demands rise high in Prosperity, every Man judges of his Merit as it weighs in his own Scale, and in Adversity every Man thinks he is at least intitul'd to Complaint, and the Loser will have leave to speak. But the unhappy Differences which prov'd so fatal to the Parliament were yet in Embryo, and the Birth appear'd not with the Deformity which Echard gives it till two or three Years after. However, they now past several Ordinances which could not but seem Monstrous to his Imagination. As, one for Ordination of Ministers, notwithstanding any Breach in the Apostolical Succession. An Ordinance for providing them Maintenances out of Deans and Chapters Lands. An Ordinance for Establishing the Assembly's Directory of Worship, and putting down the Common Prayer Book. I believe Mr. Archdeacon thinks no Wickedness in the World can come up to that. Such Ordinances as these must throw him into a Tremour; and that about scandalous Ministers work it up to a Frenzy, and we cannot expect Ceremony from him towards a Senate who had abolish'd all Ceremonies in the Church.

A. D. 1644.

The Mystery which he makes of the Designs of the Independents by the Change of the Generals, is not a Dream of his own, but of some of his sober Writers, whom he has copy'd as faithfully as if they had been awake when they wrote for him. He makes the great Villainy of this Turn to be the Production of a Fast when their Preachers kept the Pulpit 10 Hours, and the next Day Sir Henry Vane told them, If ever God appear'd to them it was in Yesterday's Exercise, which could only proceed from the immediate Spirit of God. He besought them to remember God and their Country; and that those Parliament Men who had Places would lay them down, which of course remov'd Effex, Manchester, Waller, &c. among whom were those Disgusts and Disagreements which were so prejudicial to the Service. The Reverend Historian represents those Gentlemen who had been zealous for the Directory as out of their Wits, and to do that effectually he seems to have parted with his own. General Ludlow, who was himself an Independent, a Member of Parliament, a chief Officer of the Army, a Man of Honour, Genius, Vertue, Learning, Knowledge and Experience, speaks of this Alteration soberly and rationally. "The Disputes in the mean Time continu'd in the two Houses concerning the Conduct of the Army, and though what was objected touching the late Miscarriages at the Fight of Newbury, and elsewhere, amount-

"ed not to a formal Charge, yet it so far prevailed with the House of Commons, as to convince them of the Necessity of making an Alteration in the Command of the Army, in order to bring the War to a Conclusion." Which Resolution was taken by the House upon a Report made to them by Mr. Zouch Tate, who, by the way, was a zealous Presbyterian, and no Independent, and is said to be the only profess'd Presbyterian in the House of Commons, when this Parliament met first, though there was a great Number of Puritans. Mr. Tate was Chairman of the Committee for reforming the Army, and represented in his Report, That the Committee had been endeavouring to obey the Order of the House, but found the Condition of the Army as the Physician did the Blood of his Patient, who consulted him about the Cure of a slight Tumour, when the whole Mass of his Blood was entirely corrupted; that therefore the Committee had order'd him to acquaint the House, that the whole Body of the Army being infected, nothing would serve for their Recovery less than the entire renewing of their Constitution.

Self-denying Ordinance. The House, that they might do it without giving Occasion to any sinister Reflections upon themselves, agreed to a Self-denying Ordinance, the Grounds of which were express'd to be the Clearing of the Parliament from the Aspersions cast upon them of prolonging the War, on purpose to gratify each other with Places, and neglecting their Duty in the House by holding Employments in the Army, &c.

Every one knows Zouch Tate was no Creature of Cromwel's, and every one that has read the true History of these distracted Times, such as Rushworth's and Whitlocke's, must know, that the Disagreement among the General Officers of the Parliament's Army, would necessarily corrupt the Soldiers; and if as they had begun their Defence with the Sword, they resolv'd to end it by securing their Religion, Rights and Liberties, they could not hope to do it without putting their Forces under other Management, and they could not change Hands more decently than by this Self-denying Ordinance, of which we shall hear more the next Year. Some Historians, as Gregorio Leti, who pretends he had his Memoirs from the Earl of Anglesey, who publish'd Whitlocke's Memorials, represents this Ordinance as the Effect of Cromwel's Intrigues to remove the Earl of Manchester, to whom he was Lieutenant General, and get the chief Command himself; but as he is out in most Things, notwithstanding the Authority he boasts of, so is he in this; and to me nothing can seem more natural, than that after Sir William Waller had been routed at Roundway Down, for want of Assistance from the Earl of Essex, and the Earl of Essex had been hinder'd of a compleat Victory at Newbury first Battle, for want of Assistance from Waller, after the Earl's Disgrace in Cornwall, and his leaving the Army, not only there, but before the last Newbury Fight, after Cromwel's formal Complaint against Manchester, and Manchester's as formal Complaint against Cromwel, the Parliament should put other Generals over their Armies. The Royalists were sensible that the Alteration would be for the worst with respect to them, and that in the Low Condition of their Affairs a vigorous and zealous General would soon clear the Kingdom of them; but though they were afraid of this Change to a Degree hardly expressible, yet they put the best Face they could upon it, and seem'd to be Merry even when they trembled, calling the Parliament's new Model of the Army the new Noddle, and it is some of their best Wit too.

A. D. 1644. I have mention'd his Highness the Prince Elector Palatine's writing to the Parliament, and about the latter End of the Summer he came over into England, and was complimented by a Committee of both Houses. This Prince appears to have a Sense of true Religion, and to differ in Morals very much from his Brother Prince Rupert, who indulg'd himself in Looseness of Life as well as Principle, though in his latter Days he became sensible of the Design to destroy the Protestant Religion and Liberty, and generally voted in Parliament with the Country Lords in King Charles the Second's Reign. The Committee inform'd his Electoral Highness, That the two Houses were surpris'd at his Coming without giving them any previous Notice, and conceiv'd his Residence abroad might be of great Advantage to the Publick, for the Parliament have always been very tender of the Affairs of his Highness, and will continue the same Regards, and are ready to express it in their Actions and faithful Advice. To which the Elector reply'd, I hold my self much oblig'd to the Parliament for their former Favours, and my Coming is to express in Person what I have often done by Letters, my sincere Affections unto them, and to take off such Jealousies as either the Actions of some of my Relations, or the ill Effects of my Enemies might by my Absence cast upon me. My Wishes are constant for the good Success of the great Work you have undertaken for a Thorough Reformation, and my Desires are to be rul'd and govern'd by your grave Counsels, and being ready to serve you, I will with Cheerfulness embrace your Advice. The King wrote his Highness a Letter from Tavistocke, Sept. the 27th, which was extremely cold; and though his Majesty said, The Consideration of your Mother's Son is the only Cause of my Curiosity, yet it is plain he was a little perplexed about it, and wanted to know who invited him, and what he meant by coming. The latter was very plain, his Highness could have no other Meaning than to procure Assistance of those who were willing and able to assist him; whereas himself and his Interests, and the Interest of the Protestant Religion in Germany, had been shamefully abandon'd by the Court of England for above 20 Years, but the Palatine House was too much Protestant to be regarded by Ministers under the Influence of Villiers, Weston, Wentworth and Laud. The two Houses order'd an Apartment at Whitehall to be fitted up for his Highness, and 8000 Pounds a Year to be settl'd upon him, till their Circumstances enabled them to make better Provision. They also pass'd an Order for his being admitted, when he pleas'd, into the Assembly of Divines, to hear their Debates, as his Highness had desir'd. A Committee was appointed to take his Affairs into Consideration, and 10000 Pounds a Year order'd to be paid to his Royal Mother the Queen of Bohemia. These Civilities from the Parliament are the Occasion, I suppose, that Echard tells us, her Majesty's Grant Succession the two Sons Rupert and Maurice scorn'd their elder Brother the Elector. I have frequently observed with what Disregard that Queen and her Royal Posterity have always been treated by the Laudian Faction. If they had been famous for Foresight one would think they foresaw, that the Succession of that Illustrious House to the Crown would one Day save and secure the Reform'd Religion in England, the Liberties and Properties of the People, which they could not foresee but with the utmost Terror and Detestation, as appears by the Tenor of their late Histories.

Ordinance for Martial Law Com-
In June this Year the Parliament pass'd an Ordinance for excluding all Members of both Houses, Law Com-who missionaries.

A. D. 1644. who had deserted them, and for electing Members to sit in the Place of those Commons who had been expell'd. Two Months after they pass'd the Ordinance for executing Martial Law, intended chiefly against Spies, Conspirators, Mutineers, Breakers of the Covenant, Deserters, Assistants of the Enemy; The Commissioners were the Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Kent, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Salisbury, the Earl of Bolingbroke, the Earl of Manchester, the Earl of Denbigh, Lord Viscount Say, Lord Wharton, Lord North, Lord Grey of Werke, Lord Robarts, Lord Lisle, Sir James Harrington, Sir William Waller, Sir Arthur Haslerigge, Sir John Corbet, Sir John Bampfild, Sir Henry Hayman, Col. Stapely, Colonel Whitehead, Col. Morley, Col. Purefoy, Col. Ven, Col. Fephsen, Col. Rigby, Col. Brown, Col. West, Col. Player, Col. Prince, Col. Harfner, Col. Popham, Major General Skippon, Col. Fleetwood, Col. Williams, Col. Turner, Col. Maynwaring, Col. Whickcot, Col. Pindar, Colonel Humphry, Colonel Owen, Sir Nathaniel Brent, Dr. Thomas Eaton, Edward Baynton, Esq; William Molyns, Esq; John Bradshaw, Esq; Thomas Arundel, Esq; William Steel, Esq; Lieutenant Colonel Welden, Lieutenant Colonel Underwood, Lieutenant Colonel Wilson, Lieutenant Colonel Webb, Lieutenant Colonel Bradley, Major Sallozway, Major Tichburn, Major Camfield. A Court as little likely to do any thing cruel and unjust, as could be hop'd for from the Birth, Education, Principles and Professions of so many noble Lords and Gentlemen, there being very few of them who were Gentlemen by their Offices only, as Ven and Brown. The latter indeed did sit in a bloody Court afterwards, and aton'd by his Injustice there for the Justice he did in this. The first Man who dy'd by this Act, was one Pit of Wolverhampton in Staffordshire, a profess'd Puritan, who being Tenant to Col. Levison the Popish Governor of Dudley Castle, was prevail'd upon to endeavour to bribe Capt. Tuthill Governor of Rusbat-Hall to betray that Garrison for 2000 Pounds. Tuthill discover'd the Treason, and Pit at the Gallows express'd his great Sorrow for attempting the Fact for which he was to suffer.

An Ordinance for an Assessment for Ireland. In October an Ordinance pass'd for an Assessment thro' the Kingdom of England for the present Relief of Ireland and the British Army there. The City of London was assess'd 300 Pounds a Week, Middlesex and Westminster 125 Pounds a Week, and so all the Counties of England and Wales, amounting in all to about 4500 Pounds a Week. The Parliament also pass'd an Ordinance, that no Quarter should be given to the Irish who were found in Arms against them in England.

For no Quarter to Irish Rebels in England. At this Time the Lord Macgwire and Hugh Oge Mac Mahon, Esq; were first brought upon their Trials for the Irish Rebellion, and their Guilt was so notorious, that Mr. Archdeacon cannot lay their Blood to the Parliament on any other Account, than that Macgwire was a Lord and try'd by Commoners. Macgwire and Mac Mahon were taken at Dublin the Day before they were to have seiz'd that Castle, and to have murder'd the Lords Justices of Ireland. Mac Mahon immediately confess'd and boldly avow'd the Plot; but Macgwire would not then acknowledge it. At last he made a large Confession before the Lord Lambert and Sir Robert Meredith. About July 1642. they were sent for over to England and committed to the Tower, where they remain'd two Years, the Parliament not having Leisure to bring them to Trial. They then, by Confederacy with two Priests belonging to the Spanish Ambassador, and one Mr. Levison over against the New Exchange in the Strand, at whose House the French Agent lodg'd, got a Lord Mac-Steel saw, with which in the Night they saw'd afunder the Door of their Chamber above two Inches thick, and so with Cords got over the Tower-Wall, and swam the Ditch. No News was heard of them in a Month. They took Lodgings at a Constable's House in Drury-lane, and one of them looking then out of Window to call an Oyster-Woman, happen'd to be spy'd by a Servant of Sir John Clotworthy, whose Servant O Conolly had discover'd their Plot; and probably the good Services of this Gentleman's Servants expos'd him to the Insults of the Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Echard. The Lieutenant of the Tower hearing where they were hous'd, went and seiz'd them, and carry'd them back to Prison. Their late Escape put the Two Houses upon expediting their Trial. Mac Mahon pleaded Not Guilty, but was convicted by full Evidence, condemn'd, hang'd, drawn and quarter'd at Tyburn, Nov. 22. Macgwire pleaded his Irish Peerage; but Mr. Pryne and Serjeant Whitfield, Counsel for the State, argu'd learnedly against it, and the Court over-rul'd his Plea. The Witnesses who prov'd the Charge, were Sir William Cole, Sir Francis Hamilton, Sir William Steward, the Lord Blaney, the Lady Caulfield, and Sir Charles Coote. The Evidence was too full to admit of much Debate, so he was convicted and condemn'd to die as Mac Mahon did. He petition'd the Two Houses that he might be beheaded, which was refus'd, and in Truth the Gallows was good enough for such an impenitent bloody-minded Rebel. He had much Popish Trumpery about him when he mounted the Ladder, and Directions from his Priest how to make his Prayers, as, We fly to thee for Aid, O holy Mother of God. Hail! sweet Mother of Christ, pray for the Church of Ireland, M. Grea, Say Jesu Maria three Times, also a Pater and Ave and Jesu Maria three Times. Which Farce the poor Wretch was made to believe by his Priest would carry him to Heaven.

About the same Time Sir Alexander Carew was brought to his Trial for Treason in contriving to betray the Island of St. Nicholas near Plymouth, of which the Parliament had made him Governor, to the King. Treachery is a Crime so unworthy a Gentleman, that it has a good Word in no History but in the Archdeacon's and the History he copy'd from. He tells us this Knight was willing to redeem his former Errors, his voting for the Attainder of the grand Apostate Strafford, and taking the Covenant, by Breach of Oath and Trust. It is no Matter how these Men gain their Ends, if they can but gain them. Carew was seiz'd in the very Fact by his own Soldiers, and sent up to the Parliament, who order'd him to be try'd by the Court Martial. The Witnesses against him were Mr. Francis Mayor of Plymouth, Mr. Randal, and Mr. Willis, two Ministers, Capt. Hancock, Mr. Deep a Merchant, and Arthur Skinner Gent. Being found guilty, and condemn'd to be beheaded, his Lady petition'd for a Reprieve on Account of his distracted Condition, upon which a Committee was appointed to visit him, who reported that he was not distracted, but a Month's Time was given him to settle his Estate. He made a Speech on the Scaffold, wherein he said, All you can lay to my Charge is but Intention, and no Man knows my Intentions better than my self, and they shall die with my self. The Archdeacon makes an old Woman's Reflection on this Execution,

A. D. execution, that he was the next Man who was beheaded on that Scaffold after the Earl of Strafford. But what he makes of the Punishment of the Hothams is enough to set one a trembling; that their Death was another Instance of Divine Vengeance, for their being true to their Country, and securing Hull. As if the Cause of Tyranny, Spiritual and Temporal, of Sabbath-Breaking, Superstition, and Ceremonies, was the Cause of God. The Brachmans and Musselmans seem to know as much of the Christian Religion as these Men do of the Reform'd.

Sir John Hotham try'd and condemn'd.

On the 30th of November Sir John Hotham was brought before the Court Martial at Guildhall, Sir William Waller President. The Charge against him was for traiterously endeavouring to betray the Trust the Parliament had repos'd in him, which was prov'd by his Letters to the Lord Digby and the Marquis of Newcastle. He made but a poor Defence, and Sentence of Death pass'd upon him that he should be beheaded; but on his Lady's Petition for Time to settle his Estate, he was repriev'd.

His Son Capt. Hotham was charg'd with holding traitorous Correspondence with the Parliament's Enemies. One main Evidence was his own Servant John Keys, who depos'd that his Master having first sworn him to Secrecy, sent him to Newark with a Message to the Queen, just after he was committed to Prison in Nottingham Castle. 'Twas to desire her Majesty to send a Party to rescue him, when he was remov'd thence to be sent to London, or to the Lord General. Keys was intrusted with several other Notices for the Queen, and desiring his Master to give him a Token that her Majesty might give Credit to him, Hotham said, By the same Token I sent her a Letter by one of her own Doctors of Physick where she might land in England. Keys further depos'd, that when he came to Newark and deliver'd his Letter, her Majesty said, This unhappy Accident had not fallen out if Capt. Hotham had come away when he first resolv'd it. Upon which the Lord Digby standing by, told her Majesty, Both he and his Father had come in long since, but for doing your Majesty better Service, and by forbearing it for a Time. So plain Evidence as this could not but produce the same Sentence as pass'd against his Father 17 Days before. The Father being condemn'd the 7th of December to die on the 16th, and the Son was condemn'd the 24th of December to die the 1st of January, which I mention to shew Mr. Archdeacon's uncommon Veracity and Modesty. He says, The vile Artifices us'd both before and after their Trials, were so unhuman, as have been rarely practis'd among Christians. The Man who writes thus is a Dignitary in the Church. The Father was order'd first to suffer upon an appointed Day, and the Son the Day following. Rushworth tells us the Father was condemn'd to be executed the 16th of December, and the Son was not condemn'd till the 24th of December; he adds, they were try'd by a Court Martial, but he takes no Notice of the Ordinance which made the Court Martial the Law. The Lords having repriev'd Sir John Hotham for a few Days without Consent of the Commons, it occasion'd a Vote that no Reprieve should be valid without the Consent of both Houses. This tragical Story takes up but a few Lines in the Archdeacon's Folio, and yet it teems with Falsities. He suffer'd Hugh Peters to tell the People he had reveal'd himself to him, and confess'd his Offences against the Parliament. What Laurence Echard says of Hugh Peters, they being both Ministers, is so far from being true, that Sir John Hotham himself said on the Scaffold, I was no way guilty of betraying Hull from the Parliament; and Hugh only told the People, It is the Desire of Sir John Hotham, that since he has in his Chamber fully discover'd himself to me and other Ministers, many Questions may not be put to him, but that he might have Liberty to speak only what he thought fit concerning himself. Sir John disown'd any Offence against the Parliament as to Hull, and Mr. Peters did not declare that he had confess'd his Offences. One cannot let such Scraps of History pass without taking Notice of the Insolence in them; for tho' Peters was a Man of a whimsical Character, yet his Station in the Protestant Church was of much more Eminence than the Historian's is like to be, at least if he is rewarded as his History deserves.

The next Criminal brought before the Court Martial, Sir John Corbet President, was an infamous Person, one Roger L'Estrange, a Writer of such History as our late Histories of England, in the Reign of King Charles II. and a zealous Champion for the Church, in Echard's Sense of that Word. His Crime was the contriving to betray the Town of Lynne in Norfolk to the Cavaliers. He receiv'd a Commission from his Majesty, beginning thus; We having receiv'd from our trusty and well-beloved Roger L'Estrange, Esq. Which Commission, said the Judge Advocate, not being that of a Soldier to raise Men, but a Commission of Bribery and Corruption, merely to make a Party in the Town by clandestine Ways, with Bait and Promises of Money and Preferment, and the Prisoner coming from the Enemy into the Parliament's Quarters without Drum, Trumpet, or Pass, it brought him within the Danger and Penalty of a Spy. It was prov'd against him, that he promis'd one Mr. Leaman, a Sea Captain, 1000 Pounds, and Corporal Haggard 100 Pounds to make a Party in Lynne, which Leaman discover'd to Col. Walton the Governor, who sent six Soldiers disguis'd like Seamen to seize L'Estrange at Mr. Paffon's at Appleton Hall, where they took him and his noble Commission, and he was condemn'd as a Spy, To be carry'd back to the Place from whence he came, to be hang'd and there to be carried to Smithfield, there to be hang'd by the Neck until he be dead. A Sentence which all honest Men in England wish'd afterwards had been executed. But he was repriev'd and shut up in Newgate several Years, where he learnt the Manners and Language of a Goal, as appear'd plentifully in his Observators, Ryehouse-Plot, and other detestable Libels against the Protestant Religion and Liberty, which made him so great an Ornament to the Cause he espous'd, and a proper Subject for Mr. Archdeacon's Eulogy. Among other Pieces of Treachery, which, as the easiest Way, the Cavaliers chose to do their Work by, was the Attempt of one Mr. Barnard, a Parson, to corrupt Major General Browne Governor of Abingdon. Barnard had left his Parish of Woolchurch, London, to be a Court Preacher at Oxford. Browne was a Sort of Kinsman of his, and as such Barnard sent to him for a Pass to come and speak with him, which being granted, he told the Major General he wish'd they were both on one Side. Browne, to lift him, declar'd, if he thought himself in an Error, he would not be long in leaving it. Mr. Barnard then desir'd Liberty to write to him, which the Major General granted, and the first Letter he wrote him informs Browne, His Majesty wonder'd that he, who is recommended to him for many worthy Parts and Actions, which shew'd he was no Stranger to noble Qualities; He, who, &c. and so

A. D. 1644. so for 20 panegyricall Particulars, should not only join with, but lead his Subjects against him. By the by, this same Major General, with all these heroical Endowments, was no more nor less than a London Woodmonger. The Parson endeavour'd to prove that he was IPSO FACTO excommunicated for siding with the Parliament by two or three Texts out of Proverbs, the Writer of which never heard of Excommunication, and that he was commanded to run from his Colours by two or three Texts more in Timothy. That he was look'd upon as Mordecai look'd upon Esther, as one advanc'd to restore the King to his Subjects, and his Subjects to the King. If Hugh Peters or Stephen Marshal, whom Echard calls the Effes Parson, had held forth like this Mr. Barnard, the Archdeacon could not have made himself too merry with them. Browne gave a civil Answer to his Letter, which was follow'd by another, with an Offer of being made a Baronet. But the Major General reply'd, Abingdon deseru'd something better. Upon which the Lord Digby wrote to him, and told him, He was a Person of much Reason, and very much a Gentleman, and if he will be so good as to receive his Majesty's Forces into Abingdon, he shall have a Warrant to be a Baronet, and the Command of a Brigade in his Majesty's Army. Browne answers, There is nothing wanting to an absolute Conclusion between them, saving a speedy Provision of his Affairs at London. The Reply from the Lord Digby highly extols the Major General's Discretion, and presses for a speedy Conclusion. But the Major General receiving a Reinforcement of 1500 Foot into the Town, convinc'd the Lord Digby that Browne had made a Fool of him, which appear'd more fully in the Major General's next Letter, Did your Lordship imagine that your Ink would catch like Bird-Lime. You say you have hang'd a Spy of mine, and that you may be ballanc'd, this very Morning I will cause to be hang'd one of yours condemn'd by our Council of War. Digby out of Revenge wrote a Letter so worded, as to give the Parliament a Jealousy of Browne, who answer'd it, as one who knew what he meant by it, The World may now see which Way the Queen convey'd from London the Jewels beyond Sea, and the Irish Rebels were brought over, which Way so many Overtures have appear'd and vanish'd, surely by my Lord Digby's Trick of Cleanly Conveyance, a Term Digby had us'd in his last Letter. Browne's Works about Abingdon were not finish'd, and had the Garrison of Oxford attempted the Place, while he was fooling their Secretary of State, they must have carry'd it. But when the Fortifications were compleat the Major General told him so, and bad him Defiance. The Dexterity of this volatile Lord is the Subject of much Encomium in the Earl of Clarendon's and the Archdeacon's Histories, though we see he is out-witted and banter'd by a Woodmonger.

1645. We have mention'd that there had been some Overtures for a Treaty made by his Majesty. But the two Houses conceiving that in those Messages they were not sufficiently own'd to be a Parliament, return'd only an expostulatory Letter, and no farther Progress was made in it till about a Month before Christmas, when both Houses, with the Consent of the Scottish Commissioners, having prepar'd certain Propositions for Peace, wrote to the King's General for a safe Conduct for the Lords and Commons, and Commissioners for Scotland, who were appointed to carry them to his Majesty, and these were, the Earl of Denbigh, the Lord Maynard, the Lord Wenman, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Whitlocke, the Lord Maitland, Sir Charles Eskines, Mr. Barclay. The Trumpet who carry'd the Parliament's Letter brought back a safe Conduct from Prince Rupert under the King's Hand and Seal, which yet took no Notice of them as Members of Parliament, but as private Persons. The Commissioners were not very civilly us'd by Colonel Blake, Governor of Wallingford, who quarrell'd with the Earl of Denbigh concerning some Passages of the War, and Sir Jacob Ashley Governor of Oxford made them wait some Hours in the cold open Field, at the latter End of November; at last they were admitted into the Town, and lodg'd at a forry Inn, the Katharine Wheel, near St. John's College. The next Day they had Access to his Majesty, and the Earl of Denbigh read the Propositions which the two Houses of Parliament and the Scotts Commissioners had agreed to, as the Ground Work of Peace. The King ask'd the Commissioners if they had Power to treat. They answer'd, No. But their Commission was to receive his Majesty's Answer in writing. His Majesty reply'd, Then a Letter Carrier might have done as much as you. The Earl of Denbigh said, I suppose your Majesty looks upon us as Persons of another Condition than Letter Carriers. The King reply'd, I know your Condition, but I say your Commission gives you Power to do no more than a Letter Carrier might have done. Which caus'd some Disatisfaction in the Commissioners, who went away in it, but some of the Court Lords afterwards excus'd to them those hasty Words. At the Reading the excepted Persons Names which the Earl of Denbigh read with great Courage and Temper, Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice being present when there Names were read as Persons excepted, they fell into a Laughter, at which the King seem'd displeas'd, and bad them be quiet. His Majesty's Behaviour to these Commissioners in general did not promise well for a Peace. When he gave them his Answer 'twas seal'd up, which they did not think proper to receive thus, and humbly address'd to have a Copy of it. The King reply'd, What's that to you, who are but to carry what I send, and if I will send the Song of Robin Hood and Little John, you must carry it. To which the Commissioners only said, The Business we came about, and are to return with your Majesty's Answer, is of somewhat more Consequence than that Song. Whitlocke, one of them, says, "Other Passages there were which shew'd the King to be then in no good Humour, and more wonder'd at, especially in a Business of this Importance, where the disobliging of the Commissioners could be of no Advantage to the King; but all was endeavour'd to be made up again by some Lords about his Majesty before the Commissioners came away, and a Copy of the Answer was sent them. They took another Exception to the Paper, which was directed to no Body, nor the Parliament so much as acknowledged or nam'd in it." To which the King answer'd, It was deliver'd to the Parliament's Commissioners, and that was sufficient. Some of the Lords told them, They could not get it otherwise, chiefly because they were there as Commissioners of both Kingdoms, and earnestly entreated them for Peace sake to receive it as it was sent, which was at last consented to, and they carry'd it to the Parliament. Both Houses had a Conference upon his Majesty's Answer. In the Preamble of which were High Expressions of his Desires of Peace, and he demanded a Safe Conduct for the Duke of Lenox and Earl of Southampton to bring his Answer to the Propositions, which was granted, and Somerſet House order'd

Commissioners sent to Oxford.

A.D. 1645. to be prepared for their Reception: But no Member of either House was permitted to visit them or send to or receive any Message from any one that came from Oxford without leave. All the Answer the King's Commissioners brought, was a Proposal for Persons to be appointed to treat on both Sides and debate the Propositions, which the Parliament had sent to his Majesty, which being voted, safe Conducts were granted by King and Parliament for their respective Commissioners, and Uxbridge appointed to be the Place of Treaty.

Treaty at Secretaries to the English Commissioners:

Mr. Thurlow, Mr. Earl.

To the Scots Commissioners:
Mr. Chiefely.

Affistants to the English Commissioners:
Mr. Vynes, Mr. Marshal, Mr. Cheynel.

587. These Commissioners for the Treaty on both Parts met at Uxbridge, Wednesday the 29th of January, and several Visits past between them; Sir Edward Hyde visited Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitlocke; the Lord Colepepyr did the same to Sir Henry Vane, and others of the King's Commissioners visited several of the Parliament's, with whom they had long Discourses about the Treaty, which both Sides seem'd very forward to promote; but it was visible as soon as it open'd, that the King did not think his Case so desperate as he soon found it to be, when the Campaign was begun and his Commissioners made no Concessions which they could suppose would be satisfactory. Mr. Archdeacon continues the Character of his History in the Account he gives us of this Treaty: The very Opening of it being false and taken from a French Papist. The Parliament invested their Commissioners with a Power only to treat, whereas the King invested his with a full Power not only to treat but to conclude. Salmonet says, Au lieu que le Roy Leur avoit donné un plain Pouvoir de traiter librement & de conclurre sur tout le detail des Affaires les Etats avoient restraint les Pouvoirs de leurs Deputez aux Instructions qu'ils recevoient, which is directly the Reverse of the Truth. Whitlocke assures us the King's Commissioners

A.D. 1645. said, We are bound up by our Instructions from his Majesty, and can go no further.

Sir John Benner's House at the farther End of the Town was fitted up for the Place of Meeting, and the first Thing they treated upon when the Commissioners met there, was Religion, the chief Article of which Dr. Stuart asserted to be not Faith and Piety, but Episcopacy, such as that of Munster and Toledo, which he affirm'd to be Jure Divino. By Episcopacy he must understand Baronies, Lordships, Titles, Dignities, Spiritual Courts, Prerogatives, Mitres, Crostiers, &c. Which it was impossible for the Apostolical Bishops to have or think of, there not being a Power upon Earth which did not treat them as Enemies; for if the good Doctor had said, that Bishop Titus and Bishop Timothy's Vocation to preach God's Word and take Pastoral Care of their Flocks was Jure Divino, nay that their pious Successors have the same Divine Right which those primitive Bishops had, there would not have been a Word said against him. Mr. Henderson and Mr. Marshal spoke in Praise of Presbyterian Government as more suitable to the Word of God, and consequently Jure Divino; and the Marquis of Hertford reply'd to both of them, My Lords, here is much said concerning Church Government in general; the Reverend Doctors on the King's Part affirm, that Episcopacy is Jure Divino; the Reverend Ministers on the other Part do affirm the Presbytery is Jure Divino; for my Part, I think that neither the one nor the other is Jure Divino; and I desire we may leave this Argument, and proceed to debate upon the particular Proposals. The Earl of Pembroke was of the same Judgment, and many of the Commissioners besides these two Lords were willing to pass over this Point, and to come to the Particulars. But the Jure Divino Men on both Sides stood to their Text, and the Lay Commissioners could not but perceive the Peace they came to treat about would not be much forward-ed by the warm Debates of the Clergy. One of them, Mr. Christopher Love, who it seems was a Voluntier, and was come to Uxbridge without being sent, preach'd there to the Market People, and said in his Sermon, They were not to expect any good from the Treaty, for that they came from Oxford with Hearts full of Blood, and that there was as great a Difference between this Treaty and Peace, as between Heaven and Hell, and that they only amus'd the People with Expectations of Peace, till they were able to do some fatal Mischief. This Piece of Impudence would have deserv'd some notable Punishment, if the King's Commissioners had not really so amus'd the People. Their Memorial upon it was sent to the Parliament, but the Treaty broke up so soon that Love escap'd Animadversion. In the Management of the first Article about Religion, and Episcopacy as a Fundamental of it, we may see by the Papers on both Sides how hopelessly the Business went on.

King's Commissioners Paper. "As we have given your Lordships already many Reasons concerning the Injustice and Inconveniency which would follow upon passing the Bill for abolishing Episcopacy: So we are ready now by Conference to satisfy your Lordships, why we conceive that the said Bill is not for the Glory of God or the Honour of the King.

Parliament's Commissioners Reply. "We have received no Satisfaction from your Lordships, nor have you yet made appear unto us any Injustice or Inconveniency in the passing of the Bill for abolishing Episcopacy." This occa-

A. D. 1645. occasion'd a new Debate between the Divines for Episcopal and Presbyterian Government; and after it was over,

The Parliament's Commissioners deliver'd another Paper. "There having now been several Days spent upon the Proposition for Religion, and all Objections alledg'd to the contrary, either from Conscience, Law, or Reason being fully answer'd, we should be wanting to the Trust repos'd in us, if we did not press for a clear Answer to the Proposition concerning Religion. King's Commissioners. "We deny that the Objections alledg'd by us against the passing the Bill for abolishing Episcopacy, from Conscience, Law or Reason, have been fully answer'd by your Lordships, or that indeed we have receiv'd any Satisfaction from your Lordships in those Particulars; and we should be wanting to the great Trust repos'd in us if we should consent, &c.

Parliament's Commissioners. "We did assure our selves that after so many Days Debate concerning Religion, and our Removal of whatever Objections had been offer'd by your Lordships, and our making appear how great a Hindrance Episcopal Government is, and hath been to a perfect Reformation, to the Growth of Religion, and prejudicial to the Civil State, that your Lordships would have been ready to have answer'd our Expectation, &c.

King's Commissioners. "It is evident, and we conceive consented to on all Purposes, that Episcopacy hath continu'd even from the Apostles Times by continual Succession in the Church of Christ without Intermission or Interruption.

If two of them speak, or two Hundred of them it is all one. Eternal Sophistry and Prevarication! That the Function and Title of a Bishop to preach the Gospel, administer the Sacraments, to take the Pastoral Care of one Church, and sometimes to superintend others, in a brotherly exhortative Manner, was without Intermission or Interruption is true; but could the most invincible Assurance pretend that the Matters for which the King's six Doctors contended, Mannors, Royalties, Peerages, temporal Powers, Courts and Castles, have been without Intermission or Interruption in the Church of Christ, from Pope Linus's Time to Pope Joan's, or Pope John's 800 Years after. I have before me a very learned and judicious Writer, Mr. Tallents, who knew the State of this Affair better than the Uxbridge Doctors; and I shall give his own Words, which will be sufficient and satisfactory, and there needs no more be said of it.

Binius
Can. Apost. "The Names of Bishop and Presbyter were promiscuously used, and not distinguish'd for above 200 Years. There were good Bishops at Rome till after the Year 300: From thence they declin'd much, till the Year 600, and from thence they grew very bad. The Catalogues of these Bishops seem very fair; This is the boasted Succession, without Intermission or Interruption; but there is great Confusion in them: Few of them are alike. Some are nam'd that were never in Being. The Times of most are uncertain, and the Names of divers unknown; there being no certain Writer of their Lives from the Year 858, to the Year 1047. Besides, there were many long Vacancies, and 30 Schisms, 2 or 3 Bishops or Popes at the same Time. There are also great Differences about the first 6 Bishops, as Baronius confesses: Some say St. Peter came to Rome Anno 42. some say 63. and some not at all. We must by no Means imagine

"the first Bishops of Rome, who were holy Men, and gave themselves to Prayer and the Word, were like the Bishops in after Ages or now, &c." What Mr. Tallents says is agreeable to the Parliament's Commissioners Reply. "So far were we from consenting that Episcopacy hath continu'd from the Apostles Times by continual Succession, that the contrary was made evident to your Lordship, and the Unlawfulness of it fully proved." Warwick, who is certainly as good a Divine and Casuist as he is a Politician and Historian informs us, that the Presbyterians storm'd at Dr. Lany; and Dr. Hammond prov'd by Scripture that the Covenant was against it. Echard assures us, impartial Men, such as the Earl of Clarendon and himself, thought the King's Divines superior to the other in Argument and Genius; the last Word Genius is very good if he understood it, and if he had we should not have found it in his Panegyrick. This is their modest way of talking. By Superiority here, if any Thing is meant it is Confidence, they out fronted the Presbyterian Divines, as we read in Whitlocke, Dr. Steward, and Dr. Sheldon argu'd very positively, that the Government by Bishops was Jure Divino; Mr. Henderson and Mr. Vines argu'd as positively, but more modestly, that the Government of the Church by Presbyteries was Jure Divino.

King's Commissioners. "We must profess to your Lordships that we did conceive the Succession of Episcopacy from the Apostles was consented to on all Sides, and cannot remember that the contrary thereof was so much as alledg'd, much less that the Unlawfulness thereof was prov'd.

One may perceive by this with what Spirit and with what Truth these Gentlemen and Doctors argu'd. It was not possible for the Parliament's Commissioners to debate this Article, but they must at least alledge some such Thing: But the King's Commissioners, the Lords, Knights, and Doctors, do not remember a Syllable of it, and a Treaty was likely to come to something that was made up of asserting and denying. His Majesty's Commissioners were oblig'd to allow that the spiritual Courts ought to be abolish'd by taking away their Fees and Excommunications; yet that scandalous Grievance, which not only reflects on the Protestant but the Christian Religion, and indeed upon all Religion, as being a Mart for Wickedness by Mults and Commutation, &c. is still the Complaint of all honest Men, and the Practices of those mean mercenary Officers the Infamy of a great and generous Nation. The King's Commissioners offer'd that Ceremonies should not be enjoin'd, which in Truth was to abolish them; that Bishops should not ordain without Consent of the Presbytery; that they should preach every Sunday and reside in their Diocesses, and that Pluralities should not be suffer'd, &c. But the Parliament's Commissioners had engag'd for the establishing of the Covenant which abolish'd Episcopacy, and it was great Pity they could accept of nothing less; for the King's Commissioners could yield to nothing more: So that Article remain'd in Statu quo.

The next was that of the Militia, the Power of which the Parliament's Commissioners demanded to be vested in such Persons as both Houses and the Parliament of Scotland should nominate, which, says Echard, Lane, Gardiner, Bridgman and Palmer, prov'd to be without any Pretence of Law or Justice. Observe how positive he is, and yet the very contrary of it is the Fact. He adds, "Sir Edward Hyde" and

"and Mr. Whitlocke had some Disputes, but to "no Effect;" that is, the King's Commissioners would make no Concession that was effectual. Whitlocke's own Account of it is as follows; "Sir Edward Hyde would have had it "for granted that the whole Power of the Militia, by the Law of England, is in the King "only: Mr. Whitlocke deny'd this to be so very "clear, and undertook to make it out, that our "Law doth not positively affirm where that "great Power is lodg'd, and doubted not but to "satisfy the Commissioners fully in that Point: "Upon which it was mov'd that a Day might be "appointed to hear their Arguments, but the "Earl of Southampton was against a formal Debate, which would take up too much Time, "and so was Mr. Hollis. However the Commissioners of England and Scotland at their "Return to their Quarters gave Whitlocke "Thanks for encountering Sir Edward Hyde "upon the Point of Right as to the Militia, "wherein he was so confident. They said the "Honour of the Parliament was concern'd therein, and Whitlocke had vindicated it." However the King's Commissioners, continues Echard, to shew their Readiness for an Accommodation, propos'd, that for seven Years the Persons to be trusted with the Militia, should be nam'd half by the King and half by the Parliament: Whereas the Truth is, the Parliament to shew their Readiness for an Accommodation, sent an Express to their Commissioners at Uxbridge to propose a "Limitation of the Militia for three "Years after the three Kingdoms are declar'd "by the King and Parliament to be settled in "Peace, or have it settled in the Parliament "for seven Years after the Time the King is "willing to settle it.

Ireland.

The Third Article about Ireland is told as faithfully as the rest. The Archdeacon writes, "Sir Edward Hyde, who knew the Secrets of "that Affair, undertook the King's Vindication, "and historically display'd the Justice and Piety "of the King's Proceedings, and the inevitable "Necessity of the Cessation with the bloody "Irish REBELS." This is not only directly against the Truth, but in full Defiance of it. That pious and just Act struck the whole Nation with Horror, and one cannot read it without shuddering. These Irish Rebels had just massacred 200000 Protestants, Men, Women and Children, with the greatest Variety of diabolical Cruelty. The Blood of those Innocents was still as it were reeking on the Hands that sign'd the Treaty on the Part of the Massacrers. As to the Justice of it, let us see what the Parliament's Commissioners at Uxbridge said after the Matter had been debated. "It is very contrary to our "Expectation to find your Lordships unsatisfy'd, "notwithstanding the Arguments and Reasons "alleg'd by us that his Majesty had not Power "to make the Cessation with the REBELS in Ireland; and that upon Perusal of the Statutes, "it appears not to you that his Majesty had no "Power to make that Cessation. It is strange "that your Lordships had forgot all other Arguments used by us from the Common Law "from other Proceedings in Parliament, and "Circumstances as this Case stands, on which "we still insist, and do affirm, that his Majesty "had no Power to make or consent to that Cessation;" which indeed is as plain as simple Fact and common Sense can make a Thing; for by an Act of Parliament pass'd by this King himself, the Contributors of Money towards carrying on the War in Ireland, were to be repaid out of the forfeited Estates in that Kingdom, and this Cessation cut off those Forfeitures. The King's Commissioners, in the Management of this Point, spoke and acted like Persons who were ashamed of the Business, but yet were oblig'd to justify it, and confirm it, the King having not only sent for Sir Michael Ernly's, Sir Richard Fleetwood's, Col. Monk's, Col. Gibson's, and Col. Warren's English Regiments from Ireland; but the Cessation was then about to be turn'd into a Peace, and the Popish REBELS were treating with him to supply him with an Irish Army to reduce the Parliament of England. One can't without blushing read the frivolous Excuses of the King's Commissioners for the Marquis of Ormond's refusing to take Vengeance on the Murderers of so many Thousands of unarmed defenceless Protestants. We have seen what was the Justice of this Cessation, and the Piety of it could not but be seen at the same Time. The Parliament's Commissioners earnestly besought the King's, That God's Quarrel might be re-rend'd upon those perfidious Enemies of the Gospel of Christ, who had imbrued their Hands in so much Protestant Blood; and that they would consider the Cessation that is made with them is for their Advantage, and rather a Protection than a Cessation, as if it had been all of their own contriving, Arms, Ammunition, and all manner of Commodities being to be brought to them, that afterwards they may the better destroy the small Remainder of the Protestants. The Parliament's Commissioners add, Again, we beseech your Lordships, in the Bowels of Christian Charity and Compassion to so many poor Souls, who must perish if the Strength of that raging Adversary be not broken, and in the Name of him who is the Prince of Peace, who hates to be at Peace with such Shoulders of Blood, give not your Consent to the Continuance of this Cessation, till Justice have been fully executed upon the Actors of that accursed REBELLION. Let not the Judgment of War within this Kingdom, which God hath laid upon us for our Sins, be increas'd by so great a Sin as any Peace or Friendship with them, whatsoever becomes of us: If we must perish, let us go to our Graves with that Comfort, that we have not made Peace with the Enemies of Christ, yea the Enemies of Mankind, declar'd and unreconcil'd Enemies to our Religion and Nation. Yet, according to the Reverend Historian, the making Peace with these Enemies of Christ was an Act of great Piety. As to the inevitable Necessity of it, the Fallhood of that Pretence is as self-evident as that there is Light in the Sun: For the English Protestants in Ireland, for whose Preservation it was shamefully pretended to be made, protested, complain'd, and petition'd against it, and yet it is confidently said at Uxbridge, His Majesty's English Protestant Subjects could not subsist without a Cessation. There is nothing in the History of the Rebellion, or Mr. Archdeacon's History, more false than this, The Parliament's Commissioners answer'd the King's; The contrary is undeniable, and his Majesty's Protestant Subjects there, both English and Scottish, who have opposed that Cessation, have subsisted, and do still subsist. It was said again by the King's Commissioners, The poor Protestants in Ireland were preserv'd, and that Kingdom kept from utter Ruin by the Cessation of Arms made with the Popish bloody REBELS. Nothing falser than this is to be met with in Monkish Fables and Legends; it is not only the very Reverse of a Truth which every body knew, but which they that said it could have prov'd better than any one. The Parliament's Commissioners reply'd, It is most apparent that the Necessities alleg'd for the Grounds of that Cessa-

A. D.

A. D. 1645. Cessation were made by Design of the Popish and Prelatical Party in England and Ireland, who so wickedly contriv'd the same, that the Provisions sent thither by the Parliament for Relief of his Majesty's good Subjects in Ireland, were dispos'd of, and afforded to the REBELS there in their greatest Wants. Many wicked Instances of this Design are set forth in their Paper of the 22d of February; and this is the just and pious Affair of which, says Echard, Sir Edward Hyde knew the Secrets. These Men do really know no more of Piety and Justice, than what Mr. Archdeacon expresses in his Vindication of that impious and unjust Cessation, of which Whitlocke writes thus; The Earl of Ormond concluded the Cessation with the Irish REBELS, and divers of them under Col. Ernley came over thither to serve the KING. A Minister was voted out of his Living for constantly praying for the Irish REBELS. Sir William Brereton reported to the House of Commons, that the Irish REBELS commit great Spoil and Cruelty where they come in Cheshire, and that more of them are expected over. The House taking into Consideration the Marquis of Ormond's treating with them, and sending them over to England, voted to impeach him as a TRAYTOR to the Three Kingdoms. In the mean while 20000 of the Scots in the North of Ireland vow'd to live and die together in Opposition to the Cessation. The Earl of Inchiquin, who commanded the English Army in Munster, wrote a Letter to the King, subscrib'd by all the chief Officers, Earl of Inchiquin, Lord Broghil, Sir William Fenton, Sir Percy Smith, Lieutenant Col. William Brocket, Lieutenant Col. Thomas Searl, Major Muschamp; wherein they earnestly pray'd his Majesty to revoke the Truce which his Commissioners at Uxbridge said again and again, and no doubt would have sworn it, was made on Purpose to preserve them. The Conclusion of this Letter was thus, Whatever your Majesty's Resolution is hereupon, ours is to pursue the War vigorously against those inhuman and furious BUTCHERS, and we will rather chuse to die Martyrs in a good Cause, than basely abandon the Defence of it. What Baseness was it then not only to abandon those brave Men, but to assert that the abandoning them was to save them, the Nonsense of which is without Example, as is the Effrontery of justifying an unjust and impious Act as a pious and just one. But to close this Article, and give a solid Proof of the Ingenuity of the King's Commissioners at Uxbridge, and of the Modesty and Ingenuity of their Historians, Mr. Hyde and Mr. Echard, let us read what Sir John Temple, Master of the Rolls in Ireland, and a Privy Counsellor there when this Cessation was made, says of it. "After a considerable Number of Horse as well as Foot sent over by the Parliament of England arriv'd at Dublin, and had in some petty Encounters thereabouts try'd the Metal of the REBELS, and found their Spirits of a poor and base Alloy, they began extremely to disvalue them, and would be no longer abus'd with the fabulous Reports of their great Strength and Numbers, which with much Advantage they had long made use of. Therefore now they began to seek them out in all Places, and wheresoever they met with them they always prevail'd even with small Numbers very often against great Multitudes of them, sparing not many Times to pursue them into the midst of their greatest Fastnesses, and made the very Bogs and Woods unsafe Receptacles for their broken Forces, and with so great Success was the WAR prosecuted by the English, from the first landing of their Forces out of England, until the TREATY OF THAT MOST UNHAPPY CESSATION concluded in September 1643. as that in all the Encounters they had with the REBELS, during that Time, they never received any Scorn or Defeat, but went on victoriously beating them down in all Parts of the Kingdom." This Gentleman was on the Spot, a great Sufferer by that accurs'd REBELLION, and was like to be still as great a Sufferer as any Man in Ireland, yet he is so far from thinking there was any Preservation for him in the Truce with the Massacres, that he bewails the concluding it. What Absurdity, what Stupidity, and worse still than all that, are there in pretending to conclude a Treaty to preserve those People who know there is no Preservation for them but in breaking it, and continuing the War. The Truth is, the Militia, Episcopacy, and the bringing Delinquents to Punishment were Things the King himself, his Bishops and his Counsellors, could not bear the Thoughts of; and the King could not maintain his Ground another Campaign against the Parliament without Assistance from the Irish Papists, who according to what the Parliament's Commissioners said at Uxbridge, were in League with the Prelatical Party; and Agents from the Irish Massacres were admitted by the Court of Oxford, to whom the King, when he took his Leave of them, said, we have both need of one another, Rushworth that we neither of us may fail of what we design. The Design of the bloody Irish REBELS was to cut the Throats of all the English Protestants in that Kingdom, and restore the Papal Tyranny and Idolatry. This Design was open and avow'd, the Lord Inchiquin, in a Letter he wrote Colonel Myn before he deserted the Service in Ireland, writes thus, Some Counsellors about the King have prevail'd with him to make such an Agreement with the Rebels here, as leaves the Interest he now has in their Power, whereof we find they mean to make use for the Extirpation of the English Nation and Protestant Religion out of this Kingdom; of which we have given the King notice, &c. However, the King tells them farther, You must not defer putting it in Execution; by assisting me with all your Forces against my REBEL Subjects of England. Do you assist me to subdue them, and when you have done me that Service, you the Irish Butchers, the King himself calls them so, Rushworth. p. 240. may expect all the Support and all the Protection that can be hop'd for from a grateful Prince. At the Head of this Agency, were Dermot Mac Trag Obrien, one of the most barbarous of those Butchers, the Lord Muskerry, Sir Robert Talbot, &c. and one need not say how welcome they were to the Court at Oxford, after what we have repeated of the Speech which was there made to them. Thus ended the famous Treaty of Uxbridge, after it had lasted 24 Days, in which, according to Whitlocke, There appear'd no Compliance in the King's Commissioners to grant any of the Propositions, and they only press'd for longer Time. Dr. Wetwood, in his Memoirs, imputes the King's Obstinacy in refusing the least Compliance, except a little in the Article of Episcopacy, to a Letter he received at that critical Juncture from Montrose, who with a Party of Banditti, for most of his Followers were no better than Highland Robbers, had over-run Scotland, but made no Settlement. The Bishop of Salisbury told this Story to Wetwood, Ep. Sal. not with a Design he should print it, and having p. 39. himself related it in his own History, I shall take it thence. The Marquis of Montrose's Success was very Mischievous, for when the King had been

A. D. 1645. been satisfy'd by Whitlocke and Hollis, two of the Parliament's Commissioners at Oxford, just before the Treaty at Uxbridge, that it was his Interest to make Peace with the Parliament on the Foot of their Propositions, softned in some Places, and many of his Counsellors, as the Earl of Southampton, Earl of Dorset, Lord Colepeper, not Digby nor Hyde, &c. were of the same Opinion, just then the King receiv'd a Letter from the Lord Montrose, with such an Account of what he had done, of the Strength he had, and of his Hopes next Summer, that the King was by that prevail'd on to believe his Affairs would mend, and that he might afterwards treat on better Terms. This unhappily wrought so far, that the Limitations he put on those he sent to treat at Uxbridge, made the whole Design miscarry. Montrose wrote to his Majesty, That he had gone over the Land from Dan to Beersheba, which was true as to his riding Post and outrunning Opposition; but as Bishop Burnet observes, he had made himself Master of no strong Places or Passes, and therefore had it in his Power only to do Mischief to his Country without doing good to his Master. He added, Come thou and take the City lest I take it and it be called in my Name; for having been a rank Covenantner and bigotted Presbyterian, he wanted not Texts of Scripture to express his Vanity now as they had done his Hypocrisy before. Most of the King's Commissioners at Uxbridge, who were not excepted out of the Parliament's Article of Indemnity, as Mr. Hyde always was, were for accommodating Matters before they left Uxbridge. The good Earl of Southampton rode Post from Uxbridge to Oxford, to press the King to yield to the Necessity of the Times, and by giving his Assent to the most material Propositions, settle a lasting Peace with his People: All the wise and innocent Part of his Council prest him to do it upon their Knees, and his Majesty, though very reluctant, at last was prevail'd upon to follow the wholesome Counsel of those faithful Counsellors. The next Morning was appointed for signing a Warrant to his Commissioners to that Effect; and so sure were they of a happy End of all Differences, that the King at Supper complaining his Wine was not good, one told him merrily, I hope your Majesty will drink better before a Week is out, with my Lord Mayor at Guildhall: But before the next Morning came, the fatal Letter from Montrose arriv'd with his Dan to Beersheba; wherein he express his utter Aversion to all Treaties with his Rebel Parliament; and adds, he hopes it is not true that his Majesty has consented to treat, advising him not to do it as unworthy of a King, and assuring him he doubted not but to be able within a few Months to march into England with a brave Army to his Assistance. Thus in a Moment were all the Impressions the King's best Friends had made upon him dash'd out. This Letter was copy'd from the Original by the Duke of Richmond, which Dr. Welwood saw, and has printed at large: And Dr. Burnet not only affirms this Letter came to the King during the Uxbridge Treaty, but Messengers also brought the same Romantick Advices from Montrose. Yet Echard with a vain ridiculous Air says, I will not examine into the Inconsistency of this Letter with the Earl of Clarendon's Account and the best Writers; as if the surest Way to come at the Truth was not to refer to those Histories that are inconsistent with the Earl of Clarendon's and his best Writers; and being sensible that his own Authority would by no Means pass with judicious Readers, he quotes the weakest Passage in the Compleat History of England, where weak ones are pretty plenty: Supposing such a Letter was written, yet it seems to be no Inference that the King himself was the Cause of the Breaking off the Treaty, when the Denial of the least Concessions, and even of a few further Days, was the sole Act of the Parliament's Commissioners. This is their way in all their Arguments and Histories. They take the very Reasoning and Words of the Parliament, and turn them against them. The Lord Commissioner Whitlocke informs us, there could be no Expectations of a good Issue of the Treaty, or Inducement for the Parliament to grant longer Time, when not one of the Parliament's Propositions was granted. These spiritual Authors are always in such a Pannick when their temporal Concernments are in Jeopardy, that any Help, even of the Irish REBELS, is acceptable: And as the Article of Episcopacy every Way concern'd them, they have no Mercy on the Parliament for not making Concessions, that is, for not continuing the Revenues, Prerogatives, Powers, Dignities, and every Thing belonging to it, which has a Tincture of the Pumps and Vanities which it is their Duty to renounce and to teach us to do the same. It was easily to be conjectur'd by the King's Commissioners bringing so many Doctors with them that the Article of Religion would never be comply'd with.

That of the Militia would have secur'd all the rest, and there being no Military Power left to invade the Civil, the Government must have been reduc'd to the Rule of the Law, which is no where pretended to have been the Rule of this King's Reign, but in his own Declarations, and the Historians who have built their Histories on those solid Foundations, and that it would be the Rule afterwards when the Power of Breaking it was reserv'd, could not be conceiv'd by any Man in his Senses.

The Article of the Irish REBELS was not likely to be yielded up when there had so lately past so much Endearment between them and the Court at Oxford, who expected with Impatience a powerful Assistance from them. Nay, during the Treaty it was intimated to the King's Commissioners that his Majesty was engag'd for Ireland, and had sent this Letter to Ormond.

"I Cannot but mention the Necessity of hastening the Irish Peace. But in Case, against all Expectation and Reason, Peace cannot be had, you must not by any Means fall into a new Rupture with them, but continue the Cessation, for which you shall promise them to join with them against the Scots and Inchiquin, &c.

By these Letters, says Sanderson, as great a Cavalier and as great an Historian as Mr. Archdeacon, the Mystery is open'd why the King is so violent for Peace with the Irish: But this was tenderly treated by the King's Commissioners; and well they might be willing to shadow these Designs. He frankly confesses the King dealt doubly with the Parliament in the Affair of the Irish REBELS; and Echard commends his Justice and Piety in it.

Till the Preliminaries were settled for a good Foundation to treat, the Meeting at Uxbridge was at best but a wild Business, from which no reasonable Man could expect any Good.

Notwithstanding the Archdeacon's Objection to Welwood's Memoirs as inconsistent with the Earl of Clarendon's, an excellent Character of a History, and notwithstanding also the notable Reflections he has cited out of the Compleat History

A. D. 1645. story of England, sober Writers are of Opinion that Montrose's Romantick Actings and Boastings had too great an Influence on his Majesty's Resolutions in rejecting every Proposition of the Uxbridge Treaty. Mr. Acherley writes thus of it; "As to the King, his Majesty's Affairs were in a ruinous Condition, for it was apparent that by one Stroke more all his Power in Point of War would be quite extinguish'd, which makes the Wonder great why he insisted so much as he did upon Points of Prerogative, and why he did not comply with any Terms by which his Government and Possession of the Crown might be restor'd at a Time when he had nothing to oppose against the prevailing Power, unless his Majesty's too great Dependence on Montrose's wild Successes made him indifferent." Bishop Burnet says, Lord Hollis told me all was owing to Montrose's unhappy Successes.

I cannot conclude what I have to say of the Uxbridge Treaty without taking Notice of an Error in Raguenot, Gregorio Leti, and even Larrey, who all mention Oliver Cromwel's being one of the Parliament's Commissioners there; and Leti particularly writes thus; "Cromwel's Reputation increas'd much in this Conference, wherein he gave great Proofs of his Ability, both in Military and Religious Matters, infomuch that every one was not only pleas'd with the Solidity and Eloquence of his Arguments, but there was hardly any Body that would venture to argue with him." All the Fault in him is, that Cromwel was no Commissioner, and was not there.

The Preparations for War continu'd all this while, and the two Houses pass the Ordinance for new modelling their Army. And what wise ones the King had about him we may guess again by Echard's Character of them, they look'd upon this new Army and their new Officers with such Contempt, that the New Model was by them in Scorn, commonly called the New Noddle, which is some of their best Wit as well as Foresight. But the Truth is, they were in mortal Fear of both the new Officers and Army. They knew too well the Conduct and Courage of Fairfax and Cromwel, to have any Hopes left of spinning out the War. They knew both those Generals were in Earnest, and resolv'd heartily to reduce them to Obedience without any more Ceremony and Complement. The Parliament declar'd their Intention to be no longer amus'd with Messages and Words: But since the Controversy had been left to the Decision of the Sword, they were for the Sword's deciding it as soon and as effectually as possible. For this End they shifted Hands, and to do it with as much Civility as they could to their own Members, they made the Ordinance General to exclude the Members of both Houses from Employments in Army and Fleet: But there was a Pretext found out to continue Cromwel in his Command. I do not find that the Parliament had any Jealousy of the Earl of Essex's Fidelity to the Cause they were engag'd in; but it is visible by his March and Disgrace in the West; by his avoiding the second Battle at Newbury; by his Misintelligence with Waller and other Generals; by his own continual Speeches in Praise of Peace, that he would have been glad of one on much easier Terms than the Parliament would submit to, and it was not prudent in them to carry on the War under such Management. But they parted with the Earl in as handsome a Manner as they could. They highly extoll'd his Valour, Wisdom and Experience; they thank'd him for his many glorious Services to the Common Wealth; and set-led 10000 Pounds a Year on him. 'Tis certain A. D. 1645. he was very loath to part with his Barren, though he gave the Parliament as good Words as they had given him, when he deliver'd it up. But those who were for a speedy End of the War, and reducing their Enemies to a Necessity of making such a Peace as would effectually secure those valuable Rights and Liberties for which they had been Fighting and Conquering, found it absolutely necessary to change their General, which is the whole Secret of this Self-denying Ordinance. Indeed other Use was made of it afterwards, when the Army had knock'd down all Opposition, and began to set themselves above their Masters, when a Party under the Notion and Title of Independants, became the Majority in the Army, and supported the like Party in the House of Commons, till they were the major Vote in Parliament. The Independants, at the Passing of this Ordinance, could carry nothing by themselves, and if the Presbyterians had not join'd with them it had never pass'd. Mr. Archdeacon makes a Mystery of this plain Fact, and almost all his Authorities are founded on the Dreams and Visions of those who wanted some better Excuse for their being beaten and baffled, than Cowardice and Folly. This Ordinance was not to extend to Deputy Lieutenants, Justices of Peace, or Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, who were Members of either of the Houses of Parliament. The Lords did not so readily fall in with it as the Commons desir'd; and the Disagreement about it increas'd the great Difference between the two Houses, which ended in the Dissolution of one of them.

The new Army was to consist of 6000 Horse, 1000 Dragoons, and 14000 Foot, under the Command of Sir Thomas Fairfax, General.

Oliver Cromwel, Esq; Lieutenant General.

Philip Skippon, Esq; Major General.

Lieutenant General Hammond, Lieutenant General of the Ordnance.

Henry Ireton, Esq; Commissary General of the Horse.

Colonels of Horse.

Col. Middleton, Col. Sidney, Col. Graves, Col. Sheffield, Col. Vermuyden, Col. Whaley, Sir Michael Livesey, Col. Fleetwood, Col. Rositer, Sir Robert Pye.

Colonels of Foot.

The Archdeacon assures us that these Ten Colonels of Foot had not among them all one thousand Pounds a Year Land, which though it is as false as it is impertinent, is far from being a Diminution of the Merit of these Officers. I could name him ten Generals in the late Wars with France, who had not altogether Land enough for a Knight of a Shire, when they enter'd the Service; yet they behav'd as gallantly as if they had been Heirs to as much Land as they conquer'd.

By the Self-denying Ordinance the following Members of both Houses were oblig'd to lay down their Commissions: The Earl of Essex, the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Manchester, the Earl of Denbigh, the Lord Robarts, the Lord Grey of Groby, the Lord Howard of Es-crick, the Lord Fairfax, the Lord Willoughby, Sir William Waller, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir Thomas Middleton, Sir John Meyrick, Sir William Brereton, Sir John Price, Sir Samuel Luke.

Sir Tho. Fairfax made General.

Earl of Essex lays down his Commission.

Sir Thomas Fairfax was in the North when he was made General of the Army, and coming privately to London, was the next Day, February the 19th, conducted to the House of Commons by four of their Members. A Chair was set for him, but he refus'd to sit, and the Speaker told him the great Trust the Commonwealth had conferr'd upon him in the Command of their Army, and the good Opinion they had of his Valour and Fidelity for the Defence of Religion, Laws and Liberties, yet it was six Weeks after this that the Earl of Essex formally deliver'd up his Commission at a Conference between the two Houses, at which Time he deliver'd also a Paper to this Effect, That he having been employed for almost three Years past as General of all the Parliament's Forces, which Charge he had endeavour'd to perform with all Fidelity and Sedulity, yet considering by the Ordinance lately brought up to the House of Peers, that it would be advantageous to the Publick, he desir'd to lay down his Commission, and freely to render it into the Hands of those from whom he received it, and desir'd, that such of his Officers who had done faithful Service, and were now left out, might have their Arrears, and some others be received into favour. The Earls of Manchester and Denbigh then also laid down their Commissions, which was declar'd by both Houses to be an acceptable Service, and a Testimony of the Fidelity and Care these three Lords had of the Publick. The Commons appointed a Committee to consider of Gratifying the Lord General, and the two other Earls, for their faithful Services, and hazarding their Lives and Fortunes for the Publick. Some of Essex's Friends were against his laying down his Commission, but others told him, That Mischiefs and Contentions might arise if he kept it, of which he himself was sensible. And, says Whitlocke, As he had great Stoutness of Spirit, so he had great Goodness of Nature, and Love to the Publick, which perswaded him to deliver up his Commission. It was very absurd and desperate Counsel, which those of his Friends gave, who would have had him to have kept it, after the Parliament had voted a new General, and not at all to depreciate the Merit of so gallant a Peer, and so good an Englishman, as the Earl of Essex, it is most certain, that excepting the Raising the Siege of Gloucester, his Services were not so beneficial to the Publick, as his Losing his Army in Cornwall, through his own ill Conduct, was prejudicial; and as for the Battles of Edgehill and Newbury, which he fought, though Echard and other Historians falsify the Fact in denying him the Advantage, yet it is very evident that those Victories were not so well improv'd as they might have been; and that the Suffering the King's Army to retreat after the treacherous Action at Brentford, lost an Opportunity of dispersing it, and restoring Peace before much Blood had been spilt in this unnatural War. No Body thinks there was the least Tincture of Unfaithfulness in his Lordship's Conduct, or that he wanted Courage; but it is obvious he would have had the War carry'd on, and the Peace made in his own Way, which the Parliament thought too indifferent and dilatory.

Admiralty. The Earl of Warwick laid down his Commission of Lord High Admiral, as the other Earls had done, and had a like Compliment from the Parliament, who appointed Commissioners of the Admiralty, and nam'd the Earls of Essex, Northumberland, Pembroke, Warwick, the Lords Say and North, Sir Walter Earl, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir John Evelyn, Sir Christopher Wray, for that Commission. The Commissions which they granted now to their Generals had not the Care of the Preservation of his Majesty's Person in them, nor were in the Name of the King and Parliament, but in the Name of the Parliament alone, and if they had run so at first there would have been the less Absurdity in them, for every one knew the Earl of Essex's Army was rais'd to fight the King's, and that the Care of the Preservation of the King's Person at the Battle of Edgehill, where his Majesty attack'd him, was Nonsense, yet the Archdeacon tells us, that the leaving out that Nonsense was a Sign of the Parliament's Intention from the beginning to murder the King. This was the first plain Discovery of their Intention. The Juggle and Mask were remov'd. He knew very well that the two Houses abhor'd the King's Death, and while they were free did their utmost to prevent it, yet because they were Presbyterians he does what he can to load them with this Infamy.

The main of the King's Strength was in the West, where Goring commanded, and committed so many Acts of Cruelty and Rapine, that his Name is Infamous there to this Day, especially about Taunton, which Town he besieg'd, and during the Siege his Soldiers made themselves terrible by continual Butcheries, Rapes and Robberies, insomuch that the Name of Goring's Crew is even now remember'd with Abhorrence. Before he form'd this Siege a small Colonel Officer, one Colonel Edmund Windham, sent a Windham Summons to Colonel Blake the Governor, threat-summons Taunton. ning him with Fire and Sword, but Blake, infinitely superior to Windham in the Character of Heroism, return'd this Answer, These are to Colonel let you know, that as we neither fear your Men-Blake's naces, nor accept your Proffers, so we wish you Answer. for Time to come to desist from all Overtures of the like Nature unto us, who are resolv'd to the last Droop of our Blood to maintain the Quarrel we have undertaken, and doubt not but the same God who hath hitherto protected us, will e'er long bless us with an Issue answerable to the Justice of our Cause. Forsoever, to him alone shall we stand or fall. The Works of the Place were inconsiderable, and Blake was in great Want of Ammunition and Provisions, yet he made a resolute Defence against several Armies, one after another, till a Party of the Parliament's Forces broke through the Besiegers, and supply'd the Town with Stores of Provisions, and what they wanted. Larrey terms it the Saguntum of Taunton the Parliamentarians, comparing the Fidelity of compar'd Taunton to that of Saguntum in Spain, and the to Saguntum. Extremities which both Towns were reduc'd to, one with the other. Taunton, however, had better Fortune than Saguntum, which Hannibal took and demolish'd, but Taunton was reliev'd twice by the Parliament Army; the first Time was when Colonel Welden and Colonel Graves, who were detach'd by Sir Thomas Fairfax, came to the Assistance of Blake, whom the Parliament had order'd the General to relieve, but he was afterwards countermanded, and Graves and Welden sent on that Expedition. They came before the Town on Sunday, May the 11th, and the Besiegers knew nothing of their coming till they were within 4 Miles of the Place. Greenville the western Robber, and the other Cavalier Commanders, immediately drew off in Confusi-

A. D. 1645.

A. D. on, blocking up the Way with Trees that the Parliament's Forces might not pursue them. The Town, especially East Street was much burnt, having been several Times storm'd and enter'd by the Enemy, who was always beaten out again. In the last Storm one Barodon, a Parliament Officer, having his Thumb cut or shot off, as he was driving the Cavaliers before him out of that Part of the Town, protested the Rogues should not carry it away with them, and while he was searching for it, one of those Rogues, who remain'd drinking in an Alehouse shot him dead out of a Window, which was the greatest Loss that happen'd to the Besieg'd in that Action. The Parliament order'd Colonel Blake 500 l. and 2000 l. for his Garrison. And what is very remarkable, the 11th of May was kept an Anniversary Day of Rejoicing for the Relief of that Town, even after the Restoration, and in the Worst of Times, King Charles, and King James's Reigns, and is still yearly kept at Taunton in some Measure. Goring had been order'd out of the West, and Prince Rupert out of the North, to join the King at or about Oxford, where the Court was very much perplexed at the Raising the Siege of Taunton; Goring's Heart was set upon the Reduction of that Place, that he might bring that rich and populous Town and Country under Contribution, and indulge himself in Rapine and Riot. This made him ill digest the Orders he receiv'd to leave the West, especially when he heard that Colonel Welden and Colonel Graves had thrown Succours into the Town. In this Humour he approach'd Oxford, which City his Majesty had left and was making towards Worcester, to be nearer Prince Rupert.

Cromwel Lieutenant General Cromwel march'd from Windsor with a Party of Horse to Cavesham Bridge, and thence to Wheatley, to observe the King's Motions, and being inform'd that a Squadron of Horse under the Earl of Northampton and Goring was hovering about Islip, he hasten'd thither, attack'd and defeated them, took 400 Horse, 200 Prisoners, of whom many were of Rank, and the Queen's own Standard. The rest fled to Bletchington House, where Colonel Windebank kept Garrison for the King. Cromwel pursu'd them thither, and after some Treaty took the House also upon Articles, and therein store of Arms and Ammunition; for which Colonel Windebank was shot to Death at Oxford.

Col. Windebank the Governor shot. Colonel Fiennes fell upon a Party of the King's Horse near Witney in Oxfordshire, took 120, three Standards, and 140 Prisoners, Lieutenant General Cromwel fell upon another Party of the King's at Bampton Bush, where he took Sir William Vaughan, Lieutenant Colonel Littleton, and another Lieutenant Colonel, Mr. Lee, 5 Captains, 8 Lieutenants, 8 Ensigns, Dr. Dunsc, 20 Serjeants, 230 Common Soldiers and Arms. Being reinfor'd with 500 Foot from Major General Browne's Garrison at Abington he attempted Farrington House without Success. The King's Forces under Prince Rupert and Goring join'd in Oxfordshire, and, with the Troops his Majesty had there before, made an Army of 11 or 12000 Men, which had he kept together he might at least have defended himself longer. Richard has found out a Victory for Goring, who surpriz'd a Horse Quarter of Cromwel's, and another Party of Fairfax's Horse, broke and defeated them with great Slaughter, which gave him great Reputation, and made him exceeding welcome to the King. Larrey writes, Cromwel open'd the Campaign fortunately, by the Defeat of Colonel Goring, whom he made to lose the Title of Invincible, which his People had given him. But Larrey being a Protestant may not have Credit with Mr. Archdeacon, therefore see what Leti A. D. Papist says, Cromwel meeting a Body of 1300 1645 Horse commanded by Goring, defeated them, took 200 Prisoners, &c. We see how well grounded the Reputation of the Historian's Heroes is, for Goring did not beat Cromwel's or Fairfax's Men, but was himself soundly beaten. He was order'd again into the West to join Green-vile and Hopton, and renew the Siege of Taunton.

Sir Thomas Fairfax being making Preparations to besiege Oxford, the King perceiv'd he was ill advis'd in dividing his Army; and tho' his marching Northward to relieve Chester, King re which was distress'd by Sir William Brereton, lies had so good an Effect, that Brereton on the Cheller. News of it drew off his Forces; yet it brought him into a Necessity of coming to a decisive Battle, which prov'd fatal to himself and to his Followers.

But before the utter Overthrow of his Army, Takes Leis he came before Leicester, where Col. Gray com-manderd for the Parliament; and one of the Gates being betray'd to him, his Forces enter'd, after a gallant Defence made by the Parliament's Soldiers in the Market-place. The Cavaliers put a great Number to the Sword, some of them after Quarter was given. They murder'd several Women, ravish'd several Maids and Matrons, turn'd others naked into the Streets. They hang'd Mr. Rayner and Mr. Sawyer in cold Blood, and murder'd Mrs. Barlow, a Minister's Wife, and her Children. The whole Town was miserably plunder'd. This is Whitlocke's Account of the King's Triumph, as Echard terms it; and I do not here or elsewhere mention the Massacres, Rapes and Plunderings of the Royalists as Matter of Wonderment; for People who were in Arms to destroy the Rights, Liberties and Properties of the Nation in general, could not stick at killing them, and robbing them in particular; but to shew what Reason the Arch-deacon has to glory in a Conquest which a good Protestant and Englishman cannot read without Horror, he assures us the Town was got purely by an Act of great Courage; and Whitlocke, that it was got purely by an Act of great Treachery. But this Falstity is nothing to the wretched Reflections he makes on the Consecration the Two Houses were in on News of the Loss of this one Town only, a Place, says he, very considerable, but of no great Extent. The taking of Leicester gave the King's Armies a mighty Reputation, and made a terrible Impression upon the Hearts of those at Westminster. Great Fears and Distrusts arose in the Houses, every Word false, and several Members were heard to say in their Passage, There is no Hope but in the King's Mercy, and the speediest Recourse to it will be the safest Expedient. What follows may have a little more Truth in it, because this has none at all. The Royal Party seem'd as good as sure that the Day was their own, which they made appear even in London by all publick Signs and Discourses, which they durst no more do than to have taken Cromwel by the Nose at the Head of his Ironsides. What his Majesty said upon it in a Letter to the Queen, shews how soon he was lifted up with a little Success in the Midst of extreme Calamity and Distress: I may, without being too sanguine, affirm, that since this REBELLION my Affairs were never in so hopeful a Way.

The strong Town of Shrewsbury, which cut off the Communication with Wales, had been lately surpriz'd by the Parliamentarians; the Town of Taunton, one of the Keys of the West, had lately been reliev'd; Weymouth, which Sir Lewis Dives had taken for him, was just recover'd by the Parliament's Forces; the Scots had

A. D. had join'd Sir William Brereton in the North; 1645. Sir James Long had been just routed at the Devizes by a Party of Sir William Waller's Troops, with the Loss of a whole Regiment of Horse. Montrose had lately been defeated in Scotland. The Rout at Islip was but a few Days before, and Sir Thomas Fairfax was about to lay Siege to Oxford; yet his Majesty says, his Affairs were never in so hopeful a Way since he began the War.

Battle of NASEBY. Let us look a little into Eckard's History preceding the Fight at Naseby, because we shall see by it that himself and the Authors he depended upon are as ignorant of the true Cause of that Fight, as if it had been fought in China. "The King, instead of retiring towards Worcester to join General Gerrard, who had 3000 Horse and Foot, or staying for General Goring, now sent for by his Majesty, or of marching Northward with the Terror of a victorious Army, which we shall see presently was so terrible, that Oliver was afraid they would have given him the Slip, unfortunately turn'd towards Oxford, which was thought by some to be in Distress. From whence hearing that Fairfax was drawn off, it kindled a greater Appetite in the King's Army to find him out." There are many other Falsities in this Account of the Preparations for the Battle of Naseby, but the last is the most extraordinary one; for Fairfax and Cromwel were all this while drawing the Cavaliers into the Snare they had prepar'd for them, as appears by Larrey's History. "Cromwel made but a small Account of his little Successes. His Views and Hopes went much farther, and flaming with Desire to see himself engag'd with the Royal Army, he despis'd all Triumphs but over the King, and therefore being highly delighted that his Designs were supported by the Advice and Commands of the Two Houses, he us'd his utmost Diligence to bring his wish'd-for Project to succeed, and block the Way up, so that the King could not escape him." The Two Houses, instead of having Recourse to the King's Mercy as the safest Expedient, in which Eckard tells us they center'd all their Hopes, had really Recourse to their Army, and commanded their Generals to bring the King to a Battle, now he was in the Field, before he got into a Town again. Larrey proceeds, "With this Design, and the better to conceal it, Cromwel made a Feint of marching towards the Northern Counties, as if his Intention was to go into Scotland, and there join the Covenanters Army. He cross'd Huntingtonshire and Cambridgeshire, but he communicated his Intention to General Fairfax, that he might follow him, keeping close to the King's Army, which he did not doubt would pursue him, and join him when there should be Occasion. Every thing succeeded. The King supposing no Stratagem, and being altogether intent on Cromwel's Motions, took his Route thro' Northamptonshire, with a Design to observe him, but not risk a Battle, in which he was mistaken. The active and diligent Cromwel no sooner had Advice that the King was encamp'd near Naseby, but he resolv'd to surprize him there, and compel him to fight. He advis'd Fairfax of it, and the whole Army marching all Night, came the 10th of June by Break of Day up with the King's Camp." What need was there then of the Archdeacon's kindling an Appetite in the Royalists to find out Oliver? Fairfax and Cromwel have found out the King, and are resolv'd not to let him escape, as he had done at Edgehill and Brentford. The Battle ending so unhappily as it did, Eckard will by A. D. no Means leave any Blame on the King, and 1645. therefore he affirms his Majesty design'd to return to Leicester, and continue on the Defensive; whereas, directly contrary to this, we are inform'd by a Writer who was on the Spot, the Sp. p. 33. King's Opinion prevail'd against the Mind of most of his great Officers, who thought it best to avoid Fighting.

On the 5th of June Sir Thomas Fairfax rose from before Oxford, and march'd to Marsh Gibbon, having order'd Major General Skippon, who lay before Borstaff House to join him, which Mr. Archdeacon very ingeniously calls being beaten off with Loss. Here the Lord General had Intelligence that the King was marching from Leicester towards Daventry, with Intention to raise the Siege of Oxford, which was done to his Hand. The next Day the Army march'd to Great Brickhill, and the next Day to Sherrington, from whence an Express was sent to General Cromwel in the Associated Counties, to inform him of the Army's advancing that Way. On the 9th of June a Party was sent out to get Intelligence of the Enemy, who brought in some Prisoners of Sir Marmaduke Langdale's Brigade, by whom General Fairfax was inform'd that the King lay still at Daventry, having fac'd Northampton. A Council of War was also held, where it was resolv'd to send Letters to the Two Houses, praying, That in Consideration of the Likelihood of a sudden Battel, Lieutenant General Cromwel's Absence in the House might be dispenc'd with for a Time, which shews us that he was not so entirely exempted from the self-denying Ordinance as is pretended. Col. Hammond went Post to London with these Letters, and return'd Post with a favourable Answer, and a Commission for General Cromwel to command the Horse under the Lord General Fairfax; which Proceeding of the Parliament being pursuant to a Motion of the Council of War held when Oliver was at a Distance, and knew nothing of the Matter, takes away much of the Artifice and Trick imputed to Cromwel, to get himself dispenc'd from the Ordinance last mention'd. On the 11th of June the Army march'd to Wootton, within 8 Miles of Northampton, where they were inform'd that the King's Army lay still at Daventry, his Foot and Carriages on Burrough Hill making a Shew as if he intended to fight on that Ground. But afterwards it appear'd that his Stay there was only till a Party of 1200 Horse was return'd from convoying the plunder'd Cattle and Sheep from Leicestershire and Northamptonshire to Oxford, himself intending to follow Cromwel. From Wootton the General march'd to Gilsborough, within 5 Miles of Burrough Hill. A Party of Horse being detach'd to get further Information of the Enemy, they alarm'd their Camp and took some Prisoners, by whom the Parliamentarians understood the King was a Hunting, the Soldiers in no Order, and their Horses at Grass, having not the least Knowledge of Fairfax's Advance. But the Alarm was quickly taken thro' all their Quarters, and the Parliament's Foot being somewhat behind, it was not thought proper to make any farther Attempt. About Twelve that Night the General took Horse, and rode about both the Horse and Foot Guards till Four in the Morning, expecting the Enemy would have shewn some Gallantry that Night, and fallen upon some of his Quarters. About Break of Day a remarkable Accident befel him as he was riding his Round, for having forgot the Word, he was stopp'd by the Guard, and requiring the Soldier who stood Centinel to give it him, he refus'd to do it, saying,

A. D. 1645. I am to take the Word from all that pass, but to give it to none; which oblig'd the General to stop in the Rain till the Captain of the Guard came, and commanded the Centinel to give him the Word, which he did, and the General rewarded the Soldier for his Duty and Carefulness. As he was riding within a Mile and a half of Flower, where the Enemy kept a Horse-Guard, he could discern them about Three a Clock in the Morning riding fast over Burrough Hill, and making Fires in Abundance, as if they were Firing their Huts, which gave him Reason to conclude they were about to march; and two Hours after he receiv'd Advice from Scout-master General Watson, who was almost always upon the Reconnoitre, that the Enemy was drawing off from Burrough Hill in great Amazement at the near Approach of the Parliament Army. Echard owns his Majesty lay quiet five Days, not knowing where Fairfax was, tho' within five or six Miles of him; a very unhappy Security amidst so much Danger, and an Instance that the King's ill Fate fast pursu'd him; for in all the War he had not till then shewn any Want of Conduct or Activity. Watson's Scouts were follow'd by some Spies, who confirm'd the former Report, adding, that the King's Carriages were drawn from Burrough Hill towards Harborough. Upon which a Council of War was held. Before it broke up, Lieutenant General Cromwel arriv'd with 600 Horse out of the Association, to the great Joy of the General and the whole Army. A Party of Horse was immediately order'd to get Intelligence on Daventry Side, and Colonel Ireton with a strong Party to fall upon the Flank of the Enemy if he saw Cause, while the main Body of the Parliament's Army flank'd the King's in their March to Harborough, and came that Night, the 13th of June, to Gilling, where they understood the Royalists were at Harborough, their Rear within two Miles of Naseby, and soon after, that Col. Ireton had fallen into their Quarters in Naseby Town, where he took many Prisoners, some of the Prince's Life-guard and Langdale's Brigade, and gave a terrible Alarm to all their Forces; upon which his Majesty quitted the Quarters he had taken, and for Security went to Harborough, where Prince Rupert quarter'd, who was then a-bed; but the King order'd him to be call'd up, and a Council of War to be held, by whom it was resolv'd to give Battle, taking themselves, says my Author, as indeed they were, a more considerable Force than the Parliament's, especially in Horse, on which they chiefly depended.

Saturday, June the 14th, General Fairfax advanc'd by Three a Clock in the Morning from Gilling towards Naseby, and by Five his Army rendezvouz'd near the Town, when great Bodies of the Enemy's Horse appear'd on the Top of the Hill on Harborough Side; and these were follow'd by the whole Army, for the Royalists had receiv'd false Intelligence, that Sir Thomas Fairfax was flying towards Northampton, and they made so much haste to pursue him, that they left many of their Ordnance behind them. Whereas Fairfax, instead of flying, had drawn up his Army in Battalia in a large fallow Field, on the North-West Side of Naseby, and was ready to receive them.

Of the Parliament Army Fairfax and Skippon commanded the Main Body, Cromwel the Right

Wing and Ireton the Left. The Reserves were brought up by Rainsborough, Hammond and Pride. The Parliament Word was God our Strength; the Royalist, Queen Mary, a Papist, 'tis true, but never the worse Word for their Purpose. Prince Rupert began and charg'd the Parliament's Left Wing with great Resolution. Ireton made gallant Resistance, but was at last forc'd to give Ground, he himself being run through the Thigh with a Pike, and into the Face with a Halbert, his Horse shot under him, and himself taken Prisoner. Prince Rupert follow'd the Chace almost to Naseby, and in his Return summon'd the Train, who made no Answer but with their Firelocks. He also visited the Carriages, where was good Plunder, for which the Cavaliers had always so keen an Appetite that to come at it, they never consider'd the King's Safety nor their own, and it must be confess'd that this Plunder was what their common Soldiers fought for, since one cannot believe they were so well appriz'd of the great Advantages of arbitrary Power, and the Blessings of Superstition and Priestcraft, as the Earl of Clarendon and the more enlighten'd of them were.

Prince Rupert remain'd all this while among the Parliament's Carriages which he could rifle, tho' they could not take, and all this while was Cromwel cutting to pieces the left Wing of the King's Army, whom he had forc'd from their main Body, broke them and their Reserve with a dreadful Slaughter; after which he bore down like a Torrent on the main Body of the Royal Army, and with the Assistance of two or three Regiments of Infantry encompass'd their Foot, who finding themselves deserted by their Horse, threw down their Arms and yielded themselves Prisoners. His Majesty got out of the Field into Leicester Road, where he was pursu'd by the Parliament Horse, and thinking Leicester not safe enough, he posted to Litchfield, and thence into Cheshire and Wales. Prince Rupert returning too late from his Expedition against the Parliament's Carriages, found all was lost on the Place of Battle, and with about 300 Horse made as fast as he could to Bristol. Tho' the Action was hot while it lasted, and many of the King's Soldiers who behav'd like Englishmen, were slain; yet the Shortness of it prevented a greater Slaughter on both Sides: On that of the Parliament, Captain Bush of Cromwel's, and Captain Selby of Fleetwood's Regiments, and Lieutenant Colonel Francis of Skippon's Regiment were kill'd, and about 1000 kill'd and wounded; 600 of the King's Soldiers, among whom was Colonel Sayr, a Papist, were kill'd, but 6000 were taken Prisoners, which made the Number of the Slain the less. Among the latter were Sir Thomas Dalison and Sir Richard Cave, Sir Peter Brown, Major Rively, Major Markham, and Captain Thorold, the four last Papists. All their Train, of Artillery, every one of their Carriages were taken, 8000 Arms, 200 Barrels of Powder, 200 Horses, 6 Colonels, 7 Lieutenant Colonels, 16 Majors, 70 Captains, 80 Lieutenants, 80 Ensigns, 200 inferior Officers, 140 Standards and Colours, the King's Footmen and Servants, his Coaches, Sumpster and Cabinet, of which more in due Time. Whitlocke tells us, there were found among the Runaways 100 Irish Women, and many other Women who had follow'd the Camp; and Mr. Echard, with singular Sincerity tells us, Fairfax's Soldiers avoided no Manner of Cruelty, and in the Pursuit kill'd above 100 Women, some of which were Persons of Quality. It is modest to a Miracle. Women of Quality are wont to be Campers; and tho' they were Irish Quality,

A. D. 1645. lity, the Trulls of Irish REBELS, they were not massacred, as the Archdeacon affirms they were. Lilly says, p. 72. The King's Army was overcharg'd with Irish Whores. Some particular Accidents which happen'd in the Fight are worth Remembrance.

Particular Accidents in the Battle.

The Lord General had his Helmet beaten off, and riding in the Field bare headed from one Part of his Army to another, to see what Advantage might be gain'd, he came up to his own Life Guard, commanded by Colonel Charles Doyly, who told him he was too much expos'd, so many Bullets flying about him, and offer'd him his Helmet, which the General refus'd, saying, It is well enough Charles. A Body of the King's Horse making a Stand not far off, Sir Thomas Fairfax ask'd him if he had charg'd them; Doyly reply'd, I have charg'd them twice but cannot break them: Upon which the General order'd him to charge them once again in Front, and he would himself charge them in Rear. Thus they would meet together in the middle of them. Doyly did as he was commanded, and both together charging that Body put them in Confusion, broke them, and Fairfax and Doyly met indeed in the Middle of them, where Fairfax kill'd a Cornet, and one of Doyly's Troopers took his Standard, bragging of the Service he had done in killing the Officer and taking his Colours: But Doyly who saw the General himself kill the Cornet, severely reprimanded the Trooper for his bragging and lying, telling him how many Witnesses there were who saw the General do it with his own Hands; but Fairfax himself bid the Colonel let the Trooper alone, saying, I have Honour enough, let him have that Honour. General Skippon, the oldest Soldier remaining among the Chief Officers, receiv'd a Shot in the Body, from one of his own Men, as was suppos'd unwillingly, whereby he was in a great Measure disabled to perform the Duty of his Post that Day, though extremely desirous to do it: The Lord General entreated him to go out of the Field, but he answer'd, I will not stir so long as a Man will stand; and he staid accordingly till the Battle was ended. Cromwel also had his Helmet knock'd off, but hastily catching it up he clap'd it on the wrong Way, and so fought with it bravely the rest of the Day. We have mention'd Ireton's being wounded and taken in the Fight, but in the Confusion of the Rout, he got loose again and was a Witness of the Victory obtain'd by his Party.

P. 46.
Lilly's Prophesy of Naseby
Fight.

Whitlocke, who was one of Lilly's Patrons, as were Mr. Selden, Mr. Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir Christopher Wray, Mr. Reynolds, and the Learned Elias Ashmole, Esq; speaks of that Astrologer's foretelling the Battle of Naseby, which he himself tells thus in his Life, "I made Use of the King's Nativity, and finding that his Ascendant was approaching to the Quadrature of Mars about June 1645, I gave this unlucky Judgment in my Anglicus for that Year, "If now we fight a Victory stealerth upon us, and so it did in June 1645, at Naseby, the most fatal Overthrow he ever had." Sober Persons, especially such as curse Lilly for his Prediction, may censure so grave a Person as Mr. Whitlocke for taking any Notice of it, and despise the Parliament for countenancing him, tho' the King himself countenanced him so far as to send Mrs. Whorwood to him from Hampton-Court, when he was there under Confinement, to erect a Figure for his Escape, and she gave him 20 Broad Pieces, part of the 1000 Pounds which Alderman Adams, of London, had lately sent him. But the King's Conjurors, though they were eternally running from one House to another among the Celestial Ones, could never make any Thing of their Errand. All the Houses were against them. The chiefest of them was Hodges of Wolverhampton, of whom Lilly writes, "He was a great Royalist, but could never hit any Thing right for that Party, though he much desir'd it."

Colonel John Fiennes was sent to London with the Prisoners and Colours, and the News was receiv'd in that City with unexpressible Joy, as being the Promise of a safe Peace.

Among the Pillage of the Field, which was very rich, was taken the King's own Cabinet, "Where, says the Archdeacon, were lodg'd his secret Papers, and Letters between him and his Queen, of which they soon after made the most barbarous Use, and publish'd them in Print with the severest Comment." The Falshood and Sophistry of this Reflection, which is in all their Histories, Orleans, Raguenot, Salmonet, Clarendon, Warwick, &c. are equal to the Character of his History. He would have you believe by the most secret Papers, are to be understood the Privacies of Conjugal Amours, and the Secrets of the Marriage Bed, which if they had made publick, it would have been a barbarous Use of those Papers. Instead of this they publish'd such Passages as prov'd to the World what they had long asserted, That the King corresponded with the Irish REBELS, and that he was never sincere in the Treaties he proposed to the Parliament. We have already observ'd that he would not suffer those Butchers to be call'd REBELS, and it was here that the Manuscript of his Victories written by Sir Edward Walker was taken among other Papers, where when Sir Edward said REBELS, he struck it out with his own Hand, and in several Places wrote Irish over it. There was also taken and brought to the Lord General a Wooden Image like a Roundhead, which the Cavaliers blasphemously call'd the God of the Roundheads, and carry'd it about their Camp in Scorn a little before the Battle began. In one of the Letters to the Queen, it is said His Majesty intended to make a Peace with the Irish, and to have 40000 of them over into England to prosecute the War here. Did this need a severe Comment? and could any Thing but this Intention keep up the Spirit of a Party reduc'd to the extremest Degree of Misery and Despair. In other Letters to the Queen the King complains, that he could not prevail with his Mongrel Parliament at Oxford to vote that the Parliament at Westminster were no Parliament: That he will not make Peace with the English REBELS without her Approbation, nor go one Foot from the Paper she sent him. That upon the Treaty at Uxbridge he did not positively own the Parliament, it being otherwise to be construd, though they were so simple as not to find it out, and that it was recorded in the Notes of the Council that he did not acknowledge them a Parliament. But the Parliament were not such Simpletons as to be impos'd upon by him and his Oxford Counsellors. They oblig'd the King to own them in as solemn Words as Language can express, and his Majesty's commanding that Prevarication to be recorded in the Notes of the Council, that he did not own them after he had done it so solemnly, is one of those Passages which a little Discretion would have sunk as the Parliament sunk those Passages in the King's Letters, which would have vindicated him for the Particular of the 40000 Irish REBELS. The King made them more than they were, to keep Life in the languishing Spirits of his Queen and Followers; but that he intended to bring as many of them over

A. D. 1645. over as he could is a Truth so well known that I shall not endeavour to prove the Lord Clarendon and Mr. Echard's Misrepresentations on that Article since they sufficiently prove themselves. The double Dealing in the Treaty of Uxbridge, and putting the Terms of Peace into the Queen's Hands, are Passages that would not admit of Vindication. Another Charge of Concealment he brings against the Parliament, is their hiding a great Part of his Majesty's Book EIKON BASILIKH, which his Majesty had not then written by ten, and never did write, but was afterwards the Performance of Dr. Gauden, as is proved as plain as Proof can make a Thing, by Dr. Walker, who carry'd Gauden's Manuscript to the Press, and talk'd of it frequently with the true Author, by the Earl of Anglesey, who was so careful to prevent the World's being any longer impos'd on by it, that he left an Attestation under his Hand that King Charles II. own'd to him, his Father did not write it: So did King James II. but since those Proofs appear'd, we have another in Bishop Burnet's History of his own Times.

Eikon Basilike not written by ten, and never did write, but was afterwards the Performance of Dr. Gauden, as is proved as plain as Proof can make a Thing, by Dr. Walker, who carry'd Gauden's Manuscript to the Press, and talk'd of it frequently with the true Author, by the Earl of Anglesey, who was so careful to prevent the World's being any longer impos'd on by it, that he left an Attestation under his Hand that King Charles II. own'd to him, his Father did not write it: So did King James II. but since those Proofs appear'd, we have another in Bishop Burnet's History of his own Times.

P. 51. "The Duke of York suffer'd me to talk very freely to him about Religion, and as I was urging him with somewhat out of his Father's Book, he told me, That Book was not of his Father's Writing, and that the Letter to the Prince of Wales was never brought to him;" 'tis much insisted on by Clarendon and Echard. "The Duke of York added, Dr. Gauden writ it; after the Restoration, the Doctor brought the Duke of Somerset and the Earl of Southampton both to the King and me, who affirm'd, that they knew it was his Writing, and that it was carry'd down to the Isle of Wight by the Earl of Southampton, and shew'd the King during the Treaty there, who read it, and approv'd of it. The Duke said farther, Though Sheldon and the other Bishops oppos'd Gauden's Promotion, because he had taken the Covenant, yet the Merits of that Service carry'd it for him, and he was made a Bishop." Dr. Burnet says this Evidence is very strong, and indeed stronger there cannot be. Since these Evidences we have still another later one, Dr. Burnet of the Charter-house, and a Bishop whose Name I was not told, being at Dinner on a Thirtieth of January, at the House of a Person of Quality, one of the noble Company, from whom I had it, said to Dr. Burnet, There's Dr. Gauden's Letter to the Lord Clarendon about Eikon Basilike, and the Lord Clarendon's Answer in their own Hand-writing at such a Booksellers, Why don't the Bishop and you go and see them? Dr. Burnet reply'd, Be quiet, be quiet, we have seen them already. I find, that upon the publishing of this Book, many People suspected it to be an Imposture, among others Lilly writes, "I wonder at that Passage of his, if it was his, which I doubt of, in that Book publish'd under his Name, and call'd his Portraiture, wherein he maintains the Parliament was called as much by his own Choice and Inclination, as Advice of others, whereas it is manifestly known even unto all, it was only Necessity and the Importance of the English. The Book it self maintains so many Contradictions unto those Things, manifested by his own Letters under his own Hand to his Queen, that I conceive the most part of it Apocryphal. The Meditations or Psalms, wholly were added by others. Some loose Papers he had I do well know, but they were nothing so well methodiz'd." Again,

M. S. "Two main Things are objected against the King, which his late pretended Book meddles not with, or answers. First, Why his Majesty

"was so tender-hearted of the Irish, as not to suffer above 40 Proclamations to issue against those Rebels in Ireland, and those also to no Purpose, or unopportunately, when too late. Besides, to shew his Respect unto them, I know he obliterated with his own Hands the Word Irish Rebels, and put in Irish Subjects, in a MS. Discourse, writ by Sir Edward Waller, and presented to him, which I have seen of the Irish Rebellion. Secondly, Whereas the Parliament were sending over Clothes and other Necessaries for the English Soldiers in Ireland, the King seiz'd them as they went, arm'd and furnish'd the English and Welsh against the Parliament. The Reasons of these are omitted by the Penmen of his Portraiture.

But to good Judges of Sentiments and Style all these Declarations are needless. The Disagreement there is between the King's Thoughts and Expressions in that and his other Writings, the Affectation, and the Rounding and Ranging of the Periods, the Coldness even in such exalted Devotion, and the Bitterness where Occasion is taken to speak of the Reform'd Religion, as it is establish'd in Protestant Countries, shew sufficiently, without other Proof, that it was not the Work of a Layman.

Echard's Story of the Spy, who was the Cause, of the Loss of the Battle of Naseby, is so far from being true, that it could not be true. He tells us, Cromwel and Ireton prevail'd with the unwilling General to open the Letters which the Spy was carrying to the King from Goring, advising him not to fight till he join'd him. Cromwel could not prevail with him, for he was then in the Associated Counties, and came not to Fairfax's Camp till after the Resolution to fight was taken. If there had really been no Intention to bring over the Irish Massacrerers to assist the Cavaliers, the continuing the War after the entire Defeat at Naseby, is an Effect of Despair, which seldom appears while Men have their Wits about them, for if, like the Parliamentarians, we pursue the Royalists from one End of the Kingdom to the other, 'tis only from Rout to Rout on their Side, and from Victory to Victory on that of their Enemy.

General Fairfax march'd from Naseby Field General to Leicester, where the King had left a Garrison Fairfax under the Lord Hastings, whom he summon'd takes Leicester two Days after the Fight, and his Lordship return'd a Cavalier Answer, defying him and his victorious Army, but he did not keep in that sturdy Humour, for the next Day on the Firing of two or three great Guns, he sent out a Trumpet to desire a Parley, which being granted, Colonel Pickering and Colonel Rainsborough concluded a Treaty of Surrender on more honourable Terms than Men in their desperate Condition ought to have expected. But such was the Clemency of the Parliament's General, who took Pleasure indeed in Conquest, but not in Insolence and Cruelty, which cannot be said of the King's Generals in the few Instances we have of their Successes.

Sir Thomas Fairfax's Heart was set on relieving Taunton, which good Town Goring had reduc'd again to a second Extremity, and ruin'd the adjacent Country with second Pillage and Devastation. Colonel Blake the brave Governor, had in several Sallies got great Advantages of him, and at last wrote to the Parliament; That if Relief General came not speedily they should be put into great Straits for Provisions and Ammunition. He Letter to assur'd the House he had never accepted of a Parley, but scorn'd it. That his Garrison had some Ammunition left, and resolv'd to feed upon their Horses. He desir'd the House to take Consideration

A. D. 1645. consideration of their Condition, and left all to the Almighty, who he doubted not would relieve them. The Parliament answer'd, That Relief should speedily come to the Garrison. And what Money they took up the House would pay, desiring them to go on in their Vigilancy and Valour and they should never want Encouragement. Soon after Governour Blake had Intelligence from Lyme, that Succours were order'd for him, and having receiv'd thence a small Supply of Powder, a Party of the Garrison issu'd out on the Besiegers and slew above 400 of them, with the Loss of 100 of the Besieg'd, who oblig'd the Enemy by this sharp Action to draw back, and enlarg'd their Quarters 5 or 6 Miles in Compass. On the Parliament's Side were kill'd Colonel Lloyd and Colonel Richbel. On the King's Major Norwood and Captain Richardson, two Papists. Sir John Digby was mortally wounded and died at Bridgewater, a staunch Papist. The Parliament sent Orders to General Massey to march towards Taunton with 3000 Horse and Foot, before General Fairfax left pursuing the King, but he was only strong enough to hinder the Cavaliers scatter'd Troops from joining Goring, and Fairfax wrote him Word he would be up with him by such a Day, in order to clear Taunton, and the Country about it, from such a horrid Crew.

General Fairfax's The two Houses desir'd the Scots Army to advance towards Hereford, that by reducing so considerable a Place on the Welch Frontier, the King, who was in Wales, might be farther straiten'd, and sent Orders to General Fairfax to march to the Relief of Taunton. Accordingly having settled the Town of Leicester, he march'd the 20th of June to Lutterworth, thence to Warwick, thence to Clifford and Campden in Gloucestershire, and on the 25th he came before Highbworth in Wiltshire, and summon'd one Major Hen, who had fortify'd himself in the Church and refus'd to surrender. There is a Spice of Desperation and Frenzy in the future Actions of the Cavaliers. Hen hung out bloody Colours, but he no sooner saw the Guns drawing up against his Fortification than he yielded upon Quarter. The Soldiers had good Booty. The Resistance the Cavaliers make is like the Agonies of dying Men, yet they will not suffer their Master to part with the Laudean Prelacy, or rather to part with them, to save Himself, his Kingdoms and Posterity. The Mischief they did now was of no Use to them, and the Parliament's Forces treated them like Men who deserv'd Pity rather than Chastisement, the Delinquents only excepted, who had brought all these Calamities on the Nation, and of whom Mr. Edward Hyde was not the least guilty. The General left a small Garrison at Highbworth to enlarge the Parliament's Quarters that way. From Marlborough, June 29. Spies were sent to Taunton, to give Governour Blake Notice of Fairfax's March towards him. On Salisbury Plain the Army met with some of the Club Men, and near Blandford in Dorsetshire took Mr. Penruddock and one Fussell, two of their Captains, who upon Promise of future peaceable Behaviour were dismiss'd. These Club Men were spirited up by some Laudean Priests in Wiltshire and Dorsetshire, who having a little more Discretion than Dr. Hudson, Dr. Dunse, and other Doctors, who were among the King's Troops, did not counsel them to declare openly for the King, but for a Neutrality, and under that Pretext to fall upon those who offer'd to disturb them, meaning the Parliament's Forces only, which they fail'd not to do when they met with Stragglers, or had any Advantage over them, as they once broke into Major General Massey's Quarters, surpriz'd some of his Men and slew them, but having several of their own slain in Revenge, it gave a Check to them for some Time. Their Leaders, Dr. Goeche of Trinity College, Cambridge, Mr. Bromwel, Mr. Walsham, Mr. Hook, all Club Divines, John St. Loe, Esq; Peter Hoskins, Esq; Thomas Trenchard, Esq; Robert Culliford, Esq; Gentlemen much too good for the Company they kept, Mr. Richard Newman, Mr. George Hawkes, Mr. Robert Pawlett, and one Young an Attorney, deliver'd a Petition to Sir Thomas Fairfax, to desire, that till a Peace was concluded the Towns of Dorset and Wilts should be put into their Hands. The General thought fit to temporize with them till he had driven Goring from before Taunton, lest on any ill Success these Club Troops, headed by their Clergy, should fall upon those of his Men, who retreated to those Counties, so he gave them good Words, though he knew very well that some of them had rais'd Men by the King's Commission, and resolv'd to disperse them as soon as he had an Opportunity.

Goring hearing of Fairfax's Approach drew off his Army to Blackdown, to tempt the Garrison of Taunton to sally still farther from their Works, and then cut off their Retreat. But the Garrison heard as well as he that General Fairfax was approaching, and left Goring to his Management.

The Army march'd from Dorchester to Beaumer, which Town they found in Ashes, being set on Fire by Prince Maurice's Men in five Places at once, occasion'd by a Quarrel between the French and Cornish. Here the General receiv'd certain Information, that Goring, who did not know what to do, was quite drawn off from Taunton and come to Ilminster, making the best of his Way to avoid the victorious Army, but he had staid about Taunton too long. He had a long Reckoning to make up, for the Robberies and Cruelties he and his Crew had committed, and Fairfax is resolv'd they shall pay it. At Crookkern the General commanded Colonel Fleetwood with a Body of Horse to pursue Goring, while three other Regiments of Horse, and two of Foot, march'd more slowly after him, to be ready to join in case of Action. The Enemy pretended to make good South Petherton Bridge, but on Fleetwood's Approach they abandon'd it. The Parliament's Forces march'd over the Bridge towards Ilchester, and sent a Detachment to Load Bridge, where the Royalists had a strong Guard, but it was not thought fit to attack them. They had also garrison'd Ilchester and Langport, and broke down the Bridge near Yeovill. On July 7, the Parliament Army rendezvouz'd in a Field near Crookkern, and the General and Lieutenant General went with a Party to view the Pass at Load Bridge. The Enemy's Horse appear'd in great Numbers. They drew up their Foot and march'd some Regiments from Load Bridge along the Side of the River Parret, towards Ilchester. The Horse on both Sides skirmish'd all Day by Parties on the Meadows near the River. The Cavaliers had Garrisons at Ilchester, Langport, Burrough, Sydenham House, and Bridgewater, and their Army was ready on the other Side of the River to defend the Passage. The General therefore left a sufficient Strength to observe the Garrison at Ilchester, and the Guard at Load Bridge, and march'd his Army to Yeovill, where Intelligence was brought that Colonel Phillips, Governor of Ilchester, had quitted it, after having burnt the Bridewell, a Place he had fortify'd. The Guard also was drawn off from Load Bridge, and Goring came near Taunton again as if he thought he might surprize the Town

A. D. 1645. Town in the Security they probably were in upon the Approach of the Parliament Army. General Fairfax sent Major General Massey after Goring with his own Brigade of Horse, and order'd another Party of Horse as a Reserve if need were.

Battle of Langport.

Wednesday, July the 9th, the Army march'd to Long Sutton, where News came that Major General Massey was near upon an Engagement, and the General immediately gave Command that Colonel Montagu should march with 2000 Musketeers to his Assistance, being every where an inclos'd Country, but the Engagement was over before he could come up, Goring's Party beaten, many slain, 800 Horse taken Prisoners. In this Action Colonel Cooke was shot through both Checks. The Parliament Horse continu'd all Day skirmishing with the Enemies, at a Pass a Mile beyond Langport on Ham side. They took a French Cornet with his Standard, a Dutch Man, and a Spaniard Prisoners.

The next Day, July the 10th, the Cavalier Infantry advanc'd from Langport to the Pass, lin'd the Hedges thick with Musketeers, and drew up their Ordnance, upon which the General, Lieutenant General, and all the Officers, instantly mounted and rode up the Field where the Enemy was preparing to engage, one of the rashest Actions in the War, for Goring might have made his Escape when he was Master of the western Side of the River. Fairfax could not have hinder'd his Army's getting into Devonshire and Cornwall, where there were more Forces to encrease it, but ill Fate pursu'd the King and his Generals, and Despair hurry'd them on Enterprizes which had no Prospect but Destruction. The Parliament's Army was not only more Numerous but Victorious, and Goring's, spirited with nothing but the Lust of Blood and Rapine, which sinks always in Battle, where the honest and generous Mind only carries a Man well through.

General Goring routed.

Before the Detachment sent as a Reserve to Massey return'd, Fairfax's Ordnance play'd on Goring's Army with great Execution, beating the Enemy from the Hill on Ham side, and forcing them to draw off their Ordnance from the Pass. The Parliament Foot drew down the Hill towards the Pass, and with their wonted Resolution charg'd the Enemy from Hedge to Hedge till they got the Pass, upon which Goring's Horse advanc'd towards them, and were charg'd and routed by Major Bethel and Major Desborough. The Musketeers coming up after the Horse, fir'd on them so close, that the King's White and Black Regiment march'd off without farther engaging, and were pursu'd as far as Aller Drove, 3 Miles off, where Goring's Horse and Foot made a short Stand, but seeing Fairfax's Horse and Foot marching after them in excellent Order, the Cavaliers took to their Heels, the Horse endeavour'd to leap the Reens, which are broad, full of Water in Winter, and Mire in Summer, and many of the Cavaliers were mir'd. The Troopers dismounted and got into the Meadows to the Infantry, who being surrounded yielded at Discretion. There were about 300 of the King's Soldiers kill'd, among whom was Mr. Theodore Mowse, a Popish Volunteer, and 1400 Prisoners taken, among whom were Major General Porter, Colonel Heveningham, and Colonel Slingsby, General of Goring's Ordnance. Fairfax's Men took also 100 inferior Officers, 40 Standards and Colours, 4000 Arms, and 1200 Horses. Goring, and the rest of the Runaways, got to Bridgwater, and the General took up his Quarters at Middlesey, within 5 Miles of it. The next Day he drew up his whole Army, Horse and Foot, on Weston Moor near Pensy Pound, the very Spot of Ground where just forty Years after the Duke of Monmouth's Forces fought King James the Second's. The People of Middlesey, Weston, Chedsey, Barwrip, Puriton, Pawlet, and all along Poldon Hill, hearing of the Defeat of the Cavaliers, and fearing to taste of their former Cruelties as they ran away, rose in great Numbers, and with their Colours, Clubs, and Arms, appear'd upon Knoll Hill, then belonging to the famous Governor Blake. General Fairfax being inform'd of it, He, Lieutenant General Cromwel, and other Officers, rode up the Hill to them, and were receiv'd with seeming Joy, in token of which they gave them a Volley, and their Leader made a neutral Speech. The General having engag'd them not to supply Bridgwater with Provisions return'd to the Army, which quarter'd that Night in and about Chedsey, within two Miles of Bridgwater, which Town the Lord General resolv'd to reduce.

If I am more particular in this Siege than any Siege of other, some Allowance is to be made for my BRIDGWATER. writing it on the Spot, and for the Love which every one naturally bears to the Place of his Nativity, an Affection which I have observ'd to be more prevalent in the Natives of this Town than those of any other, owing probably to their plentiful and jocund Way of living. I am furnish'd with the Particulars by a Manuscript which will be improv'd by my Knowledge of the Place, at that Time the most Important in the West of England, it, in some Measure, cutting off the Communication between all the Country beyond it to the Lands End, and the Rest of England, standing on the River Parret, which divides the spacious and rich County of Somerset in two, and from the Mouth of that River 12 Miles from Bridgwater in the Severn Channel, to its Source on the Edge of Dorsetshire, not far from the British Channel, is an Isthmus not much above 30 Miles broad. The Country from the North almost to the South Channel, abounds with all Sorts of Provisions, as much, if not more, than any Part of England, and could plentifully supply a much greater Garrison than the King had in Bridgwater. A Town which never departed from the true Interest of England, when they were not misled by Bigots, nor influenc'd by an ill Neighbourhood. It was now full of Gentlemen and Clergymen, who, contrary to the Inclination of the Inhabitants, who were generally Puritans, under the Guidance of a very pious, worthy Minister, Mr. Devenish, their Vicar, made it a Garrison for the King, while the gallant Colonel Blake, afterwards the renowned Admiral, a Native of this Town, kept Taunton for the Parliament.

About 3 Months before General Fairfax attack'd Bridgwater, the Prince of Wales kept his Court in the Castle there, and had his Council with him, the chief of whom were, the Earl of Berkshire, Sir Edward Hyde, the Lord Capel, the Lord Colepepyr. Thither were summon'd the King's Commissioners for the four associated Counties.

Sir Henry Killigrew, Mr. Coriton, Mr. Scawen, Mr. Roscorroth.

These Gentlemen waited on the Prince the 23<sup>d</sup> of April, and a long Consultation was held at the Castle about the Operations of the ensuing Campaign. Sir John Starvel propos'd, that One and All should rise in these Associated Counties, and knock the Parliamentarians o'th' Head. But the Vigour of that Proposition did not meet with the Applause it was intended for, his Highness's Council not being satisfy'd that the One and All were at the Command of Sir John Starvel. At this Meeting was discover'd the ill Effect of the Disagreement between Goring and Greenville, the King's Generals in the West. Complaints were daily brought against Sir Richard Greenville, and Goring was disgusted that the Prince did not make him Generalissimo of all the Western Armies, which were to be soon dissipated. Much Business would have been done according to Sir Edward Hyde, who was one of the principal Counsellors, IF it had not been for the Divisions in the Councils, which render'd this Meeting useless. His Highness staid at Bridgwater eight Days, and then return'd to Bristol.

Windham Governor of this Borough, and was expell'd the House of Commons as a Monopolizer. His Wife had given Suck to the Prince, yet, to use the Lord Clarendon's Words, she was a Woman of no good Breeding, and a Country Pride, Nihil Muliebri præter Corpus gerens, having nothing of a Woman about her but her Body. He adds, She valu'd her self much upon the Power and Familiarity which her Neighbours might see she had with the Prince of Wales, and therefore upon all Occasions in Company, and when the Course of People was greatest, would use great Boldness towards him, and, which was worse than all this, she affected in all Companies where she let her self out to any Freedom, a very negligent and disdainful Mention of the Person of the King. She diverted the Prince by her Folly and Petulancy from applying himself to the serious Consideration of his Business, and spoke negligently and scornfully of his Council. Intolerable! The Lord Clarendon was the chief Man of that Council, and to be scorn'd and neglected was enough to put her into his History in as ill a Figure as the Wife of Col. Ven, whom he has also made as immortal as the History of the Rebellion. Governor Windham acted upon his Neighbours without Controul, says the Earl, and it is said he hung up an honest Townsman upon the Sign-Post of the George Inn for having given Offence to some of his Clergymen by certain Acts of Devotion in the Presbyterian Way. On the 3<sup>d</sup> of June the Prince of Wales return'd to Bridgwater, and was attended by a Deputation from the Club-Men, who to the Number of 5 or 6000 appear'd in Arms on Poldon Hill, near Marshal's Elm, 10 Miles from this Town. They complain'd of Goring's Violence and Rapine, and the Earl of Clarendon assures us that Sir John Starvel had his Agents amongst them. Several Persons were active at their Meetings, who were known to be affected to the King's Service. The Prince order'd Goring to reform his Army by good Discipline, but he took little Notice of those Orders, and liv'd himself and suffer'd his Men to live in all manner of Licentiousness; but what was most grievous to Windham Governor of Bridgwater, he took the Contributions which were assess'd on the Inhabitants of the Parts adjacent for the Payment of his Garrison, which consisted of about 1800 Men, some of whom were taken Prisoners by the Club-Men for attempting to levy those Contributions by Force, after Goring had inhibited Windham to do it.

The Town of Bridgwater is seated, as the Earl of Clarendon observes, in the Centre of the Shire, and is consequently the best situated for the Business of it, which one would think to be within the Compass of common Understanding, and therefore not liable to be contested. It is the youngest Town and the oldest Corporation in the County; it not having a Being before the Norman Invasion, and was incorporated about 130 Years after by Procurement of that powerful Baron William de Briwere, Favourite to Henry II. Richard I. and King John. Briwere built the Castle, and made it the Head of his Manors in those Parts. The Castle and the Manor of the Castle are now in the Possession of his Grace the Duke of Chandos, who has built a very handsome Street between the Site of the old Castle and the River. The Castle now remaining is a modern Building not 100 Years old, and there were no more Apartments in it in Windham's Time than there are now, but some Outlodgings and Houses, of which nothing now is to be seen. There were 40 Guns mounted on the Walls, which were 15 Foot thick in most Places. An Historian who was with Sir Thomas Fairfax, says, The Town glory'd in the Equality of its Level, there being not a Clod on the East Side of the River that could afford any Advantage against the Place. The Fortifications were very regular and strong; the Ditch about it very deep, and 30 Foot wide, which for a great Part of the Circuit of the Town was every Tide fill'd up to the Brim with Water. The Circuit within the Line and Works was not very large, but very well mann'd. The Town is divided into two Parts by the River Parret, over which is a Stone Bridge with three large Arches built by Nicholas Trivet the Historian, who marry'd a Descendant of Briwere's in Henry III's Time, or that of his Son Edward I. There was a high Fortification at the East End of the Field, where stood the Hospital of St. John, and Mounts rais'd between that and Dunwear, which render'd the Access difficult on the Side of Eastover the Eastern Division of the Town. There was also a Garrison in Sydenham House, belonging now to Mr. Dodington, one of the Lords of the Treasure, and Representative in this present Parliament for the Borough of Bridgwater. The House was surrender'd to Colonel Helborn on Summons, and in it 100 Men were made Prisoners of War. The General order'd Col. Welden's Brigade to post themselves at Ham House on the South-West Part of the Town, and the adjacent Hill belonging also to Mr. Dodington, from whence it was easy to annoy the Place. Batteries were rais'd there, but the Lord General resolv'd not to make a long Siege of it, and to carry the Town by Storming, while his Soldiers were flush'd with the Victory at Langport. He commanded Col. Okey with a Detachment to reduce the King's Garrison at Burrough, where 140 of Goring's Men had fortify'd themselves in a Chapel on the Top of a steep Pyramidical Hill; but they were so terrify'd at the Sight of the Rout given their Fellows in Auler Grounds, just under the Hill, that they surrender'd upon Quarter.

A. D. 1645. to Bridgwater, between which there is great Communication on Account of the Coal Trade. Moulton's Frigates took 16 Welsh Transports off Steepleholmes, an Island, or rather Rock, about two Leagues from the Mouth of Bridgwater River, famous for the Retirement of the old British Historian Gildas, which, with Variety of other curious Incidents relating to these Parts, must be referr'd to the Description of Somersetshire, a Work the Author has been preparing these twelve Years, the perfecting of which, as useful and pleasant as it would be, has been and is still impeded purely by the Prejudice of Party, and a private Jealousy too mean to be mention'd here.

On Monday the 14th of July a Council of War was held at the head Quarters at Chedsey, and a great Debate arose whether to storm the Town or not. They came then to no Resolution; but however Preparations were made for a Storm, Faggots were provided, and the Soldiers drawn out in a Readiness: But it was deferr'd at that Time, and Lieutenant General Hammond caus'd eight Bridges about 40 Foot long to be prepar'd, which was of great Use in the Storm. This Day the General fording the River at Dunwear to view the Posts on Ham Side, was in Danger of being surpriz'd by the Head of the Tide, which at a Spring breaks in sometimes in a foamy Wave, of 4 or 5 Foot high, the Breadth of the River. Two Days after another Council of War was held at Chedsey, wherein was debated, Whether to rise, and leave the Town unattempted, which was conceiv'd to be very prejudicial to their future Progress, or to sit down before it; being a Place of that Strength, and they not sure to carry it, leaving the Enemy at Liberty to rally his broken Forces, which seem'd very hazardous, or block it up by Forts on both Sides with Part of their Army: But the Difficulty of laying a Bridge over the River, thro' the Violence of the Current, which would be necessary for maintaining a Communication between the Quarters on both Sides, hinder'd that Design, or attempt it by Approaches. It was consider'd, if they should go that Way, it would prove very tedious; and if, during their Stay about it, any great Glut of Rain should fall, it would fill up their Trenches, and disable them from effecting the Business; so at last it was resolv'd to storm, tho' it carry'd the greatest Danger with it. Yet the Desire the Army had to be speedily free, for the farther Service of the Common Wealth, surmounted all Difficulties, and both Officers and Soldiers drew Lots for their Posts, some to storm, some to be Reserves, others to allarm. The Day appointed for it was Monday the 20th of July. General Massey was to make the Attack on Ham Side, with the Regiments of Col. Welden, Col. Ingoldsby, Col. Fortescue, Col. Herbert, Col. Birch, and the Major General's own Regiment. On St. John's and Castle Field Side were posted the General's Regiment, Lieutenant General Cromwel's, Col. Pickering's, Col. Montagu's, Sir Hardress Waller's, Col. Pride's, Col. Rainsborough's. On the Saturday the General forded the River again, and rode round the Town to see if all Things were ready, that both Sides might fall on together. The Castle Wall on the North Side was very high, the Moat was deep, and between the North Gate and West Gate was a Battery on the off Side of the Moat, which hinder'd all Approach that Way. On Sunday Mr. Peters preach'd an encouraging Sermon, after his Way of Preaching, in the Forenoon, and Mr. Bowles, the Lord General's Chaplain, in the Afternoon. The eminent Mr. Baxter, who was present at this great Action, was not wanting in the Discharge of his Duty. Mr. Bowles is the same Divine who was afterwards so instrumental in the Restoration, and refus'd the Deanry of York, which was offer'd him. After the Sermons the Drums beat, and the Army was drawn up in the Fields about Horsey and Bower. The Commanders of the Forlorn Hope, and the Soldiers who were to begin the Storm, were afresh exhorted to do their Duties by Mr. Peters, who behav'd that Day tam Marte quam Mercurio. As soon as it grew dark, the Soldiers drew to the several Posts allotted them to Storm. The Signal was the shooting off three Pieces of Ordnance, which the Forces on Ham Side were to take Notice of, and to fall on at the Instant. Before the Action Sir Thomas Fairfax sent a Summons to the Governor and Citizens, as Sir Roger Manley calls them, to surrender: But Windham, like the rest of the Cavaliers, did not want Words of Defiance, and return'd a scornful Answer, for which he is to pay severely the next Day. July the 21st, about Two a Clock in the Morning, while Massey's Forces kept alarming the Enemy on the South Part of the Town, Lieutenant Col. Hewson led on the Forlorn Hope at the East End, and was valiantly seconded by the General's own Regiment, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Jackson, and Lieutenant General Cromwel's, commanded by Lieutenant Col. Ashfield. The Bridges prepar'd by Col. Hammond were quickly brought to the Ditch at St. John's and Castle Field, and thrown over it, on which the Soldiers pass'd with little Loss, and with undaunted Courage mounted the Works the Enemy had rais'd there, beat them from their Ordnance, and turn'd them on the Town, while Capt. Reynolds, of Cromwel's Regiment of Horse, at the Head of the Forlorn Hope, drove the Cavaliers from the Draw-bridge at St. John's, which was let down, and a Passage made to the East Gate, which was soon forc'd open, and Reynolds entering Eastover, says my Author, with his Horse, scour'd the Streets of that Part of the Town up to the Stone Bridge, over the River that cuts it in two; upon which the Officers and Soldiers, to the Number of 600, who had made Resistance in Eastover, threw down their Arms, and cry'd Quarter, Quarter. There was at that Time a Gate on the Bridge where the Enemy instantly made Barricades, and drew up a Draw-bridge. The Parliament's Forces had not been two Hours in Eastover before the King's shot Granades and Slugs of hot Iron, which fir'd it on both Sides, and by next Morning it was all burnt to the Ground, except three or four Houses: It consisted then of Goodly Buildings, as my Author writes, who saw it, and of several Streets. Major Corvel of Col. Harley's Regiment, stood in the Midst of Eastover, while both Sides were in Flames, and kept Guard to prevent the Enemy's sallying. General Fairfax hoping the Storm might have wrought upon the Soldiers, and the Fire on the Townsmen, that they would have hearken'd to a Treaty, renew'd his Summons, which the Governor peremptorily refus'd, as if it was his Intent that so fair a Town should be destroy'd, for he knew he could at worst be but a Prisoner of War. There was no Hope of his being reliev'd, and the Resistance the Royalists made, had more of Frenzy in it than Courage. When the Latter saw Eastover in a Blaze, they rang the Bells for Joy, and set Fire themselves to several Houses in Silver Street, Friers Street, and at the Pig Cross, which shew the Effect of it to this Day, where the Parliament Fire had done no Hurt, laying it to the Charge of the Townsmen, who, they said, did it on Purpose to be rid of them; for the Inhabitants,

A. D. 1645. habitants, as I have already observ'd, were generally well affected to the Parliament. The Townsmen said the Soldiers did it, when they had little Hopes to hold out; But Thanks be to God, says the Historian, we found more of it standing than we expected.

On Tuesday, July 22. General Fairfax resolv'd to alarm the Town on the East Side, while General Maffey storm'd it on the South; but that Resolution was chang'd to an Alarm on both Sides, at which the Enemy was much amaz'd, and abandon'd their Line on the South and South-West Part of the Town. About Two a Clock that Day the General sent a Trumpet to the Governor with a Message to this Purpose; That his Denial of fair Terms had wrought in him no other Thoughts, but of Compassion towards those that were innocent, who otherwise might suffer thro' the Governor's Obstinacy; wherefore he signify'd to him, That Women and Children that would might come forth of the Town by Four a Clock; which being made known to Col. Windham's Lady, she came out, as did also the Lady Hawley, Mrs. War, and several other Ladies. They were no sooner gone, than the Cannon play'd fiercely into the Town; Granades were shot, and Slugs of hot Iron in Abundance, by which several Houses on the Corn-hill, in St. Mary's Street and High Street were set on Fire, and the Wind being high, increas'd the Flame. The Citizens and Soldiers, says Sir Roger Manley, who was then there, were astonish'd at this unusual Tempest, and every Man employ'd about saving his House and his Goods. Windham, amidst this Distraction, sent Tom Elliot, as he was then generally call'd, one of the King's Domesticks, to desire Terms; but the General would only grant the Soldiers their Lives, the Inhabitants their Liberty and Freedom from Plunder, the Gentlemen to be dispos'd of as the Parliament should appoint, which the Governor said the Gentlemen would not consent to, and Mr. Elliot, the same who carry'd the Great Seal to the King at York, fearing the Army would fall on, pray'd the General to forbear till he went once more to Windham, from whom he presently brought back an Answer of Submission. The Town continu'd on Fire, and the Townsmen ran about, crying, Mercy, for the Lord's Sake. Hostages also came out to the Lord General for Performance of the Governor's Agreement, who were Sir John Heal, Sir Hugh Windham, Mr. Walrond, Mr. War, Mr. Sydenham, Mr. Speke, and the Town was the next Day, July the 23d, surrender'd to the Parliament Army upon Quarter for Life only. There were in the Town when Sir Thomas Fairfax came before it, Col. Edmund Windham the Governor, Sir Hugh Windham, Sir John Digby, Sir John Heal, Sir John Starvel, Sir Francis Courtney, Mr. Speke, Mr. War, Mr. Walrond, Mr. Sydenham, &c.

One of the poorest historical Creatures who ever wrote, is Sanderson, to whom Mr. Archdeacon is much obliged, and he tells us, The Garrison was to march out, leaving such Ammunition and Plunder as escap'd burning, which was very little, and not worth the Purchase. This Author was allow'd to be the best Historian on the Cavalier Side, till the Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Echard appear'd in direct Defiance to Fact and Truth; and how they were taught by Sanderson will be seen when he is compar'd with Whitlocke and Rushworth, the latter being present when this Town was storm'd and taken. There were left for the Parliament 40 Pieces of Ordnance, 4000 Weight of Match, and Powder in Proportion, Victuals for 2000 Soldiers for four Months, 1700 Prisoners, 200 of them Reformades, Commanders, Gentlemen and Priests, Treasure in Plate, Jewels, &c. said to be worth 100000 Pounds. The Works of the Town were as strong as any in England, and the Moat as deep.

The taking of Bridgwater, according to my Lord Clarendon, who had been there but a Month before, was "Matter of Amazement to all Men; nor was it any Excuse that it was not of Strength enough against so strong an Army, for it was so strongly situated, and it might well have had all those Additions which were necessary for Fortifications, that it was inexcusable in a Governor, who had enjoy'd that Charge 3 Years, with all the Allowances he had himself desir'd, and had often assur'd the King that it was not to be taken, that it did not resist any the greatest Strength that could come before it for one Week, and within less Time it was surrender'd into Fairfax's Hands, not till it had been storm'd, burnt, and render'd defenceless: But the Earl of Clarendon did not love Windham on his Wife's Account, who had no very good Opinion of his Counsels. Again, "That this prodigious Success on the Enemy's Side should break the Spirits of most Men is not at all to be wonder'd at, &c."

An Express was immediately dispatch'd to the Parliament with Advice of the Surrender of Bridgwater. They gave him 20 Pounds as a Reward, and order'd that the Ministers in the several Parishes of London should the next Lord's Day, render Thanks to God for the taking of this Town, of which Mr. Peters gave them, two or three Days after, a more particular Account, and produc'd several Commissions in Characters which were taken from the Prisoners at Bridgwater. The House order'd him 100 Pounds, and Thanks to their General Sir Thomas Fairfax, for reducing it. Colonel Birch was made Governor. The Reason of so great Treasure found here was, that the Cavalier Gentry had from all the adjacent Parts, sent in thither their Jewels, Plate, and best Household Furniture; Colonel Windham, the Governor, having assur'd the King it could not be taken. Much Plate and rich Hangings were carry'd thence to London, and there sold to raise Bounty Money for Fairfax's Soldiers who were at the Storm, which was the most Furious of any in this War, and the Prize of the Victors as valuable; But the fine Town, as the Historian styles it, suffer'd much in the Burning so many goodly Buildings, of which there are left no Remains in the Eastern Division of the Place, which was taken by Storm, but the Western can now boast of more Beauty and Magnificence of Building than any other Town in the West of England, of so small a Circuit, scarce 2 Miles in Circumference.

A Week after the Surrender of Bridgwater, the Army was drawn up on Mendip Hill, above Wells, with Intention to march to Bath; but Bath taken upon Intelligence that the Citizens had open'd their Gates to Colonel Rich, who came before it with two Regiments of Horse and two Troops of Dragoons only, the General turn'd towards Shireburn, which he took a View of at the Lodge, Saturday, August 2. The same Day he had Information that the Club Men of Dorset, Wilts, Club Men, and Somerset, were to rendezvous at Shaftsbury, and a fair Opportunity offer'd to surprize them. These Club Men corresponded with Prince Rupert, Lord Hopton, and Goring, though they pretended Neutrality. Indeed it was one of the best Cards the Cavalier Generals had to play in this Extremity. This Rabble were in all above Taken.

A. D. 1645. above 15000 Men, and if they could have been prevailed upon to have declar'd and fought for the King, it might have prolong'd the War some Months at least, and People in Despair always flatter themselves, that Matters being at the Worst must mend; but though the Club Men were much better inclin'd to that Service than to the Cause of their Country, they had not Courage enough to oppose a victorious Army, and the Lord General did not think it convenient to be any longer trifled with by them, or to leave them at Liberty to join or not join the Royalists at their Pleasure. He therefore commanded Colonel Fleetwood with a good Body of Horse to surround them in the Town of Shaftsbury, which accordingly he did, and took about 50 of their Ringleaders Prisoners; among whom were Dr. Goche, the Parson, Mr. Hawles, Mr. Carey, Mr. Young, Mr. Cradocke, who were all disarm'd and imprison'd. The next Day the General receiv'd Advice that more Club Men were to join them from Dorset, Wilts and Somerset, to deliver their Fellows out of Prison, though their real Intent was to hinder Provisions coming to the Army before Shirburn. Upon this Lieutenant General Cromwel went in Person with Part of the Army to disperse them: As he advanc'd towards Shaftsbury, he discover'd some Colours on the Top of a high Hill, full of Wood and almost inaccessible. He sent a Lieutenant and a small Party to know their Meaning, and to inform them the Lieutenant General was there. Mr. Newman, one of their Leaders went along with Gen. Cromwel's Lieutenant, to the General, and demanded, Why the Gentlemen were taken at Shaftsbury? Cromwel told him, "No Account was due concerning their Fellows there taken, but yet he assur'd him, that the General only intended if they were found upon due Trial, to have committed any Offence, they should be punish'd according to Law, otherwise be releas'd." Newman's next Demand was, that they might secure themselves from Plunder: To which the Lieutenant General reply'd, "The General will not suffer any of you to be plunder'd or injur'd, but upon Complaint against any of his Soldiers, will do you Justice;" With which Answer he seem'd satisfy'd, and the Club Men on the Hill disappear'd: But Cromwel advancing towards Shrawton, the Seat of Mr. Freeke, saw 4000 of them on Hambleton Hill, where is an old Roman Work deeply trench'd. The Lieutenant General sent a Lieutenant with a Party of Horse to require an Account of their Meeting; he was answer'd with a Volley of Shot from the Club Men. Cromwel sent one Mr. Lee, who had come from them to him to require Submission to his Orders, and that they would disperse, which they refus'd, and made another Volley on the Parliament's Soldiers. Lee was sent to them again to prevent Effusion of Blood, but they refus'd this third Message at the Instigation of one Bravel, a Parson, who bad them stand to it, or he would Pistol those that gave back. The Lieutenant General then order'd his own Troop to fall on, which they did, and were repuls'd, the Club Men firing from behind the old Work, to which there was a Passage about 20 Foot wide: Upon this Major Desborough with the General's Regiment, went round about a Ledge of the Hill, and climb'd it with much Difficulty, which the Club Men perceiving, and that he was about to attack their Rear, they ran away; some were slain, many wounded, the rest slid and tumbled down the high steep Hill to the Hazard of their Necks. Four hundred of them were brought to Shrawton, of whom 200 were wounded. In this Skirmish Captain Pattison and about 12 more were kill'd on the Parliament Side. There were among the Prisoners four Parsons, Mr. Talbot of Milton, Mrs. Lawford of Auckfield, a vicious one, and two more. The Motto of their Colours was,

*If you offer to plunder or take our Cattle,
Be assur'd we will bid you Battle.*

My Author adds, in others of them they had Sentences of Scripture profanely apply'd by their malignant Priests, who were the principal stirrers up of the People to these tumultuous Assemblies, particularly Bravel before mention'd, Parson of Compton, and Mr. Rogers Parson of Langton, who issu'd out Warrants to the Country Fellows to make Reprisals for the Prisoners taken at Shaftsbury, and the Club Men own'd they would have laid down their Arms had it not been for Bravel, Lawford and White, Vicars or Curates. We have read in the Earl of Clarendon's and Echard's Histories, That the Puritan Ministers were the Ecclesiastical Drummers, and preach'd the People to War. But here we find some of their own Ecclesiastical Friends in actual War, misleading their stupid Hearers to hazard their Lives and Goods for they knew not what; and the same Spirit still possesses too many of the Vicars and Curates in the same Quarter of the Kingdom.

In the mean Time General Fairfax carry'd Shirburn on the Siege of Shirburn Castle, before which was kill'd the gallant Captain Horsey of Colonel Rainsborough's Regiment, who was bury'd with military Pomp in the fine Church at Shirburn, where his Ancestors lay bury'd: His Family being at least as ancient and honourable as Mr. Hyde's, who is pleas'd to say in his impartial History, that there was hardly a Colonel in the Parliament Army of a better Family than the private Soldiers, and here's a Captain only of as good a one as his own, or that of the greatest General in the King's Army, the Princes only excepted. A Breach of 50 Foot wide being made in the Castle Wall, the General summon'd Sir Lewis Dives the Governor to yield, but he return'd a peremptory Denial, confiding too much in the Zeal and Strength of the Club Men. Upon his Refusal of Terms 20 of his Garrison leap'd over the Wall, and came to the Parliament Army upon Quarter. Those within cry'd out for a Parley, but it was deny'd upon any other Condition than to have their Lives spar'd; and while they were disputing it, the Parliament's Soldiers enter'd the Place at the Breach, and the Garrison threw down their Arms; Quarter was given them, but they were stripp'd to the Purpose, all but Sir Lewis Dives and his Lady, the Lord Digby's Sister, and a few more. The Soldiers found Plunder to a great Value, and took it in a disorderly Manner, which could not then be prevented. Besides their making a Resistance not like brave Men, but mad Men, no Relief being to be expected, lost them all Claim to the Usage of generous War. The taking of this Place so discourag'd the Club Men, that they gave the General very little Trouble afterwards. In it were taken, besides Sir Lewis Dives, the Governor, Colonel Giles Strangersways, Sir John Walcot, Mr. Pawlet, Colonel Thornhill, and others of Quality. We cannot name the latter without observing that Sir James Thornhill, the greatest Genius for Painting, not only of our Nation, but of our Age, is of the same Family, and Owner of the same Seat, Thornhill, in this County of Dorset.

A. D. 1645. The Prisoners, as well the Club Men as those taken in Shirburn Castle, being sent to London, the General march'd to Castle Cary in Somersetshire, and in his March order'd Colonel Rainsborough with his own, and Colonel Hammond's Regiments to take in Nunney Castle, which was very strong though not very large; and had a Garrison of 100 Men under Captain Turberville, who surrender'd it the second Day after Summons.

Nunney
Castle taken.

Siege of Bristol.

The Siege of Bristol being resolv'd on, Commissary General Ireton was commanded to advance near it with 2000 Horse and Dragoons, to preserve the adjacent Towns for the better Accommodation of the Army. Vice Admiral Moulton was order'd to send some Ships from Milford, to block up the City on the Side of the Severne. Prince Rupert, the Governor, had there and in the Neighbourhood about 3000 Men, Horse and Foot. The General detach'd a strong Party of Horse with a Regiment of Foot to take Post at Hanham, three Miles from Bristol, on the River Avon, between that and Bath, which gave the Enemy the first Alarm; for the Cavaliers made so great Dependence on their good Friends the Club Men, that they did not think the General would be able to reduce Shirburn in so short Time. Upon his Approach they fir'd Bedminster and burnt it to the Ground, a Village now almost contiguous to the City on Somersetshire Side: Thither was sent a strong Party of Horse and Foot to keep the Prince where he was, upon Advice that he intended to break through with his Horse and join Goring. The General and Lieutenant General went with this Party, view'd the Town, and appointed Guards and Quarters on Somersetshire Side: The General himself quarter'd at Keynsham, where he receiv'd Messengers from several Lords and Persons of Quality for Passes to go beyond Sea; but they had staid too long in England since the War broke out, and done too much Mischief to be let go at the Ending of it. The two next Days, the 22d and 23d of August, were spent in setting Guards on Gloucester and Somersetshire Side, the Head Quarters being remov'd to Hanham. The Enemy's Cannon play'd from the Great Fort and Pryor's Fort, but wounded only a Dragoon. They made a Sally with a Party of Horse but were beaten in again, with the Loss of Sir Richard Crane, and others. The Head Quarters were again remov'd to Stapleton on Gloucestershire Side. The next Day being Sunday, the Enemy sally'd out again, at the Salley Port near Pryor's Hill Fort, in a full Career, but were again beaten back by Colonel Rainsborough's Regiment. In this Action they lost a Major and some others. The next Day Warrants were issu'd to Sir John Horner, that eminent Patriot, High Sheriff of the County of Somerset, to raise the Posse, and be in a Readiness to reinforce General Massey, who lay about Taunton, to observe the Motions of Goring, who had got a Body together in Devonshire. On Tuesday the Enemy sally'd on Colonel Welden's Brigade at Bedminster, and through the Negligence of the Officer who then had Command there, took 10 and kill'd as many. As a Recompense for this Affront Captain Molineux of Colonel Butler's Regiment, and another stout Officer, seeing three bold Cavaliers under their Works, rode up to them, and ask'd Whom they were for? They swore, God damn them, for the King, and fir'd at the two Roundheads, who immediately return'd their Fire, wounded them, and after some Bickerings, took Sir Bernard Ashley, who was one of them, and dy'd of his Wounds; Colonel Daniel another of them, and his Companion got into the Town again. On Thursday the 28th of August, Lieutenant Colonel Kempson of Welden's Regiment, took the Fort at Portsmouth Point, which open'd a Passage for the Parliament's Ships into King-road, where Vice Admiral Moulton arriv'd three Days after, came a Shore to wait on the General, and offer'd him his best Assistance of Sailors, if the General storm'd the City. The Besieg'd made a Sally on the Parliament's Quarters near Lawford's Gate, and took three or four Soldiers.

On Monday the 1st of September, Prince Rupert sally'd out with 100 Horse and 600 Foot, and was driven in again by Fairfax's Horse and Colonel Rainsborough's Brigade of Foot; but it being a wet misty Day, Colonel Okey fell in among the Enemy unawares, and was taken by them. The Valiant Captain Guilliams of Commissary General Ireton's Regiment was kill'd in the Skirmish. On Tuesday a Council of War was held, and it was then resolv'd to storm the Place. Colonel Welden with his Brigade, consisting of his own Regiment, Colonel Ingoldsby's, Colonel Fortescue's and Col. Herbert's were to storm on Somersetshire Side; Colonel Montagu with the General's Brigade, consisting of Fairfax's Regiment, Colonel Montagu's, Colonel Pickering's, and Sir Hardress Waller's were to storm on both Sides Lawford's Gate, to the Rivers Avon and Frome. The Bridge over Frome to be made good against Horse with Pikes, or to break it down. Colonel Rainsborough with his own Regiment, Major General Skippon's, Colonel Hammond's, Colonel Birch's, and Colonel Pride's were to storm from the Salley on Frome Side up to Pryor's Hill Fort, and to storm the Fort it self as the main Business, 200 of this Brigade to go up in Boats with the Seamen to storm Water Fort: A Regiment of Horse and another of Foot to move up and down in the Clofes before the Royal Fort, to ply hard upon it and alarm it. A Regiment of Dragoons and two Regiments of Horse to carry Ladders with them, and attempt the Line and Works by Clifton and Washington's Breach: All Things being ready, the General order'd every Man to have six Shillings paid him for his Encouragement; so much having been promis'd them as a Bounty for their good Service at Bridgwater; and the General and Council here receiving News of Montrose's Successes and Depredations in Scotland, wrote a Letter to the Earl of Leven and his chief Officers, to express how sensible they were of it, and how willing to serve them if Need were for their settling of their Nation in Peace, so soon as the Condition of this Kingdom could spare them. Sign'd by Sir Thomas Fairfax, General, Oliver Cromwell, Lieutenant General, Thomas Hammond, Lieutenant General of the Ordnance, Henry Ireton, Commissary General, Edward Montagu, afterwards Earl of Sandwich, Colonel Richard Fortescue, Colonel, afterwards Sir Richard Ingoldsby, Colonel John Pickering, Sir Hardress Waller Colonel, Colonel William Herbert, Colonel Robert Hammond, Lieutenant Colonel James Gray, Adjutant General of the Foot, Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Pride, Sir Robert Pye Colonel, Colonel Thomas Rainsborough, Colonel Thomas Sheffield, Colonel Ralph Welden, Colonel Charles Fleetwood, Lieutenant Colonel John Raymond, Lieutenant Colonel Leon Watson, Captain Arthur Evelyn, Adjutant General of the Horse, Captain Richard Dean, Comptroller of the Ordnance, Lieutenant Colonel James Jackson, Major John Desborough, Major Christopher Bethel.

A. D.

A. D. Cannon Baskets being fill'd, Seamen and Boats sent for, and all Things ready for a Storm, the Lord General sent a Letter to Prince Rupert, to summon him to surrender the City, in which Letter he endeavour'd to convince the Prince of the Justness of the Parliament's Cause, and of his delivering up the City to them: He closes it thus, Let all England judge whether the Burning of its Towns, ruining its Cities, and destroying its People be a good Requital from a Person of your Family, which hath had the Prayers, Tears, Purges and Blood of its Parliament and People. I have often taken Notice of this. And, if you look on either as now divided, hath ever had the same Party, both in Parliaments, and among the People most Zealous for their Assistance and Restitution, which you now oppose and seek to destroy, and whose constant Grief hath been, that their Desires to serve your Family have been ever hinder'd and made fruitless by the same Party about his Majesty, whose Course you act, and whose Interest you pursue in this unnatural War. It is worth observing here that General Fairfax remonstrates against Prince Rupert's drawing his Sword against a Party, who were the only zealous Friends to his illustrious Family, the Parliament of England having always desir'd nothing more earnestly than the Restoring the Palatine House to their Hereditary Rights. The Trumpet that went with the Summons was detain'd all Night, and the next Day, September the 5th, brought an Answer from the Prince, desiring Leave to send to the King, which the Lord General excus'd as a Delay, and demanded a more positive Answer by the same Trumpet, who brought back Propositions; to every Article of which the General objected, and gave his Reasons for it in Writing, which not satisfying Prince Rupert, the Storm was made the 10th of September.

Parliamentary Party the only Friends to the Palatine Family.

The Storm.

The Signal was the Firing of Straw and Faggots on the Top of a Hill, and the Shooting off 4 great Guns against Pryor's Fort, from the Place where the General was to reside all the Time of the Storm, which began immediately upon the Signal, and was terrible to the Beholders. The Parliament Word was David before the Line was enter'd, and the Lord of Hosts afterwards. Colonel Montagu and Colonel Pickering, with their Regiments at Lawford's Gate enter'd speedily, and took 22 great Guns with many Prisoners. Major Desborough advanc'd with the Horse after them, having the Command of the General's Regiment and part of Colonel Graves's, Sir Hardress Waller, and Lieutenant Colonel Jackson enter'd with their Regiments between Lawford's Gate and the River Frome, Colonel Rainsborough's and Colonel Hammond's Regiments enter'd near Pryor's Fort, Major General Skippon's and Colonel Birch's enter'd nearer to the River Avon. The Regiment commanded by Colonel Pride was divided, part assign'd to the Service at Pryor's Fort, and part to alarm the Great Fort. These took a little Fort defended by Welch Men. The Seamen assisted in storming the Line and Works, which being broken down by Pioneers, Captain Ireton, Major Bethel, Adjutant General Fleming, of Whaley's, Rich's and Graves's Regiments of Horse, enter'd, and meeting with a Party of the Enemies defeated them. In this Action Colonel Taylor, Burgess for Windfor, but expell'd for Malignancy, was mortally wounded. This so dishearten'd their Horse, who perceiv'd also that Fairfax's Foot were Masters of the Line, that they never came on again to give one Charge, but retreated, and stood in a Body under Covert of the Great

Fort, and Coulston's Fort. In the mean while A. D. Pryor's Hill Fort held out obstinately two Hours after the Line was center'd, but then was taken by Storm, some of the Parliament's Soldiers creeping in at the Port Holes. Captain Lagoe, of Colonel Pride's Regiment, was the first who laid hold on the Colours, and the Parliamentarians were so enrag'd at the Obstinacy of the Cavaliers, that they put the Commander, Major Price, and most of the Officers and Soldiers to the Sword. All this was done between two o'Clock and five in the Morning. It was dark, and well it was so for the Parliament's Soldiers, who could not have stood upon any Ground, had it been light, to have attempted Pryor's Hill Fort, in regard the Great Fort, and Coulston's Fort on the one Side, and the Castle on the other, might have cut them off as they came, but being in the Dark they durst not shoot for fear of killing their own Men, the Cavalier Horse being drawn up during the Storm in a Body between Coulston's Fort and the Great Fort. The Forces on Somersetshire Side had not the like Success. The City Works were so High without Temple Gate and Raddcliffe Gate, that the Ladders could not reach them. The Horse design'd to enter the Line there, were Lieutenant Cromwel's Regiment, commanded by Major Huntington, Sir Robert Pyc's, and Colonel Sheffield's, who all three behav'd with great Intrepidity, but could not force their Way. And least the Prince should attempt to make his Escape, while Fairfax's Men were storming, Commissary General Ireton's, Colonel Rutler's, and Colonel Fleetwood's Regiments of Horse, were appointed to be in a moving Body on Durdam Down, the most open Passage for Horse to get off. Ireton, and the two other Regiments, alarm'd that Side of the Line, and Great Fort, towards Durdam Down and Clifton, as Colonel Okey's Dragoons did Brandon Hill Fort, and the Line towards Clifton.

About 9 o'Clock a Trumpet came from the Prince to desire a Parley, which there was Reason enough to refuse, but considering the Enemy had fir'd the City in several Places, at which Time Temple Street was burnt, and that the whole City was like to be consum'd, if the Fire had gone on, the General consented to a Treaty, and nominated Colonel Montagu, Colonel Rainsborough, and Colonel Pickering, to be his Commissioners to treat with the Prince's Commissioners, Colonel Mynn, Major General Tillyer, Sir William Vavasor a Papist, and they agreed upon Articles which were very honourable for a Garrison in that desperate Condition, who were allow'd to march out with Arms, Colours, Drums, Bag and Baggage, and they did so the next Day, the 11th of September, when the Prince march'd out of the Great Fort, and with him went 8 Lords, several Ladies and Persons of Quality. The General waited on his Highness about 2 Miles, and there was a great Appearance of the Country to see Prince Rupert and his Garrison marching off, many crying, Give him no Quarter, Give him no Quarter, for his Highness had much provok'd the People by the ill Discipline of his Men, and had carry'd on the War with great Rage and Inveteracy against the Parliament, who made such ample Provision for his Mother and elder Brother the Prince Elector, and were always so zealous to promote the Interests of his Princely Family. Whitlocke says, "The Cause of sitting down before Bristol was "to prevent the Plunder and Cruelties of Prince Rupert in that Country." Here were taken 140 Pieces of Cannon mounted, 100 Barrels of Powder, and Ammunition in Proportion. The Great

A. D. 1645.

A. D. 1645. Great Fort and Castle had Provisions for 150 Men for 350 Days; there was in Garrison, as Mr. Creswick the Mayor told General Cromwel, 2500 Foot, 1000 Horse, and about 1500 Train'd Bands and Auxiliaries, and there march'd out only 500 Horse and 1400 Foot, the rest being kill'd, or wounded, or taken, or run away. Fairfax lost but 160 Men in the Storm, among whom were Capt. Gayle of Pickering's Regiment, Lieutenant Colonel Dursley of Fortescue's, Major Cromwel and Capt. Ward of Ingoldsby's, Capt. Sterne of Rainsborough's, Major Bethel of Whaley's, Capt. Williams of Ireson's. Fairfax here and at Bridgewater recover'd all the Cannon which the Earl of Essex lost in Cornwall. Major General Skippon was appointed Governor of Bristol, Mr. Creswick the Mayor was displac'd, and John Gunning, Esq; who had been Sheriff A. D. 1651. put into his Office.

Thus in little more than two Months has the victorious General Sir Thomas Fairfax won two Battles, and taken the two strongest and most important Towns in the West of England, by Storm partly, and partly by Surrender. We must now leave him there, and see how his Majesty dispos'd of himself after the Rout at Naseby.

The Continuance of the War now is an Affront to the Character of the English Nation, whose Valour has always had a Mixture of Sobriety; but the Cavaliers are so many Quixots fighting with Windmills. There is not the least Likelihood of their saving themselves by Resistance, and yet they keep up one another's Spirits as if there was Heroism in their Despair.

*The King
after

The King being got into South Wales, was join'd by General Gerrard with 2000 Horse and Foot, and receiv'd great Encouragement from the Commissioners of the Welsh Counties, who attended him at Abergavenny. Several Gentlemen in those Parts were seiz'd for obstructing the Levies that were made for him, and without considering that the Parliament had a hundred to one to make Reprizals, some about the King were for hanging these Gentry, which his Majesty not consenting to, Echard tells us the Marquis of Worcester made this shrewd Answer; Well, Sir, that forgiving Temper may chance to gain you the Kingdom of Heaven, but if ever you gain the Kingdom of England by these Means I'll be your Bondsman. I do not believe one Word of it came out of the Marquis's Mouth. 'Tis so far from being shrewd, that it is extremely silly; for if, as his Lordship would have had him, the King had order'd the Marquis's Neighbours to be hang'd, and the Parliament had hang'd up half a hundred of their Enemies, how shrewdly would the old Marquis have advis'd his Majesty, who was about passing over to Bristol, and in order to it was come to Chepstow, where he was met by Prince Rupert; and tho' his Highness seem'd highly pleas'd with having the Court in the City of which he was Governor, yet other Measures were taken, an usual Effect of the Irresolution in unfortunate Counsels. The King returning to Cardiffe, heard of the Loss of Bridgewater, which, says the Lord Clarendon, he had been perswaded to believe was impregnable, and the Loss of it could not but make great Impressions upon him, to think he was betray'd. The Commissioners of all Counties earnestly desir'd Peace, and some Officers of the Army enter'd into Cabals with them to get Proposals to be sent to the Parliament. Prince Rupert was of the same Opinion, and wrote his Reasons for it to the Duke of Richmond, which the King answer'd in a Letter written with his own Hand at Cardiffe. The Lord Clarendon informs us, 'Twas

so lively an Expression of his Soul, that no Pen else could have written it: I shall therefore repeat a Passage or two, If I had any other Quarrel but the Defence of my Religion, Crown and Friends, you had full Reason for your Advice. It will not be deny'd that those Friends were the Delinquents, against whom the Parliament demanded Justice, and, as was declar'd after the Restoration, drew their Swords to bring them to it. All the Calamities which the Nation had incur'd in this King's Reign, were owing to their evil Counsels, yet the Letter says, God will not suffer his Cause to be overthrown. I know my Obligations not to abandon God's Cause, and do not despair that God may in due Time avenge his own Cause, for which his Majesty had bargain'd with the Irish Rebels to fight, as will be seen presently.

At Cardiffe the King heard that the Scots Army had laid Siege to Hereford, and the Earl of Clarendon is of Opinion no better Way could be thought of to relieve it, than by issuing Writs to the Welch Sheriffs to raise their Posse. I was very willing to follow his Lordship in his History of the King's Actions after Naseby Rout, but every one of them is so magnify'd, and will so little bear it, that it is turning them into Ridicule.

His Majesty pass'd over the Mountains of Brecknock and Radnor to Ludlow, thence thro' Shropshire and Derbyshire to Welbeck, intending to join Montrose, who had over-run Scotland, without having made himself enough Master of any Part of it to stand out against the Power that was coming against him. The King proceeded as far as Doncaster, where the Gentry so well preserv'd their Promises to him, that within three Days there was an Appearance of full 3000 Men without Arms; but they offer'd to get Arms within four and twenty Hours, if the King staid so long, which was so uncertain, that a few Hours after his Majesty made haste back to Newark, on News that David Lesley was come to Rotheram, with all the Scottish Horse, to enter Scotland and oppose Montrose, which he did effectually, routed his Band of Mountaineers and Irish REBELS, whom he cut off almost entirely, and oblig'd the Marquis to shelter himself behind the Grampian Hills. This was the Army which was to enter England, in Hopes of whose March the Treaty of Usbridge was broken off, and his Majesty got into Yorkshire.

The Lord Clarendon, in the Fulness of his Politicks, which are indeed incomparable, informs us, that IF the King with his beaten and baffled Troops, as he calls them himself, had, instead of retreating from Doncaster, fallen upon David Lesley and his 4000 Horse at Rotheram, he had found him in a very ill Posture to have made Resistance, and had absolutely preserv'd Montrose. His Majesty, says the Earl, prosecuted his Journey from Newark to Oxford, tho' not without making some Starts out of the Way, by which he had an Opportunity of heating up some Quarters of the Parliament Horse. As thus in Whitlocke: "In the King's March, the Scots Horse fell upon his Quarters at Bewdley, took 70 Horse, and several Officers. At Tilbury Sir John Gell fell upon his Rear, took Capt. Blake and 40 Prisoners." The Earl of Clarendon assures us, that David Lesley knew nothing of the King's being in Yorkshire; and Whitlocke, that Major General Pointz, Col. Rossiter, and the Country Forces, were order'd to join the Scots, after which Junction they got between the King and the North, so he retreated back to Newark. A Party of the Parliament's made

A. D. 1645. made a Start and fell upon his Rear, took the Lord Harris a Papist, 100 Horse, and several Prisoners. Whitlocke again: "From Newark the King march'd into Lincolnshire, where his Army committed many Outrages." The Earl of Clarendon's Starts. The next Day he lay at Belvoir, the next at Stamford, his March being very sudden, for he met with frequent Starts from the Parliament's Forces. "A Party from Burleigh and Leicester fell upon his Rear, took 80 Horse, four Standards, and many Prisoners. The Van of his Army being as far as Stilton by Huntington, were oppos'd by Capt. Gibbs and Capt. Poe, but they were overpower'd by Numbers, and the King's Forces enter'd the Town, which they miserably plunder'd," and made the like Starts in several Places of Cambridgeshire and Bedfordshire, upon an unarm'd defenceless People, and not upon the Parliament's Horse Quarters. At last understanding the Country was rising against them, his Majesty hasten'd to Woburn, where some of his Stragglers were taken, and from thence to Oxford, where he staid three Days only, and then, according to the Lord Clarendon, prosecuted his former Resolution, "at least to endeavour the Relief of Hereford; and as he was on his March thither, he receiv'd Intelligence that the Scottish Army, upon Notice of his Purpose, was that Morning risen in great Disorder and Confusion. This News was so welcome, and his Majesty was receiv'd with so full Joy into the City of Hereford, that he slip'd the Opportunity not of vanquishing, overcoming, or routing, but of discommoding the Scottish Army, if not ruining it." The Pleasantry of it is extremely delightful; for in Truth the Scots Army consisted of 16 or 17000 Men, and the King had with him not above 4000, most Horse and Dragoons. The Parliament order'd Major General Pointz and Col. Roffiter to attend his Motions, and if he went towards Hereford, to correspond with General Leven, and assist him. Accordingly Pointz and Roffiter follow'd the King, and the Common Council of the City of London resolv'd that every one of them should furnish a Horse and Arms to make up with other Forces a flying Army to attend the King, who, if we may believe the Lord Clarendon, was going even then to drive the Scots Army from before Hereford. There is no other such History in Being. The Truth is, the Scots were alarm'd at the Progress of Montrose, and tho' their Horse was gone to the Relief of their Brethren, they could not be easy so far Southward, while all was in Danger in the North; upon which Consideration only they quitted the Siege of Hereford, and march'd Northward; but in their March heard of the Marquis of Montrose's intire Defeat, and at the Desire of the Parliament lay down before Newark, the King making what haste he could towards Chester to relieve that City, besieg'd by Sir William Brereton. His Forces plunder'd and burnt Mr. Cartwright's House at Aynoe in Northamptonshire. But before he bent his March that Way, he endeavour'd again to get some Levies in Wales to relieve Bristol. He went a second Time to Ragland Castle in Monmouthshire, where he receiv'd the dreadful News of the Surrender of Bristol, which so discompos'd him, that he wrote the following Letter to Prince Rupert from Hereford.

"but is likewise the greatest Trial of my Constancy that hath yet befallen me. For what is to be done, after one that is so near to me both in Blood and Friendship, submits himself to so mean an Action? I give it the easiest Terms such ——— I have so much to say, that I will say no more of it, only lest Rashness of Judgment be laid to my Charge, I must remember you of your Letter of the 12th of August, whereby you assur'd me, that if no Mutiny happen'd you would keep Bristol for Four Months. Did you keep it four Days? Was there any thing like a Mutiny? More Questions might be ask'd, but now, I confess, to little Purpose. My Conclusion is, to desire you to seek your Subsistence, until it shall please God to determine of my Condition somewhere beyond Sea, to which End I send you herewith a Pass, and I pray God to make you sensible of your present Condition, and give you Means to redeem what you have lost; for I shall have no greater Joy in a Victory than a just Occasion, without blushing, to assure you of my being

Your loving Uncle, and

Most faithful Friend,

C. R.

Having lately read the Particulars of the Siege and Surrender of Bristol, one can't think the Prince's Conduct deserv'd so severe Animadversion. General Fairfax had master'd above a Mile of the Line and Works in the strongest Part of the City, the Miscarriage on the Side of Somersetshire was owing only to the Shortness of the Ladders, which would be lengthen'd in two or three Hours time. The City was a Fire, and the Prince had no Way to save that, himself and his Garrison, but the Way he then took. What Success the King had had in his Field Battles, was owing to Prince Rupert's Valour, and this Letter seems to be the Effect rather of Affliction than Reflection.

His Highness was convoy'd from Bristol to Oxford, and the King wrote a Letter to the Council there, to require him to deliver up all his Commissions; which it was surmis'd to him the Prince would not do tamely; and therefore Orders were sent to imprison Col. Leg, Governor of Oxford, and Favourite to his Highness, lest he should attempt any thing on his Account.

From Hereford the King went to Worcester, and made an Attempt to reach Oxford, but was hinder'd by Major General Pointz, who follow'd him close with about 3500 Horse and Dragoons; so he march'd to Ludlow, and thence towards Chester, which was besieg'd and distress'd by Sir William Brereton, Col. Jones, and the Cheeshire and Lancashire Forces. It was thought the King intended to pass from Chester into Ireland, and put himself at the Head of the Army that was to be transported thence into England. The Earl of Clarendon's Account of the King's March and Defeat, is as pleasant as his Lordship's other Relations of Events in this War. "The Enemy had surpriz'd both the Out-works and Suburbs of Chester, when the King came within half a Day's Journey of it; so that his unexpected coming look'd like a Designation of Providence for the Preservation of so important a Place. The Parliamentarians were no less amaz'd, looking upon themselves as lost, and the King's Troops believ'd them to be in their Power." Every Word of which is as true as that the King saw the ensuing Fight from the

Nephew,
His Letter to Prince Rupert. "THO' the Loss of Bristol be a great Blow to me, yet your surrendering it as you did is of so much Affliction to me, that it makes me not only forget the Consideration of that Place,

A. D. 1645. Echard. Rowton Heath Battle. the Walls of Chester, when he was not in the Town, but in the Battle on Rowton Heath, two Miles off. The placing his Majesty upon Chester Walls, is to lessen the Disgrace of the Defeat as much as possible, in a Supposition that Sir Marmaduke Langdale had not been so beaten as he was by Major General Pointz, if his Majesty had been in the Battle: A very poor Way of Writing! If his Troops are beaten, he is beaten, and there's no Need of concealing his being in the Action, which is not a whit the better or the worse for it. The Fact is thus: Sir William Brereton, with the above-mention'd Forces, had lain before Chester some Time, when Col. Jones, who commanded the Horse, and Adjutant General Lothian, who commanded the Foot, drawing off from before it in the Evening, the Besieg'd thought they were gone, and took the less Care of their Works, but early the next Morning Jones and Lothian return'd and storm'd the Suburbs and Out-works before they were discover'd, which the King hearing, hasten'd his March to relieve the Place, and with about 5000 Horse and Foot got thro' Wales to the Neighbourhood of Chester. Pointz, whose Duty was to observe him, having Intelligence of his March, took a shorter Way, and came to Rowton Heath, 2 Miles from Chester; he could reach no farther. He also had given Col. Jones Notice of his Approach, desiring him to charge that Body in the Rear while he attack'd them in Front. But the King's Troops engag'd Pointz, Sept. 26. before Jones could come up, and worsted him. However he rally'd and made good his Ground till Jones's Forces join'd him, and then, together with Lothian and Jones, renew'd the Fight, utterly routing the King's whole Body, of which about 300 fled into Chester, and the King with them. But the Pursuit was so violent, that he immediately left the Town, and fled into Wales. The rest of his Party were kill'd, taken, and dispers'd. Among the Slain was the Lord Barnard Stewart, Earl of Litchfield, a faultless young Man, says the Earl of Clarendon; Lieutenant Colonel Middleton, Lieutenant Colonel Constable, Capt. Abraham Lance, Capt. Robert Lance, all Papists; and during the Siege were kill'd Lieutenant Colonel Philip Howard, Mr. Roger Wood, Mr. Edward Davis, Mr. Errington, all Papists, on the King's Side, as also two Knights, one Colonel, and above 400 Officers and Soldiers, Sir Philip Musgrave, and ten Colonels, most of them Knights, seven Lieutenant Colonels, five Majors, forty other Officers, 1000 Common Soldiers, and 100 Horse were taken. The Country People took 60 Prisoners after the Rout, with Store of Arms, which the Cavaliers had flung away in their Flight, and the Parliamentarians had good Pillage. The invincible Obstinacy, or rather the miserable Infatuation of these Men! There is scarce a Horseman left of the whole Body that had attended the King since the Battle of Naseby; Montrose was suppress'd in Scotland, the King's Troops in the West were flying before General Fairfax. South Wales was in a manner reduc'd, Pointz following the King into North Wales. Yet rather than Delinquents shall be punish'd, or Episcopacy abolish'd, does the King not only fly from the War, but from Peace, which might now easily be had on those Terms, and there remain'd no Hope for him ever to have better, unless he had plac'd his Hope in Assistance from Irish REBELS. In this desperate Condition the Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Echard are eternally holding Councils of War for the wise Counsellors to shew their Parts; but they came to Resolutions only to abandon them; and yet these two Historians in-large upon them, as if they had been all crown'd with Victory. A. D. 1645.

The first Action which succeeded those Councils, was the sending the Lord Digby and Sir Marmaduke Langdale Northward to join Montrose, if they could. The Earl of Clarendon's History of this Event is as risible as Affectation and Insincerity can make it. "The Lord Digby was inform'd at Doncaster, that there was 1000 Foot newly rais'd for the Parliament a little out of the Way, which he resolv'd to fall upon, and did it so well, that they all threw down their Arms." Whitlocke; "He surpriz'd 400 of the Parliament's Party at Shirburn, and shatter'd Col. Wren's Regiment of Horse." Clarendon again: "While the Lord Digby staid at Shirburn, he had Notice of the Advance of some Troops of Horse under the Command of Col. Copley. Digby presently sounded to Horse, and having gotten some few Troops ready, march'd with them out of the Town, and finding Copley standing upon a convenient Ground, he would not stay for his other Companies, but immediately charg'd them with that Courage, that he routed most of their Body, which after a short Resistance fled, and were pursu'd thro' Shirburn, where his other Troops were refreshing themselves, and discerning the Flight of Copley's Horse, concluded in great Consternation, that their own Fellows were flying, and so with equal Confusion they mounted their Horses, and fled as fast as the others. IF it had not been for the flying of these Troops, because the Enemy fled, the Lord Digby had without doubt been Master of the North." Is not this excellent above all Story? The Roundheads and Cavaliers are running away very lovingly together. Again: "By this Means one Troop only that remain'd in the Field unbroken fell upon the Lord Digby, and those Officers and Gentlemen who stay'd with him, for it seems the Parliament Troops ran away, tho' no Body ran after them, and they were compell'd to retreat to Skipton, which they did with the Loss of Sir Richard Hutton, a gallant and worthy Gentleman;" as they are all to a Man, excepting two or three who had disoblig'd his Lordship. "The Lord Digby's Baggage and Cabinet were taken, which being publish'd by the Parliament, administer'd so much Occasion of Discourse." The Occasion administer'd, was by the Discovery of a horrid Correspondence with the bloody Massacres in Ireland, and a Design to bring them over to destroy the Protestants in England, as they had done there; which I speak the more boldly, for that I shall prove it upon them, when I have given the true History of the Rout of Digby, that the Reader may laugh as well as I when he compares it with that of the Lord Clarendon.

"Col. Copley engag'd the Lord Digby's whole Whitl. 21 Body, not a Part of them, about Milford, 162, routed and pursu'd them three Miles, slew Col. Carnaby, Sir Richard Hutton, several Officers, and 40 others, took Prisoners four Colonels, many inferior Officers, Gentlemen and Reformades, about 400 Troopers, and the Countess of Niddesdale, who was under the Lord Digby's Convoy. That Lord's Coach, the King's Chirurgion, and divers Letters and Papers were taken, among which was a Letter to a Member of Parliament, who was expell'd for it." Ludlow adds, that Copley recover'd the Men and Arms which the Lord Digby had taken. One cannot part with the Earl of Clarendon yet, for what follows is not one of the least Falsities

A. D. 1645. in the History of the Rebellion. "Most of Digby's scatter'd Troops came together again at Skipton, with which he march'd without any other Misadventures through Cumberland and Westmoreland, as far as Dumfries in Scotland." One cannot read it without Hands and Eyes uplifted. For Ludlow informs us, that Party was defeated a second Time by Sir John Browne, and a third by Colonel Bright; yet according to the Lord Clarendon, they met with no other Misadventures; "but being arriv'd in Scotland, and neither receiving Directions which Way to march, nor where Montrose was, and less Knowledge how to retire without falling into the Hands of the Scottish Army on the Borders, in the highest Despair, the Lord Digby, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, the Earls of Carnwarth and Niddesdale, and most of the other Officers embark'd themselves for the Isle of Man, and shortly after for Ireland," which is so far from Truth, that he met with the following Misadventures, Disgraces and Routs, as we read in Whitlocke; "The Lord Digby and Langdale, with 800 Horse advancing towards Scotland to join Montrose, were fallen upon at Carlisle Sands by a Party of the Scots Forces under Sir John Browne, who though less in Number, after a sharp Dispute routed Digby's Party, kill'd 100, took 200 Horses, several of their Officers, 3 Colours, many Prisoners, and dispers'd the whole Party, Digby and Langdale flying into the Isle of Man." The Reader will observe how the Earl of Clarendon turns and winds himself in this Historical Adventure, and how it is after his Manner envelop'd in Words to conceal the Truth. Warwick, who tells his Tale as wretchedly as ever any Body told one, comes off much better in his than the Lord Clarendon.

Lord Digby routed near Scotland.

P. 290. Digby's Design evaporated; he is beaten in his Entrance into Yorkshire, before he got into Carlisle defeated, and so forc'd to ship himself for Ireland, instead of Scotland. This Scrap of the History of the Rebellion is so very extraordinary and Clarendine, that I recommend it to the Reader as a choice Example of the Author's sincere and fine Way of Writing.

Now let us see what Sort of Letters there were taken in the Lord Digby's Coach: The Contents were, That the King, notwithstanding that tremendous Appeal to Heaven before the Sacrament at Christ-Church, Oxon, against Popery and Papists, and the pledging his Salvation upon it, offer'd the Irish Papists a Toleration of their Religion, the Choice of their Governor, to have Forts and Castles, &c. on Condition they sent 10000 of those Massacrers into England, whom he himself call'd Butchers, to assist him against his Enemies, meaning the Parliament of England. There was also a Commission to the Earl of Glamorgan, a Papist, empowering him to treat and conclude an Agreement with the Irish REBELS. The Popish Archbishop of Tuam being slain at the Battle of Sligo, in Ireland, Whitlocke informs us there were Letters taken about him, discovering the Transactions between the KING and the REBELS, whom his Majesty tenderly styles the Confederates; but the Lords and Commons of England are every where term'd in the Full of the Mouth, REBELS. Whitlocke adds, Those Letters discover'd large Offers to the Massacrers, as a Toleration of their Religion, &c. as is above-mention'd. Not long after the People of Padstow in Cornwall, siezing a Ship coming from Ireland, the Master of which threw a Packet over Board, it was recover'd, and in it was found a Letter from the Earl of Glamorgan, importing that 6000 Irish REBELS were ready to embark for the Assistance of the King's Party, and 4000 more should follow in a little Time, which is farther confirm'd by this Letter of the Earl of Glamorgan's to the King, I am now at Waterford providing Shipping, immediately to transport 6000 Foot, and 4000 more are by May next to follow: This was after the Earl of Glamorgan had been charg'd with High Treason by the Lord Digby, and committed for treating with the Massacrers, which Commitment was all Grimace. The Noise that wicked Treaty had made even among the Royalists, of whom the more reasonable complain'd against it, occasion'd the pretended Disgrace of the Earl of Glamorgan, who wrote to his Lady not to entertain any Fears concerning him, for that he doubted not he should be able to justify his Proceedings to the Confusion of those who had caused his Imprisonment, which he could well do by the before-mention'd Commission, and he was employ'd in the same impious Service after his Enlargement, as appears by his Letter in Sander-son, address'd to his Majesty, yet upon the Parliament's discovering and declaring warmly against this clandestine, felonious Treaty, the King reply'd thus, His Majesty doth protest, that till such Time as he had Advertisement that the Person of the said Earl of Glamorgan was arrested, he never heard nor had any kind of Notice that the said Earl had enter'd into any Capitulation with the Irish. I never met with any colourable Pretence for this nefarious Confederacy with the Irish Massacrers. The best is in Echard, because taken from the best Writer and the honestest Man on that Side, one Doctor Nalson, who in a Nook of the Paper Office, found a Letter written to the Popish Lords and Gentlemen by the Lord Digby, wherein 'tis said the King will joyn with the Roundheads and Scots Presbyterians rather than do the least Act that may hazard the Protestant Religion. The Archdeacon's Judgment was not of Extent enough to let such an idle Paper from such an idle Author escape him; for it is very well known, as Whitlocke says, that this very Lord Digby, the Popish Earl of Glamorgan, and the Marquiss of Ormond, concluded the Peace with the Irish Butchers, which put the Provinces of Munster and Ulster in that Kingdom, under the Government of the Popish supreme Council. Glamorgan's prior Treaty had so incens'd the Parliament, "That they refus'd either to treat with the King, or admit him to come to London, or this Business to end here, but render'd all the King's subsequent Treaties with the Parliament suspected, and the End of attaining the King's Propositions more difficult: And here, continues Coke, you may see how this King would prostitute his Honour and Christianity, contrary to what he so often profess'd not only to the Parliament but to his own Party."

The King remaining at Newark after the Departure of Digby and Langdale, there happen'd some Differences in the Garrison, which render'd his Condition still worse, as it made him more uneasy, for there was no Manner of Prospect that it would mend. Hither came Prince Rupert with his Brother Prince Maurice, and was seemingly reconcil'd to the King about the Surrender of Bristol; but his Majesty having made the Lord Bellasis Governor of Newark, instead of Sir Richard Willis, who was appointed Captain of his Guards, about the 20th of October, the two Princes and the Lord Gerrard espous'd Willis's Quarrel; and Bellasis had the Party of the Lord Digby. Prince Rupert told the King plainly, Willis was remov'd because he

D.* 1645. was his Friend; and Gerrard added, It was a Plot of the Lord Digby, who was a Traytor, and he would prove him so. This Language so surpriz'd the King that he commanded them from his Presence, and to come no more into it: Upon which the Prince, the Lord Gerrard, Sir Richard Willis, and above 200 Officers, the Meanest a Captain, desir'd Passes to go beyond Sea, and retir'd from Newark to Wyverton, whence they sent to Col. Roffiter for Parliament Passes, engaging their Honours never to return to take up Arms against them; accordingly Passes were granted to the Princes and others. The King soon after by hasty Night Marches, got from Newark to Oxford in the Beginning of November, where we must leave him to follow General Fairfax farther into the West.

The Prince of Wales was Generalissimo of all the King's Forces in those Parts, which were commanded under him by the Lord Hopton, Sir Richard Greenville, the Lord Goring and Sir John Digby in several Bodies; but before the Parliament's Forces went in Pursuit of them, 'twas thought convenient to clear the Trading Counties and the Roads towards London, of Cavalier Garrisons, which were reduc'd rather to Nests of Banditti than Retreats for Soldiers. Ludlow tells us, "Many of the King's Party" hover'd about the Hampshire and Wiltshire "Downs, to rob Travellers, and thence were call'd Colonel Down's Men."

Sir Charles Lloyd, Governor of the Devizes surrender'd it after a few Shot, on Condition of marching out, Officers and Gentlemen with Arms, and the Soldiers without Arms. The next Day, September the 24th, Colonel Bosville yielded Lacock on Summons, himself, Officers and Soldiers to have their Arms and Baggage. Colonel Rainsborough summon'd Sir Charles Lucas, Governor of Berkley, who answer'd, He would eat Horse Flesh before he would yield, and Man's Flesh when that was done; but they were not such Cannibals as they made themselves. We must remember that these heroical Persons had not the least Hope of Relief, and that the Overflowings of their Courage are of no more Use to them than the Overflowings of their Bile, and indeed past off generally in Vapour. For no sooner had Rainsborough master'd the Out-works by Storm, and put 40 to the Sword, than Lucas was glad to found a Parley, and accept of such Conditions as Rainsborough would give him and his Garrison, about 500 Men.

Lieutenant General Cromwel, while General Fairfax was marching Westward, dispers'd the Hampshire Club Men, and coming before Winchester, forc'd the Gate, enter'd the Town and began to batter the Castle, the Lord Ogle the Governor having rejected his Summons. He then planted more Guns against it and made a Breach; upon which the Lord Ogle beat a Parly, which was agreed to, and Colonel Hammond and Major Harrison for Cromwel, concluded Articles with the Governor, who surrender'd the Castle the 14th of October. It had a Garrison of 500 Men, and was well provided with all Sorts of Stores. There were in the Place Sir John Pawlet, Sir William Courtney, Sir Edward Ford, and Colonel Bennet. Against the two latter Cromwel made great Exceptions, they having not kept to their Engagements with the Parliament, but rather than stay longer before it he at last consented to let them go with the rest

Basing, a Place of Importance, it having been a great Annoyance to the Trade, both of London and the Country. As soon as Lieutenant General Cromwel had planted his Batteries and settled the several Posts for the Storm, his Men fell on with their wonted Resolution, and took Basing House and the Grange with little or no Loss. Colonel Pickering storm'd the New House, past through it, and got to the Gate of the Old House; the Marquis of Winchester, a Papist, Lord of it, founded a Parley, which the Parliament Soldiers would not hear of. In the mean while Colonel Montagu and Sir Hardress Waller's Regiments master'd the strongest Work, and beat the Enemy from a whole Culverin. They there drew their Ladders after them, and got over another Work and the House Wall before they could enter. In this Attack Sir Hardress Waller was wounded, but the Parliament Forces suffer'd not much: They put many of the King's Forces to the Sword, and some Officers of Quality: One Major Castle a notorious Papist, was kill'd by Major Harrison, for this Garrison had been a Harbour for Papists, and no doubt they far'd the worse for it. Major Casaud, Captain Wyburn, Captain Rigby, Popish Officers, were slain, as also these Popish Volunteers, Mr. Savine, Mr. Bowles, Mr. Stoner. One Robinson, a noted Player in those Days, and a fit Champion for such a Cause, was kill'd here; about 300 Prisoners were taken, and the Soldiers got rich Booty, the Stores of all Kinds being prodigious; the Furniture so costly that one Bed only was valu'd at 1300 Pounds. The old Marquis talking with Hugh Peters after the Place was taken, as to the Justice of the Quarrel, said, If the King had no more Ground in England but Basing House, which was called Loyalty, he would adventure as he did and maintain it to the uttermost. The Son of this zealous Papist became a zealous Protestant, and all the Reward he had for the Sufferings, Losses, and Merit of his Father, was his being spar'd when the Lord Russel was murder'd in King Charles the Second's Reign, the Court having as good Proof against the one as the other. The Marquis, Sir Robert Peake and other Prisoners of Quality were sent up to the Parliament.

After this new Advantage the Lieutenant General follow'd General Fairfax into the West, and in his March took Langford House in Wiltshire, which Sir Bartholomew Pell surrender'd at Summons, October the 18th. And by the reducing of this Place the Roads were so clear'd from London to Exeter, that a single Man might have travell'd there, without any Fear of an Enemy.

General Fairfax about the same Time took Gen. Fairfax Tiverton, and gave Quarter to Sir Gilbert Talbot the Governor, and the Garrison, though his Men enter'd the Place Sword in Hand, and carry'd it by Assault; in it was found much Plunder, and about 300 Men were made Prisoners: among them was one Major Sadler, who having deserted the Parliament had privately made Overtures to General Fairfax to serve him for a Pardon, but they being rejected he was try'd by a Council of War, and condemn'd to die. He broke Prison and escap'd to Exeter, not yet reduc'd, where the Royalists having had Information of the Offers he had made General Fairfax, try'd him by their Council of War, condemn'd and shot him.

While the General was on his March in Devonshire, he receiv'd Advice that all South Wales had declar'd for the Parliament, after Colonel Milton had oblig'd Colonel Fitz Morris to deliver up Chepstow Town and Castle and made him-

A. D. himself Master of Monmouth, Sir Trever Williams and Colonel Morgan rais'd 1500 Men for the Parliament in Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire. Pembrokehire and Carmarthenshire had before been intirely reduc'd by Major General Langborne. The Marquis of Worcester had a long while influenc'd and govern'd that Country. The King was twice there in Person in Expectation of raising very great Reinforcements for his Armies; but Resource is now cut off, and Hereford being surpriz'd by Col. Birch and Col. Morgan, the Cavaliers have no Place to retreat to on that Side of England but Ragland Castle, which will follow the Fate of their other Garrisons. In Hereford were taken according to Ludlow; 40 Lords, Knights and Gentlemen of Worth; most of them Papists. If it was the Cause of God and the true Protestant Religion for which the King fought, as he always declares, how comes it, that when any of his People are taken Prisoners, there are such Numbers of Papists amongst them? Colonel Birch's Stratagem to surprize Hereford is a very pleasant one. He hir'd 6 Men, and disguis'd them like Labourers, putting Lieutenant Bernard as a Constable over them with a Warrant to bring those Men to work in the City. They lodg'd in the Night within 3 Quarters Musket Shot of the Place, and 150 Firelocks near them; himself with the Foot, and Col. Morgan with the Horse coming up after them to cut off all Intelligence from the Town, by which Means they were never discover'd. The first Night they came too short, but the next, with careful Spies and Scouts they carry'd on the Business, and in the Morning, upon letting down the Drawbridge, the Constable and the 6 Country-men went with their Pickaxes and Spades to the Bridge. The Guard beginning to examine them, they kill'd three and kept the rest in play till the Firelocks came up, who made it good till Colonel Birch and Colonel Morgan came with the whole Body, and soon master'd the City, December the 18th.

We shall not take further Notice of Sir Thomas Fairfax's Progress in the West this Year, intending to begin the History of the next Years Military Transactions with it, and shall close this with a short Account of some Re-encounters in other Parts of the Kingdom.

Colonel Moor Governor of Gaunt House, with 200 Horse, fell upon 500 of the King's, 5 Miles from Oxford, routed them, and pursu'd them to that City, taking Mr. Sackville, the Earl of Dorset's Son, one of the King's Pages, Prince Rupert's Chaplain, and several others, Prisoners; about the same Time Colonel Paine march'd with a Party from Abingdon to Farringdon, with an Intent to surprize the Garrison; but though he fail'd in that, he took 100 Horse, 4 Captains, other Officers, and 36 Prisoners, with the Loss but of one Man. Thus while the Royal Garrison of Oxford was shut up within the Walls, the King's Forces in the Neighbourhood suffer'd much by the Vigilance and Valour of the Parliamentarians.

After the King's Defeat at Rounton Heath, Colonel Jones renew'd the Siege of Chester, which was valiantly defended, and the Besieg'd made several bold though not successful Sallies. They lay near Ireland, and no doubt were in daily Expectations of the 10000 Irish Men. Sir William Byron, the Lord Byron's Brother, got together 400 Horse about Holt Castle, of which Colonel Jones having Notice, he drew off a Party of Horse from the Siege, attack'd him and routed him, took Sir William and other Persons of Quality Prisoners, slew 40, and brought away as many Horse. Sir William Vaughan with 1700 Foot, and 700 Horse was marching towards Chester to throw Succours into it, of which Colonel Jones having Notice, 1400 Horse and 1000 Foot were detach'd from the Siege to encounter them, under the Command of Colonel Mitton, who came up with them near Denbigh, defeated them, kill'd 100 of them, took 500 Horse, 400 Foot, and so dispers'd them, that not above 100 were left together. Another Parliament Party took Shelsford Manor, almost in Sight of Newark. It had been resolutely defended by 200 Men, of whom the greatest Part after Summons and Quarter refus'd, were put to the Sword. The Governor, the Earl of Chester's Son was wounded and taken Prisoner. Mr. Cary and Mr. Gennings, two Popish Volunteers were kill'd, as was also Captain Clifton, another Papist. Wyverton House near Newark, followed the Example of Shelsford. Latham House, defended two Years by the dauntless Countess of Derby, of the Blood of Tremouille in France, yielded upon Articles, and in it were found 12 Cannon, Store of Arms and Ammunition, rich Prize and Pillage.

Thus the Parliament's Forces clear'd the Way every where, and it is not in human Wisdom to imagine what could reasonably give Hope to the Cavaliers, and support them in an Opposition that was as vain as it was desperate.

We must leave Newark, besieg'd or rather blockaded by the Scots and General Pointz, Chester by Sir William Brereton and Colonel Jones, General Fairfax in Cornwall, and take a View of what pass'd at Oxford and Westminster.

The King being got safe from Newark into Oxford was at Leisure to consider the Perils which surrounded him, and the hopeless Way of Deliverance by Arms, which Considerations naturally produc'd Thoughts of Peace, but no just Thoughts of accomplishing it. For the wise Counsellors began with advising his Majesty to send a Message to the Parliament, almost glutted with Victory, which as the Earl of Clarendon says, should contain nothing but a Resentment, that his former Messages had not been answer'd. Was there ever such Wisdom before in the World? If they had Reasons for not answering the Messages before they were Conquerors, they must of Course have more Reasons not to do it after. The Lord Clarendon's political Reflections on this Occasion, being not founded upon Fact, must be left to the Fate of all such Reflections, and the Reader will not expect any Remark should be made upon them: It would too much swell the Bulk of this History, and too much interrupt the Course of it. But when ever any Attempt shall be made to justify them, I am well enough provided to prove it will be in vain.

Before the King's Message of Resentment was receiv'd, the Parliament had appointed a grand Committee to sit about Propositions of Peace, and instead of a Treaty were resolv'd to reduce the Terms of it to Acts, which were to be presented to his Majesty. Yet the Earl of Clarendon not taking the least Notice of this Resolution, declaims with a very great Superfluity of Words, on the Perverseness of the two Houses in refusing to treat in the King's Way. The grand Committee had sat several Times, and debated the Propositions, which were in some Forwardness to be made Acts, when the King sent a second Message to them for a safe Conduct for the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Southampton, Mr. John Ashburnham, and Mr. Jeffery Palmer, to bring his Proposals to London; to which Answer was return'd, That they were themselves in Consideration.

A. D. 1645. ation of Propositions to be sent by way of Bills to his Majesty, And the Commissioners for Scotland agreed to it. They were so much in earnest for this Peace, that they provided for themselves and their Friends in the Articles of it, having voted,

Members to be promoted. That their General, Sir Thomas Fairfax, be made a Baron, and have 5000 l. a Year settled upon him.

The Lord Fairfax, his Father, to be made an Earl.

The Lieutenant General Cromwel to be made a Baron, and to have 2500 Pounds a Year.

The Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Essex, the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Pembroke, to be made Dukes.

The Earl of Salisbury, and Earl of Manchester, to be made Marquisses.

The Lord Roberts, the Lord Say, the Lord Willoughby of Parham, the Lord Wharton, the Lord Howard, to be made Earls.

Denzill Hollis, Esq; to be made a Viscount.

Sir William Waller to be made a Baron, and to have 2500 l. per Ann.

Sir Arthur Haslerigg to be made a Baron, and to have 2000 l. per Ann.

Sir Henry Vane, sen. to be a Baron.

Sir Philip Stapleton to be a Baron, and to have 2000 l. per Ann.

Sir William Brereton, to have 1500 l. per Ann.

Major General Skippon to have 1000 Pounds per Ann.

In the mean while the King met his mongrel Parliament at Oxford again, and as an Effect of more Wisdom, they were permitted to vote, That the Commissioners of the Great Seal, the Judges and the Pleaders at Westminster, are guilty of High Treason, and the Seal to be void. A rare Way this to promote Peace. They also voted, That the Directory which the Parliament had establish'd by Law should not be us'd in Divine Service, but the Common Prayer to be still us'd as by Law establish'd. The Parliament of England look'd on them, and treated them as a Non-Entity. But they look'd upon themselves, and the King look'd upon them, and treated them as so many Some-bodies. The two Houses resolv'd, The King's Answer should be desir'd to their Acts without any Treaty, which the Scots Commissioners seem'd to desire. And that Motion of theirs to treat, with their refusing to besiege Newark, when they were first requested to do it, and to deliver up the Places they were possess'd of in England with that Readiness which was expected, created ill Blood between the two States, and there was not then Temper enough in either of them to provide against it in Time.

Divisions in Parliament. Now also began to appear some Clouds of Difference arising in the Parliament House, the only Cloud that threaten'd them, for the Opposition they might expect from the Royalists was rather despicable than dangerous. And all Parties thought of making their Market by their Merit in the late Successes.

The Presbyterians. The Presbyterians were the Majority in the Parliament, City, and Assembly of Divines, but the Independents had undermin'd them in the Army, where their Head, Oliver Cromwel, did what he pleas'd, though Sir Thomas Fairfax had the Name and Show of General. The Cavaliers were a baffled, beaten Party, and without the Divisions and Sub-divisions which fell out in Parliament and Army, they had never been heard of more. Nor is it in any one Instance owing to their Policy and Management that they ever lifted up their Heads again, but wholly to the Interests, Jealousies, and Resentments of the chief A. D. Men, both in the Parliament and Army, both 1645. grown too secure and too wanton by Success.

There were but few Independent, and no Baptist Ministers in the Assembly of Divines, but those Independents who were there acted with a Spirit and Constancy which were troublesome to the Presbyterians, who procur'd a Petition from the Common Council of London, That more Power might be given to Ministers and Elders than was establish'd by Parliament. This Petition was follow'd by another from the London Ministers, who were answer'd, That they should go home and look to the Charges of their several Congregations. Alderman Gibbs presented a like Petition from the City to the House of Lords, with a long Speech, and their Lordships promis'd to take it into Consideration, being very much Presbyterian in Principle.

The Independents had kept themselves pretty much to themselves till the War broke out, and Divines. they and the Baptists were reckon'd no more The Inde- Sectaries than the Presbyterians by Church-pendents. men. But when the Assembly of Divines met there were among them 6 or 7 of the most eminent Independent Ministers who join'd with the Presbyterians till they had drawn up the Confession of Faith, the larger and smaller Catechism, but when they came to Church Government, they engag'd the Presbyterians in long Debates, and kept the Matter as long as they could undetermin'd and unexecuted in almost all Parts of the Kingdom, except London and Lancashire, which gave their Party Time to strengthen themselves in the Army and Parliament, and at last hinder its Execution. The Chief of these Independent Ministers were, Mr. Jeremiah Burroughs, Mr. Sydrack Symphon, Mr. Philip Nye, Mr. Thomas Goodwin, Mr. William Bridge. Not illiterate, ignorant Enthusiasts, as the Lord Clarendon and Mr. Echard represent them, but as Mr. Baxter, their known Opponent, does it Cal.p.112 impartially, learned, discreet, and pious, capable of being very serviceable to the Church, Searchers into Scripture and Antiquity. He adds, Some Episcopal Men, of whom Archbishop Usher acknowledged to him he was one, held that every Bishop was Independent as to Synods, and Synods were not so much for Government as for Concord. This Party distinguish'd themselves by a Zeal for a Thorough Reformation in Church and State, and were for the most part Republicans. Those of the Parliament who were for so effectually securing their Spiritual and Temporal Liberties, that it should not be in the Power of a single Person to invade them hereafter, lik'd very well to see the Independents so zealous, and gave them Encouragement. Cromwel, who probably began to think what Game he should play for himself after the Battle of Naseby, courted and caress'd them as much as was consistent with keeping Terms with the Presbyterians.

The Baptists were Independents in every The Bap- Thing but Infant Baptism, the denying of which, tists. good Church-men do generally believe, being generally so taught, to be as great a Heresy as those of the Ophites and Paternians, if they know what those Heresies were, and considering their Cause is so very good, it is great Pity there is no more to be said for it out of History or Argument. Baxter, who wrote for Infant Baptism with more Success than any of those Men, writes thus of the Baptists, "He found many of Cal.p.113. "them sober, godly People, not differing but "in Point of Infant Baptism, and as to that, "consulting Antiquity, he observ'd, That tho' "Infant Baptism was held lawful by the "Church,

A. D. 1645. " Church, yet some with Tertullian and Nazianzen thought it most convenient to make no haste, and the rest left the Time of Baptism to every ones liberty, and forc'd none to be baptiz'd, so that not only Constantine the Great, Theodosius, and such as were converted at Years of Discretion, but Augustine also, and many Children of Christian Parents had their Baptism long deferr'd, to some it was administer'd in Infancy, to some at ripe Age, and some a little before their Death, as was the Case of the Emperor Constantine," in whose Reign there were more Christians baptiz'd than had probably been in an hundred Years before. Mr. Baxter and Dr. Calamy, both eminent Assertors of Infant Baptism, add, All the Penalty of Delay of Baptism was the being still number'd among the Catechumens or Expectants: Mr. Echard is a Church History Writer, and an Archdeacon, and yet he does not shew that he knows one Word of these Matters, upon which many thousand Words more may be said was it needful, or more nearly related to the History of England, only I cannot help observing, that there is hardly one rural Vicar or Curate in twenty who has the least Conception that such a Catechumen is in a State of Salvation, so literate, so rational, and so charitable are they.

The Army.

The Baptists and Independents agreeing exactly in Ecclesiastical and Civil Polity, made them united a formidable Party, which alarm'd the Presbyterians, who by endeavouring to nip them in the Bud in a Time of so much Distraction, irritated those who were only offended before, and induc'd them to put themselves under the Protection of the Army, who found the Presbyterians in too much haste as they thought for Peace, and willing to accept of it, if the King would accept of them and their Directory, without considering much the Merit of the Army, and the Interest of the other Denominations, which the Soldiery were resolv'd should be consider'd before they put their Swords into the Scabbards, Satisfaction and Security after so bloody and expensive a War grew popular Terms, and all those who made use of them went under the Notion of the Independent Party, though there were many Presbyterians, some Church-men; and if one could believe Mr. Archdeacon, some Papists, as Sir John D'avers, one of the King's Judges, among them: Lieutenant General Cromwell, Lieutenant General Ludlow, John Lisle, Esq; Sir Henry Vane, jun. Henry Martin, Esq; Sir Arthur Haslerigg, Sir Henry Mildmay, Lord Grey of Groby, Lord Monson, Anthony Stapely, Esq; Miles Corbert, Esq; &c. were at the Head of this Party in the House of Commons; and at the Head of the Presbyterians were Denzil Hollis, Esq; Sir Philip Stapleton, John Glyn, Esq; Sergeant Maynard, Sir William Waller, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, Sir William Lewis, Colonel Long, Colonel Harley, Colonel Massey, Colonel Copley.

Heads of the Independents.

Heads of the Presbyterians.

Neutral Party.

There was another Party in the House of Commons who declar'd for neither Side, as Mr. Pierpoint, Bulstrode Whitlock, Esq; Oliver St. John, Esq; John Crew, Esq; Sir Thomas Widdrington, Colonel Birch, Mr. Goodwyn, Sir John Hippeley, &c. who sometimes voted with the Presbyterians, and sometimes with the Independents, as they thought conduc'd most to the Service of the State, and generally they went with those who were for Satisfaction and Security, till it was known that Oliver and his Party meant the Death of the King by it, in which they were left by all those who meant the Reformation, and not the Destruction of the Government at the Beginning of the Rupture. 1645.

As to the Sects, Antinomians, Familists, Seekers, Ranters, Adamites, &c. every one knows they were the Mushrooms which sprung up in the Fields of Blood during the Civil War; and when muster'd together, hardly made up the Number of Parson Mason's Followers in Buckinghamshire, about six or seven and thirty Years ago, with whom the Church of England may be as well charg'd as the Presbyterians and Independents, with the Sectaries against whom they were always preaching and labouring as much as confuted with the Confusion of the Times.

Mr. Baxter informs us, that the Parliament's Divisions Friends saw betimes what would be the fatal Consequence of the before-mention'd Divisions and Sub-divisions, and that their Enemies had not a Twig to catch at to save them from sinking to the Bottom for ever but what grew out of them. They had nothing left to employ their Valour about, and their Wifdoms had been baffled as much as their Armies had been beaten; but they could with Safety, if not with Success, foment those Divisions, and flatter'd themselves that when by courting sometimes one Party, and sometimes another, a Breach was made, they might enter at it; tho' all other Entrance was deny'd them. Success is as apt to perplex Counsels as Distress. The Conquerors quarrel as often about dividing the Prize, as the Conquer'd about keeping of it. There had been 1000 Light Houses set up in History to direct Nations and States how to avoid the Rocks and Sands of Discord. Baxter foresaw, and it needed not good Eyes, what would be the Effects of the Animosities between the Presbyterians and the other Denominations whom he warn'd, That a House divided against itself cannot stand; That the Course they took would bring them to Shame, and turn a hopeful Reformation into Scorn, and make the Land of Nativity a Place of Calamity and Woe, as it was from the Restoration, the Effect of that divided House, to the Revolution.

We shall in the Sequel of this History so often have Occasion to speak of these Parties jointly and separately; that it was necessary to explain them a little, to make what we are to say the more intelligible.

Just at the End of the present Year, his Majesty sent another Message to the Parliament, offering to come to London and treat with the Two Houses: Upon which read what Mr. Acherley writes; "It is observable, that the King in all his Answers to those infinite Petitions and Invitations which had been sent him to return to his Parliament, had always objected, That he would not return for fear of Tumults at Whitehall, whereas he knew that his Prosecution of the Invitation and Scots Invasion was the Cause of those Tumults. But now when the King's Power to revenge was extinguish'd, his Majesty laid aside all his Fears, &c.

He propos'd in this Message to commit the Trust of the Militia for such Time and with such Power as is express'd by his own, not the Parliament's Commissioners at Usbridge, to the following Commissioners: Lord Privy Seal, Duke of Richmond, Marquis of Hertford, Marquis of Dorchester, Earl of Dorset, Lord Chamberlain, Earl of Chichester, Earl of Southampton, Lord Seymour, Lord Lucas, Lord Leppington, Mr. Delaware, Mr. Spencer, Mr. Apburnham, Mr. Gervase Clifton, Mr. Tho. Chicheley; Earl of Northumberland, Earl of Essex, Earl of Pembroke, Earl of Salisbury, Earl of Manchester, Earl Commissioners for it nam'd by the King.

A. D. 1645. Earl of Warwick, Earl of Denbigh, Lord Say, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Hollis, Sir Thomas Fairfax, Sir Henry Vane, Mr. Robert Wallop, Mr. Oliver Cromwell, Mr. Philip Skippon. But the Militia, with all its Powers, being to be restor'd to the King solely in Three Years, while Resentment and Revenge were still hot, and not the least Satisfaction offer'd for the Blood that had been spilt in the Three Kingdoms by the wicked Counsels of Delinquents, the Parliament resolv'd to go on as they had begun, in preparing Bills for his Majesty to sign, as the Foundation of a safe and lasting Peace, which all good Englishmen earnestly pray'd for.

The main Strength the King had left, were the Remains of his Western Army under the Prince of Wales, retreating before Sir Thomas Fairfax, the Garrisons of Oxford, Newark, and Worcester. Yet such was the Fury and Outrage of the Cavaliers, even in the woful Catastrophe of their War, that Col. Bard, Governor of Worcester, now issu'd out his Warrants to the Constables for Contributions, in these Terms:

The King's Governor of Worcester's Warrant. Know ye, That unless you bring in unto me, at a Day and Hour in Worcester, the monthly Contributions for six Months, you are to expect an unsanctify'd Troop of Horse amongst you, from whom if you hide your selves, they shall fire your Houses without Mercy, hang up your Bodies wherever they find them, and scare your Ghosts. I wonder such a fine Piece should not be found in Mr. Archdeacon's History, among so many Pieces not so fine, which he intended for the Glory of his Heroes.

A. D. 1646. General Fairfax did not think fit to lay Siege to Exeter in the Depth of the Winter, but having streighten'd the Garrison there as much as he could, he follow'd Goring, who was hastening farther Westward with 1000 Horse. Bishops Cliff, Stoke and Pokimore, were garrison'd by Fairfax, the latter with the Consent of the Owner Sir John Bampffield, a worthy Member of the House of Commons, whom I name the rather, for that there are still Branches of that ancient and honourable Family to glory in, and imitate the Example of their Ancestor.

When the General arrived at Ottery, November the 4th, a Trumpet came to him from his Royal Highness the Prince, with a Letter desiring a Pass for two New Lords, Hopton and Colepeper, to go to the King on a Design of mediating a Peace between his Majesty and both Houses of Parliament. The Lord General reply'd, he would send his Highness's Letter to the Parliament, from whom only he could expect an Answer; but if he would disband his Army, and go himself to them, he would be his Convoy. While the General lay at Ottery, he receiv'd a Letter from the Lord Goring for a safe Conduct for Col. Scrope and Col. Philips to attend him with Overtures; which was granted, not out of Expectation of Good from the Treaty, but to increase the Jealousy and Discontent between Goring's Party and Greenville's. The Overtures brought by Scrope and Philips were for both Armies to engage themselves to force both King and Parliament to Conditions. To which the General return'd no other Answer, than that he would acquaint the Parliament with it. At Ottery a Sickness incident to the Season seiz'd his Soldiers, and for some Time hinder'd his marching into Cornwall, which gave Greenville and Hopton an Opportunity to raise more Cornish Men; tho' the Earl of Clarendon, then Prime Minister to his Royal Highness, attributes whatever was done in his Service to the Depth of Wisdom in the Prince's Counsels, and makes Mysteries of those Things which will appear to be plain Facts. The Step the Lord Goring had taken about the Overtures, being not done in Concert with Mr. Hyde and Greenville, the Jealousy and Discontent above-mention'd increas'd so far, that Goring left his Army and retir'd to France, from whence he went to Spain, and, to Goring re-crown all his heroical Actions recorded by Mr. Echard, turn'd Dominican Fryar, as did also another of their Heroes, the Lord Cottington, Fellow Ambassador in Spain with Sir Edward Hyde, and the Gradation in the Remove was very small. Indeed I should not have been astonish'd at it if they had all turn'd Fryars, considering the Cause they had espous'd.

The General sent Sir Hardress Waller, with a Body of Troops, to seize Crediton, and order'd several Houses to be garrison'd for the Parliament, as Sir William Courtney's at Poldarham, Sir George Chudleigh's at Abston, the Lord Chichester's and Mr. Davy's at Canon Leen, by which the City of Exeter was so streighten'd, that the Prince's Generals were press'd very much to relieve it, and gave out they would attempt it, which made the General rendezvous his Army between Okehampton and Crediton, from whence Lieutenant General Cromwell advanc'd to Bovey Tracy, January the 16th, where Part of the Lord Wentworth's Brigade Ld. Wentworth's, took about 400 Horse, seven Colours, one worth's of them the King's, with a Crown and C. R. Brigade defeated. upon it. Several of the King's Officers were at Cards when the Parliamentarians enter'd the Town, and seeing the latter coming upon them, flung their Stakes out at the Window; for which, while Cromwell's Soldiers scrambled, the Lord Wentworth's Officers made their Escape.

The General advancing in Person, march'd to Ashburton, which a Day before, January the 9th, had been the Enemy's Head Quarters. The advanc'd Guard found a Body of them at the Town's End, beat them thro' the Town, and broke two Regiments of that Brigade.

On the 12th of January the Army appear'd Dartmouth before Dartmouth, where Sir Hugh Pollard commanded for the King, and had near 1000 Men in Garrison. General Fairfax order'd all Necessaries to be provided for a Storm, and on the 18th about Eleven at Night the Action began. The Cavaliers made but one Discharge before the Parliamentarians got under their Cannon, possess'd them, and turn'd them against the Enemy, having none of their own, the Way and Weather not admitting any to be drawn against the Place, where were no less than 100 Pieces mounted. The Commanders of every Party took the Posts assign'd them, and master'd those of the Enemy. Lieutenant Colonel Pride possess'd himself of Mount Boone, where were Twenty Pieces of Ordnance; Col. Hammond took the West Gate, where were Four Pieces of Ordnance, and Twenty in the Flanker; Col. Fortescue took Tunstal Church with Twelve Pieces of Ordnance in it, and the other Commanders succeeded alike in the other Parts of the Town, particularly the Old Castle, where were five great Guns that commanded the River. All which was done with the Loss of one Man kill'd. The Town being master'd, Capt. Dean, Comptroller of the Ordnance, was sent to summons two Men of War which lay in the River, and yielded immediately. About a Mile from the Town were two old Forts, mounted with 84 Guns, the Garrisons of which beat a Parley. The General permitted Sir Henry Cary, who commanded in one of them, to march away, but oblig'd the Lord Newport and Col. Seymour, with their Garrison in the other, to surrender

There were 600 Men in the Out-Garrisons, and 1000 in the Place, of whom 800 were made Prisoners. The rest were either kill'd, or suffer'd to march off with Sir Henry Cary. In this Service Capt. Roupe's Men of Dartmouth were very useful in guiding the Parliament's Soldiers at the several Attacks. The Engineer belonging to the Town, a bigoted Papist, was in Danger of being torn in Pieces by the Women for his Cruelty in burning of Houses, particularly Mr. Plumley's, with great Store of Corn in it, thresh'd and unthresh'd.

Plymouth Siege
rais'd.

Some Days before, Sir John Digby, who commanded the Blockade of Plymouth, march'd off, leaving his Works standing, and that important Town which had defended it self against two or three long Sieges, was at last deliver'd from a rapacious revengeful Enemy.

Not long after Dartmouth was taken, a Ship from France came into the Port, as if it had been still in the King's Hands. The Master immediately threw his Dispatches over-board, but sufficient Matter was discover'd in the Queen's and Goring's Letters to shew, they had at the same Time Negotiations with the Scots Presbyterians and the French Papists to carry on their good Cause. The General intended to return Eastwards and lay Siege to Exeter; but upon Advice that the King's Forces in Cornwall were about to cross the Tamar, in hopes of being join'd by a great Body of Horse from the East to attempt the raising the Blockade of Exeter, Fairfax march'd to meet them, having by Col. Hammond reduc'd Polderham Castle, where Sir

Meredith commanded for the King. On the 11th of February the General came up with the Royalists near Torrington, where his Forlorn of Horse charg'd the King's, and forced them to retreat; however they sally'd, being reinforc'd, and put the Parliament's Forlorn to a Stand, whose Reserves and some Foot coming up, they again forc'd the Enemy to retreat, and pursu'd them as far as Stephenson, Mr. Rolle's House, which they had begun to fortify, but quitted it on the Approach of Fairfax's Men, and retreated to Torrington, whither Fairfax's Forlorn follow'd them. The Enemy drew their Foot out of the Town into the Clofes. The Parliament's Forlorn of Foot lin'd the Hedges, and so they fac'd each other about two Hours within half Musket Shot. There were several Skirmishes between the Forlorns and Reserves on both Sides, and by this Time it began to be Night. Sir Thomas Fairfax call'd his Council of War to consider, whether to engage before Day or not; but they deferr'd the Resolution, and the General and Lieutenant General rode to the Forlorn to see in what Posture they were. They knew the Enemy to be still in the Town by the Tartoe which they could hear. However, to be certain, six Dragoons were commanded to creep under a Bridge near the Barricades, and to give Fire, to see whether they would answer, by which it might be known certainly whether they stood to defend the Town. They receiv'd the Charge, and answer'd with a sharp Volley of Shot. The Parliament's Forlorn Hope seeing the Dragoons engag'd, gave Fire, upon which the Enemy fir'd all along the Hedges and Works, and the Reserve to the Forlorn came up to their Relief, which being so engag'd, the whole Army advanc'd, and about 8 at Night the Battle began, six Fields from the Town. The Parliamentarians fought from Hedge to Hedge till they had beaten the Royalists into their Barricades, which for an Hour they maintain'd very resolutely, and often repuls'd the Parliament's Forces, who at last got over the Barricades, and forc'd the Enemy into the Town. The Horse follow'd them, and scouring the Streets, were warmly receiv'd by the Cavaliers; but they drove them before them thro' the Town, and out of the Barricades, at the other End of it. The Parliament's Soldiers having taken many Prisoners, put them into the Church, but many more escap'd in the dark over the Hedges, throwing down their Arms, and all the Men flying several Ways. Fairfax's Soldiers were no sooner possess'd of the Town, but the Enemy's Magazine, which they had left in the Church took fire, whether casually or by Design is uncertain: It prov'd a terrible Blast, blowing up the Church with all the Wood and Lead upon it, deforming many Houses, killing some of the Prisoners in the Church, and some of the Parliament's Soldiers in the Church-yard. Two great Webs of Lead fell within 10 Foot of the General, and a great Number were hurt with the Stones, Timber, and Lead. Most of the Town was shaken, and the Blow could not but be prodigious, near 80 Barrels of Powder being fir'd. Sir John Digby, at the Head of the Enemy's Horse, gave one Charge more, and then they all fled about Eleven a Clock at Night. Their Infantry were taken, slain, and totally routed, many of their Cavalry taken and dispers'd. The rest fled in great Disorder towards Cornwall, leaving all their Bag and Baggage behind them. Among the Colours taken, was one of the Lord Hopton's, with this Motto, a very bald one, I will strive to serve my Sovereign King. Sir John Digby's Commission was taken, 500 Pounds in Money, and much rich Pilgrage in his Quarters. The Lord Hopton, the Lord Capel, and the Lord Wentworth, were in this Battle, the Lord Hopton and the Lord Capel were wounded, Major General Threave, Capt. Fry, several Officers, and 400 of their Men kill'd and blown up. This Army consisted of about 4000 Horse and 5000 Foot, of which very few remain'd in a Body.

The General having order'd a Party to block up Barnstable, and another to take in the Earl of Bath's House, march'd after Hopton towards Cornwall, having detach'd Col. Butler with a strong Body to pursue him, and himself following closely with the rest of the Army. Near Sratton Col. Butler came up with Part of the Enemy's flying Forces, commanded by Major General Web, a Papist, whom he routed, and at Sratton took about 400 Horse, Feb. the 24th. This same Sratton is the Place where, as Richard tells us, this same Lord Hopton gain'd that Noble Victory, for which he was made Baron Hopton of Sratton. But the Village is now to be remember'd to the Honour of Col. Butler, who obtain'd this Noble Victory over Part of the Baron of Sratton's Army.

General Fairfax advancing to Lainceston, Feb. 25, the Lord Hopton retir'd to Bodmin, whither the General pursu'd him, March the 2d, and Hopton retreated to Truro. At Bodmin Sir Thomas Fairfax had Intelligence that the Prince of Wales, with Sir Edward Hyde and his other Counsellors, had shipp'd themselves for Scilly, Prince of Wales at Scilly. Scilly. tho' he might have done it as well from Alderney or Sark, for in Truth he wanted Relief himself as much as they did. But these Gentlemen always carry'd their politick Views along with them, and their Hopes seem'd to increase with their Calamities. The last Thing which Guilt submits to is Despair.

IRISH
employ'd by
the King.

On the 3d of March Col. Edgcombe deliver'd up his strong House of Mount Edgcombe to the General; and Mr. Coriton, Mr. Glanville, Mr. Lower, and Mr. Trevis, Cornish Gentlemen, made their Submission. The General shew'd them the original intercepted Letters from the Earl of Glamorgan, concerning the Army of Irish REBELS to be brought over to the King's Assistance. Several of those Rebels being found a-board the Irish Ship at Padstow, were knock'd on the Head by the Townsmen, and one, a Captain of those REBELS, offer'd on Promise of Pardon, to confess what he knew, which was, that 300 Irish were appointed for the Prince of Wales's Life-guard, of whom 100 were to be put into the Mount, and 100 into Pendennis Castle. The Cornish Gentlemen just mention'd were so surpriz'd at this Intelligence, that they declar'd they would raise what Force they could to assist the Parliament against all Irish and Foreigners, tho' they had hitherto assisted the King.

We remember how Clarendon and Echard insulted the Parliament when the Earl of Essex had unadvisedly shut himself up within a Nook of this County of Cornwall; and left his Army to take Care of themselves, and that his Horse broke their Way thro' the King's. General Fairfax has now got the Royal Army within another Nook of Cornwall; but tho' their Horse were almost double the Number to Essex's, there's no Attempt to break thro', which indeed Fairfax had well provided against, with the utmost Precaution, and Hopton and his Army are in so miserable a Condition, that it would be inhumane to insult them, tho' the Insolence of the Cavaliers and their History Writers, do sufficiently provoke one.

From Bodmin Sir Thomas Fairfax wrote a Letter to Sir Ralph Hopton, taking no Notice of his Barony of Stratton, a Title which he purchas'd with Apostacy from good old English Principles, wherein he said, "I have thought good, for Prevention of more Blood-shed, or of farther Hardship or Extremity to any, but such whose Hearts God shall harden to their own Destruction, to send you this Summons for your self and your Forces, to lay down your Arms, and withal, a Tender of such Conditions upon a present Surrender, and Engagement never to bear Arms against the Parliament, as may be better than any thing they can rationally expect by farther standing out." Thus we see that the General, out of meer Compassion, made the first Motion of Treaty to them, whom he could easily have cut to Pieces or starv'd. But the Earl of Clarendon, who had all along been with Hopton's Army, and must necessarily know the Truth, will not allow this kind Offer to proceed from a generous Sentiment of Soul in Sir Thomas Fairfax, but from a mutinous Spirit in Hopton's Officers, who positively propos'd to send for a Treaty, which positively had been propos'd and sent to them. The Lord Hopton's Answer to the General's Letter further shews us, what we learn by the Lord Clarendon's History, that the Royalists did not know what was doing at Westminster, or that their Judgments were not so sagacious and piercing as the Earl represents them; for he desires to be inform'd, Whether the King has not pass'd the Four Bills, and concluded a Treaty with the Parliament: If so, there was no Occasion for them to treat; if not, he would name eight Commanders, and three Country Gentlemen, to give a Meeting to an equal Number on Fairfax's Side. In the General's Answer to the Lord Hopton's Letter, are some Expressions which will confirm what we have urg'd of the King's treating with the Irish REBELS, and the Double Dealing of his Commissioners in former Treaties with the Parliament's: "I believe that as the Parliament may be discourag'd from the Way of Treaty by former Experiences of the Fruitlessness thereof, and the ill Use the same hath been design'd or driven unto, viz. only to gain Advantages for War, without real Intentions for Peace; so the late Overtures that way are the less likely to be successful, by Reason of the clear and certain Discoveries the Parliament have had, that his Majesty, at the same Time, was and is labouring, by Agents in all Parts, to draw in Foreign Forces, and especially that the Earl of Glamorgan, by Commission from his Majesty, had concluded a Peace with the Irish Rebels, upon the only Condition of sending over Forces to invade England, whereof I presume you cannot but have heard: And tho' his Majesty did in a Letter to the Parliament disavow any such Agreement, and pretended he had given Order to the Lord Digby for the Attainting and Impeaching the Earl of Glamorgan of High Treason, yet by late Discoveries of the Parliament, and especially by Letters intercepted from the Lord Digby and the Earl of Glamorgan, to Secretary Nicholas, your self, Sir Edward Hyde, and others, it is most clear and evident, that the arresting the Earl of Glamorgan was only for a present Colour, to salve Reputation with the People, and continue their Delusions till Designs were ripe for Execution; for the same Peace is fully concluded with the REBELS, the King to have Aid from them, &c." After this there can be no Front so harden'd, as to deny the Treaty with the Massacrers in Ireland, and the inviting of them into England to butcher the Protestants in this Kingdom, as they had done in that: And to me it does not seem much Matter, whether the King granted a Commission to those bloody REBELS before he made War upon the Parliament or after, for that War might have been avoided, if he had govern'd according to Law, which he says he is fighting for in all his Declarations; and it was as much against Law to commission the Popish Rebels to kill the English as the Irish Protestants; and that he did so commission them was, as General Fairfax says, clear and certain. If those Butchers were proper Champions for the Cause of God, as his Majesty calls his own, let any reasonable Reader determine; and what fine Histories must the Earl of Clarendon's and Mr. Echard's be, which deny that he gave any Commission at all to the Irish REBELS. This one Article is enough to prove that neither of those Historians made Conscience of what they did say, or did not say, for the Cause they espous'd. The Lord Hopton seeing his Stratagem would not take, but he must beg a Cessation, if he would have it, sent at Twelve a Clock at Night for a Treaty at Tresilian Bridge. The Earl of Clarendon affirms he would not treat for himself. The General consented, and appointed his Commissioners.

A. While Hopton's Troops were disbanding, another Packet of the Lord Glamorgan's was taken at Peryn, containing Copies of the Letters intercepted at Padstow. The Ship put into Cornwall on a Supposition that the King's Army were Masters there, and probably the Irish REBELS were to re-inforce it. About the same Time Sir Hardress Waller reduc'd Exmouth Fort, where Colonel Arundel commanded. General Fairfax took in Dennis Fort, near which Colonel Rick defeated Major General Pert, and took 300 Horse. The whole Field Force of the Enemy being reduc'd, the Lords Hopton, Wentworth, and other Persons of Quality embark'd for Scilly. The General march'd his Army back to besiege Exeter in Form ; but first he wrote a Letter to Sir John Berkley the Governor, March the 31st, to offer Terms, and Sir John in Answer nam'd his Commissioners to treat : Sir Henry Berkley, Mr. William Ashburnham, Sir George Carey, Mr. John Weare, Colonel Godolphin, Captain Fitzgarret, Mr. Robert Walker, Mr. Thomas Knight, Mr. Thomas Kendal, Mr. Thomas Foard.

Exeter taken.

General Fairfax's Commissioners.

Lieutenant General Hammond, Commissary General Stane, Sir Hardress Waller, Colonel Lambert, Colonel Harley, Colonel Fry.

The Treaty lasted six Days, and was concluded the 9th of April : The Hostages for Berkley were Sir John Coventry, Sir James Thynne and Colonel Croker. Whitlocke observes that his Commissioners had most at Heart the preserving the Cathedral from Damage. As the Governor was very frank in answering the General's Summons, so the General was very fair in the Conditions he granted him ; one of which was, that the Princess Henrietta, afterwards Dutches of Orleans, a Native of this City, Her Governess and Household should have Liberty to pass with their Plate, Money, Goods, &c. to any Place in England or Wales, at her Desire, in 20 Days.

Barnstable taken and Dunster.

The next Day after the City was surrender'd the General march'd to Barnstable, summon'd the Town and receiv'd a civil Answer from Sir Allen Apsey, who yielded on much the same Terms as Sir John Berkley. Dunster Castle, the Seat of the ancient Family of Lutterel in Somersetshire was surrender'd by Colonel Windham to the famous Colonel Blake, afterwards Admiral. The General returning to Exeter the 14th of April, made Lieutenant General Hammond Governor, and left with him Part of the Country Regiments of Colonel Shapcot, Colonel Fry and Colonel Weare, who had done good Service at Tiverton and Exmouth.

Gen. Fairfax's great Actions in one Year.

On the 18th of April General Fairfax began his March towards Oxford, having in less than a Year obtain'd more Victories and taken more Towns than ever did any General in so short Time, in a War where the Number and Valour of the Troops on both Sides were so equal.

On the 24th of May, 1645. he took Godstow in Oxfordshire.

On the 14th of June he gain'd the glorious Victory at Naseby.

On the 18th of June he took Leicester.

On the 27th of June he took Highworth.

On the 3d of July he oblig'd the Lord Goring to raise the Siege of Taunton.

On the 10th of July he fought and won the Battle of Lanport.

On the 23d of July he took the strong Town of Bridgwater by Storm.

On the 15th of August he took the strong Castle of Skirburn by Storm.

On the 10th of September he took the City of Bristol by Storm.

On the 23d of September he took the Town of Devizes.

On the 20th of October he took Tiverton by Storm.

On the 16th of January he rais'd the Siege of Plymouth.

On the 19th of January he took Dartmouth by Storm.

On the 15th of February he fought and won the Battle of Torrington.

On the 25th, 28th, 29th of February, and March the 3d he took Salsburgh, Leskard, Mount Edgecomb, Fuoy.

On the 14th of March he oblig'd the Lord Hopton to disband all the King's Western Army.

On the 10th of April, 1646. he took the City of Exeter.

On the 20th of April he took the Town of Barnstable. And,

On the 1st of May he came before Oxford, being that Day Twelvemonth from his leaving the Siege of that City to take the Field. And what History can produce a General who in a Twelvemonth did so many glorious Actions, and obtain'd so many Victories ?

The King did not stay for his coming, but as soon as he heard of his Intention made his Escape, as will be seen hereafter. We must now look into some other Parts of the Kingdom, where the Royalists were in the Agonies of a dying War.

We left the City of Chester besieg'd by Sir Chester William Brereton, who met with a gallant Resistance ; but the Hope of Relief from the Irish failing, and Colonel Mitton having hinder'd the Junction of some Troops that were marching to relieve it, the Besieg'd desir'd a Treaty, which was concluded, and the City surrender'd to Sir William, where he found great Store of Provisions and Ammunition. Sir Jacob Astley now Lord Al-made a Lord too, had got together 2000 Horse and Foot, which were intended to join Sir William Vaughan ; and some Forces landed in Wales from Ireland, for the Relief of Chester, which being surrender'd, Sir William Brereton march'd to meet the Lord Astley, who hearing of the Surrender would have shelter'd himself in Oxford ; but Sir William Brereton's Troops being join'd by those of Colonel Morgan, Governor of Gloucester, and Colonel Birch, fell upon the Lord Astley at Stow on the Wold, in Gloucestershire, March the 22d, and after a very sharp Engagement routed them, took the Lord Astley and 1600 Horse and Men, all their Carriages, Arms, Bag and Baggage. Brereton's Word was God be our Guide ; Astley's Word was St. Patrick and St. George ; two special Saints and hopeful Patrons for so hopeful a Cause : About 200 Cavaliers were kill'd, many of them Gentlemen of Quality, as Colonel Cassy Bentall, a Papist. A few of the King's Forces escap'd to Oxford and Farrington ; and the Lord Astley said to some of the Parliament's Officers, Now you have done your Work and may go play, unless you fall out among your selves, which the Royalists expected, and no Body more than the King himself, who having now no Body of Men in the Field to oppose the Parliament's Armies, plac'd all his Hope in their falling out with one another.

A. D. 1646.

A. D. 1646. another or with the Scots. A Company of Welshmen were got together in Glamorganshire for the King, under Sir Charles Keymes, who makes but a scurvy Figure at the Fag-end of the War. Major General Langborn, Sir Trevor Williams, and Colonel Morgan soon drove him and his Company out of the Country.

Divisions.

Edward who is wonderfully delighted with the Earl of Clarendon's Political Mysteries, attributes the Hopes of the King and his Counsellors to the Misunderstandings between the Parliament and the Scots Army. But the Parliament had done their Work, and could drive the Scots out of England with as much Ease as they had driven Hopton out of Cornwall, had they been forc'd to it. The true Reason is in Ludlow, who writes thus on the above mention'd Saying of the Lord Ashley; "It deserves the more Reflection because he being well acquainted with the King's Secrets, was not ignorant that many amongst us, who at the Beginning appear'd most forward to engage themselves, and to invite others to the War against the King, finding themselves disappointed of those Preferences which they expected, or out of some particular Disgusts taken, had made Conditions with the King, not only for their Indemnity, but for Places and Advancements under him, endeavouring by a Treaty, or rather by Treachery, to betray what had cost so much Blood to obtain. These Men to strengthen their Interest, apply'd themselves to the Presbyterian Party, who jealous of the Increase of Sectaries, of which the Army was reported chiefly to consist, readily join'd with them, by which Conjunction most of the new elected Members were either of a neutral Spirit, and willing to have Peace upon any Terms, or such, who though they had engag'd against the King, yet finding Things tending to a Composition with him, resolv'd to have the Benefit of it and his Favour, though with the Guilt of all the Blood that had been shed in the War upon their Heads, as not requiring Satisfaction for the same, nor endeavouring to prevent the like for the Future." This was the Party whom the Royalists courted, and who were not a little pleas'd with their Courtship. But however, as much as the Divisions in the House were fomented, it would all have come to nothing, and the Cavaliers would never have had another Card to play, had not the Army, at least the Chief of it, Cromwel, acted an under Plot, and betray'd, and even depos'd his Masters; and it is a just though not a common Observation, that as all the Disgraces, Defeats, Calamities, and Distresses of the Royalists, were owing to their Rashness, Weakness, Pride and Obstinacy; so all the Good that happen'd to them afterwards, was owing to the Jealousies, Animosities, Divisions and Quarrels of their Enemies. In a Word, their Miseries were owing to their own Folly, their Happiness to the Folly of others.

Corfe Castle surpriz'd.

About this Time a Party of the King's surpriz'd Wareham in Dorsetshire, and carry'd the Governor, Colonel Butler, into Corfe Castle, whence Butler made his Escape with Major Laurence a Royalist, who resolv'd to come in to the Parliament, and soon after Corfe Castle it self fell into their Hands thus; Lieutenant Colonel Pitman, who was in Garrison there, had formerly serv'd under the Earl of Inchiquin in Ireland, and being weary of the Service he was in, intimated that if he might have Protection he would deliver the Place to the Parliament, which being promis'd him, he told Colonel Anketill the Governor, he would fetch 100 Men out of Somersetshire to reinforce the Garrison, and would get Leave of the Commander of the Forces who lay before the Castle under Pretence of procuring an Exchange for his Brother, who was their Prisoner, for a Parliament Officer in the Castle. The Governor consenting to it, Leave was had from Colonel Bingham, who commanded those Forces, and gave Pitman 100 Men to carry with him into the Castle, who were no sooner enter'd than the Besiegers began to storm, and Pitman's Men soon possess'd themselves of the chief Towers, which they made good against the Garrison, who seeing this yielded upon Quarter.

The Siege of Newark was carry'd on by the Newark Scots on one Side of the River Trent, and Major Gen. Pointz on the other. Gen. Leven, who commanded the Scots, had some Difference with the Parliament's Commissioners in his Army about Pay; and the Scots Parliament and Army finding they were not carest so much now the Parliament of England did not want them as when they did, grew daily more discontented, pretending however 'twas only out of Concern for the Presbytery and the Covenant. The Parliament Scots dissent were discontented at General Leven's raising Money in England by his Warrants, and granting Commissions for making Levies of Men in this Kingdom.

All the Stir the Royalists could make was by spiriting up Mobs and Mutinies in City and Camp; and there were not wanting a great Number, who over valuing their Merit, thought themselves not sufficiently rewarded, and were ready to take hold of any Occasion to be troublesome. Whitlocke informs us that the King's Party was suppos'd to set on Soldiers Widows and Creditors of the Parliament to come to the Doors of the House and cry out, Pay us our Money, we are ready to starve, and when any of the Members came by they seem'd as if they would tear their Clothes off their Backs. A small Game; but the Cavaliers were unwilling to stand out.

The King remain'd still at Oxford, and from thence sent another Letter to the Parliament, January the 16th, desiring, That Church Government may continue as it was in the Days of Queen Elizabeth; a Name dear to all good Protestants for her Zeal against Popery: But the Meaning of continuing Church Government as it was in her Days, was the Continuance of Spiritual Courts, Forms, Ceremonies and Superstition, which 'tis very well known were the only Blemish of her Reign. His Majesty was content that the Directory of Worship should be used in some Churches in London, but not all; which must necessarily have bred the utmost Confusion. In a following Letter he charges them with violating the known Laws to draw to themselves an exorbitant Power over their Fellow Subjects: A very likely Stile this, to engage them in a Treaty of Peace in the Height of their Prosperity. He press'd again for it the 26th of January; but the Parliament proceeded in the same Way still, and prepar'd the following Bills, to which if he would assent, they were willing he should come to London.

1. For settling Presbyterian Government, and Acts for extirpating Episcopacy.
2. For prosecuting the the King War against the Irish REBELS.
3. For the Militia to remain in the Power of the Parliament.
4. For Payment of the Debts of the Kingdom.
5. For bringing Delinquents to Punishment, of whom Mr. Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon was always named to be one.
6. That no Honours be given but to such as have testify'd their Affections to the Publick.

Divisions.

And what is amazing, after the History we have read of it, he disclaim'd the Earl of Glamorgan's Commission as false, which General Fairfax said was so clear and certain. How this agrees with the pious Sentiments in Eikon Basilike, and how the double Dealing in the Treaties mention'd by the same General, whom his Enemies allow to be a Man of strict Honour, agrees with them, is what no Body can understand but Echard and his Brethren. The Parliament of Scotland wrote to the Parliament of England to settle Religion as the Assembly desir'd, to forward the Propositions for Peace, and pay the Scots Army their Arrears by the third of May. The Committee of both Kingdoms were order'd on the 26th of February, to desire the Scots Commissioners to bring in their Accounts. This was long before any one had the least Suspicion that the King would put himself into the Hands of the Scots Army, and when he did so, and these Accounts were made up, and their Arrears paid, the whole Herd of Cavalier Historians bellow out against it as a Bargain and Sale for the delivering up of the King. Let us have Recourse to Ludlow here; "Another Sort of Men there was amongst us, who having acquir'd Estates in the Service of the Parliament, now adher'd to the King's Party for the preserving of what they had got; who together with such as had been discharg'd from their Employments by the Reform of the Army, or env'y'd their Success, combin'd together against the Common-wealth. This Party was encourag'd and supported upon all Occasions by the Scots, and the City of London. The first of them, though they began the War, and though their Assembly of Ministers had declar'd the King guilty of the Blood of Thousands of his best Subjects, their Covenant engaging them in the Preservation of his Person, so far only as might consist with the Laws of the Land and Liberty of the Subject; yet having had many good Opportunities in England, and hoping for more, supposing it to be in their Power to awe the King to whatsoever they should think fit, they were content to swallow that Ocean of Blood that had been shed, pressing the Parliament by their Commissioners to conclude upon such Terms with the King as shew'd them rather Advocates than such as had been Enemies to him. The City of London had had their Treasure much wasted in the War, and their Trade long interrupted; besides the Influence the Scots had upon them by the Means of their Ministers: The Common Council being also debauch'd by Sergeant Glyn and others of that Party in the House of Commons; it was not much to be wonder'd at, if they earnestly sollicit'd for the speedy Determination of the Difference by a Treaty. The King also perceiving Judgment to be given against him by that Power, to which both Parties had made their solemn Appeal, thought it advisable to make Use of the Fox's Skin, and for a Time to lay aside that of the Lyon, sending Messages to the Parliament, to desire of them a safe Conduct for his coming to London in Honour, Freedom and Safety, there personally to treat with the two Houses, The Parliament for divers Reasons thought it not convenient to comply with

"the King's Propositions, and demanded of the Scots an exact Account of what was due to them", which, as I have already observ'd, was before the King went to their Army; and the Parliament had promis'd to pay them their Arrears upon their withdrawing their Garrisons out of England, which they pretended to keep as cautionary Towns. The Parliament had some Difference with the Scots Commissioners concerning the Propositions about the Militia, the Education of the King's Children, the Disbanding of the Army, the Act of Oblivion, in which Matters the Parliament would not let them interpose; and this occasion'd a Remonstrance from them to the two Houses, containing Expressions highly reflecting on the Parliament, who declar'd them to be injurious, scandalous, and order'd the Remonstrance to be burn'd by the Hands of the common Hangman, the 14th of April; so far were they from being in the least Dread of the Scots, which the Earl of Clarendon and his Shadow Mr. Echard, all along intimate, though in a Manner which discovers that they knew very little of the Things they wrote of, or did not write according to their Knowledge. True it is the two Houses were very desirous to preserve a good Correspondence with the Scots, on Account both of Religion and Interest; but they were not for preserving it at the Expence of their Honour: And the Scots finding them so resolute, thought fit to abate of their Demands, and leave the Parliament to their own Management. These Animosities, says Mr. Archdeacon, and the Scots Pretensions to have a Right in their King, were thought very advantageous to his Majesty's sinking Cause, and there seem'd to be some Life in it. 'Twas thought, and there seem'd; By whom? By those who had been thinking and seeming his Majesty into the most deplorable Condition a Prince could be reduc'd to; and yet in the midst of all this Misery the Historian presents us with a Vow made by the King, That he would restore Abbey Lands, if ever it pleas'd God to restore him to that Sovereign Power which he had so well exercis'd before the Rupture. Archbishop Sheldon gave it under his Hand that he kept a Copy of that notable Vow under Ground thirteen Years, though if he had kept it above Ground, it was not such a Treasure that he needed be afraid of losing it; and a little more Discretion would have hinder'd Mr. Echard's publishing it in print, and calling such Things as the demolishing St. Becket's Tomb at Canterbury Sacrilegious Incroachments. What a Parcel of Words have these Men got to make Use of instead of Reason? Schism, Rebellion, Sacrilege, and if you take down a Rood or melt down a Chalice, though by Act of Parliament, you are as guilty of Sacrilege, according to this good Protestant, as if you stole the Church Bible or Common Prayer Book. To hedge in an Acre of a Monk's Glebe, though allow'd by the Statute, is as damnable a Sin, according to the Reverend Historian, as to break open a House. He tells us the King made an extraordinary Vow, in the Presence of Almighty God, to give back to God's Church; to what shocking Uses do they put that tremendous Name! all Lands belonging to any Abby, Religious House, &c. This Vow was made at the most improper Juncture of Time which could happen; for 'twas when Monsieur Montreuil was sent to England by Cardinal Mazarine, and two Popish Queens, the Regent of France and Consort of England, to persuade the King to abolish Bishops, and set up Presbyters, as the only Means to secure to himself and Posterity the Possession of the Throne. About the same Time too as he vow'd this, his Majesty sent another Message to the Parliament, offering "to come in to his two Houses upon their Assurance for the Safety of his Person, provided all those that had adhear'd to him might return home, and live in quiet without taking the Covenant, or having their Estates sequestred: He will then disband his Forces, dismantle his Garrisons, and pass an Act of Oblivion, which was doing nothing." The Parliament knew very well that his Garrisons and Forces would be disbanded and dismantled in a few Weeks without him, and that his Friends wanted an Act of Oblivion much more than they. There is a Reserve in all these Messages which shews that the King never sent them with Expectation of Success; for without Presbytery the Militia and Justice on Mr. Hyde and the other Delinquents he knew well they would not receive him again. The judicious Acherly says, The Parliament argu'd that now the King had no Power but what they should give him, and how he, who had continu'd so obstinate, would use his Power did plainly appear by his Declaration after the taking of Bristol, and therefore their Resolutions about receiving him were for the present suspended. We shall see what Life there seem'd to be in the King's Cause by the Parliament's Answer to this Message, as it is in Larry. "They were very much prejudic'd against him as to his Sincerity, and desir'd him not to think of coming to London till he had first given his Assent to the Bills that would be sent to him. They added, if he attempted to come notwithstanding this Remonstrance, they would give Orders to secure his Person, and sieze on all his Retinue." They also order'd that all Persons who had born Arms against the Parliament should immediately withdraw out of London, and without the Lines, under Pain of being treated as Spies. 'Tis said Cromwel, who was come from the Army, was in a great Measure the Occasion of this Answer and Order, which sufficiently convinc'd his Majesty that he must either throw himself upon the Parliament, or have Recourse to the Scots, whose Difference with them was magnify'd, and himself made believe it was much greater than he found it. Fairfax's Approach quicken'd his Majesty in this last Resolution, the worst he could have taken. There had not yet been a Hint in Parliament against the King's Person, but it was resent'd. The major Vote was then for a Peace on Terms of Security for Religion and Liberty, and his Presence at London would most certainly have encreas'd that Party, but by his throwing himself upon the Scots he irritated both Parliament and Army, and gave the Enemies to his Person an Opportunity to accomplish those Designs which till then they durst not think of. I take no Manner of Notice of the Earl of Clarendon's long Account of Montreuil's Negotiations with General Leven for his kind Reception of the King before his Majesty left Oxford, because it is quite contrary to Fact. For the Earl of Leven and the Committee of Estates of Scotland wrote to the Committee of both Kingdoms, That they were astonish'd at the Providence of the King's coming to the Scots Camp, which was so private that it was long e'er they could find him there. They declar'd, there hath been no Treaty betwixt his Majesty and them; and add, We believe your Lordships will think it Matter of much Astonishment, seeing we did not expect him to come to any Place under our Power, and we do ingenuously affirm that there hath been no Treaty nor Capitulation between his Majesty and us, nor any in our Names. The King came to our Army in so private a Way, that after we had made some Search for him upon the Surmises of Persons who pretended to know his Face; yet we could not find him in some Hours. Among others this was sign'd by General Leven, to whose Quarters, as Echard informs us, the King was conducted by a Troop of Scots Horse upon his Arrival at their Camp, and to prove that General Leven, the Earl of Dumferling, the Earl of Lothian, &c. wrote so shameful a Falsity to the Committee of both Kingdoms; he quotes Bishop Guthrie, which I mention to shew what Authority his Bishop Guthrie is in other Cases. The Scots Commissioners in their Declaration tell the Parliament, the King came to their Army without Capitulation or Treaty; yet the Earl of Clarendon's and Echard's Histories, as well as Guthrie's, enlarge upon Montreuil's Negotiations, in Pursuance of which the King made his Escape in Disguise, April the 27th, his Hair cut after the Roundhead Fashion, with a Port-Oxford, manteau behind him, as Mr. John Ashburnham's Servant. Their Guide was one Hudson a Parson of the Militant Order, who conducted them to Henley, by Cross Roads, Brentford, Harrow on the Hill, where his Majesty staid some Time; thence by St. Alban's to Harborough in Leicester, where Echard assures us the French Agent Montreuil, was to meet him with some Scots Horse, according to a Treaty which the Scots Lords say he never made with them, and indeed no Scots Horse came thither. 'Tis probable Montreuil met with Encouragement from the Scots as to the King's coming amongst them, but that they sign'd any Treaty is neither propable nor credible; and though the King says in his Letter to the Marquis of Ormond, April the 13th, Having lately receiv'd very good Security that we and all that do or shall adhere to us shall be safe in our Persons, Honours and Consciences in the Scottish Army; yet there seems to be no other Security for any Thing than the French Agent's Word, and one of the first Things that the Scots did after he came to their Army was to prohibit by Proclamation all those that did or should adhere to him to come near his Person. From Harborough the King and his Companions went to Stamford, and thence cross the Country to Downham in Norfolk, where he arriv'd April the 30th; and his Travels were not kept so private but that it was said in London, he was gone to the Associated Counties, upon which Colonel Wharton was sent by the Parliament to Lynn, to take Care for the Security of the Association. Clarendon, Echard, Sanderson, and all their History Writers throw the Parliament into the most terrible Consternation, on News of the King's having made his Escape: They make them more afraid of him now he is riding about the Country as Mr. Ashburnham's Man, than when he had disarm'd General Essex's Army in Cornwall: Whereas they were in no farther Concern about it than it might be a Hindrance to a Peace, which if he had been taken in Oxford, they hop'd he might have been prevail'd upon to hearken to, and as escaping in so clandestine a Manner could not be with any good Design, they declar'd by Beat of Drum and Sound of Trumpet, that what Person soever shall harbour or conceal, or know of the Harboursing and Concealing of the King's Person, and shall not reveal it immediately to the Speakers of both Houses shall be proceeded against as a TRAYTOR, forfeit his whole Estate, and die without Mercy. From Downham the King went to Montreuil's Quarters at Southwell, where Part

A. D. 1645. In the Scots Army. of the Scots Army quarter'd, and perhaps there was a Whisper of his being there before he discover'd himself, and after it was known, some Horse might be sent to bring him to General Leven. This History will shew that 'tis impossible to read it, and have a very good Opinion of King Charles's Counsellors and Counsels. He has hardly taken one prudent Step either before or after the War; and there have many Opportunities offer'd when one such Step would have preserv'd him on the Throne with Safety and Honour. Had he now thrown himself upon Sir Thomas Fairfax instead of General Leven, he would have puzzled his Enemies, and prepared the Way for a Conclusion of a happy Peace; whereas by going to the Scots Camp, he shew'd that his Intention was to divide them from the Interest of the Two Houses to engage them in his own, and renew the War, which gave too much Occasion to People to think there could be no Security in any Treaty with him. He was brought to the Earl of Leven's Quarters the 5th of May, eight Days after he left Oxford. On News of which the Parliament voted, That the Commissioners and the General of the Scots be desired that his Majesty's Person be disposed of as both Houses shall desire and direct, and that he be sent to Warwick Castle; also, That Mr. Ashburnham and Hudson be sent for as Delinquents. The Former made his Escape, but Hudson was brought up by the Serjeant at Arms. The Scots, who had a strong Appetite for their Arrears, resolv'd to delay the Delivery of the King till they were paid. The Account between the Parliament and them, was adjusting by Mr. Bond the Auditor; and as their Demands for Damages and Charges, as well as Pay, were exorbitant, it could not be stated with the Dispatch they insisted upon.

The King orders the Surrender of Newark.

They immediately oblig'd the King to send to the Lord Bellasis to surrender Newark to the Parliament's Commissioners in their Army, and march'd farther North with their Prize, being afraid of having him taken from them by Force. Their receiving him without Consent of the Two Houses, had brought them under Suspicion, and their disputing the Delivery of him, made many, especially among the Soldiery, to wish that Sir Thomas Fairfax had been order'd to demand him, rather than the Parliament's Commissioners. Warwick is not so weak but he could observe the Parliament were a little too forward in their Treaty with the Scots: If the English Army had been left to themselves, they would soon have shorten'd the Taylor's Bill. 'Tis Sir Philip's courtly Way of Writing. Fairfax would have made up the Account sooner than Auditor Bond. The Parliament knew it well enough, and order'd Forces to march from several Quarters to the North, to let the Scots see they would vindicate their Demand of the King's Person in another manner, if they attempted to keep him; but the Scots meant only to quicken the passing their Account, and his Majesty soon found when he was at Newcastle, that he might as well have trusted himself with the English Army as with the Scots. The Latter began their March from Newark, May the 7th, the King being suffer'd to ride before them as their General, the Earl of Leven by his Side, and the Scots Lords around him. The Bells rung in the Towns and Villages thro' which they march'd; but tho' there was an Appearance of Joy, there was no Appearance of Liberty for the King; and when he came to Newcastle, May the 13th, he was lodg'd in the same House with General Leven, but with no Solemnity; and Leven issu'd a Proclamation, That no Papist or Delinquent should come near him, and that all Persons do conform to the Orders and Ordinances of Parliament; who press'd the Scots Commissioners to settle their Army's Account, that they might be paid, which shews that the Two Houses were desirous to pay off the Scots, and dismiss them, before any Bargain was made for the Sale of the King's Person, which the Ignorant and the Vulgar talk much of; tho' it is certain that according to the Stipulations between the Two Houses and the States of Scotland, for the levying and maintaining a Scots Army for the Assistance of the Parliament of England, there was near twice the Money coming to the Scots, including their Losses and Damages by the War, as the Parliament agreed to pay, and even of that Agreement, they had not above half paid them.

A. D. 1646. His Majesty from Newcastle wrote another Letter to the Parliament, May the 18th, expressing that he was not come into the Scots Army out of any Intent to divide the Kingdoms in Affection, His Majesty or prolong the War; whereas it was an express Article in Montreuil's Negotiation, if there was any such Negotiation, That the Scots shall really and effectually join with the King of Great Britain, and employ their Armies and Forces to assist him. His Majesty proceeds, but to secure his Person, and labour to compose the Differences between him and his Kingdoms, and settle all well, he desir'd Religion might be first insisted on, and settled according to the Advice of the Assembly of Divines of both Kingdoms. Before we say more of this Letter, it is worth remarking, that the pretended Martyrdom of this King for the Church, is indeed nothing but a very poor and groundless Pretence; for here he offers to settle Religion as an Assembly of Presbyterian Divines shall advise, it being most notorious that England and Scotland at that Time had no other Divines in Assembly. As to the Militia, he was willing to concur with what had been propounded at Uxbridge. After the Nation had been involv'd in War and Waste twenty Months longer, he would agree to what he had agreed to before: For Ireland, he will do what he can to satisfy Desires of that Kind. How tenderly this is touch'd! The Desires of that Kind were to pursue the Irish Massacrers with, Slaughter and Destruction, till the innocent Blood of two or three hundred thousand Protestants was reveng'd, and the Protestant Religion and Interest in that Kingdom sufficiently establish'd and secur'd. He will disband and dismantle his Armies and Towns, if he has any, should have been added, and consent to the Payment of the Debts of the Nation, which the Parliament were resolv'd to see paid, whether he consented or not. Such Propositions were but Waste of Time and Paper. The Parliament have the Power, and consequently will have the Terms. He knew what they were, and the endeavouring to evade them was equally vain and dangerous.

The Royalists, playing their last Cards, were in the mean while very industrious in fomenting Differences in the Parliament, Army, and City; and they were all blind enough not to see it and guard against it. Ambition, Avarice, Pique, Resentment, Revenge, and false Zeal began to operate, now their Work with the King was pretty well over: The Cavaliers durst not speak out, but under various Pretexts increas'd the Misunderstandings between all of them. The Lord-Mayor Sir John Gayer, the Aldermen and Common-Council of London, presented a Remonstrance to both Houses of Parliament, the City Res- Twenty-sixth of May, desiring a strict Course for suppressing all private and separate for Perse- Congre-cution.

The King at Newcastle.

A. D. 1646. Congregations; that all Anabaptists, Heretics, &c. as not conform'd to the publick Discipline, may be declar'd and proceeded against.

These worshipful Persons were themselves persecuted five or six Years ago; and now having the Power, as they thought, in their Hands, are themselves very eager for Persecution. This ought to have been a Lesson to their Brethren in our own Days, who could not but have heard how many thousand Reverend Divines had been ruin'd for not submitting to the Tyranny of Subscription after the Restoration, and yet they themselves a few Years since were very zealous to compel Ministers to subscribe. The Citizens proceed, That all be requir'd to obey the Government settled, or to be settled; That none disaffected to the Presbyterian Government be employ'd in any Place of Publick Trust. If I had learnt Eckard's Partiality by reading him, I would have sunk this Remonstrance, it highly reflecting on a Body of Men whom I respect; but I am sensible this narrow Spirit is what they are now alham'd of, and this will be no Example to them for the future. It was levell'd directly against the Army, where Cromwel, Ireton, Lambert, Harrison, and almost all the chief Officers, were disaffected to the Presbytery; and finding themselves struck at, began to think of securing and maintaining themselves. Again, That the Propositions of Peace may be hasten'd. This Article was very Cavalier. By hastening the Peace was always understood the receiving the King. Again, That the Privilege of Parliament may be so qualify'd, that Men may recover their Debts; which was a tacit Reproach to the House of Commons, as if the Members of it defrauded their Creditors by that Privilege. That the Publick Revenues may be employ'd to publick Use, and the City Taxes abated; another Reproach that the Members of Parliament misapply'd the Money that was rais'd for the Service of the Common Wealth. That the Compositions of Delinquents may be employ'd to pay the Debts owing the City; That the Committee of Haberdashers Hall may be dissolv'd: A kind of Committee for Taxes, who were empower'd to compound with Delinquents, to prosecute such as refus'd or delay'd to pay the Contributions requir'd by Ordinances. This was a very popular Article among the Royalists and Disaffected, Haberdashers Hall being as terrible to them as the High Commission Court was to the Puritans. However, in the Close of their Remonstrance they soften the Matter, and say, They would not have it interpreted to intrench upon the Privilege of Parliament, whom they are ready to serve; whereas they intrench'd upon their Government from the Beginning to the End of their Remonstrance, and directed them what they should do. The House of Commons express'd great Offence at it, and, according to Whitlocke, "many sober Men were unsatisfy'd with this "Action of the City, looking upon it as wholly "a Design of the Presbyterian Party; but the "House of Lords acknowledg'd the great Service and Merit of the City, and gave them "Thanks for this Testimony of their Duty and "good Affections." Tho' the Royalists were no further the better for this Misunderstanding between the House of Commons and the City, than that they were both the worse for it, yet they were wonderfully elated at it, and by their bold Behaviour so incens'd the Parliament and Army, that they compleated their own and their Master's Ruin.

The King's last Propositions were approv'd of by many of the House of Commons, and in Truth they were a good Foundation for a Treaty, had the Point of Security been a little better explain'd, and had not the Weakness and Rashness of the Royalists exasperated the major Part of the Parliament and Army, and put Thoughts into their Heads of which they had not till then been susceptible. For nothing can be more obvious; than that a little more Moderation, Discretion, Forbearance, and Compliance in the King and the King's Followers, would have prevented the tragical Catastrophe of the Civil War.

The above-cited Remonstrance produc'd a Counter one, intituled, A Petition from many Remonstrants of London, setting forth the Power of the Parliament, and the Labour and Successes of the present Parliament, which cause the more Opposition against them, and praying them to proceed in managing the Affairs of the Kingdom according to their own best Wisdoms, and the Trust reposed in them, and to punish Delinquents and procure Peace. That they would never suffer the free-born People of England to be enslav'd, upon what Pretence soever, nor any other to share with the Parliament, or prescribe to them in the Government or Power of this Nation, and the Petitioners will stand by them with their Lives and Fortunes. This Petition was counter to the former from the City, and now, says Whitlocke, the Designs were to make Divisions, Arms beginning to fail. The Royalists were soon detected in their Politicks, which seldom had any Depth in them. The Parliamentarians saw as plainly as the Quarter of the Wind, whence came the Differences and Divisions that were rising among them like so many Clouds; but the Variety of particular Interests to be reconcil'd before the general one could be secur'd, render'd it impossible to hinder the Effects which always attend Discord, Confusion, and Overthrow. These Petitioners were thank'd by the House of Commons, as the Remonstrancers had been thank'd by the House of Lords; and is it not great Pity that their Lorpships should not have more consider'd their own Dignity and Safety, than to give into Designs which led so directly to their Ruin? For what could be more natural than to foresee that the Party in the House which were against the Remonstrancers would be supported by the Army; That all Opposition against them would be in vain; and that the only Way to a safe and lasting Peace, was to unite heartily in the most proper Methods of procuring it.

In all Propositions of Peace the Affair of the Church was the first Article, but that of the Militia the most important; for can there be in Reason and Argument greater Nonsense and Contradiction, than that the King, who had utterly extirpated Episcopacy in Scotland, should sacrifice his Life for it in England, where also we shall find, when it is too late, that he consents to abolish it? The Militia was a Concession which secur'd the People's Liberty against future Invasions, and without the Militia the Parliament could not secure their Presbytery against the Zeal and Power of the King, who being resolv'd to have the Power still in him to govern after the Civil War as he had done before, was obstinate in the Point of the Militia, but struck at the Church first, it being the first Article.

The Earl of Clarendon informs us, that Sir Sir William Davenant, whose Poetry and Politicks liam Davenant were much of a Piece, was sent to the Queen to prevail with the King to give up the Church, as sent to the he terms it, and then explains what is to be Queen for understood by it, the Lands belonging to Cathedral Presbyteries. He adds, That to set up Presbytery was profane and sacrilegious, and to gratify the Lust and Impiety of the Scots, which the Marquis

A. D. 1646. quis de Bellievre, the Minister of France, very much press'd the King to do; but he was too conscientious, says the Earl, for if he had given up the Church, he must have given up the Earl, with the other Delinquents, and that would have been as profane and sacrilegious as the other, considering how his Lordship very modestly commends himself, where he makes the King say of him, He is an honest Man, and will never desert me nor the Church.

I have often observ'd upon what rotten Foundations the Royalists built their magnificent Fabricks, and now the Earl tells us, If the Prince of Wales had staid in Cornwall, his Residence might have been secure: Scilly and Pendennis might always be reliev'd by Sea, where the Parliament were Masters, and Oxford, Worcester, Wallingford, and Ludlow, were not taken, which upon any Divisions among them might have turn'd the Scale; that is, those Garrisons, which were all impatient to surrender, might have beaten Sir Thomas Fairfax's victorious Army. If there had been better Politicks in any one Page of his Lordship's History, this should have been spar'd for the Sake of it.

The King
and the Scots.

His Majesty continuing resolv'd not to yield to the Parliament's Propositions, the Scots told him by their Lord Chancellor Lowdon, "That the Parliament, after many bloody Battles, had got into their Hands the strong Holds and Forts of the Kingdom; That they had his Revenues, Excise, Assessments, Sequestrations, and Power to raise all the Men and Money of the Kingdom; That they had gain'd Victory over all, and had a strong Army to maintain it, so that they might do what they would with Church and State; and without he granted their Propositions, the Kingdom and his People could not be in Safety; That if he refus'd his Assent, he would lose all his Friends in Parliament, lose the City, and lose the Country; and if he left England, he would not be admitted to come to reign in Scotland, which had been declar'd by the General Assembly of the Kirk." The King, according to the Lord Clarendon, bad them proceed their own Way, and tho' they had all forsaken him, God had not. Pagan History has nothing like it. To say it is Noonday at Midnight is Modesty to it; for is there the least Appearance that can be, that Arbitrary Power, Oppression, Persecution, Superstition, are a Cause that God will not forsake. But the Argument was as good as the Prophecy, and it is very probable his Majesty never said it. The Parliament had voted, That the King, in going to the Scots Army, intended to prolong the War, and to make a Difference between the Two Kingdoms. They also voted, June the 9th, That this Kingdom hath no more Need of the Scots Army, and that the Scots Commissioners should be desired to take Orders that their Army might be withdrawn out of this Kingdom. Upon which the Scots Commissioners deliver'd a Paper, containing in Substance, "That they desire to depart, and will deliver up such Towns and Castles as they have: They desire to have Consideration for their Losses and Hazards, Charges and Damages, Part in present Money, and Security for the rest; and his Majesty not having consented to the Propositions, that a Way may be thought upon, by joint Advice, for the Security of both Kingdoms.

The Way which the Parliament of England thought of, was reduc'd to Nineteen Propositions.

1. "To take away all Oaths and Proclamations against the Parliament and their Actions.
2. "To sign the Covenant, and an Act for the general taking of it.
3. "To pass an Act to abolish Bishops, &c.
4. "To confirm the Assembly of Divines.
5. "That Religion be settled as both Houses shall agree.
6. "Unity and Uniformity of Religion to be settled by an Act.
7. "An Act against Jesuits, Papists, &c.
8. "An Act for educating Papists Children in the Protestant Religion.
9. "The Penalties against Papists.
10. "Against saying Mass in any Place.
11. "The like for Scotland, as they shall think fit.
12. "For the due Observance of the Lord's Day.
13. "The Militia to be in the Parliament for 20 Years, so for Scotland, with the Power to raise Monies, and use the Militia.
14. "All Honours and Titles since the Great Seal was carry'd from the Parliament, to be void, and no Peer to be made but by Consent of both Houses.
15. "To confirm the Treaty between England and Scotland, and Conservators of the Peace to be appointed.
16. "To establish the Declaration of both Kingdoms of the 30th of June, 1643, with the Qualifications of Exception from Pardon, both English and Scots, and the Names of those made incapable of Office, and such as have deserted the Parliament.
17. "To make void the Cessation in Ireland, the War there to be left to the Parliament, and the same Religion to be settled there as in England.
18. "The Militia and the Tower of London to be in the Government of the City, and their Charters to be confirm'd.
19. "All Grants and Process under the Great Seal here, to be confirm'd, and all by any other Great Seal to be void, and the like for Ireland, and all Honours granted since the Cessation there, to be void.

These Particulars to be pass'd by several Acts of Parliament.

The Commissioners appointed to attend the King with these Propositions, were for the Lords, the Earls of Pembroke and Suffolk; for the Commons, Sir John Hippestey, Sir Walter Earl, Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Goodwin, who arriv'd at Newcastle the 25th of July, and were well receiv'd by his Majesty, as was also Duke Hamilton; but, says the judicious Echard, at the very Moment he kiss'd the King's Hand, there happen'd a prodigious Storm of Thunder and Lightning, without any preceding Appearance, in the Midst of a fair Day. What then! What did this presage! His Blazing Star in Libra prognosticated that Queen Anne would die of a Dropsy, which had long afflicted her: But what doth this Thunder and Lightning prognosticate! Duke Hamilton lost his Head for the King, whose Hand he kiss'd. The Silliness of this Remark is without Example. When the Commissioners deliver'd the Propositions to his Majesty, the Earl of Pembroke told him, He knew well what a Spokesman he was, therefore he desir'd Mr. Goodwin might speak for him. The King presently ask'd, If they had any Power to treat. They answer'd, No. Then said he, Saving

A. D. 1646. Saving the Honour of the Business, an honest Trumpeter might have done as much. I hope you expect not a present Answer to this high Concernment. The Air is always the same; his Majesty had been often told, that the Parliament would proceed by Bills, and not a Treaty. Sir Thomas Fairfax, in the Letter already mention'd, gives the Reason for it, the Insincerity of former Treaties; yet the Parliament's Commissioners could get no other Answer, than an Offer for a Personal Treaty at London, which had been so often rejected.

Of the same Authority with Eikon Basilike, is what the Archdeacon inserts of the King's Dispute with Mr. Henderson, the Scots Presbyterian Minister, who, according to the Earl of Clarendon, dy'd of Grief, and Heart-broken, for his having taken the Covenant and acting against Episcopacy. Sanderson, who was as zealous a Churchman as the Earl, assures us, He fell into a Distemper at Newcastle, and therefore was sent home to Scotland, where he dy'd; and Whitlocke, That he dy'd of Grief, because he could not persuade the King to sign the Propositions. 'Tis very hard that one can't have one Word of Truth from them, Echard again, IF his Majesty's Army had been as strong as his Arguments, he had been every Way invincible. Henderson's Arguments were Texts of Scripture, the King's the Authority of the Fathers, which, as we are told by Mr. Archdeacon, triumph'd over the Word of God.

When the Parliament's Commissioners came to Newcastle, his Majesty was engag'd with the famous Mr. Henderson; and in Whitlocke we read of another sort of Engagement about the same Time, and that was with the Irish REBELS, in Robert King, one of the Parliament's Commissioners in Ireland, bringing thence the Marquis of Ormond's Treaty of Peace with those Butchers, which however had not the intended Effect, for the Pope's Nuncio and the most bigotted of the REBELS, disclaim'd the Treaty made by their Commissioners, and prosecuted the War to their Destruction. Whitlocke informs us, that the Commissioners of both Kingdoms begg'd the King on their Knees to sign the Propositions, but he was inflexible, of which more hereafter.

We have seen already, that the Earl of Clarendon was of Opinion, that IF Pendennis Castle, Ragland Castle, Wallingford, Ludlow, &c. had not surrender'd so soon, their standing out might have turn'd the Scale, after every other City, Town and Castle in England were reduc'd; and both the Earl and the Archdeacon make it a wonderful Condescension in his Majesty to send Warrants to Sir Thomas Glemham Governor of Oxford, Sir Thomas Tilsley Governor of Worcester, Col. Washington Governor of Banbury, Col. Blague Governor of Wallingford, and all other Governors of Cities, Towns, Castles, and Forts in England and Wales, to quit the Places, and disband their Forces, neither of which could they have maintain'd much longer. Sir Thomas Fairfax came before Oxford the 1st of May, and having settled the several Quarters of the Army in order for an Attack, he sent a Summons to Sir Thomas Glemham the Governor the 11th of May, who desir'd a safe Conduct for Sir John Monson and Mr. Philip Warwick, the renown'd Memoir Writer, to confer with him, or whom he pleas'd to appoint, who were Col. Rainsborough, Col. Harley, and Col. Lambert. All that Monson and Warwick propos'd, was to send to the King to know his Pleasure about the Surrender of that chief City of his Residence, this being some Weeks before the Warrant for the general Surrender arriv'd at Oxford or elsewhere, that Proposal being only to delay Time. Sir Thomas Fairfax's Commissioners represented to Sir Thomas Glemham's the Vanity of such a Delay, and the Advantage of treating before the Attack was begun. But they having no Power to treat, a Trumpet was sent back with them for a positive Answer; and in the mean Time the Line went forward, and Order was given for drawing up of the Batteries. Upon which on the 14th of May the Governor made known his Desire to treat, which was agreed to, and Mr. Crook's House at Marston appointed to be the Place.

The Commissioners named on both Sides were,

For the King.

Sir John Monson, Sir John Heydon, Sir George Bynion, Sir Thomas Gardiner, Sir Richard Willis, Sir Stephen Hawkins, Col. Gofnold, Col. Tyllier, Dr. Zouch, Thomas Christy, Esq; Mr. John Dutton, Mr. Jeffery Palmer, Capt. Robert Mead, M. A. Mr. Philip Warwick.

For the Parliament.

Lieutenant General Hammond, Col. Ireton, Col. Lambert, Col. Rich, Col. Harley, Col. Watson, Major Desborough, Major Harrison, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Waller.

The General excepted against Sir George Bynion, as being exempted from Pardon by the Parliament's Propositions; and it is observable that this Person had been only an ordinary Silkman in Cheap-side, but such another busy Fellow as Jones the Gun Man in Sacheverell's Time. Being oblig'd to leave the City of London, he was well receiv'd by the Court at Oxford, made not only a Knight, but a Politician, and advanc'd from a Counter to a Court. The Parliament were oblig'd to content themselves with the Quality of their People as they found it; and the Earl of Clarendon does not a little value his Cause on the Dignity of those who espous'd it. The Parliament indeed could make nothing but Soldiers, but the King made Knights and Lords too, tho' the Parliament would not own them, as well in the War Time as out of it. Mr. Herbert, one of the Commissioners for the Parliament, is the same who was afterwards Sir Thomas Herbert, who with Mr. Harrington waited on the King as Groom of his Bed-Chamber from his Confinement at Holdenby to his Death. The Treaty for the Surrender of Oxford commenc'd before his Majesty arriv'd at Newcastle, and was almost concluded before Sir Thomas Glemham, the Governor, could know his Majesty's Pleasure in it. It spun out to such a Length of Time, about five Weeks, on Account of the General's sending the Articles to London to be consider'd, and confirm'd by the Parliament.

While the Treaty lasted, Radcot House was surrender'd by Colonel Palmer to Colonel Saunderson, and Farrington by Sir George Lister to Sir Robert Pye, and Farron Condition to have the Benefit of the Oxford Articles, which were very beneficial to the Royalists. The City had been fortify'd with the utmost Art and Industry, and the Parliament were not willing their Army should be detain'd by the Siege while the Scots were in the North, and had the King's Person with them. Little Incidents very often give great Turns to the Fortune of States; and wise Statesmen will leave as little as possible in her Power. The Parliament Army were sure enough of doing the Work they

A. D. 1646. they were upon; but the doing it without Bloodshed was thought most eligible, and therefore the Commissioners on their Part were the more generous in their Terms, which being concluded, the City was surrender'd on Midsummer Day. The Articles were sign'd by the General on one Part, and by Sir Richard Lane, the King's Lord Keeper, Francis Lord Costington, the King's Lord Treasurer, William Marquis of Hertford, Edward Earl of Dorset, Thomas Earl of Southampton, Francis Earl of Chichester, Francis Lord Seymour, Sir Thomas Glemham, and Sir Edward Nicholas on the other. On Wednesday, June the 24th, there march'd out Eastward 3000 Soldiers in a Body, 500 march'd Northward, and a little before and after them 500 more mostly Horsemen and private Persons engag'd in the War. On the Monday before Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, with their Attendants, departed. The Duke of Tork was to remain till he could more decently be remov'd to London. Whitlocke observes that no Injury nor Affront was offer'd by the Parliament's Soldiers to those of the Garrison, but all the Articles were punctually perform'd. There went forth several Irish Men and Irish Women, and after the Governor was march'd away, the Keys of the City were presented to the General, who order'd three Regiments of Foot to enter the Town, between whom and the Citizens was courteous Language, not a reproachful or uncivil Word by any of the Army to them, nor the least Disorder. There was little Provision found in the Town, either for Man or Horse, which shews that the Garrison could not have held out much longer. The Conditions, says Sander-son, upon which Echard builds much of his stately Edifice, were but slenderly perform'd. "Surely, says Whitlocke, no Action or Agreement, either of War or Peace was ever more punctually observ'd than was this of Oxford Articles," which were first broken on the King's Side by Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, in coming so near London as Oatlands, upon which the Parliament sent an express Order to them to transport themselves beyond Sea in 10 Days. The Two Princes return'd a very respectful Answer, That they were sorry they had given the Parliament any Offence; had no Intention to do it, and would obey their Order: Then had the Prince Elector leave to go to see them; and if you will believe Echard or Sander-son, they receiv'd his Visit with Scorn. They had been just mortify'd with this Rebuke from the Parliament, and just order'd to be gone out of the Kingdom. They must needs be in a very scornful Humour; and their elder Brother the Prince Elector, knew little of it, or he would not have made a Journey on purpose to see them, and to be so scornfully treated by them.

Fast Oxon. p. 58. Notwithstanding the mutual Civilities between the Parliament's Soldiers and the Citizens of Oxford, as reported by Whitlocke, A. Wood represents the Place as thrown into the utmost Distraction by the Ministers in General Fairfax's Army, who preach'd rascally Doctrine, one of them a diabolical Villain; There was nothing but Confusion and Darknes: Hell was broke loose, and the Orthodox overrun by Blasphemers. I am not at all surpriz'd to meet with this Way of Thinking and Speaking in an Oxford Writer. I know what is the Eloquence, Elegance, Politeness and Temper of a College Spirit, such as A. Wood's, reckon'd an Ornament to this Seat of the Muses; and though the Earl of Clarendon's and Archdeacon Echard's Language is somewhat more purify'd, yet the Sentiments in their Histories agree exactly with those of A. A. D. Wood the Oxonian.

In the City were left the Sword of State, the Great Seal, the Privy Seal, the Chancery, the King's-Bench, the Exchequer Seals, which being carry'd to London were all broken by a Blacksmith, in the Presence of the Two Houses, who were extraordinarily assembled on Purpose to assist at that Ceremony, August the 11th.

About the Time of Fairfax's coming before Oxford, Archbishop Williams betook himself to his strong House of Pury, near Conway in North Wales, and put a Garrison into it, declaring for the Parliament. Whatever was the Occasion of his Disgust, whether it was his being suspected by the King, or resenting the large Contributions that were rais'd by the Royalists in his Precincts; it is most certain he apply'd himself to Major General Mitton for Assistance against the Lord Byron. We are told by Whitlocke, "He perswaded the Country against paying Contribution to the King; and the Lord Byron hearing of his Revolt sent out a Party from Conway, to besiege him; but the Archbishop sending to Major General Mitton for Assistance, the latter drew out a Party to intercept, and wrote to the Parliament how ready the Archbishop was to promote their Affairs, particularly for reducing the Castle of Conway, in which, and in all other Matters, he was very active for them." After we have read this in such authentick Memoirs as Whitlocke's, how must one be diverted with the Pains taken by Bishop Hacket, Mr. Ambrose Philips, Harmer, and others, to prove the Archbishop never took Arms for the Parliament. The Earl of Clarendon could not have minc'd the Matter better than a Welsh Author; he only garrison'd his own House, and discountenanc'd some stragling Cavaliers. Indeed the Usage he had met with was enough to provoke a more moderate Man than the Archbishop of Tork; for in the Beginning of the War he had fortify'd his Castle of Aberconway for the King, in which A. Wood and others, tell us, He spar'd not any Cost or Labour to make it tenable; but then his Majesty and Privy Council suspecting he would not be faithful to him, they put a Commander therein, Sir John Owen, and in a Manner, thrust the Archbishop out of his own House, which is not the only Instance of the prodigious Effects of the Oxford Counsels. Whereupon taking these Matters in high Disdain, he retir'd to his House at Pury, not far from Aberconway, and afterwards obtain'd some Forces from a Parliament Colonel, with which he set upon Aberconway Castle, took it, and kept Possession of it to his dying Day; and he was for so doing call'd Persidious Prelate, Apostate Archbishop, Shame of the Clergy, &c. by the King's Friends, whom we have had too much occasion to blame for being foul mouth'd, especially the Academicks. Sander-son says he was bold, malepert, petulant, impudent. One would think their writing and reading so much courtly History, their being conversant with such well bred Persons, should have taught them a little more Manners; but the Truth is, their Breeding was no better than their Bravery, and they were always in too great a Rage to observe Decorum.

It is hardly worth while, after so many illustrious Actions, to bestow Pains on small Sieges and Skirmishes, which remain unrelated. Banbury, after a long Siege, was surrender'd by Sir William Compton to Colonel Whalley, and soon after Colonel Washington deliver'd up the City of Worcester to Colonel Rainsborough; but Wor- it was not in Obedience to the King's Order, cetter, for

A. D. 1646. for that was publish'd six Weeks before. On the 22d of July, Wallingford Castle was surrender'd by Colonel Blague, to the General, whose Forces in Cornwall reduc'd Pendennis Castle, valiantly defended by John Arundel of Trerice, Esq; but not as valiantly attack'd by Colonel Fortescue, at the Close of the Siege, there being no likelihood of that Garrison's receiving any Relief, Captain Batten blocking them up by Sea. Colonel Fortescue's Patience was exercis'd to prevent the Shedding of more Blood, a Consideration which had very little Weight with the Royalists; however it did at last work upon Arundel, the Governor of Pendennis, and he desir'd a Treaty, which was granted, and Commissioners nam'd.

For the Parliament.

Colonel John St. Arwin, Sir John Ascue, Colonel Robert Bennet, Lieutenant Colonel Edward Herle, Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Fitch, High Sheriff of Cornwall, Lieutenant Colonel Richard Townsend, Major Thomas Jennings, Captain Walter Maynard.

Who agreed that the Garrison, Officers excepted, should march to Arwinch Downs, and there lay down their Arms. The Prince of Wales's Servants to pass with their Bag and Baggage; 500 Pounds were to be paid to the Garrison Officers and Soldiers, who were in Streights to enable them to remove from the Castle. Not far off it is the Mount which Sir William Bassett the Governor surrender'd to Colonel Hamilton, who found there Duke Hamilton, and gave him a Pass for London, where that Duke waited at the Door of the House of Commons, and thank'd the Members for his Liberty. Saltcombe Fort had before been deliver'd up to Colonel Welden, by Colonel Fortescue, a Cavalier, and Borstal House by Sir William Compton, to the General, who had before given it a short Visit in his March to Naseby, and because he would not be interrupted in his Pursuit of the King, and did not at that Time continue the Siege, Eckard and all their Historians cry out, He was beaten off from Borstal.

All that remains to be reduc'd, is Ragland Castle, except three or four petty Garrisons in North Wales, which were not minded, Major General Mitton being order'd to starve them rather than hazard his own Men about them. The old Marquis of Worcester stood out still at Ragland, against Colonel Morgan, who commanded the Blockade there. At last General Fairfax went thither in Person from Bath, where he had been for his Health; and after several Letters had pass'd between him and the Marquis, the latter surrender'd his Castle, August the 19th, in great Glory, that it was the last Place which held out for the King, though he had something else to boast of, as that he had spent in Money, and suffer'd in Losses and Damages 300000 Pounds in the Cause of the Star Chamber Court, High Commission Court, Book of Sports, Ship Money, &c. which his Posterity no Doubt will always take more Pride in telling than we do. General Fairfax sent to Mitton, he would send him more Men if he wanted them; but the latter reply'd there was no Need of them, as was apparent in the Sequel; for within a few Days the King had not a Man in Arms for him in any Part of England or Wales. 1646. The Parliament sent Orders to the General to disband Major General Massey's Brigade at the Maj. Gen. Deuizes, which he did, and in eight Days disbanded 2500 Horse. The Major General himself and Colonel Cooke assisting him; but I cannot believe what a certain Roundheaded Writer says, That divers of the Disbanded came from very remote Countries, and had Passes, some for Egypt, some for Mesopotamia, some for Ethiopia: I cannot, I say, believe that the Ethiopians, Mesopotamians and Egyptians came to fight for the Parliament; but I do verily believe that Irish and French Papists came to fight for the King.

The Civil War being thus ended in four Years End of the Time, from the King's Beginning it, by setting up his Standard at Nottingham the 22d of August, 1642. to General Fairfax's Ending it by taking Ragland Castle, August the 19th, 1646, the General as soon as he was recover'd of a fore Fit of the Stone, went to London: He was met some Miles off by the Militia of the City, and many Thousands of Citizens, and the Parliament congratulated him; the Lords by their Speaker, the Earl of Manchester, the Commons by their Speaker, William Lenthall, Esq; which was done with very great Ceremony.

The Parliament having now no Enemy in England, to divert them from the Affairs of Ireland, began to take them into serious Consideration, and order'd the Forces in the Counties of Oxon, Berks and Bucks, to be dispos'd of for that Service, being Forces that had serv'd in Garrisons, and not Part of Sir Thomas Fairfax's Army. If they had continu'd to complement that Army thus, there is no Doubt but they would have been obedient to them; but as soon as the Parliament shew'd a Jealousy of their Continuance, and talk'd of disbanding them, the Soldiery let them see that it must be done with their own Consent. Major General Langhorn's Forces lying about Milford, were thought most proper to be transported to Ireland, which was order'd accordingly; and that all Soldiers in the several Counties, who would list for the Service should have a Month's Pay extraordinary, and those that would not list be disbanded, which began to create ill Blood; but the Distemper broke not out till the grand Resolution pass'd, that 12000 Men of the Army should be transported to Ireland; and to please the Soldiers, Major General Skippon, who was much in their Favour, was appointed to command them.

In the mean while the Scots Arrears and Demands were under Audit, the Sum amounting to above a Million; but some of the Articles were so extravagant that they admitted much Litigation; and to shorten the Matter, the Scots Commissioners offer'd to lump it at 500000 Pounds: The English Commissioners offer'd 200000 Pounds down, and 200000 Pounds at several after Payments, which the Scots accepting, Major General Skippon was order'd to convoy that vast Sum to Newcastle in ready Cash, for which there were about forty Waggons laden with Silver. The Money was lent by the City of London to be repaid out of Delinquents Estates and Bishops Lands. The English Parliament were oblig'd in Honour to pay the Scots their Arrears, and make good the Agreement with them upon their coming to their Assistance. It is not pretended there was not 200000 Pounds due to them, and they never receiv'd a Penny more. But because as a Consequence of this new Compact, Arrears due to the Scots paid.

A. D. 1646. past, much short of the Debt to the Scots, the latter were to deliver up their Garrisons, and march out of the Kingdom without the King, it is very whimsically call'd a Selling of him. The Parliament appointed a new Committee of both Houses, September the 22d, to treat with the Scots Commissioners about disposing of the Person of the King, which the Scots asserted they had an equal Right to with the English: To which the Parliament of England made a very good Answer in their Arguments to justify this Assertion; We do affirm that the Kingdom of Scotland hath no Right of joint Exercise or Interest in disposing of the Person of the King in the Kingdom of England: To which the Scots Commissioners made seven Objections, and the Parliament's Answers shew them to be weak enough. But there is an Argument in the Declaration of the House of Commons, which neither the Author of the four last Reigns in the Compleat History of England, nor Mr. Archdeacon Echar'd, nor any other Ecclesiastical Historian, nor Cavalier Writer say a Word of: "The Question is, Who shall dispose of the Person of the King in England? and not after what Manner his Person shall be dispos'd; and it is to be consider'd in what Condition the King now is; That he hath deserted his Parliament and People, enter'd into and continu'd in a bloody and dangerous War against them, hath not granted those Propositions that were sent to him by both the Kingdoms of England, and Scotland, as the Means of a safe and well grounded Peace, and therefore is not for the present in a Condition to exercise the Duties of his Place, or be left to go or reside where and when he pleaseth; and your Lordships, the Scots Commissioners, did your selves declare, that it was prejudicial to both Kingdoms for the King to go into Scotland." The new Committee brought the Scots to a Compliance in this Matter, and it was agreed that the Scots Army should march out of England, and leave the King at Newcastle, where Commissioners from the Two Houses should be ready to wait upon him, and conduct him to the Place nam'd in their Instructions. The King and his Party car'd not what Blood was shed, what Treasure wasted, what Spoil and Devastation were made, if the Struggle in their Behalf could be kept on Foot. Warwick and every one about the King knew that Fairfax's Army could have driven him and the Scots Army out of Great Britain, if the Parliament of England had not wisely consider'd that the Scots were their Brethren, and their Interests, as Protestants, inseparable; that the Money they were to receive was their Due, and a great deal more had the Account been stated with Rigour, and that it would be both unreasonable and unjust to obtain that by Force which they could have by Treaty. This Treaty is what the Cavalier Historians exclaim against as a Bargain and Sale, which is equally absurd and ridiculous. The Scots Convention confirm'd the Agreement made by their Commissioners: The Money to be paid them was due to them long before the King came to their Army: Add to this, it was not possible for the Scots to keep him without a War, and they were not so enamour'd with the Cause as to enter into one with the Conquerors, to espouse it when it was desperate; for the Spirits as well as Fortunes of the Royalists were broken: They were in Despair and Impotence, and in no likelihood of being able to give them such Assistance as would enable them to cope with the Power of the English Parliament. If they had suffer'd the King to make his Escape, the Place he would have gone to was Ireland, A. B. 1646. and the Party he would have rely'd upon the Irish REBELS, whom of all Creatures upon Earth the Scots most abhor'd, and who indeed were the Abhorrence of every good Man who ever heard of them. There was not a Prince the Situation of the King's Quarrel. The Parliament's Army was a Terror to all the Nations around them. France was in a Minority, Spain in Declension, the Dutch hated Episcopacy, for which the King had been fighting with his People; Denmark was weaken'd by her late Losses in Germany, and at the best in no Condition to defy the Commonwealth of England, Sweden was all along a Well-wisher to the Parliament, out of Jealousy of the Dane, who now and then talk'd big against the Swede. What would these fine Politicians have had the Scots do with the King? Or what would he have done with himself better than a Compliance with the Two Houses, while they were in Temper to receive it? Should they have sent him to Montrose, that the Plunderings and Burnings might be renew'd in Scotland, as when that Lord was riding Post there with Victory behind him?

On the Eighth of December a full Agreement was made with the Scots Commissioners, that when 100000 Pounds came to Topcliff in Yorkshire, the Scots should give Hostages to quit all their Quarters, Possessions and Garrisons on the South Side of Tyne, within 10 Days, when the Hostages were to be re-deliver'd; and upon the Delivery of the other 100000 Pounds on the North Side of Newcastle, the Scots should give Hostages to march out of England, and quit the Garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle, within 10 Days. There was another 200000 Pounds talk'd of; the Scots were to take the Parliament's Word for it; and probably they would have paid them if they had not foolishly invaded England, a few Months after to procure the Liberty of that Prince whom they now deliver'd up to Prison. General Fairfax was order'd to appoint the Convoy for the Cash, and he appointed Major General Skippon, Sir William Selby, Mr. Delaval, Sir Edward Loftus, Sir Thomas Trollop, Sir Henry Mildmay, Sir William Broughton, who were agreed upon to be Hostages with General Leven for Performance of the Stipulations on the Parliament's Side, who appointed the Earl of Stamford for the Lords, and Mr. Asburst and Mr. Goodwin for the Commons, to go to Edinburgh, and satisfy the Scots Convention as to all Proceedings.

About this Time the Presbyterians stickled much to have Church Government settled after the Scots Model; and the Royalists, who hated Presbytery, privately instigated them to insist upon it: The latter had no other Game to play but to sow the Seeds of Discord, which in Time produc'd them a plentiful Harvest. Whistlocke observes this Debate about Church Government was intended to raise Divisions, which were the Cause of all the Mischiefs that beset the Presbyterians and their Dissenting Brethren afterwards. Had they now seriously consider'd that the Laudian Persecution had created all those Discontents which ended in the Ruin of the Persecutors, and that the creating new Discontents could not fail of the like ill Consequence; That all the Denominations could not support themselves against the Church, but by the Power of the Army, they would certainly have come to an Understanding with those Ministers, and that People whose Principles the Army espous'd, and have yielded them full Liberty of Conscience, and the full Privilege of Englishmen, which if they they had done without insisting on the Suppression of Independants and Baptists, they might have supported their Superiority by their Numbers, and their Wealth, and have prevented those Divisions that naturally grew out of Jealousy and Opposition. It is most certain they were the Aggressors by their so frequent troubling the Parliament with Petitions against their Protestant Brethren, who daily got Ground in the good Will of the Soldiery, as the Soldiery daily got Ground in their Influence on the Parliament, who appointed a Committee to consider of a new Petition in Agitation in the City by the Presbyterian Party, which they said might tend much to endanger the publick Peace. One Sir David Watkins was very forward in this Business, and reported on the Exchange, that Sir John Evelyn, a Member of Parliament should say, Since the Citizens of London intend to come to the House of Commons in a tumultuous Manner, he thought Sir Thomas Fairfax's Army should be sent for to quell them, which was false, and he was question'd for it, as done with a Design to exasperate the Citizens, and increase the Misintelligence between the Parliament and them. Sir David being examin'd, said he was told so by one Mr. Drake, and Mr. Drake upon Examination, declar'd he had it from one Dr. Aldwyn; by which one may easily perceive from what Quarter the growing Jealousies and Divisions came, and that the Cavaliers, though they had not Wit enough to do themselves Good, had enough to do Mischief to others. They were like Moles working under Ground, and turning up the Earth in the finest Borders of the Garden.

The City Petition
again.

The Petition was presented by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, Common Council, and several Citizens, December the 19th, first to the Lords, from whom they had Thanks; then to the Commons, who after much Debate thank'd them for their good Services in general, and appointed a Day to consider of the Petition, which in Fact was not the true Sense of the City, but of a Party under the Direction of the Lord Mayor, Sir John Warner, and Serjeant Glyn, the Recorder; for another Petition from a Considerable Party, as we are told by Whitlocke, was obtain'd against it, as there was against the Remonstrance a few Weeks before: And thus did both Parties, blinded by Passion or Zeal, drive one another into the Snare which the common Enemy had prepar'd for them. The House of Commons voted that the Petition was a Breach of their Privilege, and then appointed a Committee to consider the Particulars of it, who to please the Petitioners, agreed that no Minister should preach unless he was regularly ordain'd by the Presbytery, which farther disgusted the Independants, and made them throw themselves intirely upon the Army for Protection.

King's Person.

In the Disposal of the King's Person, there was a Disagreement between the Lords and Commons, and the like Disagreement happen'd too often when they had no Body to quarrel with but themselves. The Lords voted that the King should come to Newmarket, the Commons that he should come to Holmby House in Northamptonshire, and the Lords at last agreed to it. Things being so ripe for Execution, the Scots Commissioners in London sent to the Parliament to acquaint them with their speedy going home to Scotland, and desir'd to know what farther Service they had to command them to the Parliament of Scotland. Both Houses agreed that Thanks should be given the Scots Commissioners for all their Pains and good Services, and Notice taken of their last Respect to them. The Scots talk'd very sturdily, says the Earl of Clarendon, as appears by these Votes of their Parliament at Edinburgh.

A. D.
1646.

1. That Scotland shall be govern'd as it hath been for the five last Years, all Means being used against the King.

2. That the taking the Covenant and passing the Propositions doth not give Warrant to assist him against England.

3. That upon bare taking the Covenant the Scots may not receive him.

4. That the Clause in the Covenant for Defence of the King's Person, is to be understood in Defence and Safety of the Kingdom.

5. That the King shall not exercise any Power in Scotland till he hath granted the Propositions concerning Religion and the Covenant, and given a satisfactory Answer to both Kingdoms, in the rest of the Propositions presented him at Newcastle.

6. That if his Majesty refuse to pass those Propositions, he shall be disposed of according to the Covenant, &c.

How sturdily they talk in Behalf of the King? These Votes were pass'd by the Lords and Commons of Scotland; yet Richard's Bishop Guthry affirms, there were a hundred to one against them in the Parliament, and out of it. I guest at the Authority of this Guthry before I came to this singular Evidence of it; and he has no better Buttrices for his superb Edifice. I suppose it is after him or some other such Historian that he tells us how the 200000 Pounds was disposed of, 30000 Pounds to the Marquis of Argyle, 15000 Pounds to some Body else, for Argyle's sake, Sir Archibald Johnstone 3000 Pounds, one round O more had made it Thirty, and been every whit as true. Duke Hamilton 30000 Pounds: Here's near half the Money gone to three or four Persons; several of the Kirk Ministers were enrich'd. How honest and ingenious is this same Bishop Guthry? How judicious the Archdeacon, to write after him, what appears at Sight to be miserable Fable.

We shall in the Beginning of the next Year see how the Person of the King is dispos'd of, and must now wait upon the Prince of Wales, and look a little into the Affairs of Ireland and Scotland.

We have mention'd his Royal Highness's keeping his Court at Bristol and Bridgewater; from whence he remov'd to Exeter with his Council, the Earl of Berkshire, the Lord Wentworth, the Lord Colepeper, and Sir Edward Hyde, whose Names are sufficient to give every good Englishman a Concern for his being in their Hands. Not one of them since Colepeper's Apostacy, having any Dispositions to instil other Principles into him than those that had brought his Father into such a desperate Condition, and will bring himself into almost as bad a one, when it is his Turn to reign. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is his own Historian, gives himself the most advantageous Position in his Picture; and if there is any Defect in Policks, as humane Wisdom cannot be always perfect, it does not come from Sir Edward Hyde, though the Truth is, they had not had a great deal of Business on their Hands, and the most they had was to keep Matters quiet among themselves. The Character the Lord Clarendon gives of Sir Richard Greenville, is monstrous, not in the Painting but in the Figure; and what else Greenville's Picture could one expect from a Person, who having receiv'd a great Sum of Money of the Parliament to raise Men, ran away with it, and took a Commission from the King? His hanging a West Country

Country Attorney would not have deserv'd much Notice, if he had had a better Plea for it than that he had been concern'd in a Suit against him: His throwing the Mayor of Lestwithiel into the common Goal, for Fishing in a River which was not his own: His imprisoning great Numbers for not grinding at his Mill: His imposing Fines of 2, 3, 4, and 500 Pounds on Men, under Pretence of Disaffection: His sending the Mayor of St. Ives to the common Jail for not paying him Fifty Pounds when he did not owe him a Farthing, and the Mayor's Son to Jail for petitioning in Behalf of his Father, are some of the Piccadillo's he was guilty of. His Rapine and Cruelty about Taunton are as infamous as Goring's, and these two Heroes are the Generals in the West, who serve under his Royal Highness, who being pres'd by Sir Thomas Fairfax's March towards Cornwall, was advis'd to send a Letter to that General for a Pass for the Lords Colepepyr and Hopton, to go to the King about a Peace; which Letter and the General's Answer have been mention'd in the preceding Pages. But as the General advis'd the Prince to have such Counsellors as the Parliament should approve, and as Sir Edward Hyde would then infallibly have lost his Seat at his Royal Highness's Council Table, one may be sure he gave him no Counsel of that kind. Sir Thomas Fairfax advancing into Cornwall, the Prince pass'd over to Scilly, from thence to Fer-sey, and thence to France, where, as the Earl of Clarendon represents it, he was receiv'd in a manner that shew'd he was not welcome, and had little to expect from the Friendship of that Court. The same Historian gives us several original Letters from the King to the Prince, written in the Stile of Eikon Basilike, and as if they had been so written on purpose to be printed, as that of the 22d of March, 1645. from Oxford: I command you upon my Blessing to be constant to your Religion, neither bearkening to Roman Superstitions, nor the seditious and schismatical Doctrines of the Presbyterians and Independents. Schism and Sedition are taken out of the Cavalier Lexicon, and mean Liberty and the Reform'd Religion; for know that a persecuted Church is not thereby the less pure, tho' less fortunate. Most certainly, if it was the less pure by Persecution; the Protestants in France and other foreign Countries, the Church of Scotland, and their Brethren in England, would have been most abominably defil'd in this King's Reign, and his Son's, to whom he writes, For all other Things, I command you to be totally directed by your Mother, whose Directions had contributed more than any thing else to his own Misfortunes.

Earl of Essex's
Death.

Before we leave England, it will be convenient to remember a few other Occurrences, and none more worthy of Remembrance than the Death of the Earl of Essex, who dy'd the 14th of September at Essex House, in a melancholy discontented Manner, says the Archdeacon, as falsely as he ever said any thing else; for General Ludlow assures us, his very Death was occasion'd by his too great Appetite after Sport. "The Earl of Essex having over-heated himself in the Chace of a Stag in Windsor Forest, departed this Life. His Death was a great Loss to those of his Party, the Presbyterians, who, to keep up their Spirits and Credit, procur'd his Funeral to be celebrated with great Magnificence, at the publick Charge, 5000 Pounds, the Lords and Commons, with a great Number of Officers, accompanying him to the Grave;" which the Marquis of Hertford, his Brother-in-law, offer'd to do, as did others who had born Arms against the Parliament: But as it was thought to be an Artifice to wheedle the Presbyterians, the House order'd that none such should go with the Earl's Corpse at his Funeral. Upon News of his Death, both Houses in Compliment adjourn'd to the next Day. His Effigies was set up in Westminster Abbey; and as the Party he oppos'd have never wanted a Set of disorderly base Wretches fit for such vile Purposes, certain Persons, to shew their Loyalty, broke off the Head of the Effigies in the Night, tore his Sword, Spurs, Arms, and Escutcheons. Thus did the Inheritors of their noble Principles and Practices treat the Memory of the two greatest Princes in the World, King William and King George, by defacing their Statues; and thus may all glorious Names expect to be treated when dead, by those who fled every where before them when living. The Marquis of Hertford, or some one else, having seiz'd some Writings and Monies in Essex House, the Parliament order'd them to be restor'd to the Earl's Executors, who were the Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Warwick, and Mr. Solicitor St. John. Echard informs us Devereux Earl of Essex ended his Name: A small Error in such a History as his! Contrary to this, the Lords order'd a Writ to be sent to Sir Edward Devereux, the new Viscount Hereford, to sit in Parliament, that Honour and Seat descending to him on the Death of the Earl of Essex, whose Countess being disaffected to the Parliament, they order'd 4500 Pounds, Part of Parliament, they order'd 4500 Pounds, Part of Parliament, his Pension then due, to be paid to his Servants, and for Publick Uses. They also voted 5000 Pounds a Year for Sir Thomas Fairfax and his Heirs. They appointed Sir Roland Wandesford, Sir Thomas Bedingsfield, and John Bradshaw, Esq; to be Commissioners of the Great Seal, and order'd an Ordinance to be brought in to take away Privilege from Members of Parliament as to Titles to Estates and Debts, reserving only Privilege for Person, which was done on the Lord Munson's desiring to wave his Privilege, and to have a Suit against him proceed.

We are now to take a View of the Affairs of Ireland, which could not be so well attended as the State of them requir'd during the War in England. But now the Parliament set themselves to it, and appointed Sir Thomas Wharton, Sir Roberts King, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir Roger Meredith, and Mr. Salway, to be their Commissioners for that Kingdom, of which the Lord Lisle was Lieutenant; and Supplies being about to be sent thither, the Lords acquainted the Commons by a Message, that Col. Monk, a Prisoner in the Tower, had taken the Covenant, was ready to take the Negative Oath, and their Lordships conceiv'd him a fit Man to be employ'd in the Service of Ireland, on Account of his military Qualifications, desiring a Commission might be given him, which was agreed to with one Negative Voice only, Mr. Cavley's, who was of Opinion not to employ a Man who had before so basely deserted that Service.

The Treaty of Cessation has been spoken of, and of my Lord Inchiquin's standing out against it, for which he was highly extoll'd by the Parliament, and Forces were sent to his Assistance as fast as they could spare them. In the meantime the Earl of Ormond was empower'd by the King to conclude a Peace with the Massacrers, on Condition they would oblige themselves to send over an Army to assist him against the Parliament of England. The supreme Council of Kilkenny invited the Lord Ormond to that City to treat, and his Lordship being willing to see his Relations and Estate in those Parts, as also to expedite

A. D. expedite that Service, accepted of the Invitation, and march'd thither with about 4000 Horse and Foot for his Guard, which by the Advice of the Lord Mount Garret and the supreme Council, were dispers'd into Quarters in the Villages thereabouts; but Sir Francis Willoughby, who commanded that Party, suspecting Treachery, intimated it to the Marquis, and desir'd he might encamp in the Field, to which his Lordship consented; and the Enemy being disappointed of their Design to destroy the English by Surprise, resolv'd to attempt it by Force; and all the Favour the Marquis of Ormond could obtain, was Notice from his Relations to shift for himself, which he did, and order'd Sir Francis Willoughby to return to Dublin; but before they could get there, the Country rose upon them in such Numbers, that if Col. Bagnal, Governor of Laughlin, had not permitted them to pass the Bridge there, they had in all Appearance been cut off. The Irish seiz'd the Marquis's Plate, and whatever else he left at Kilkenny; and by this Usage his Zeal for the Prosecution of the Treaty abating, the Earl of Glamorgan was commission'd to prosecute it. The Lord Ormond had been very active in giving all manner of Opposition to the Parliament of England, having receiv'd a Commission from the King to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in the Room of the Lord Lisle, to whom however the Two Houses continu'd that Commission. It was Ormond who made the infamous Cessation with the Irish Massacrers: It was he, who sent the Forces which came from England to assist the Irish Protestants back to England to destroy the Protestants there. He forbade the taking the Covenant in Ireland, was Impeach'd as a Traytor against the Three Kingdoms, disabled of his Lieutenancy, and all Command in Ireland, where the Earl of Inchiquin and the Lord Broghill commanded in Munster, out of which Province they drove the Irish REBELS, and wrote to the Parliament for Supplies. Thus 'tis plain, that if the English Forces sent to reduce those Rebels had not been recall'd by the King, but had join'd the Earl of Inchiquin and the Lord Broghill, the War in Ireland had been over, and the Protestants in Safety many Years before the Commonwealth of England put an End to it. One of the most considerable Actions in Ireland, till General Cromwel landed there, was that at Sligo in November, the Year preceding. The Rebels, to the Number of 2000 Foot and 300 Horse, lay before that Town, and block'd up all the Out-Garrisons, with other Forces. Lieutenant Colonel Sanderson, who commanded in Sligo, Capt. Richard Coot, and Capt. Cole, resolv'd to sally out upon them; and having given Notice of their Resolution to Sir William Cole and Sir Francis Hamilton, they came very opportunely to their Assistance with two Troops of Horse; and falling upon the Enemy at the same Time that Col. Sanderson attack'd them, the Irish were soon put into Confusion, and fled. The English had Execution upon them for five Miles, kill'd above 200, took 150 Horse, their Arms, Tents, Baggage, Ammunition, and much Spoil. Amongst the Slain was the Popish Archbishop of Tuam, in whose Carriage were found some Papers which discover'd the Endearments between the Court at Oxford and the Irish REBELS. The English lost but one Man, and took 28 Officers of Note, as, Dom. O Flaherty Lieutenant Colonel to Richard Bourck, Cousin to the Earl of Clanckard, Lieutenant Colonel Gerdy, Major Richard Bourck, — O Neal, Grandson to Sir Terlagh Mac Henry O Neal, Capt. Browne, Brother to their famous Lawyer Jeffry Browne,

A. D. Capt. William O Shagnise, Brother to Sir Roger O Shagnise, Capt. Dillon, Son to Sir Lucas Dillon, Capt. Castlegagh, the Popish Archbishop of Tuam, President of the Province of Connaught, and Chief of the Supreme Council of Kilkenny. Among his Papers were found the Pope's Bull, and the Earl of Glamorgan's Commission to treat with those bloody Butchers, and the execrable Treaty it self made with Richard Viscount Mountgarret, President of the Supreme Council of Catholics, Donnogh Viscount Muskerry, Sir Robert Talbot, Alex. M. Donnel, Esq; Nicholas Plunker, Esq; Dermot O Brian, Esq; John Dillon, Esq; Patrick Darcy, Esq; Jeffry Brown, Esq;

By Virtue of his Majesty's Authority, under his Signate and Royal Signature, dated at Oxford the 12th Day of March, in the 20th Year of his Reign. The Treaty with the Irish Rebels.

By the First Article, "The Popish Priests were to be put in Possession of all Lands, Tenements and Tithes, to which they laid Claim, and all Papists have the free and publick Exercise of their Religion."

By the Second Article, "They were to hold and enjoy the Churches they had been formerly possess'd of."

By the Third Article, "The Papists were exempted from the Jurisdiction of the Protestant Clergy, and the Popish Clergy not to be molested in the Exercise of their Jurisdiction, &c."

All which was to be confirm'd by Act of Parliament in Ireland.

These Papers were sent to the Parliament by Sir Robert King and Mr. Arthur Annesley, afterwards Earl of Anglesey, who was then a very zealous Parliamentarian; and it appear'd by certain Hints in some of those Papers, that the King's Hopes were from the Irish Nation.

The Parliament sent Forces from England to join the Lords Inchiquin and Broghill in Munster, where and elsewhere in Ireland the Protestants had frequent Advantages of the Irish, but were not strong enough to meet them in the Field. Sir Charles Coot and Sir Robert Steward engag'd a Party of Rebels, and slew 500. The Lord Lisle was order'd to repair to his Government with all Speed, and 1200 Pounds a Month Pay allow'd him; but the Supplies came too slow, and the Irish, who were apprehensive of their coming, were industrious to improve the Advantage of their Numbers, before their Arrival. Major General Monroe, who commanded under the Lord Inchiquin in Ulster, drew the Forces out of several Garrisons to attack the Rebels: He had about 5000 Foot and 600 Horse. The REBELS were about twice the Number; and seeming to retire before him, the English follow'd them in too much Disorder, and fell into their Ambuscades, which so gall'd them, that they were forc'd to retreat with the Loss of 500 Men, and most of their Arms and Ammunition. The Lord Montgomery and the Lord Blaney were taken. This was the greatest Blow the Parliament's Forces receiv'd in any Engagement with the REBELS. The Two Houses wrote to the King, then in the Scots Army, to send Order for Delivery of the Garrisons in Ireland; but his Majesty answer'd, If a Peace were settled, that would follow of course. In June this Year the Rebels took Roscommon, and put all the English there to the Sword. They also took Bonratty, which held out three Months,

A. D. 1646. Months, and put the English and Scots to the Sword. On Advice of which the Parliament order'd 12000 Men of their Army for the Service in Ireland. The Lord Inchiquin took Pilbourn Castle, and put the Irish Garrison to the Sword.

The Pope's Nuncio, and the most guilty of the Massacrers, were against Glamorgan's Peace, as advantageous as it was for the Irish. They had no other Reason for it, than that the Protestants were to have Liberty of Conscience for a while at least. Ormond join'd the Irish Rebels, and they made together an Army of 20000 Men, who were to oblige all Ireland, as well Protestants as Papists, to submit to the Peace. But neither Papists nor Protestants were pleas'd with it; and as it was built on no solid Foundation, so it had no long Continuance: For the Nuncio's Papists became so formidable, that Ormond himself was convinc'd it could not last, and that the English must either unite all their Forces, and procure farther Assistance from England, or the Irish Papists would extirpate them, as was the Intention of the Nuncio and his Party. Ormond therefore sent Sir Francis Willoughby with Propositions to the Parliament, and to desire Supplies of Men and Money, he having left the Rebels, and shut the Gates of Dublin against them. He offer'd to come to London in Person, or serve in Ireland, as the Two Houses pleas'd, as also to surrender the City of Dublin to them, which the Nuncio's Papists had very much streighten'd, and those with whom he had so lately made Peace abandon'd him. But the Supplies which the Parliament sent arriving with their before-mention'd Commissioners to Dublin, and a Party of English under Sir Charles Coote breaking thro' the Rebels Army, they drew farther off from that Capital. However the Marquis of Ormond refus'd to deliver up the Government, under Pretence he had no Command from his Majesty; upon which those Commissioners went to Belfast with the Money and Men they brought from England. The good Lord Digby staid all the while with the Nuncio and his Massacrers; and taking upon him to reprove the Pope's Minister for giving the Irish some Advice which he did not like, the Nuncio gave his Lordship the Lye three Times. With the Commissioners came Col. Monk, who having been before employ'd by the Parliament, deserted their Service; and having afterwards been employ'd by the King, deserted his Service, and will desert two or three Services more before they make a Duke of him. Two thousand Soldiers were now brought over, who with other Supplies kept the Irish at Bay till the Army arriv'd from England, and made those bloody Rebels a dreadful Example of Justice and Vengeance. Sir Roger Manley, as weak a Writer as his Daughter was a wicked one, tells us, the King had commanded Ormond to deliver up Dublin to the Parliament, when the Nuncio's Army became prevalent; and he argues upon it with the same Sobriety which we meet with in the History of the Rebellion and Echard's History; an irrefragable Testimony against the black Calumnies of the English Rebels. He modestly means the Two Houses of Parliament; for they have all that Cant, and could not carry on their mighty Work without it. Ormond said he had no Command from the King; but it will not be expected from me to animadvert on such Memoir Writers as Warwick, Manley, &c. And indeed if I excus'd my self from that Task with respect to Echard's History and that of the Rebellion on the same Account, I should not be blam'd by those who know their true Character. If Ormond had any Order, 'twas a collusive one, nor did he submit to it and quit the Government and the Capital till some Months after, hoping to perplex the Parliament's Affairs by his Stay there; but he had no Opportunity, so he left the Kingdom, pass'd over to England, and thence to France, from whence he return'd to Ireland, as we shall see hereafter.

If you will believe Wishart Bishop of Edin-Sotland burgh, who wrote Montrose's Life, or Mr. Arch-deacon, who copy'd it, the Lord Montrose was a perfect Drawcansir, who, as Dryden, an orthodox Poet, says,

At once beat those without and those within.

The Accounts they give of him spoils the History, which is really incredible enough of it self. This Caledonian Hector being reinforce'd by a strong Body of Irish Papists under Kalketo, the Marquis of Antrim's Brother, took the Field, and with about 2000 Men beat the Lord Elcho and Earl of Tullibardin at Tippermoor, killing 2000, and taking as many as his own Army consisted of. This Battle was fought in September, 1644. Bishop Wishart, as good an Authority as Bishop Guthry, assures us, that Montrose's Men were not half the Number of Elcho's; and further, that as few as they were they had no Arms, but threw Stones at the Rebels with such Activity, that they ran away immediately. Montrose then repass'd the Tay, and understanding the Lord Burghley was at Aberdeen, he pass'd the Dee, and found him drawn up in Battle Array, 2000 Foot and 500 Horse posted on advantageous Ground, with Cannon at the Head of his Army. Montrose had only 1500 Foot, 44 Horse, and no Cannon; yet at the First Charge the Enemy was defeated, slaughter'd, routed. I chuse to take the History from Sir Roger Manley, because he takes it from the Bishop, but it is never the truer for that. Sanderson, as orthodox as the best of them, owns it was not at the First Charge: It was a Fight of four Hours Space equal, till Montrose's Men got the Advantage. We must not wonder that they contradict one another. Historians who do not make Truth their Guide will not always walk the same Way. As Perth was the Prize of the Battle of Tippermoor, so is Aberdeen the Prize of this Fight. After which he put on his Wings again, and flew with incredible Speed and Diligence into Argyle, where having forc'd the Marquis to save himself in a Boat, he did, what I verily believe is the truest Part of the History, destroy and fill the Province with Blood, Slaughter, Rapine and Fire, to use Manley's own good Words, for which he will surely have his Reward. Nor were the other neighbouring Countries, as Lorn and the rest that acknowledge the Dominion of Argyle, better us'd. He then met the Marquis at Innerlochy with an Army thrice the Number of his own, charg'd them with such Fury, that he broke their Ranks and defeated them with a great Slaughter, killing above 1500 on the Spot. The Prize of this Victory was the City of Elgin. He then forc'd Hurrey, who now again was in the Parliament's Service, to retreat, and offer'd Bayly, who was just come out of England, Battle; Bayly gave an Answer like a Man in his Wits to one out of them, When I fight, it shall be at my own Choice, and not at another's. After this, notwithstanding he was deserted by the Gordons, the Marquis of Huntley probably calling back his Sons on some Disgust at Montrose's imperious Behaviour, which was intolerable, he march'd with incredible Speed to Tad-dun, and with 150 Horse and 600 nimble or running Footmen, he assaulted, took and plunder'd the

A. D. 1646. the Town. Having done this, he made a Retreat of threescore Miles, without Sleep, without Meat, or any other Refreshment, from Bayly and Hurry, who pursu'd him with 3000 Foot, and 800 Horse; but as the Presbyterians could not live without Meat and Sleep, he got from them, and was reinforc'd by the Lord Gordon, a Name which in the Huntley Family has distinguish'd it self in the Cause of Popery, as much as it has done in the Family of Sutherland in the Cause of the Protestant Religion. This Lord Gordon brought him 1000 Foot and 200 Horse, and were a proper Band to join with the Mackdonalds, Irish Papists. There is no need of giving any Appellation to these Gentry, the Simplicity of their Names is enough to shew, without Epithet, what fine Heroes were employ'd in the Field, while the Earl of Clarendon and his Brother-Counsellors were at work in the Cabinet. The Reader will observe how Montrose has in every one of these Actions made as much use of his Heels as his Head, Heart and Hand; That he has done a great deal of Mischief to his Country, without doing his Master any Good; That he has not a Town nor a House to hide in when the Scots Army comes up with him; That he has no Way to feed his Men but by Robbery and Rapine: Yet now it was that he wrote the King the fatal Letter, which hinder'd the Conclusion of the Treaty of Peace at Uxbridge. He has conquer'd from Dan to Beerseba, as he told the King; but it was such a Conquest as the Barbarians were wont to make in the Roman Provinces in the Bas Empire, when they would sometimes plunder the Country for 3 or 400 Miles together, and come and go as swift as a Tempest.

Montrose being now 2000 strong, fought Hurrey at Alderne, and defeated 3000 Foot and 500 Horse, the 4th of May, 1645. and coming to Alford, where General Bayly lay, the Latter left his Foot at his Approach, and fled with his Horse, who, according to Bishop Guthry and Sir Roger Manley, could not have got off, if the Lord Gordon had not been kill'd. Montrose was afterwards join'd by the Lord Aboyne, another Gordon, and the Earl of Airly, with 300 Horse, and a numerous Recruit of Highlanders, forming in all an Army of 4 or 5000 Men, with which he resolv'd to penetrate into the inmost Parts of the Kingdom, and disperse the Convention at Perth. He pass'd the Forth, and incamp'd at Kylsthe, where he found the REBELS. If we must write after such Historians, we must make use of their Words, or the Force and Beauty of their Histories will be lost, being 6000 Foot and 800 Horse. Montrose's Men, animated by the old Earl of Airly, rais'd a great Shout, and the Presbyterians fell down as did the Walls of Jericho when the Gideonites blew their Horns: "The Montrosians ran upon the "Enemy, beat down such as resisted, and "ruin'd all, scarce 100 of the 6000 Foot escaping, with the Loss of 6 Men only." I have follow'd Bishop Wishart and Sir Roger Manley, because they will be allow'd to be two great Adorers of Montrose's Heroism, and here are indeed many adventurous Deeds, which were the Effects rather of Fury than Valour, for heroick Valour has always Wisdom and Temper in its Company. These Victories seem rather to be dreamt than perform'd: Here's not an Inch of Ground got, but what is lost again as soon as it is left. Montrose is no sooner gone from Perth, than the States appoint their Convention there, and he has not a Garrison in the Kingdom that could resist the Covenanters a few Hours only. Yet the King in the Decline of his Fortune, was kept more in Heart by Hopes of Montrose's making his Way to him, than by any other Hope, unless it was from the Army of Irish REBELS. After the Battle of Kylsthe, Glasgow and several Cities sent Deputies to compliment the Marquis, that they might not be plunder'd and burnt, as was the Way of his War; for having no Prospect of keeping any Place, his Business was to pillage it and spoil it. His Soldiers were the greatest Robbers that ever infested a Protestant Kingdom. Montrose fac'd Edinburgh, but did not enter it on Account of the Plague. He sent in the Lord Nappier to demand the Prisoners of his Party, who were deliver'd to him; and now he receiv'd his Commission to be Generalissimo of the Royal Armies in Scotland, after which we do not find he did any thing considerable; for the Scots, who were surpriz'd, but not intimidated by him, and as yet had only oppos'd him with raw Men, rais'd in haste, sent for David Leslie out of England, who advancing with a Body of 3000 Horse, disciplin'd Troops, the very Noise of it blasted all the Blaze of Montrose's Glory. His Followers shrunk away from him, and to excuse the entire Rout he met with at Selkirk, his Panegyrists say he had but 500 Men left, when the Covenanters fell upon him, cut his Men to Pieces, and himself very narrowly escap'd at that Time; but some of his Followers were taken, as Sir William Pollock, Sir Philip Nesbit, Alexander Ogilvie, Col. O Cahan, and Col. Laglin, the two latter Irish REBELS, who were executed for their treasonable Practices. The Lord Clarendon makes a great Merit of the King's sending an Order to Montrose to lay down his Arms, which I do not find to be so meritorious, for David Lesly had routed him before that Order came, and his future Exploits shew that his continuing in Arms would only have led him to a more honourable Death than the Covenanters had doom'd him to.

The English and Scots being agreed as to the Disposal of his Majesty's Person, the Parliament of England appointed Commissioners, January the 6th, to go to Newcastle, and receive the King and attend him to Holmby, a Royal Palace which they order'd for his Residence. These Commissioners were the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Denbigh, Lord Montagu, Sir James Harrington, Sir William Armyne, Sir John Holland, Sir John Cooke, Sir Walter Earl, John Creswe, Esq; and Major General Browne, the Latter of chief Note for being one of the most detestable Apostates of those variable Times. I shall say a little of him to open his Character, and prepare for what must be said of him after the Restoration, when we shall find his Hands stain'd with the Blood of his dearest Friends and Companions, as he now term'd them.

His base Birth and Education fitted his Mind for Corruption; and tho' the Lord Digby did not succeed in his Attempt to get Abington from him, yet his Ear being us'd to Temptation, convey'd an Impression the easier to him when it was offer'd a second Time. Being nominated for this Commission, he turn'd about to General Ludlow, who sat behind him in the House of Commons, and cry'd, I will be ever true to you. The General adds, "And truly "I then believ'd him, having met with him at "the Beginning of the War buying Horses in "Smithfield for the Service of the Parliament, "where he spoke very affectionately concerning "this Undertaking, and serv'd them afterwards very successfully, especially at Abington; but this wretched Man soon discover'd "the Corruption of his Nature, and the Malignity that lay conceal'd in his Heart; for no "sooner have recommended him to a Share of the Earl of Clarendon's Panegyrics; He was a stout and diligent Commander, a Man of great Name and Interest. The Parliament voted 3000 Pounds for the Charge of his Majesty's Journey to Holmby, about 200 Pounds a Day, and 50 Pounds a Day for his Expence there, with the following Persons to attend him in ordinary, as Sir Fulk Greville, Sir Patrick Marel, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Harrington, Mr. Maxwell, Mr. Aspley, Mr. Middleton, Serjeant at Arms, Dr. Wilson, a Physician, Mr. Marshall, Mr. Caryl, Ministers. But the two Ministers were unwelcome to his Majesty, who had form'd a Project to escape in concert with Dr. Hudson, his Guide from Oxford to the Scots Camp. Hudson wrote to Major General Langborn, Governor of Pembroke, offering an immense Sum if he would be Assistant in that Design. This Letter was convey'd to Mr. Gibb of Lincoln's-Inn, by him to Mr. Price in Wales, and by him to Langborn; though this Offer did not operate now, it did next Year to his Shame and Confusion. Another Project was for a Ship to lye off Shields, and upon the first Opportunity for his Majesty to escape, that he should embark in it for Holland. But the Parliament having Information of it, and Captain Batten being order'd to observe that Ship, the King submitted to go with the Parliament's Commissioners, who arriv'd at Newcastle the 22d of January, and his Majesty appointed the 24th for their Audience.

The Lord Pembroke, who was no great Orator, told his Majesty his Children were well at St. James's, and they were commanded by both Houses to attend him to Holmby. The King put off giving them an Answer at that Time, and the Earl of Lanerick arriving from Scotland, with the Votes of that Parliament against his Majesty's coming into that Kingdom, he told his Lordship and other Scots Lords at Newcastle, That he came to their Army for Protection, and had it, but now he perceiv'd it would be otherwise: And they being to deliver up the Garrisons he desir'd to know how he was to be dispos'd of? adding, Go into another Room and consider of it, which they did, and returning acquainted the King, that since his Majesty had refus'd to take the Covenant and sign the Propositions, they were to deliver him to the Commissioners of the Parliament of England: The next Day those Commissioners waited on him for his Answer, who only said he should not be ready for some Days. And Sanderson assures us he told the Earl of Pembroke, he had beloy'd him in many Things, but if this Journey pleas'd him he should be much mistaken. Pembroke reply'd, If he had the least Doubt of it some other should have come of the Errand; and if this his good Service displeas'd the King he was like to displease him more. To which his Majesty answer'd, The Scots are beholding to you for travelling so often on their Errands. Six Days after the Scots march'd out of Newcastle, and the English Troops entring it as soon as they were gone, the Parliament Commissioners receiv'd the King the 3d of February, lodg'd in the same House, and watch'd by Turns. They had intimated to his Majesty their Design to remove to Durham, and he seem'd to comply with Chearfulness, but could not help this severe Reflection on the Scots, That he was better satisfy'd to be with those that dearly bought him than with those that had basely sold him; which was the Cry of the Cavaliers then and a long while after. Though the Scots were so far from receiving any Purchase Money, that they had not receiv'd their Pay. Dr. Calamy tells us they receiv'd but half of it; yet the Earl of Clarendon, Archdeacon Echar, Manley, Sanderson, Walker, Warwick, Dugdale, Guthry and others as excellent for Sincerity and Truth, still to be nam'd, as Perenchests, Heylin, Nelson, Ryves, Symmons, Wagstaff, Heath, Hollingworth, do affirm that the Scots did sell the King for so much Money, in as direct a Bargain as ever was made for African or Sword-Blade Stock.

The Parliament's Commissioners, the King in their Company, went from Newcastle to Durham, February the 8th, under Convoy of 900 Horse, where Proclamation was made that none who had deserted the Parliament should come near his Majesty, and one Mungo Murray attempting it was discover'd, and imprison'd at Nottingham. General Fairfax, with many of his Officers, met the King, who at his coming stop'd his Horse: The General alighted and kiss'd his Majesty's Hand, and then mounting, talk'd with him some Miles, the King giving his Excellency this Character, That he was a Man of Honour, and had kept his Word in observing Articles. However good Words he gave him now, in one of his Letters to the Queen he call'd him the Parliament's brutish General. Upon which the Conjurer Lilly severely, if not brutishly reflected; "A most uncivil Term and Epithet to bestow upon so brave, so civil, so valiant, and so much a Gentleman as Fairfax was and is: Assuredly the Progenitors of the Lord Fairfax were Gentlemen, and of good Estates, when the Ancestors of the Stuarts were but poor Stewards to a Family in Scotland." There's a great deal more of it but 'tis not so beautiful as to make one in Love with it. One of the above-mention'd History Writers tells us that the People where the King came, cry'd out, Hosanna, but the milder Sort wept and fell a Prophecying.

The Scots march'd over the Tyne sixteen Days before the King arriv'd at Holmby; from whence his Majesty wrote a Letter to the House of Lords, desiring he might have two or three Divines out of these following to attend him: Dr. Fuxon, Bishop of London, Dr. Duppa, Bishop of Salisbury, Dr. Lany, Bishop of Peterborough, Dr. Sheldon, Dr. March, Dr. Sanderson, Dr. Hammond, Dr. Taylor, Dr. Bailey, Dr. Haywood, Dr. Beal, Dr. Fuller. The Parliament answer'd, That all these Chaplains were disaffected to the establish'd Government of the Church, and had not taken the Covenant; but for others that had, if his Majesty pleas'd, they shall be sent to him, which has given Occasion for this seraphick Meditation in Eikon Basilike; My Agony must not be reliev'd with the Presence of any one good Angel, for such I account a Learned, Godly, and Discreet Divine; such as Sheldon, of whom I never heard any Thing better than that he took great Delight in Hunting, and in Archbishop Laud, or Fuxon, whom Whitlocke commends as one of the keenest Sportsmen in England, and the best Breeder of Dogs. I should not touch upon such mean Particularities, as true as they are, had I not been provok'd to it by the Lord Clarendon's untrue Character of Caryl, the Divine, whom the Parliament order'd to attend on the King,

A. D. King, and whom his Majesty intimates to be an evil Angel, though his Enemies allow he had all the King's Characteristicks of a good One, he was Learned, Godly, Discreet.

Lord Clarendon of mean Parts, of most impertinent troublesome Mr. Caryl. The Earl of Clarendon avers he was a Man of mean Parts, of most impertinent troublesome Confidence and Importunity, which errs as much against Truth as against Charity and good Manners. As to his Parts, A. Wood his bitter Enemy owns he was in his younger Years a noted Disputant; and if his Parts had been so mean, it is not likely the honourable Society of Lincolns-Inn would have chosen him to be their Preacher. As to his Learning, Dr. Calamy tells us, He had universally the Character of a learned Man. And as to his Impertinence, his troublesome Confidence and Importunity, his Meekness and Patience were such that 'twas a common Thing to compare him with Job, on whose Book he wrote a Comment, which is not excell'd by any other in any Language; though all the Lord Clarendon's Characters have not so many Infirmities, yet there is not one but has its Share: And when the Presbyterian Ministers or their Religion comes in the way, his Lordship, or the Doctors his Editors, lose all Patience, and fall upon them without the least Regard to Truth or Decency. What fine Notions these Gentlemen have of true Piety and Devotion one may see by the Earl's complaining that the King was forc'd to pray for himself; and he tells us how and where he did it; He read the Common Prayer in his Bed-Chamber. How many of these Doctors do really know no more of Divinity than that the Reading the Common Prayer Book in a Bed Chamber is as much an Act of Devotion as the divine Communication between God and a pious Soul in holy Contemplation and Prayer? This is either Cant or Enthusiasm with them; but they are very well read in the Rights, Prerogatives, Powers, Revenues and Dignities which are annex'd to their Doctorships. The King would not allow Mr. Caryl so much as to say Grace, according to Mr. Echard, which agrees very little with the Effusion of the holy Spirit, so much affected in Eikon Basilike, said to be written in this and other Solitudes, but in Fact written in this and the next Year, by Dr. John Gauden, a Covenanter. Manley vouches for it, that though it was written by a Presbyterian, it surpasses all other Books except the Bible, in Piety. Notwithstanding all the Care of the Commissioners at Holmby to prevent the Delivery of Papers to his Majesty, yet Colonel Bosvile, formerly of the King's Party, disguis'd like a Countryman, as the King and the Commissioners were passing over a Bridge going to the Bowling Green at Harrowden, put a Packet of Letters into his Majesty's Hand, which the Commissioners observing, caused the pretended Countryman to be apprehended, and he confess'd the Letters came from France, and as he was inform'd, from the Prince, to desire Leave that he might make a Campaign in the French Army under the Duke of Orleans. The Commissioners had not known of the Delivery of the Packet if a Miller, who stood by and saw it, had not cry'd out, Nobles and Gentlemen, there's a Man gives the King Letters. Bosvile offer'd the Miller Gold to hold his Tongue, but he would not take it: His Majesty being desir'd to let the Commissioners know the Contents of the Letters, answer'd, He was not to give an Account to any Man living.

The Royal State was kept up at Holmby, and the Commissioners made good Chear, having a plentiful Allowance. The Dutch Ambassadors had Audience of the King there, to notify the Death of the Prince of Orange; and People flock to him to be cur'd of the King's Evil, a pleasant Imposition on the Populace, from the Time of Edward the Confessor, who according to Manley receiv'd the Gift from Heaven, to the Time of James the Confessor, and after the Revolution, when that good Presbyterian Mr. Harley took the Church into his Protection. The Parliament order'd a Declaration to be drawn, informing the People of the Superstition of being touch'd by the King for the Evil. Every one has heard 100 Stories of the Cures by this Touch, which were not more talk'd of than the Cures by the Stroak of Greatarakes the Stroaker in Lincolns-Inn Fields, in the next Reign. The Alderstick, the Key in the Bible, the Ague Charm have done the like Wonders, and had doubtless as much Efficacy; but the Notion was kept up after the Reformation by those of the Priesthood, who were for returning back again to Popery, under which they were in Possession of Miracles of Exorcising, Absolution, &c. very beneficial to them both in Profit and Credit.

The Lady Cave, attempted as Bosvile had done, to deliver Letters from France to the King, but being also discover'd she was apprehended, and Bosvile sent to Newgate.

His Majesty told the Commissioners he had long expected the Propositions to be sent to him. As for those he receiv'd at Newcastle, if there were no other to come he would send his Answer, which since they did not allow him a Secretary he would scribble over himself. The Contents were his Consent, That Presbyterian Government be settled for three Years, and to ratify the Assembly of Divines, propounding a certain Number of his own Ministers to be added to them, to consider what Government should be after the three Years. In the mean Time he and his Household to be free to use the Common Prayer Book. He yielded the Militia for 10 Years, and after to return to him. He is not satisfy'd in the Covenant, and would have some of his own Ministers sent him to satisfy his Scruples. He will confirm the great Seal and all done by it, himself to have it for the Future as formerly. He grants what is desir'd for the City Militia; interposes for his Party; promises to recal the Prince, and desires to come to London. He assents to an Act against Jesuits and Priests, and for educating the Children of Papists in the Protestant Religion; as also for Penalties against Papists, when he is satisfy'd what they are to be. He proposes a general Act of Oblivion and Pardon to all on both Sides: The latter would have sav'd Sir Edward Hyde and other Delinquents, whom the Parliament resolv'd to make Examples of, as fast as they could come at them: It was for that they drew their Swords, and the Inflexibility of the King in that Article, gave too much Reason to suspect that he would not protect such notorious Offenders so obstinately, unless he intended still to make Use of them or of others equally exceptionable, when he had the Power in his Hands. These evil Counsellors eternally cry'd up his Majesty's Constancy to his Servants, who had constantly advis'd him to take those Measures which had brought this Misery upon him, but their Hearts were harden'd against his Preservation, and they had rather expose his Life than their own.

The King flatters himself with Hopes that after the Treaty of Westphalia was concluded, and France and Spain were reconcil'd, one or both of those Kings would assist him, and his wise Counsellors encouraging those vain Hopes very much con-

A. D. 1647. contributed to the before-mention'd Constancy. A Letter to him from Mr. Albournham was intercepted, advising him to forbear making an absolute Agreement with the Parliament, for now that the Peace beyond Sea was almost concluded, the King might rely upon the Aid of 40 or 50000 Men; equally silly and incredible; for as has been observ'd already, the Power of the Parliament by Land and Sea was become formidable and terrible to all the Nations around them. Was any Thing more easy than to imagine that the very Name of a Foreign, especially a French Army, would have reconcil'd all Parties against the common Enemy? and was it a proper Time for them to invade England, when there was a victorious Army of 10000 Horse and 30000 Foot ready to knock them on the Head as fast as they landed, if they escap'd the victorious Fleet at Sea? Besides, What was it to Foreigners by what Title the Government of England went? The Alliance was as good, if not better to them, under one Title as under another, and Nations do not use to go to War in earnest about Words, when the Things are the same.

Divisions between several Parties.

While the King remain'd at Holmby the Two Houses of Parliament were as little at Ease as his Majesty. The Lords and the major Vote of the House of Commons, together with the City of London, were for closing with the King on the Terms he propos'd, with some Amendment as to the present Establishment of the Presbytery and Directory, and settling the Militia in them for 20 Years, with some Security that it should not afterwards be employ'd against the Rights and Liberties of the People. The Party in the House of Commons, who thought such Security was not practicable, fortify'd themselves with the Favour of the Army, which the other Party resolv'd to break, and began with too much Precipitation. If it be pretended that the Intrigues of the Royalists sow'd the Seeds of Division between the Parliament and Army, it is false: Those Seeds were sown by the Bigotry of some, and the Ambition of others: The Royalists had neither Heads to contrive, nor Hands to execute much Mischief; they doubtless look'd on with Pleasure, or in more homely Phrase, with gaping Mouths, in Hopes that something would drop into them. Ludlow tells us the Party in the House that were for betraying the Cause of their Country became Encouragers of such Petitioners as came to them from the City of London, and other Places, for a speedy Peace, and to suppress Sectaries; Complaints were made against the Army, both Officers and Soldiers as such, who held erroneous and schismatical Doctrines contrary to the true Doctrine; and that they took upon them to preach and expound the Scripture, not being learned or ordain'd. "Thus, says Whitlocke, "Those, who were so lately in the highest Esteem and Respect, as Freers of their Country from Servitude and Oppression, are now by the same People look'd on as Sectaries and Oppressors themselves. Thus we may see the Inconstancy of the giddy Multitude, and the Uncertainty of worldly Affairs. When their Turns are serv'd, their Minds change. Their best Friends when they relieve them, are counted their Enemies when they are reliev'd.

fended.

The Lords receiv'd all these Petitioners very graciously; but the Opposition they met with in the House of Commons gave Occasion to doubt the Success of their Petitions, the Army being offended with them. The next City Petition set forth their Zeal to the Parliament and Covenant, and their Apprehension of the Advance of the Army, not yet disbanded, nearer the City. They pray the Army may be remov'd, and take Notice of a dangerous Petition counter to theirs, a foot in the City. The House answer'd, That those Particulars and that Petition were under Consideration. Mr. Tooliday, who was a Promoter of the counter Petition, was sent to Jail by the Committee to whom it was referr'd. Though many excus'd him, according to Whitlocke, it being as lawful for those of one Judgment as of another, to Petition the Parliament. Nothing could be more obvious than that this Jarring among the Parties would in Time be fatal to them; and that if they had now united heartily in Endeavours to settle Religion and Liberty according to their first Professions, they might easily have obtain'd their Ends of the King; and that restless Faction, who by their Divisions recover'd Strength, would never have held up their Heads against them any more, nor have had it again in their Power to ruin their Country, which they almost accomplish'd in the two next Reigns.

The Petition from Essex desir'd that the Soldiers quarter'd in that County, might be remov'd, and it was referr'd to the General: But the Army took great Offence at it, as a Reflection upon their Conduct; nor were they less offended with the Votes about their going to Ireland, against which they were preparing a Remonstrance; but Major General Skippon, Colonel Harley, and the more moderate Party hinder'd it for the present, and Commissioners were sent to the Army, the Earl of Warwick, Sir William Waller, and Sir John Clotworthy, to see what could be done towards their Embarkation for that Kingdom: These Commissioners met Sir Thomas Fairfax and his Field Officers at Saffron Walden, where it was propos'd to ship 8000 Foot and 4000 Horse for Ireland. The Officers excus'd their engaging positively, but said, whether they went or not they would endeavour to advance that Service among those under their respective Commands. A general Answer which determin'd nothing; but they afterwards came to Particulars, and desir'd to be inform'd, 1. Under whose Command they were to go. 2. What Regiments, Troops or Companies were to be continu'd in England. 3. What Assurance for Pay and Subsistence for those that go to Ireland. 4. What Satisfaction in Point of Arrears, and Indemnity for past Services, People beginning to threaten them with Procceses for what they had done in the War, against which it highly behov'd them to be indemnify'd. A Petition was drawn up by the Officers of the Army for the General to deliver it to the Parliament if he thought fit. 1. For Indemnity. 2. For Arrears. 3. Against Pressing to serve. 4. For Relief of Widows and main'd Soldiers. 5. For Pay till disbanded. All these Particulars were reasonable, and had probably been granted sooner without a Petition than with it; for the Parliament began to think themselves under Direction by those Army Petitions, which were rather Remonstrances or Demands. Cromwel and Ireton encourag'd these Petitions behind the Curtain, that they might get the Army to be at their Beck, and restore the King or destroy him, as they thought it most for their Interest.

The Parliament being inform'd of this Petition, sent to the General to use his Endeavours to put a Stop to it, and declar'd the good Esteem they had of the Army, who were not to be appeas'd with such Declarations. For Colonel Harley and Colonel Rossiter, Members of the House of Commons, receiv'd Letters from them, that the Petition should go forward, and those that refus'd to

When it was ready Lieutenant General Hammond, Colonel Ireton, and Colonel Rich, engag'd to deliver it to the Parliament, whose Commissioners went a second Time to Saffron Walden, to treat with the Officers; but they found none of them complying except Colonel Harley and Colonel Fortescue: Upon which both Houses voted, That the Army Petition was set on Foot by evil Spirits, purposely to raise Distempers among the Soldiers; that they forgave what is past, and forbid farther Proceedings in it. Which Vote was communicated to the Officers by the General; and in Answer to it, They express a deep Sense of their Unhappiness in being misunderstood in their clear Intention, which was no other than by way of Petition to represent to the General those Inconveniencies which would necessarily befall most of the Army after Disbanding. They desir'd that as much as be thought fit of their Petition might submissively be made known to the House of Commons, and assur'd him they would wholly acquiesce in whatsoever he should think fit to offer. The General sent up Colonel Hammond, Colonel Lilburn, Colonel Pride, and other Officers, to give the House a full Account of the Business, and acquaint them that he doubted not of the Army's Obedience. But Fairfax knew no more of it than they told him, which was plausible enough. The Secret lay in the Breasts of Cromwel and Ireton. The Officers were call'd into the House, where Pride was charg'd with reading the Petition at the Head of his Regiment, and threatening those that would not subscribe, which he deny'd. The House requir'd the Officers to return to their Charges, and suppress it, which more irritated the Soldiery, who said it was a hard Case that Petitions against them were favourably receiv'd, and their own Petition in their Defence, obstructed. This occasion'd their Talk of drawing to a Rendezvous; and to prevent it the Parliament's Commissioners had a third Meeting with the General and Council of Officers at Saffron Walden, where were present 200 Officers. The Earl of Warwick earnestly entreated those of them who were appointed for Ireland, to go on that Service; setting forth the Necessity and Honour of it. General Fairfax also much encourag'd them to undertake it: But Colonel Lambert desir'd to know what Satisfaction the Parliament had given as to Arrears, Indemnity, Maintenance in Ireland, and Conduct: Sir John Clotworthy reply'd, They are all answer'd, except Indemnity, of which the Parliament will take Care, and have given Instructions to the Judges, not to receive any Indictment against Soldiers for Things done, in Tempore & Loco Belli, till an Ordinance can be brought in. Then the Officers ask'd who was to be General? They were answer'd that both Houses had appointed Major General Skippon to be General, and Major General Massey Lieutenant General. Colonel Hammond said, If they were sure Major General Skippon would go, he doubted not a great Part of the Army would engage with him. Upon which there was a Cry, All, All; Fairfax and Cromwel, and we all go. Not many of the Officers would then engage in that Service: On the contrary most of them sign'd a Declaration in the Nature of the Petition before mention'd, and authoriz'd Lieutenant General Hammond, Col. Hammond, Col. Lambert, Colonel Lilburn, Colonel Hewson and Colonel Rich, to act for them. There were but 7 Horse Officers, 7 of Dragoons, and 87 Foot Officers, who undertook for Ireland; and the four Regiments that were quarter'd in Norfolk and Suffolk, absolutely refus'd the Service; but Major Huntington appeas'd them and brought them into a better Temper. Such brave Men as these were, must have been proud of that Service to revenge the Slaughter of 200000 Protestants, if an evil Spirit rais'd by Cromwel and Ireton had not possess'd them. The Parliament however could not think they had so far renounc'd Subjection to them as to usurp Superiority over them, and voted, That the Army, Horse and Foot, should be disbanded with all convenient Speed, and four Officers were sent for in Custody of the Serjeant at Arms, for obstructing the Engaging for Ireland: But this Activity was like the Blaze of a dying Light. Some Officers in the Name of themselves and their Fellow Officers, presented to the House a Vindication of their late Petition, setting forth the great Sense they had of some Misrepresentations lately made to the House of their Actions and Intentions, by which, as it is conceiv'd, Endeavours are used to alienate the Houses of Parliament from their ever trusty and obedient Army; the Accomplishment of which would much rejoice their and the Kingdom's Enemies; they desire the Liberty to Petition as Soldiers now, and hereafter as Members of the Common Wealth; and that their Integrity might be vindicated from such false Suggestions and Reports as had been made and rais'd against them, and suggested to the Houses.

Whitlocke observes, that a victorious Army out of Employment is very inclinable to assume Power over their Principals; and this occasion'd the Parliament's growing still more eager to have them employ'd in Ireland, which the Army being sensible of, were averse to that Employment; and eight Regiments of Horse enter'd into a Sort of Association to stand by one another in endeavouring to obtain Satisfaction. They chose Agents out of the Troopers, two Agitators for every Regiment, who were term'd Agitators, and were a Sort of Committee to consider of what was proper to be done towards obtaining their Ends: The Chief of these Agitators was one Allen, afterwards Adjutant General, one Sexby, afterwards Colonel, Shepherd and Philips, who drew up a Declaration, shewing the Reasons why they could not engage in the Service of Ireland under the present Conduct, and complaining of the many Scandals and false Suggestions that were of late against the Army and their Proceedings; that they were taken as Enemies, and Designs form'd against them, which would not permit them to leave the Kingdom till they were satisfy'd in their Expectations, and their just Desires were granted. Sexby, Allen, and Shepherd, brought this Declaration to Major General Skippon, who deliver'd it to the House; and the three Agitators were call'd in and examin'd, touching their drawing and subscribing it. They were ask'd, Whether their Officers were concern'd in it? and they answer'd, It was drawn up at a Rendezvous of the Eight Regiments, and afterwards sign'd at several Meetings by their Agitators, but few of the Officers knew or took Notice of it. They were then ask'd, Whether none of them had been Cavaliers? and Major General Skippon attested for them, That they had constantly serv'd the Parliament, from the Beginning of the War. It being demanded, What was the Meaning of some Expressions in the Petition? they answer'd, It was a joint Act of those Regiments, and they could give no punctual Answer, being only Agents; but if they might have the Queries in Writing, they would send or carry them to those

A. D. 1647. those Regiments, and return their own and their Answers. One of the Members mov'd, That the Agitators might be committed to the Tower; and Cromwel whisper'd Ludlow, These Men will never leave till the Army pull them out by the Ears. For which Expression that gallant Officer says, He would have call'd him to Account in another Posture of Affairs. The Agitators were told, It did not belong to the Soldiers to meddle with Civil Affairs, nor to prepare or present any Petition, without the Advice and Consent of their General, to whom the House order'd a Letter to be sent, to desire his Care therein for the future; with which acquainting the three Agitators, and requiring their Conformity to it, they were dismiss'd.

But this not satisfying, another Petition was carry'd on in the Army much to the same Effect as the former, only the Agitators observ'd the Order of the Parliament in directing it to their General, and desiring him to present it Col. Edward Harley, a staunch Presbyterian, Father of those two staunch Churchmen Robert and Edward in Queen Anne's Time, told the House that his Regiment was highly dissatisfy'd with the Proceedings of the Petitioners, and some Members mov'd that they might be declar'd Traitors, alledging they were Servants, who ought to obey, not capitulate. Others were not wanting to suggest the Cause of these Distempers to be Cromwel, and that he ought to be secur'd; but he being advertis'd of it, went out of Town immediately, and repair'd to the Army. The Parliament appointed him, Major General Skippon, Col. Ireton, and Col. Fleetwood, to acquaint the Soldiers, That the House would provide for them before disbanding, have their Arrears audited, and pass an Ordinance of Indemnity. Cromwel did not as yet shew himself a Malecontent, and acted with Skippon in declaring the Votes of Parliament to the Army; adding, They were enjoin'd to quell all Distempers, which he said to aggravate Things, and hinder a Reconciliation. Some Officers desir'd to know, What was meant by Distempers in the Army? If Grievances, which the Soldiers had also Cause to complain of, they had then something to offer, but were unwilling to declare the Sense of the respective Troops, Regiments and Companies, without first acquainting them therewith. They took great Offence at the Vote, declaring those to be Enemies, who persisted in the Petition. This Vote was put when the House was weary with long sitting, by Mr. Denzil Hollis, who drew it up upon his Knee, and the Soldiery never forgave him for it. 'Twas oppos'd by several Members, who foresaw and fear'd the ill Consequences of it. But the Majority carry'd it and some other Articles, which the Agitators of the Army perceiv'd were preparatory to their Punishment, and resolv'd to prevent it as soon as they could. They declar'd, There was no Distemper in the Army, but many Grievances; and being inform'd that the Parliament had voted to disband all such as would not engage for Ireland, they came to a sudden Resolution to possess themselves of the Person of the King, and cut the Matter short, by depriving them of the Means of coming to any Terms with him to their Prejudice. So they sent Cornet Joyce with a strong Party of Horse, and an Order in Writing to take the King out of the Hands of the Parliament's Commissioners.

There were several Officers in the Army who did not approve of the Proceedings of the Agitators, as Sir Robert Pye, Col. Fortescue, Col. Greaves, Col. Sheffield, Col. Butler, all of Hollis's Party. These were contented their Regiments should be disbanded. Others thought it might prove dangerous to both Parliament and Army. These objected that the Latter would not submit to it. Most of the Members who were piqued at the Army had been thrown out of their Posts by the Self-denying Ordinance, and complain'd, that notwithstanding that Ordinance, Cromwel and Skippon continu'd in their Commands, and others, as Rich and Harrison, had been chosen Members since, and were admitted to sit. Hollis's Party did not directly declare against the Army, but pretended to ease the People of Taxes by disbanding them, and once more Commissioners were appointed on both Sides, to try whether any Accommodation could be made. For the Parliament were the Earl of Nottingham, the Lord Wharton, Sir Henry Vane, Major General Skippon, Sir Thomas Widdrington, Col. White, Mr. Scory, Mr. Pury. For the Army were Col. Ireton, Sir Hardress Waller, Col. Rich, Col. Lambert, and Major Desborough. These Commissioners met at Wickham, and probably had accommodated Matters, if the Agitators had not in the mean time sent Joyce to take Possession of the Person of the King, which he did the 5th of June. The Cornet came to Holmby the Night before, and drew up his Troop, some say 50 and some 500 <sup>ries the</sup> Horse before the King's Lodgings, at about Eleven a Clock, and then demanded Entrance of Holmby. Col. Greaves and Major General Browne, who upon this Alarm immediately doubled the Guards, and ask'd him his Name and Business. He told him his Name was Joyce, a Cornet in Col. Whaley's Regiment, and his Business was to <sup>King from</sup> speak with the King. Being ask'd, From whom? He said, From my self; my Errand is to the King, I must and will speak with him. Greaves and Browne bad the Soldiers Stand to their Arms, and be ready to fire at the Word. But those Soldiers finding Joyce's Men were their old Companions, open'd the Gates to them, and receiv'd them as Friends. Joyce plac'd Centinels at the Chamber Doors of the Commissioners, and by the Back-Stairs, went up to the Door of the Chamber where the King lay, at which he knock'd smartly. The Grooms in waiting desir'd him to forbear, the King being asleep; but the Noise wak'd him, and being inform'd of the Matter, he said, He would not rise to speak with him till the Morning, when he sent for Joyce, who told his Majesty he was order'd to remove him to the Army. The King demanded a Sight of his Instructions, and Joyce pointing to the Court-Yard where his Troop was drawn up, said, There are my Instructions. His Majesty looking out at the Window, and seeing them to be tall, stout, and well arm'd, reply'd with a Smile, Your Instructions are in fair Characters, legible without spelling. The Cornet then press'd the King to go along with him. His Majesty told him, He would not stir, unless the Commissioners went also. Joyce answer'd coldly, He was indifferent as to that; and promis'd his Majesty should be civilly us'd, and his Servants and other Conveniences continu'd to him. Upon which the King consented to go. But the Parliament's Commissioners coming to him after Joyce was gone to his Troop, they perswaded him to alter his Resolution; which the Cornet perceiving when he return'd, put his Majesty in Mind of his Promise, acquainting him, That he was obliged to execute his Orders. The King reply'd, Since I have given you my Word, I will go with you. But he bid the Earl of Dumferlin, who was present, tell the Parliament, That he was taken thence unwillingly; and that tho' he might sign to many Things,

A. D. 1647. Things, being in this Condition, yet it was not to be believ'd till further Notice given them. The Commissioners ask'd Joyce, Whether he had any Orders from the Parliament, and whether he was sent by the General? To which he bluntly reply'd, No. Two of them, Major General Browne and Mr. Crew, publicly declar'd, That the King was forced out of their Hands. His Majesty went into his Coach, and the Parliament's Commissioners follow'd him whither Joyce thought fit to carry him and them; and except that the Cornet was somewhat blunt in his Language, the Lord Clarendon owns he behav'd civilly enough towards the King.

His Officers who waited on him were continu'd, and Sir Robert Pye, a Colonel in the Army, supplying the Place of Equerry, rode bare before him. General Fairfax knew nothing at all of this unwarrantable Proceeding; and as soon as he did know it, he sent Col. Whalley, with a Party of Horse, to use all Means but Constraint to cause his Majesty to return to Holmby. The King was come to Sir John Cuts's at Childerley near Cambridge before Whalley could get up with him; and when Whalley would have perswaded him to return to Holmby, he absolutely refus'd it, flattering himself that he should find better Usage from the Army than he had found from the Parliament: So Whalley was only added to his Convoy; and Joyce frankly own'd, That Lieutenant General Cromwel had given him Orders at London to do all he had done.

Cromwel was return'd from the Army to the Parliament while this was doing. He at first disown'd it both to the Two Houses and the General: But the Feint did not last long. Both Houses were terribly surpris'd at this bold Action of Joyce's. The Earl of Clarendon is extremely delighted with it; but his Lordship's Jest has too much Gravity in them to have too much Wit. So they are generally taken from Religion; Mr. Marshall was sent for to pray with the Parliament. The General could with great Sincerity assure them, That Joyce acted without his Privy; That it was his and the Army's Resolution to study to settle Peace and the just Liberties of the People; and the Parliament's speedy Application to these, will further the disbanding of the Army, whose Sense is clear from opposing Presbytery, or having an Independent Government, or holding a Licentiousness in Religion, but to leave all to the Wisdom of the Two Houses. Fairfax meant as he said, but it was not in his Power to perform it. To excuse the taking away the King from Holmby, 'twas given out by the Soldiers, that the Parliament intended to have him remov'd to London, and to make Peace with him: It was even said, that Col. Greaves had receiv'd Orders from them to that Purpose. But Cromwel was beforehand with them. The Stroke being struck, the Parliament thought it the wisest way to temporize with the Army till a better Juncture offer'd; and wrote to their Commissioners appointed to treat with the Army's Commissioners, to go to the General, and confer with him about further Satisfaction for the Soldiers. These Commissioners met Joyce on the Road as he was conveying the King to New-Market, and one of them told the Cornet he deserv'd to be hang'd; but Joyce was not in the least startled at it, and gave them to understand, That he from whom he receiv'd his Orders, was able to protect him in the Execution of them. When Cromwel came to the Army, which he had promis'd the Parliament to bring to Reason, he represented to Fair- fax, that nothing could have been done of greater Advantage to the Army and their Generals, to the Church and State, than what Joyce had been doing; That the King was on the Point of making an Accommodation with the Parliament, who had determin'd to send Col. Greaves to fetch him; and if Joyce had not fetch'd him, there would have been an End of both Officers and Army, and all the Pains they had taken for the Publick Good, would not only have been useless, but criminal. These Reasons pleas'd the General, and Cromwel had others which appeal'd the King, to whom he promis'd the best Services that were in his Power, not without Intimation that he would procure him better Terms than had yet been propos'd by the Parliament, which he confirm'd with much outward Respect and Ceremony, and the King really thought his Condition was alter'd for the better.

During these Transactions, the City of London petition'd again, That all honourable Means may be us'd to avoid shedding of more Blood; That Satisfaction might be given to the Army; That the Covenant may be kept, and his Majesty's Person preserv'd; That the Parliaments of England and Scotland may have Access to him; That Ireland may be relieved, and the Ordinance to prevent Tumults and Dangers to the Parliament and City be removed; which was immediately order'd, and the Petitioners had the heartiest Thanks the House could express for their constant Affections to the Parliament; who order'd an Ordinance to be brought in for making void the Declaration against the Army, who had appointed a general Rendezvous at Triploe Heath near Cambridge, which probably was the Occasion of the last Ordinance: But whatever the Parliament did, the Army took no more Notice of it than they thought fit. Colonel Sands, Col. Devereux, and Col. Wiltshire, coming to the House, inform'd them, that meeting with a Major lately come from Triploe Heath, he told them the Army was upon their Advance, and the Horse would be here To-morrow by Noon. The Sheriffs and Common Council came to the House soon after, with a Letter sent from the Army to the same Purpose as the Major said, which threw both Parliament and City into the most terrible Consternation. Now they fear that their Votes were Brutum fulmen, against an armed Power, whom they had irritated, and could not appease, without submitting to be directed by them, and permitting them to share in the Sovereignty. True enough it is, they were both out in their Politicks. The Cavaliers were the Common Enemy; they had subdu'd them indeed, but there was no Security that they should not again be able to re-act their Tyranny. The King always understood himself to be the Law, and the People knowing that the Constitution was monarchical, were easily impos'd upon to believe that his Counsels were the Laws. 'Twas necessary to have his Consent to those Bills that were most likely to secure the Rights and Liberties of the People against future Invasions; and there was no Likelihood of his consenting to such Acts, while Parliament and Army were both courting him to be of their Party. The Parliament were sincere in their good Dispositions towards him, after Provision was made for their Security. Part of the Army thought as they did. Major General Fincher, Major Alsop, Major Huntington, and many other Officers, express'd their Readiness to fall in with the Parliament's Measures, and were so forward as to separate from their Brethren who were of the Party of Agitators; but this

A. D. 1647. Separation hurt the Cause they intended to serve, for their Places were presently fill'd up by Cromwel, who govern'd Fairfax, with Men fit for his Purpose, and the Army Party made stronger and more imperious. The General to Appearance seem'd compliable with the Parliament, but Cromwel had ever some Reasons or other to lead him contrary to his Intentions. Fairfax order'd a general Rendezvous at Royston, where the Parliament's Commissioners were present, and it was resolv'd to go from Regiment to Regiment to have their Resolution as to Compliance with the Votes for Ireland and Disbanding. They began with the General's own Regiment, and were so ill satisfy'd with their Success, that they went no farther, for they cry'd No to all their Queries, and added Justice, Justice. Nor were they without their Partisans, who procur'd Petitions from several Counties, as Essex and Norfolk, that they might not be disbanded. After the Rendezvous, the Army, to shew they were in earnest, drew nearer to London; and the Citizens, who had new modell'd their Militia to defend the Parliament and themselves, began to be apprehensive that such Defence would stand them in little stead against 30000 Horse and Foot, flush'd with Victory. The Train'd Bands were order'd out on Pain of Death; but alas! the most serviceable of them had serv'd in the Army; and tho' Sir William Waller, Sir Philip Stapleton, General Massey, and other Officers who were Members of Parliament, promis'd to head them, tho' several hundred Soldiers who had deserted with their Commanders on the Divisions between the Parliament and Army, were in a Readiness to join them, yet the Terror of Cromwel's Approach dispirited both the Train'd Bands and Citizens. The Shops were shut up, and those who had been active in getting Petitions and Votes against the Army, were more afraid of them than ever they had been of the Cavaliers. The Common-Council, with Approbation of both Houses, sent a Deputation to the Army to treat with the General and Officers, about a right Understanding between them and the City. The Parliament sent Sir Thomas Widdrington to the General with a Letter, desiring him not to advance nearer London; but he was come near St. Alban's before Widdrington deliver'd his Letter; and he told him, he doubted not he should send such Reasons for the Soldiers advancing as would satisfy both Houses, whose Panick increas'd so much, that they said and unsaid, did and undid Things, as they were hurry'd on by Fear and Confusion. They sent for the Militia of Westminster to come and guard them: They might as well have sent for the Vestry of St. Margaret's! However, upon the Appearance of these Train'd Bands under Capt. Falconbridge and Capt. White, they recover'd themselves a little, and made a bold Order, That the General be requir'd to deliver the Person of the King to such Person as both Houses shall appoint, who were their Commissioners in the Army, and Col. Rossiter's Regiment was order'd to be his and their Guard. But the Army were as busy as the Parliament, and sent several haughty Demands to them; the Fruit of which was, that Eleven of their Members, Denzil Holles, Esq; Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir William Waller, Sir John Maynard, Major General Massey, Serjeant Glyn, Col. Walter Long, Col. Edward Harley, Anthony Nichols, Esq; be suspended. The Charge against them was sign'd by Sir Thomas Fairfax and the other Officers: The General being led on so far by Cromwel, without considering whither he was leading him, which he consider'd much too late. The Charge was, for A. D. 1647. obstructing the Business of Ireland, which they had most vigorously forward'd, and the Soldiers had themselves oppos'd, for acting against the Army, which was their just Endeavour to keep them within their due Obedience, for being against the Laws and Liberties of the Subject. The Army now had gotten the King's Phrase, who in all his Declarations, and Messages, reproach'd them with acting against the Laws, for obstructing Justice. No-body can tell what they meant by that. After the reading of the Charge, the Members severally made some Defence, and desir'd to be brought to a speedy Trial: But this Charge was follow'd by a Declaration from the Army, deliver'd by Col. Scrope, Col. Okey, Col. Hewson, Col. Pride, and five Captains, Berry, Clark, Carter, Rolph, and Sexbie; desiring, That the Persons impeach'd be suspended till they are brought to Trial; That no Forces be rais'd, and none drawn together, with Design to begin another War with the Army. With which the Parliament comply'd. The Eleven Members found the House of Commons too hot for them, and absented themselves. Mr. Hollis the Eleven Members went to France, and return'd not till after the Restoration. Sir Philip Stapleton went to Calais, but was not permitted Entrance into the Town, being suspected to have the Plague. Glyn was so conscious of his Innocence, that he stood it out, and demanded Trial; but the Army not having prepar'd Matter for it, the House, to please them, expell'd him, and committed him to the Tower. Nichols was order'd into Custody, but he made his Escape from the Messenger. Maynard was impeach'd of High Treason, and imprison'd in the Tower. Massey went beyond Sea; and the rest of the Eleven Members retir'd to their Estates in the Country, and concern'd themselves no more in publick Affairs, with which the Army were content. The Common-Council of London, who lately would be satisfy'd with nothing less than having the Militia of the City put into their Hands, and who talk'd of raising Men to defend them against the Army, chang'd their Tone a little, on the Report of their Commissioners, whom they had sent to the General, and voted a Letter to him, with Leave of the Parliament, to acquaint him that no Forces should be rais'd against the Army, and that they would move the Parliament for Money to pay them. Cromwel's Enemies gave him all Advantages against them they could, by their ill Conduct: For to detain the Soldiers Pay after they had serv'd them so faithfully and so successfully, was universally condemn'd as ungrateful as well as unjust; yet such was the Hatred of the Hollis Party to that of the Army, that they added Insolence to their Injustice and Ingratitude, and talk'd of them always as Enemies, taking not one regular Step to reconcile Matters, which might easily have been accomplish'd by paying the Officers and Soldiers well, giving them good Words, and gradually dispersing them by separate Services in Ireland, and other Places where they might be employ'd or disbanded at Pleasure. But they were blinded by Pique and Passion, and a vain Hope of Support by the City and the Scots. The last Declaration brought from the Army was follow'd by another: 1. That the Houses may be purg'd of such as ought not to sit there. 2. That the Persons who had abus'd the Parliament and Army may be speedily disabled from doing the like. 3. That some Time may be set for the Continuance of this and future Parliaments. 4. That Provision be made that future Parliaments may not be dissolv'd at the King's Pleasure.

Whitlocke tells us, that these Declarations were generally drawn up by Col. Ireton, who held the Pen for his Party, and having been bred in the Inner Temple, had acquir'd good Knowledge in the Laws, as had also Col. Lambert by the like Education. Ludlow, tho' a Republican in Principle, did not like the mutinous Proceedings of the Army, it being visibly done with Design to subject the Civil to the Military Power, which he abhorr'd. The Army having their Head Quarters at Maidenhead, Ludlow went thither to visit the Officers, and particularly Ireton, the Commissary General, who suspecting that these Things might occasion Jealousies of them in Ludlow and others of their Friends in the House, desir'd him to be assur'd of their stedfast Adherence to the Publick Interest, and that they intended only to dispense with such Things as were not material, in order to quiet the restless Spirits of the Cavaliers, till they could put themselves into a Condition of serving the People effectually. We have hinted that the Militia of London was settled by an Ordinance in the Management of the Presbyterians, who were very industrious in compleating their Companies: but, as we have also hinted, this gave Offence to the Army; and Fairfax on the 10th of June sent a Letter to the Parliament, That the Militia of London might be put into the Hands of Persons that were better affected to the Army; which was done, and the Ordinance revers'd two Months after 'twas made. This so disgusted the City, that a Petition was presented by 1000 Apprentices, setting forth, That the Command of the Militia of the City was the Birth-right belonging to them by Charters confirm'd in Parliament, for Defence whereof they had adventur'd their Lives as far as the Army. They desir'd the Militia may be put again into the same Hands in which it was put with the Parliament's and City's Consent, by the before-mention'd Ordinance. Some of these Apprentices were so rude as to rush into the House of Commons, keeping the Door open, and their Hats on, crying out, Vote, Vote; in which arrogant Posture they stood till the Votes pass'd as they would have them. In the Evening, July 26. some of the Common-Council came down to the House, and understanding that the Apprentices had forc'd the Speaker and the Members to put the Question for repealing the Ordinance, they order'd them to disperse, which they did immediately. This Petition was got by the Management of Hollis's Party, and so were several others too tedious to repeat. Contrary Petitions were procur'd by the Army Party, and both Parties had always Hands ready to subscribe to what they would have them. Thus the Parliament were held in continual Amusement, sometimes by the City, sometimes by the Army. They could not please both, nor themselves; and in this Perplexity Men of less Capacity than the Earl of Clarendon's most capable Counsellors might have taken some Advantage for the King, if their Wisdom had been so great as their Zeal, or their Care of their Master in any Comparison with their Care of themselves.

The House of Commons grew pretty thin at this Time, because many of the most able Members appear'd the less there, for that they resented the Usurpations upon them by the City and Army, who were perpetually making Demands and giving Directions. There were Commissioners appointed by the Army, Lieutenant General Cromwel, Col. Ireton, Col. Fleetwood, Col. Rainsborough, Col. Harrison, Sir Hardress Waller, Col. Rich, Col. Lambert, Col. Hammond, and Major Rainsborough, to treat with the Parliament's Commissioners concerning the Parliament's Votes, and the Army's Petitions. The Army had their Head Quarters at Reading, and the King was lodg'd at Causbam, the Lord Craven's Seat, near that Town.

We left his Majesty at Royston, from whence he mov'd with the Army to Hatfield, where two of his Chaplains, Dr. Hammond and Dr. Skeldon, were admitted to attend him, and great Ceremony was observ'd towards him by the Officers. Some of them went so far as to give out, That they intended to establish his Majesty in his just Rights; which good News was sent to the Queen and Prince of Wales in France; and tho' Mr. Hyde was with them to search into the Depths of every Stratagem of their Enemies, yet he was so impos'd on by the Artifices of the Officers, that he counsell'd the sending away Sir Edward Ford, Brother-in-law to Commissary General Ireton, into England, to sound the Designs of the Army, whether or no they did really intend to restore the King to the full Exercise of the Sovereign Power, for which they were themselves now contending with the Parliament. Sir John Berkley follow'd Ford on the same hopeful Errand, as did also Mr. William Legg. They both landed at Hastings, and being on their Way towards London, were met by Sir Allen Appley, who had been Lieutenant Governor to Sir John Berkley at Exeter, and by whom he understood that he was sent to him from Cromwel and other Officers of the Army, to put him in Mind of some Discourse which Sir John had with Col. Lambert at a Conference on the Surrender of Exeter, wherein Berkley took Notice of the bitter Invectives of those of the Army against the King's Person; and presuming that such Discourses were encourag'd in order to prepare Mens Minds to receive an Alteration of the Government, he had said it was not only a most wicked, but difficult Undertaking, if not impossible, for a few Men, not of the greatest Quality, to introduce a popular Government against the King, the Presbyterians, the Nobility, Gentry, and the Genius of the Nation, accusom'd to Monarchy for so many Ages; advising Lambert and the other Officers, that since the Presbyterians, who had begun the War upon divers specious Pretences, were discover'd to have sought their own Ends, by which Means they had lost almost all their Power and Credit, the Independent Party, who had no particular Obligations to the Crown, as many of the Presbyterians had, would make good what the Presbtery had only pretended to, and restore the King and People to their just and ancient Rights, to which they were oblig'd both by Prudence and Interest, there being no Means under Heaven more likely to establish themselves, and obtain as much Trust and Power as Subjects are capable of; whereas if they aim'd at more, it would be accompany'd with a general Hatred and their own Destruction. Sir Allen added, he had Orders to let Sir John Berkley know, that tho' to this Discourse of his they then gave only the Hearing; yet they had since found by Experience, that all, or the most part of it, was reasonable, and that the Officers were resolv'd to act accordingly, as might be perceived by what had already pass'd, that Cromwel and the Officers desired he would present them humbly to the Queen and Prince, and be a Suitor to them in their Names, not to condemn them absolutely, but to suspend their Opinions of them and their Intentions, tions, till their future Behaviour had made full Proof of their Innocence, of which they had already given some Testimonies to the World; and that when Berkley had done this Office he would return to England to be an Eye Witness of their Proceedings.

If this Relation, taken from a Manuscript written in Sir John Berkley's own Hand be true, the Advice given the Independents to make themselves Masters of the Army and Parliament, came from the Cavaliers, and consequently to them may more reasonably be imputed the Death of the King than to the Presbyterians, who always advis'd the quite contrary: For if Cromwel had not hearken'd to Berkley, the Army had never usurp'd the Power of their Masters the Parliament; and had they never usurp'd it, the King had never been put to Death. His Majesty was then at Hatfield, and the Parliament, the major Vote, being still Presbyterians, voted that he should be remov'd to Richmond, and that they would send the Propositions for Peace, reduc'd to Bills; but the Army, very sensible of what was intended by it, declar'd against his Majesty's being remov'd to Richmond, at which the King took great Offence, and when after his resolute insisting upon it he was remov'd to Windsor, he would not pass by the Army's Head Quarters at Maidenhead, nor see the Officers in his Way. The Parliament to sweeten the Army a little, voted, That they do own this Army as their Army, and will make Provision for their Maintenance and Pay, which had so good Effect, that the Head Quarters were remov'd from Usbridge to Wicomb, and thence to Maidenhead, and thence to Reading, as is above mention'd. While his Majesty lay at Causbam, he was visited by the Electors Palatine, with Consent of the Parliament, who at the Request of Sir Thomas Fairfax, voted that the Earl of Northumberland should attend the King with his Children at Causbam, and see them safe back again to the Palace of St. James's, where they were lodg'd. The General removing his Head Quarters to Aylesbury, his Majesty was remov'd to Woburn, and thence to Latimers, within the Eye still of the Army, who had admitted the Duke of Richmond as well as Dr. Skeldon and Dr. Hammond, to wait on the King, but the Parliament sent an Order to dismiss them; and the General wrote a Letter to the Parliament, complaining of the late Petition of the Apprentices, and the Force put upon them by mutinous Assemblies, insinuating that it was necessary he should bring the Army to Town, to free them from such Insults; which being rumour'd in the City, the Citizens were at first spirited by Hollis's Party to stand to their Defence; Sir William Waller, Major General Massey and Major General Points appear'd among them, and offer'd to command their Militia, and new rais'd Men. The Army Party in Parliament finding Things were come to an Extremity, and that it would fare ill with them if they staid longer at London, where all Things for a while tended to a Rupture with the Soldiery, left the two Houses, and put themselves under the Protection of General Fairfax, who order'd a General Rendezvous of the Army on Hounslow Heath, where were present the Earls of Northumberland, Salisbury, Kent, the Lord Grey of Werke, the Lord Howard, the Lord Wharton, the Earl of Mulgrave, and the Lord Say, and six Lords more with the Earl of Manchester, their Speaker: There were also present about 100 Members of the House of Commons, with their Speaker, Mr. Lenthall, and both Speakers with their Maces as in full Parliament, the Army being drawn up in Battalia. The General accompany'd with the Lords and Commons took a Review of them riding along the Line from Regiment to Regiment. The Soldiers made great Acclamations, crying, Lords and Commons, and a free Parliament. His Highness the Prince Electors came also to the Army, who were still more provok'd by the Proceedings of those Lords and Commons who remain'd at Westminster, and call'd themselves the Parliament of England, as indeed they were the major Vote in both Houses. The Lords chose the Lord Hunsdon, and the Commons Henry Pelham, Esq; for their Speakers, and then proceeded to vote, 1. That the King should come to London. That the Militia of the City have Power to raise what Forces they think fit. That they choose a Commander in Chief, and other Officers: Accordingly the Common Council made Choice of Major General Massey, and their Forces, Trained Bands, Auxiliaries, and Reformades were muster'd in St. James's Fields. In the mean Time the General enter'd into Communication with the Members of both Houses, and then at his Head Quarters wrote to the City, That he was tender of them; but laying to Heart those unparallel'd Passages of entering the House of Commons, and compelling the Members to vote; he is sensible of his Obligations to the Parliament, and that the Army are resolv'd, what other Neglect soever hath been, for their Security to use their best Endeavours, as God shall enable them, for the Preservation of the Parliament from Violence. Gravesend Blockhouses were secur'd for the Army, and the Borough of Southwark fell off from the City in this Contest. Most of the Eleven impeach'd Members retook their Seats in the House of Commons, and Sir William Waller, Major General Massey, and Major General Points, continu'd Listing of Reformades for the Defence of the City. The Citizens were even so bold as to publish a Declaration against the Armies, fetching away the King from Holmby; against Breach of Privilege with Respect to the impeach'd Members. For delivering the King out of the Hands of the Army, &c. We see that this Party are lost to all Politicks: They fire with Powder only, and will not be able to keep themselves together a Minute on News of the Army's advancing; yet they voted, That the Ordinance which puts the Command of all Land Forces under Sir Thomas Fairfax, does not give him Power over the Militia. And thus have they erected a new General, Major General Massey, and a new Army, the London Train'd Bands, Auxiliaries and Reformades, with a Commission equal to General Fairfax's; and it is not owing to their Prudence if these two Armies do not renew the War. For the People of Southwark petitioning the Common Council that they might not be list'd under Points or Massey; some of the Train'd Bands fell upon the Petitioners in Guild-Hall Yard, cruelly hack'd and dispers'd them. The Army advancing to Colnbrook, his Majesty was lodg'd at Stoke Abbey. Col. Rainsborough was sent on Kingston Side, with a Brigade to assist the well affected in the Borough of Southwark. The next Head Quarters were at Isleworth; and Massey's Scouts meeting some of the Parliament's at Brentford, there was a small Skirmish, in which the Citizens had the worst of it, which much appall'd the most resolute of them in the Council at Guild-hall, where when the least good News came, the City plexity of was One and All; but when Intelligence was brought that the Army was on the March, the Cry was loud to Treat, Treat, Treat, and at last both the Common Council and Council of

Militia

A. D. 1647. Militia, agreed to send a Letter to the General, beseeching him that there might be a Way of Composure. He demanded to have the Forts on the West Side of London immediately deliver'd up to him, for he was coming to Town with those Members of both Houses of Parliament who had been driven thence by the Violence of the mutinous Multitude, which was presently comply'd with, and the next Day, being the 6th of August, the Army march'd to London. At Hide Park Corner the Lord Mayor and Aldermen met the General, and congratulated him on the late Composure between the Army and City. Then he proceeded towards Westminster in the following Order: First, Colonel Hammond's Regiment of Foot, then Colonel Rich and Colonel Cromwel's Regiments of Horse. Then the General on Horseback with his Life-Guard, then the Speakers and Members of the House of Lords and House of Commons in Coaches. Colonel Tomlinson's Regiment of Horse brought up the Rear. The General was accompanied with many Officers and Gentlemen, and every Soldier had a Laurel Branch in his Hat. As they pass'd by Charing Cross the Common Council, who stood there, saluted them, and in the new Palace Yard, Westminster, the General alighted, and the Lords and Commons went to their several Houses. The Lords sent for Sir Thomas Fairfax, and gave him Thanks for his good Service in restoring the Members of Parliament. A Chair was plac'd for him in the House of Commons, and with much Importunity he was prevail'd upon to sit in it while the Speaker gave him Thanks for his great and faithful Services, and in particular, for restoring the Members of both Houses to their former Freedom and Privileges. An Ordinance pass'd immediately, to make him Constable of the Tower; and another to make void all Acts done by some Lords and Gentlemen, Members of both Houses at Westminster, when the Speakers and Members were driven away by Tumults. The next Day the General and Army, Horse and Foot, with a gallant Train of Artillery, march'd through the City of London in so orderly and civil a Manner, that not the least Offence or Prejudice was offer'd by them to any Man, either in Word, Action or Gesture, as they marched along, which confuted the Surmises of some of their Enemies, that the Design of the Soldiers was to plunder the City. The General quarter'd at Croydon, and the Army in Kent, Surrey, and Essex. He took Possession of the Tower, turn'd out the Trained Bands, and put Colonel Pride's Regiment of Foot into it. The Tone of the City is now strangely alter'd. The Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, came to the Tower, to wait on his Excellency, where Alderman Gibbs made a Speech to him, To thank him and his Army for their Love and Care of the City, and to invite him and his Officers to dine at Guildhall, which he excus'd on Account of the great Affairs with which he and his Officers were at present taken up. They presented him with a Basin and Ewer of Gold, of a thousand Pounds value. A Committee of Lords and Commons were appointed to examine the Force put upon the two Houses by the Apprentices, and find out the chief Actors. The latter were set on by Hollis's Party, who whether to establish Presbytery exclusive of all other Denominations, or to advance themselves by making their Peace with the King, encourag'd Tumults as much as before the Civil War, and seem'd dispos'd rather to sacrifice the promis'd Security against future Tyranny, than not to have their Revenge on those that promoted the Self-denying Ordinance, by which so many of them were displac'd. They push'd their Resentments so far, that some of them, as Maffey, Brozen, Annesley, &c. turn'd rank Cavaliers, and their Bigotry and Ambition did certainly deprive the Nation of the good Settlement which must have been the Consequence of their Union with the Army. The Committee before mentioned voted that Sir John Gayer, Lord Mayor, Alderman Bunce, Alderman Langham, Alderman Cullum, and Alderman Adams, were Actors in the late Force put upon the Parliament, for which they were imprison'd and impeach'd of High Treason. The same Impeachment was order'd against Lieutenant Colonel Chapman, Lieutenant Colonel Bains, Captain Musgrave, Mr. Malory a Minister; and of high Crimes and Misdemeanors against Colonel Vaughan, Colonel Lawrence, Colonel Hooker, Captain Jones.

His Majesty was removed to Oatlands, and Sir Thomas Fairfax's Head Quarters were at Hampton, from whence the Army sent a Remonstrance to the Parliament, requiring the Purging the House, by secluding all the Members who acted and voted when the Speakers and other Members were driven away by the Tumult of the Apprentices; in which Remonstrance General Fairfax concurr'd as well as Cromwel, and this Purge was the Beginning of the Revolution which made the Catastrophe of the other so tragical. The City Militia which had been the Occasion of this Bustle, was put into the Hands of the old Commissioners, whom the Hollis Party had turn'd out, as Alderman Pennington, Alderman Wollaston, Alderman Atkins, Alderman Warner, Alderman Fouke, Alderman Gibbs, Alderman Ven, Alderman Allen, Alderman Foot, by which 'tis evident, that the Party in the City which sided with the Army, were not the beggarly Rabble, as the Earl of Clarendon represents them, but the most wealthy Citizens and Magistrates, and that their Opponents were in Truth a Faction spirited up by the eleven Members to promote Designs which they durst not own, and therefore pretended to have nothing at Heart but the Purity of Religion, and Uniformity of Worship and Discipline.

I must confess this Party to me are worse than the Cavaliers. They had by their Clamours and Intrigues brought on the Civil War for Redress of Grievances, and now they might have had every Grievance so effectually redress'd, as not to be in any Danger of being renew'd again, they out of Pique about Places and Pensions fall off from the Common Cause, and would have destroy'd that Army on which entirely depended not only the Well-being, but the very Being of the Parliament, from whom the Nation expected Liberty and Security.

His Majesty from Oatlands was remov'd to The King's Sion, when the Army's Head Quarters were at Hampton-Putney, and soon after to Hampton Court, where the Princes and Princesses, his Children, were admitted to him, when and as often as he pleas'd. The Nobility were allow'd their Visits, and his Household was settled in so much Order, that there was no Appearance of any Want either in Expence or Ceremony. It was insinuated to the King, that he was indebted for all these good Offices to Cromwel and Ireton. The House of Commons impeached the Earl of Suffolk, the Earl of Lincoln, the Earl of Middlesex, the Lord Willoughby of Parham, the Lord Hunsdon, the Lord Maynard, the Lord Berkley, of High Treason, who were put into several Prisons, but upon their Submission and Repentance they were discharg'd, and the Impeachment dropt. The

A. D. 1647. Forts and Lines cast up for Defence of the City were demolish'd, and the Party which had given Offence to the Army were so humbled that they durst not show themselves, otherwise than in snarling Pamphlets, as no Merlin, no Mercurius Bellum Hibernicæ, &c.

During these Commotions the Propositions of Peace stopt in both Houses, and the King discover'd on all Occasions his good Wishes to the Party of Hollis, who had voted his Return to London. These Sentiments hinder'd him from giving Ear to the Whispers of Cromwel's Creatures, that he might expect the best Services from him. Ireton taking Notice of the Change of his Majesty's Temper, with respect to the Army, whom he at first carest, told him, Sir, You have an Intention to be Arbitrator between the Parliament and us, and we mean to be so between you and the Parliament. His Majesty finding himself courted on all Hands, became so confident of his Interest, as to think himself able to turn the Scale. And in these Sentiments Sir John Berkley found him when he deliver'd the Queen's Letters to him, with Permission from Cromwel, who had confirm'd what Sir Allen Appesley had told him, with this Addition, That he thought no Man could enjoy his Life and Estate quietly unless the King had his Right; which he said the Army had already declar'd to the World in general Terms, and would more particularly very speedily, by Propositions which should comprize Royalists, Presbyterians, and Independents, as far as they were consistent with one another, Sir John Berkley endeavour'd to perswade the King to dissemble with the Army, and permit Mr. Peters to preach before him, to converse freely with the Officers, and cajole the Agitators, whose Interest encreas'd. But this good Advice, which certainly would have sav'd him, made no Impression upon his Majesty.

Deceiv'd still by Cromwel. Ludlow tells us, Cromwel said, Never Man was so abus'd as he in his sinister Opinion of the King, who he thought was the most Upright and Conscientious Man in the Kingdom. That the Independents had infinite Obligations to him, for not consenting to the Proposition sent to him at Newcastle, which would have totally ruin'd them, and which his Majesty's Interest seem'd to invite him to. Concluding with this Wish, That God would be pleas'd to look upon him according to the Sincerity of his Heart towards the King. But his Majesty firmly believing Cromwel talk'd after this Rate from a Necessity he and the Army had of him, slighted all these good Offers: And notwithstanding the Mysteries on which the Lord Clarendon founds this Part of Cromwel's History, it is certain he had not as yet form'd any Design against the Person of the King, whose Mistake concerning him prov'd so fatal. His Majesty was wont to say, when any mention was made of Cromwel and the Army, They can do nothing without me; which Opinion was the more reasonable in Appearance, for that some of the Agitators came to Sir John Berkley, and express'd their Jealousy that Cromwel was not sincere with the King, desiring that if Berkley found him false they might be acquainted with it, and they would endeavour to set him right, either with or against his Will. Major Huntington was a Confident of Cromwel, and therefore entrusted with the Command of the Guard about the King, yet he was so well convinc'd of his Patron's Intentions to serve his Majesty, that to do the King what Service he could, he brought two General Officers to Sir John Berkley to assure him, that the King was universally desir'd by the Army, and Cromwel and Ireton were great Dissemblers, and not real;

but the Army was so bent upon it at present; that those two Generals durst not appear otherwise. They protested, that however Things might happen to change, and what some others might do, they would for ever continue faithful to the King. They told Sir John, that Propositions were drawn up by Ireton, wherein Episcopacy was not requir'd to be establish'd, nor any of the King's Party wholly ruin'd, nor the Militia to be quite taken away. They advis'd, that his Majesty would with all Expedition agree to them, while the Army was in this Disposition, which they could not be sure would last always. This Matter went so far, that Sir John Berkley had a Conference with Ireton himself, in which they debated the Propositions a whole Night; and Berkley alter'd two of the Articles in the most material Points, but upon his endeavouring to alter a Third, about excluding Delinquents from Pardon, Mr. Hyde always one, Ireton said, There must be a Distinction made between the Conquerors and those that had been treated beaten, and he himself should be afraid of a with Parliament where the King's Party had the major Vote. He conjur'd him, as he tender'd the King's Welfare to endeavour to procure his Consent to the Propositions, that they might with more Confidence be offer'd to the Parliament, and all Differences be accommodated. Cromwel and Ireton did not forget themselves in the private Articles; we are told Cromwel was to be made Earl of Essex, and Vicar General of England, as Cromwel Earl of Essex was in Henry the VIII's Reign, and Ireton was to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

Upon the whole, we have no Reason to believe, but that this Relation is true, and that in case his Majesty had comply'd with these Propositions, the Army would have oblig'd the Parliament to pass them. Whitlocke says, The King's Bishops, always unfortunate to him, perswaded him against what he was inclin'd in his own Judgment to have agreed to, and so ruin'd him and themselves. Contrary to this, the Earl of Clarendon assures us, he was never inclin'd to agree to any Thing against Episcopacy. It is in vain to take Notice of the various Petitions presented to the two Houses, they are so numerous and so opposite to each other. The Borough of Southwark petitions, That the Houses might be purg'd of such as assisted in the late Tumults. The City of London, where those Tumults were hatch'd, petition the same. The like do the Counties of Somerset, Oxon, Bucks, Harriford, &c. Thus we see again, that the Purge attributed to, and accomplish'd by Pride, as will be seen hereafter, was not only the Desire of the Army but of the People. Both Houses of Parliament agreed, that in the Settlement of Church Government and Worship, Liberty of Conscience should be allowed to all Persons, except Papists, and those that us'd the Common Prayer. The House of Commons voted, That a Period should be put to this Parliament, within a Year after his Majesty had pass'd the Bills that were form'd out of their Propositions, and that the King should be restor'd to his Rights, to his Queen and Children. These Votes did not satisfy the Army, whose Council of General Officers sent a Paper to the Parliament, directing how future Elections, Times of Session, and Adjournments should be regulated. They offer'd other Regulations, and took upon them to direct the two Houses in their Proceedings towards the Settling of the Nation, which made the Parliament the more desirous of coming to Terms with the King, without their Interposition. Cromwel saw this, and in all his Conferences with Sir John Berkley, appear'd

A. D. 1647. appear'd most zealous for a speedy Agreement to Ireton's Propositions, which were lower than the Parliament's in the Articles of Episcopacy and the Militia. He wish'd Sir John would act more frankly, and not tie himself up by narrow Principles, always intimating, he doubted the Army would not persist in their good Intentions towards the King. When those Propositions were presented to the King, he was much displeas'd with them, expecting from the Discourse he had had with the Officers, that they would have been still lower. His Majesty said, If they had any Intention to come to an Accommodation, they would not impose such Conditions on him. To which Sir John Berkley answer'd, That he should rather suspect they design'd to abuse him if they had demanded less, there being no Appearance that Men who had through so many Dangers and Difficulties acquir'd such Advantages, would content themselves with less than was contain'd in those Propositions, and that a Crown so near lost was never recovered so easy as this would be, if Things were adjust'd upon these Terms. The Articles the King objected to were, 1. The Exclusion of 7 Persons, Mr. Hyde always one, from Pardon. 2. The Incapacitating any of his Party from being elected Members of the next ensuing Parliament. 3. The leaving Church Matters unsettled, that all but Papists and Laudeans might have Liberty of Conscience. When Arguments were us'd to his Majesty for his Compliance, he breaks away from Berkley and others, saying, Well, I shall see them glad e'er long to accept of more equal Terms.

Conduct.

About this Time Mr. John Asburnham arriv'd from France, to the King's great Contentment, and his Instructions referring to Sir John Berkley's, which they were to prosecute jointly, Sir John gave him what Light he could into the State of Affairs, but he soon departed from the Methods propos'd by Sir John Berkley, and entirely complying with the King's Humour, declar'd openly, That having always us'd the best Company, he could not converse with such senseless Fellows as the Agitators. That if the Officers could be gain'd there was no doubt but they would be able to command their own Army, and he would wholly apply himself to them. Upon this there grew a great Familiarity between him and Whalley, who commanded the Guards that waited on the King in Turn with Huntington, which produc'd a close Correspondence with Cromwel and Ireton. With these Encouragements, and others from the Presbyterian Party, the Lord Lauderdale, and several of the chief Citizens of London, assuring the King, They would oppose the Army to the Death, he was so much elevated, that when the Proposals were sent to him, and his Concurrence humbly desir'd, he, to the great Astonishment not only of Ireton, but even of his own Party, entertain'd them with very sharp and bitter Language, saying, No Man shall suffer for my sake, I repent of nothing so much, as that I pass'd the Bill against the Earl of Strafford, and the Church must be establish'd according to Law. To which those of the Army reply'd, That it was not their Work, and that his Majesty had already consented to the Abolition of Episcopacy in Scotland. The King said, I hope God has forgiven me that Sin, repeating frequently these and the like Words; You cannot be without me. You will fall to Ruin if I do not sustain you. This Manner of Courage was observ'd with the utmost Amazement by many Officers of the Army, who were present, and at least in Appearance were Promoters of the Agreement. Sir John Berkley taking Notice of it, look'd with much Won-

A. D. 1647. der upon the King, and stepping to him, said in his Ear, Sir, You speak as if you had some secret Strength and Power which I do not know of, and since you have conceal'd it from me, I wish you had done it from these Men also. Upon this his Majesty recollected himself, and began to soften his former Discourse, but it was too late, for Colonel Rainsborough, who of all the Army seem'd the least to desire an Agreement, having observ'd these Passages, went out from the Conference, and hasten'd to the Army to inform them what Entertainment their Commissioners and Propositions had found with the King. Sir John Berkley, to allay this Heat, demanded of Ireton, and the rest of those Commissioners, What they would do if the King should consent? Ireton reply'd, We will offer them to the Parliament for their Approbation. His Majesty having thus bid Defiance to the Army, thought it necessary to bend all his Force against them, especially to strengthen their Enemies in the Parliament, to which End the Apprentices Petition was contriv'd, and the Militia in London new modell'd, but when it appear'd that the Citizens could not defend themselves against the Parliament, and that the King, notwithstanding the Votes for his coming to London by the Lords and Commons, who remain'd at Westminster when the Speakers went to the Army, would not be able to carry his Point by that Party, his Majesty was well advis'd to write a Letter to the General and Officers before it was known that London would submit, to renew the Propositions, but he would not sign it till after three or four Debates, which lost one whole Day's Time. At last Mr. Asburnham and Sir John Berkley going with it, met with Messengers from the Officers to hasten it. But before they could come to Sion House the City Commissioners were arriv'd, and the Letter was out of Season, for coming after it was known with what Difficulty it was obtain'd, and that Matters were like to be adjust'd between the Parliament and Army, it lost both its Grace and Efficacy. Notwithstanding all which, the Officers being resolv'd to do what they could, propos'd, while the Army was in the very Act of giving Thanks for their Success, that they should not be too much elevated with it, but keep still to their former Engagements with the King, according to the Propositions, which was resolv'd upon, but that Resolution, broken by the Indiscretion and Precipitancy of some of the General Officers, who to ingratiate themselves with the King, gave all Liberty to the Cavaliers, and made Speeches in his Behalf in the Council of War at Putney. Some of the same Party did the like in the House of Commons, where one of them said, He thought God had blasted their Counsels for their Severity to the Cavaliers. The Agitators, who suspected that those Officers were bargaining for themselves, complain'd to Cromwel and Ireton, that their Doors were open to Berkley and Asburnham, when they were shut to them. Cromwel was startled at their Complaint, and desir'd those two Gentlemen to forbear coming to him, at least not so publicly, for he should not be safe in his Quarters if they did. His Majesty now was so complying with the Army, that he refus'd the Propositions which the Scots Commissioners presented to him, being those that were deliver'd at Newcastle, with some Alterations relating to Scotland, and demanded a personal Treaty. Cromwel, Ireton, and many of their Party in the House of Commons, spoke for it, but contrary to their Expectation, found a vigorous Opposition from such as had already conceiv'd a Jealousy of their private Agreement with

A. D. 1647. with the King, and were now confirm'd in it; the Suspicion of them growing so strong, that they were accounted Betrayers of the Cause, and lost almost all their Friends in the Parliament: By which it appears, contrary to the Earl of Clarendon's History, that Cromwel had not as yet suffer'd his Ambition to aim at the King's Death and his own Sovereignty. The Agitators complain'd openly against them in the Council of War at Putney, saying, Since the King had rejected their Propositions, they were not engag'd any further to him; and that it was not just to sacrifice the general Good to the Interest of particular Persons; but they ought now to consult their own Safety, and that of the Commonwealth. That having the Power devolv'd upon them by the Decision of the Sword, to which both Parties had appeal'd, and being convinc'd that Monarchy was inconsistent with the Prosperity of the Nation, they resolv'd to use their Endeavours to reduce the Government of England to the Form of a Common-wealth. This was the first Time that this Party in the Army declar'd themselves for a Republick; and it struck so great a Terror into Cromwel, that he and his Creatures thought it necessary to draw the Army to a general Rendezvous, pretending to engage them to adhere to their former Propositions, but indeed to bring the Army into Subjection to him and his Party, that so they might make their Bargain by them, designing if they could carry this Point at the Rendezvous, to dismiss the Council of Agitators, to divide the Army, and to send those to the most remote Places who were most opposite to them, retaining near them such only as were fit for their Purpose. This Design being discover'd by the Agitators, amongst whom Col. Rainsborough had the principal Interest, they us'd all possible Industry to prevent the general Muster, which was appointed to be at Ware. Cromwel represented this their Opposition to the King, as a Design to break of all Agreement with him, and protested it was not in his Power to undertake for his Security in the Place where he was, assuring him of his real Service, and desiring the Lord to deal with him and his according to the Sincerity of his Heart towards his Majesty. Some advis'd the King to go to London and appear in the House of Lords: To this it was answer'd, That the Army being Masters of the City and Parliament would undoubtedly seize his Person again; and if there should be any Blood shed in his Defence he would be accus'd of beginning a new War, which if he had not begun even the Army would not probably have thought of putting an End to it by his Death. Others counsell'd him to quit the Kingdom, against which the King objected, that the Rendezvous being appointed for next Week, he was not willing to quit the Army till that was over; because if the superior Officers prevail'd, they would be able to make good their Engagements; if not they must apply themselves to him for their own Security. 'Twas also propos'd that he should conceal himself in England; but that was thought unsafe, if not impossible. Some mention'd Jersey for a Place of Retreat; but there were no Ships ready to convey him thither. At last his Majesty resolv'd to go to the Isle of Wight, being, as is most probable, recommended thither by Cromwel, who as well as the King had a good Opinion of Col. Hammond, the Governor there.

To this End his Majesty sent for Mr. William Legg, Sir John Berkley and Mr. Asburnham, requiring them to assist him in his Escape, for which Horses were laid at Sutton in Hampshire. On the following Day, November the 10th, Sir John Berkley and Mr. Asburnham waiting with Horses, the King with Mr. Legg came out towards the Evening, and being mounted, they design'd to ride through Windsor Forest, his Majesty their Guide, but they lost their Way; and the Night proving thick and stormy, and the Roads bad, they could not reach Sutton before Break of Day, and his Majesty would not stay there, being inform'd the County Committee was there fitting by Order of Parliament. The King went to Fitchfield House, a Seat of the Earl of Southampton's, and sent Sir John Berkley and Mr. Asburnham, to Colonel Hammond, with the Copy of the Letter he left on the Table in his Chamber at Hampton-Court.

That Liberty, the Thing now generally pretended and aim'd at, was as necessary for Kings as any other. That he had a long Time endur'd Captivity and Restraint, hoping it might tend to the Settlement of a good Peace; but finding the contrary, and the Unfixedness of the Army, and new Guards set upon him, he had withdrawn himself.

That wheresoever he should be he would earnestly labour the Settlement of a good Peace, and to prevent the Effusion of more Blood; and if he might be heard with Honour, Freedom and Safety, he would instantly break through his Cloud of Retirement, and shew himself ready to be Pater Patriæ.

CHARLES REX.

With this he sent two other Letters he had lately receiv'd, one without a Name, expressing great Fears and Apprehensions of the ill Intentions of the Republican Party against him; the other from Cromwel, much to the same Purpose, with this Addition, That a new Guard was design'd the next Day to be plac'd about his Majesty, consisting of Men of real Principle. Echard, who knew as little of these Matters as any Man that ever pretended to know them, assures us, that this Relation of Cromwel's private Treaty with the King is told by his Majesty's Enemies with much Confidence, but with little Authority. One would wonder how these Words much Vol. 1. Confidence and little Authority could drop from p. 81. that Pen; for this Account was really written by Sir John Berkley himself, one of the King's best Friends, in a MS. which General Ludlow receiv'd at Geneva of Berkley's own Hand writing, which MS. is mention'd by the Lord Clarendon: Yet Echard adds, After a careful Search, we can find nothing to support or indeed to countenance such a Story among the most authentic Writers: Ludlow, a much more authentic Writer than any of his most Authenticks; of Genius, Quality, Fortune and Spirit, superior to the most noble of them, if Ancestry gives Quality, tells us upon his Honour, that Sir John Berkley left that MS. in the Hands of a Merchant at Geneva, where he saw and read it. If Falsities were not so common with this Historian, there would hardly be any Confidence steady enough to support such a one as this. The King sent a Letter to Colonel Hammond, by Berkley and Asburnham, wherein after he had express'd his Distrust of the levelling Part of the Army, and the Necessity lying upon him to provide for his own Safety, he assur'd him, "That he did not intend to desert the Interest of the Army, and had chosen him of all the Officers to put himself upon him, whom he knew to be a Person of good Extraction, and though engag'd against him in the War, yet without any Animosity to his Person, to which he

"he was inform'd he had no Averſion. That he did not think fit to ſurprize him, and therefore had ſent theſe two Gentlemen to advertiſe him of his Intentions, and to deſire his Promiſe to protect him and his Servants to the beſt of his Power, and if it ſhould happen that he was not able to do it, then to oblige himſelf to leave them in as good a Condition as he found them." With theſe Inſtructions Sir John Berkley and Mr. Aſhburnham went to the Iſle of Wight, and met the Governor, Col. Hammond, on the Road between Carisbrook Caſtle and Newport: When they had told him their Errand, he cry'd out in a Sort of Aſtoniſhment, Oh Gentlemen! You have undone me in bringing the King into this Iſland; if at leaſt you have brought him. If you have not, pray let him not come, for that between my Duty to his Maſteſty, and Gratitude to him, upon this freſh Obligation of Confidence, and the Diſcharge of my Truſt to the Army, I ſhall be confounded. The two Gentlemen told him, the King intended a Favour to him and his Poſterity, in giving him this Opportunity ſo highly to oblige him, and that it was not at all inconſiſtent with his Relation to the Army, who had ſolemnly engaged themſelves to the King; but if he thought otherwiſe his Maſteſty would be far from impoſing his Perſon upon him. The Governor reply'd, If the King ſhould come to any Miſchance, what would the Army and his Maſteſty ſay to him, that had refus'd to receive him. They answer'd, You have not refus'd him, for he is not come to you. Colonel Hammond ſeem'd ſomewhat ſatisfy'd, and deſir'd to know where the King was, wiſhing that he had thrown himſelf abſolutely upon him. The two Generals did not like this Heſitation, but Aſhburnham fearing his Maſteſty might be diſcover'd before they had come to any Concluſion with the Governor, took him aſide, told him where he was, and prevail'd with him at laſt to declare, he believ'd the King rely'd upon him as a Perſon of Honour and Honesty, and therefore he did engage himſelf to perform whatſoever could be expected from a Perſon ſo qualify'd. Aſhburnham reply'd, I will ask no more. Then ſaid the Governor, Let us all go to the King and acquaint him with it. When they came to Cowes Caſtle, where a Boat lay to carry them over, Colonel Hammond took Captain Basket, Governor of that Caſtle with him, and order'd a File or two of Muſketeers to follow them in another Boat. Upon their Arrival at Titchfield Houſe, Aſhburnham leaving Sir John Berkley below with Colonel Hammond and Captain Basket, went up to the King, and gave him an Account of what had paſt between the Governor and him, adding, Hammond is come with us, to make good what he has promis'd. At which the King ſtriking his Hand upon his Breſt, cry'd, What have you brought Hammond with you! Oh, you have undone me, for I am by this Means made faſt from ſirring. Aſhburnham then told him, If he miſtruſted Hammond he would undertake to ſecure him. His Maſteſty reply'd, I underſtand you well enough, but if I ſhould follow that Counſel, it would be ſaid, and be believ'd, that he had ventur'd his Life for me, and that I had unworthily taken it from him. It is now too late to think upon any Thing but going through the Way you have forc'd upon me, but I wonder how you could make ſo great an Overſight. At which Expreſſion Aſhburnham having no more to ſay, wept bitterly. In the mean Time Colonel Hammond and Captain Basket beginning to be impatient of their long Attendance below in the Court, Sir John Berkley ſent

a Gentleman of the Earl of Southampton's to deſire the King and Mr. Aſhburnham to remember they were below. About half an Hour after his Maſteſty ſent for them up, and before Colonel Hammond and Captain Basket had kiſs'd his Hand, he took Sir John Berkley aſide, and ſaid to him, Sir John, I hope you are not ſo paſſionate as Jack Aſhburnham. Do you think you have follow'd my Directions? Berkley answer'd, No indeed, but it is not my Fault, as Mr. Aſhburnham can tell you if he pleaſe. It was now too late to take other Meaſures, and the King received Colonel Hammond very cheerfully, who repeated to him what he ſaid before, which was no Promiſe, for as he was intruſted by the Parliament, it was not conſiſtent with a Man of Honour and Honesty, in any wiſe to betray that Truſt, or to give his Maſteſty any other Protection than was ſuitable to his Diſcharge of it. Colonel Hammond conducted the King, and the Gentlemen who were with him to Cowes, and the next Morning his Maſteſty went with him to Carisbrook Caſtle, being met on the Way by ſeveral Gentlemen of the Iſle of Wight, by whom he underſtood that the Iſlanders were unanimouſly for him, and that if Hammond did not answer his Expectations, it would be eaſy for him at any Time to make his Escape; which Information was like what had been too often given the King ſince his Miſfortunes came upon him, very ill grounded both in Fact and in Reaſon.

The Earl of Clarendon is angry with Colonel Whalley for putting a Force upon his natural Temper in his Cruelties to the King, the Colonel being by Nature rude and brutal, and his Maſteſty every Day receiv'd Billets or Letters of wicked Deſigns upon his Life, which put him upon Thoughts of eſcaping from the Army. The Letter which he left for Colonel Whalley, ſhews what a faithful Painter the Lord Clarendon is.

Colonel Whalley,

I Have been civilly us'd by you and Major Huntington. I cannot but by this parting Farewel, acknowledge it under my Hand, as alſo do deſire your protecting my Houſhold Stuff and Moveables of all Sorts, which I have left behind me in this Houſe. I aſſure you it was not the Letter you ſhow'd me to Day that made me take this Reſolution, nor any Advertiſement of that kind, but I confeſs that I am loath to be made a cloſe Priſoner under Pretence of ſecuring my Life. So being confident that you wiſh my Preſervation and Reſtitution,

I reſt your Friend,
Charles Rex.

The firſt News the Parliament had of the King's Escape was by a Letter from Lieutenant General Cromwel, who about an Hour after it was known, that his Maſteſty had withdrawn himſelf from Hampton Court, wrote to the Parliament, That the King was this Night expected at Supper, and the Commiſſioners entering his Chamber with Colonel Whalley, found his Cloak careleſly caſt on the Ground, by the Way into the Entry Chamber that leads to the back Stairs, and down into the Vaults to the River ſide. As neither Parliament nor Army was in the Secret of his Escape, they were both terribly alarm'd at it, and the more for that each was afraid of the others coming to a ſeparate Agreement with him, and conſequently jealous of every Step that was taken. The Houſe of Commons read Cromwel's Letter early the next Morning, and voted, That it ſhall be Loſs of Eſtate and Life for any one to detain the King's Per-

Person, and not to discover it to both Houses of Parliament. Colonel Whalley brought them the Letter his Majesty left upon the Table, and to excuse himself, inform'd them that Asburnham had broken his Parole of Honour with him, that the King should not leave the Army without his Privy and Consent. Great Search was made for his Majesty in the City of London, where it was reported he had conceal'd himself, and Messengers were sent every Way in quest of him. But no News came till a Letter arriv'd from Colonel Hammond giving an Account of his Majesty's having put himself upon him in the Manner before related. "At which he being exceedingly surpriz'd did not know at first what Course to take, but weighing the great Concernment that the Person of the King is to the Settlement of the Peace of the Kingdom, he thought it his Duty to the King, the Parliament and Kingdom, to use the utmost of his Endeavours to preserve his Person from any horrid Attempt with which he had been threaten'd, and to bring him to a Place of Safety, where he may be also in a Capacity of answering the Expectation of the Parliament and People in the Settlement of the present Distractions." They receiv'd another Letter from Captain Basket, and order'd Rewards to the Messengers who brought them. They also order'd a Letter of Thanks to Colonel Hammond, who a Day or two after wrote them, That he caus'd a Mutiny of the Gentry of the Island, who express'd their Readiness to preserve his Majesty's Person, and to obey the Authority of Parliament; which shews that my Conjecture was right as to the Unanimity of the Island in the Cavalier Cause, That he had given Order to restrain any from going out of the Island, or coming in, without Passes, or being examin'd. He desir'd Accommodations for his Majesty, and 5000 l. was order'd him, which he complain'd of as too little, and had the former Allowance of 50 Pound a Day continu'd besides that advanc'd Money. Messengers were sent to the Isle of Wight, to bring up Sir John Berkley, Mr. Asburnham, and Col. Legg, but Col. Hammond excus'd the not Delivery of them, in a Letter to the Earl of Manchester, submitting, however, to the Pleasure of the Parliament if his Excuse was not thought sufficient. His Majesty had not been a Week at Carisbrook before he had himself drawn up a Message for the Parliament. Wherein in the first Place, he again refus'd to abolish Archbishops, Bishops, &c. which however he consented to afterwards in his Treaty with the Scots, for renewing the Civil War. The King avows he is satisfy'd in his Judgment, that this Order was plac'd in the Church by the Apostles themselves. That is, Bp. Timothy and Bp. Titus were Lords Temporal as well as Spiritual, had Miters, Crostiers, Chancellors, Spiritual Courts, Manors, &c. for if the King and his Chaplains had meant nothing else by Episcopacy, but Preaching, Praying, Ordaining and Super-intending in Ecclesiastical Government, the whole Body of the Presbyterians would gladly have been govern'd by primitive Bishops, as settled in Archbishop Usher's Reduction. His Majesty however consents, that the Presbyterian Religion be establish'd for three Years, and in the mean Time the Divines at Westminster, with 20 of his own Nomination, to determine as to Church Government after the three Years are expir'd, and then Toleration to scrupulous Consciences to be granted to all Persons, except Papists, Atheists, Blasphemers, and all those that do not say the Athanasian Creed, which all that do say it do so perfectly understand. His Majesty gives the Power of the Militia to the Parliament, during his Reign; and also that of the Disposing of the great Officers of State and Privy Counsellors, for the same Term, which were certainly very large Concessions, and such as ought to have given Satisfaction to reasonable Men. And probably they would have satisfy'd every one, had not new Provocations arisen by a new War, and the Minds of the People been more and more imbitter'd by the desperate Attempts of the Cavaliers and their Abettors. The King having no Answer to this Message in 10 Days, sent another to remind the Parliament of it, and a personal Treaty. But the Parliament had resolv'd to have their Propositions turn'd into Acts, and pass'd, before they consented to the King's coming to London. And it is to be noted, that the four Propositions which were agreed to be sent to him, had their Rise in the House of Lords, and consequently could not be the Contrivance of the Republican Party to obstruct the Peace. The four Bills for the King to pass, were, 1. A Bill for Settling the Militia of the Kingdom. 2. A Bill for calling in all Declarations, Oaths, and Proclamations, against the Parliament, and those who adher'd to them. 3. A Bill that those Lords who were made after the great Seal was carry'd to Oxford, should be incapable of sitting in the House of Peers. 4. That Power be given to the two Houses of Parliament to adjourn as they shall think fit. Which Bills being pass'd, they agree to a personal Treaty for the rest of the Propositions. His Majesty wrote a Letter to Sir Thomas Fairfax, informing him, He had appointed a Copy of his Letter to the Parliament when he left Hampton Court to be deliver'd him, and now had sent him a Copy of his last Message to both Houses from the Isle of Wight, in order to the Settlement of a good Peace. He desires him to employ his Credit with them, that Dr. Sheldon, Dr. Oldisworth, and Dr. Hammond, may be protected in coming to him. The House of Lords appointed the Earls of Kent, Northumberland, Rutland, Pembroke, Denbigh, and Commissioners Salisbury, to be their Commissioners, to carry the four Bills to the King. The Commissioners for the Commons were, Mr. Bulkely, Mr. Lisle, Mr. Robert Goodwin, Mr. Kemp. And the Scots Commissioners having press'd very much to have the Propositions more accommodated to their Nation and the Covenant; they were answer'd, That Bills pass'd both Houses were not to be alter'd; and that the Parliament were resolv'd to send away their Commissioners, desiring the Scots Commissioners to send their Propositions at the same Time, instead of which they protested against the Bills, and press'd for a personal Treaty with so much Vehemence, that it was suspected they intended to make the Refusal of it a Pretence for another War, about which they were then privately treating with the King; and doubtless, their flattering him with Hopes of Deliverance by the Assistance of that Nation, very much obstructed the King's speedy Compliance with the Parliament. The Commissioners arriving at the Isle of Wight on the 24th of December, presented the four Bills to the King, who said, He was assur'd they did not expect a present Answer, but he would take them into Consideration, and give his Answer in a few Days; which immediately dash'd all Hopes of any Success from this Commission, the Commissioners having but four Days allow'd them to stay for the Answer. The Scots Commissioners had probably been consulted, for presently after they presented a Protestation against the four Bills to the King, in the Name of the whole

It was a wild Imagination to hope for Restitution by a Scots Army, for which Cromwell and his Party had a hearty Contempt. Yet, as wild as it was, it hinder'd the King from passing the Four Bills, as Echard himself confesses; and Ludlow owns, that those who were for setting him aside, dreaded his passing them, it being visible, says he, that had he been restored to the Throne, he might easily have gratify'd his Friends, and reveng'd himself upon all his Enemies. But the Delinquents were so afraid of their Necks, and the Clergy of their Power and Revenues, that whatever Disposition his Majesty was in to do any thing for his own Safety, they always found some Means or other to frustrate it in Consideration of their own; and now they advise him to come to Terms with the Scots, who in such Case engag'd to bring an Army into England to join with the Presbyterians and Royalists for his Restitution.

The King falls in with the Scots.

Insurrections for him.

Several small Enterprizes were set on foot in and about London, in Wales, and in the North, with the same View; all which put together admitted a Glimmering of Light thro' a very dark Cloud of Adversity; and by this false Light did those weak Counsellors conduct his Majesty to the tragical End of all his Miseries.

The Lord Clarendon takes a great deal of needless Pains, and wastes Abundance of fine Words and round Periods, to shew the Monstrousness of the King's Treaty with the Scots, and the infamous Concessions. How courtly it is! But the Courtier is lost in the Delinquent, and the Apprehension he was in of perpetual Exile abroad, or a shorter Fate at home, has thrown those two handsome Epithets, monstrous and infamous, into his Oratory. The King, in a Word, oblig'd and bound himself down by all the Sanctions of a Treaty, To confirm the Solemn League and Covenant by Act of Parliament; To confirm also Presbyterian Government, The Directory of Worship, and The Assembly of Divines at Westminster, the very same whom the same Earl calls infamous, vicious, and ignorant, for three Years, and then to settle these Things for ever as should be agreed upon by that Assembly of Divines, to which Twenty of the King's Nomination should be added, and a Number from the Kirk of Scotland; which proving as plainly as Proof can render a Thing, that his Majesty had given up Episcopacy for ever, With what Front can it be said that he dy'd a Martyr for it? Let a Man have the least Forefight imaginable, and the greatest Degree of Stupidity next to Bigotry or Idiotism, could he not have assur'd himself, that the Assembly of Divines, with 40 or 50 zealous Kirkmen from Scotland, would have been much too hard in a Vote for Dr. Sheldon and 19 more such Doctors, whom the King was to name. Here the Earl of Clarendon labours like a Stag in the Toils, the more he struggles, it fastens him the more; he is fast in the Argument, and knowing that the Cause is given up, and the Martyrdom for the Church entirely lost, he strives to avoid and evade it, he strives hard against a very simple Fact, and would come off the same Way which the Roundheads always urg'd the King would take to clear himself of all Treaties, by alledging

the Concessions were extorted by the Scots. There was no need of Honour to hinder an Historian's concealing such an Argument; a little Discretion and Temper would have done it, for it confirms beyond Dispute what ever the Parliamentarians said of the Insecurity and Insincerity of the King's Treaties. Whenever any ingenuous Person has a Mind to object to this Passage, he shall find that I could easily have lengthen'd it several Pages, and have shewn that the Lord Clarendon was himself sensible that this Treaty of the King's with the Scots, knock'd all the Zeal for Church and Churchmen on the head: And what was extraordinary beyond Conception in this Treaty, his Majesty oblig'd himself to pay the very Money with which the Parliament bought him, and which was never paid, tho' such Glamour has been made by staunch Writers and Thinkers against that Bargain and Sale. This Treaty for a new Invasion of England, and a new vain unaccountable War, was solemnly sign'd at Carisbrooke Castle while the Parliament's Commissioners were there, with the Four Propositions; and what can be more evident than that the King resolv'd to argue as the Earl does, that those Concessions, and all Concessions which hinder'd his Return to arbitrary Power, should be declar'd extorted, when he could maintain such a Declaration? Ludlow informs us, that the Scots Treaty was manag'd chiefly by Dr. Gough a Popish Priest in London, in Concert with the Earls of London, Lanerick, Lauderdale, Sir William Fleming, and others, on the Part of the Scots; and that while the English and Scots Commissioners were at one and the same Time at Carisbrooke Castle walking with the King, they observ'd him to throw a Bone before two Spaniels that follow'd him, and to take great Delight in seeing their contesting for it, which some of them thought to be intended by him to represent the Bone of Contention he had cast between the Two Nations; a Piece of such superficial undisguis'd Politicks, that if both Nations had not been infatuated with mutual Prejudices, they would have seen and avoided it. The Earl of Clarendon's Reflections on the Treaty with the Scots, and the Conduct of the Presbyterians and Independents, agree as much with the Facts, as Things can agree which are made on Purpose for them, and are as agreeable to Truth as Dreams and Visions. I could with a great deal of Pleasure divert my self and the Reader with them, but I have not Room, and am afraid I have already too much offended the Gravity of History, which the Earl maintains amidst as much Mirth as is produc'd by a Man's believing he is imposing on another, when he is all the while himself impos'd upon. One Passage shall serve for all: The Scots Army in England did as much against the King as the Parliament. The Scots were beaten at Marston Moor, where the Parliament's Army obtain'd the Victory. The Parliament's Army obtain'd all the other Victories without the Scots, and took all the Towns except two or three on their own Borders; yet they took themselves to have equal Merit with the English. One would indeed think the King and the wife Counsellors took them so, or this fatal Treaty had not been enter'd into, which gave the Parliament Army a very signal Opportunity of shewing how equal the Scots were to the English in the Merit of the War, when Cromwell with 8 or 9000 English routed and dispers'd above 20000 Horse and Foot, which were rais'd to support this notable Treaty. The King's Answer to the Four Bills was deliver'd to the Parliament's Commissioners seal'd up, at which the Earl of Denbigh, who was the principal Commissioner, took

Offence,

A. D. 1647. Offence, alledging they were requir'd by their Instructions to bring an Answer, and they knew not whether the Contents of that Paper were an Answer or not; and when they had their next Audience of the King, the Lord Denbigh said, I have been your Ambassador, and in that Employment would never have deliver'd any Letter without a preceding Sight of it. His Majesty said, I have employ'd twenty Ambassadors, and none of them ever dar'd to open my Letters: But understanding that what the Earl of Denbigh said was the Sense of the other Commissioners, he told them, Well then I will shew it you, on Condition you will promise not to acquaint any one with the Substance of it before you have deliver'd it to the Parliament. To which they consenting, he desir'd the Company might withdraw. The Commissioners propos'd that Governor Hammond might be permitted to stay, which the King was not willing to allow; but not thinking it convenient to refuse it, he gave way, and by this Means the Governor as well as the Commissioners came to understand that the King had way'd the Interests both of the Parliament and Army to close with the Scots against both of them. The Impression which the Discovery of these Things made upon the Governor was so great, that before he departed from Carisbroke to accompany the Parliament's Commissioners to Newport, he gave Orders for a strict Guard to be kept in his Absence, and at his Return commanded the Gates to be lock'd up, and the Guards to be doubled, sitting up himself with them all Night, by which the King's intended Escape was obstructed. The next Morning he order'd his Majesty's Servants to remove, not excepting Dr. Hammond his own Kinsman, who taking Leave of the King, acquainted him that there was a Frigate ready to take him aboard. The Removal of the King's Servants, and the obstructing his Escape, made a great Noise; and one Burley, a discarded Sea-Officer, caus'd a Drum to be beaten to draw People together and rescue the King; but, says Ludlow, there were few besides Women and Children that follow'd him, having but one Musket amongst them, so that the King's Servants thought not fit to join them. Whitlocke adds, The Mayor of Newport where Burley beat his Drum, and the Inhabitants, shew'd their Affection to the Parliament, and were thank'd for it. Now, according to the Earl of Clarendon, the whole Island fell into the Mutiny under Capt. Burley, of a good Family; they said, They would not endure to see the King so us'd: Every Word of which is invented, as is what follows. That the King's own Servants, those very Servants that had been put out of the Castle, quieted the People. The Ground we walk on is all as rotten as this, and every Step we take gives Way under us! The poor Gentleman, the honest Tarpaulin, paid dear for his ill-advised Loyalty, the Term he gives to the Drum-beating; and the Parliament without Delay, above three Weeks after, sent down a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, with an infamous Judge, Wylde, a Gentleman of as good Extract and as great Fortune, of better Practice in the Law, and of as fair Character in Morals, as Mr. Hyde, who so scurrilously uses him, and so falsely represents the Fact; whom they made Chief Baron of the Exchequer for this Service, whereas he was not made Lord Chief Baron till nine Months after; who caus'd poor Burley to be indicted of High Treason. He did not cause it. The Parliament order'd Burley to be try'd by a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, and the Jury found him guilty. A pack'd Jury, according to the Historian, that he may be out in every Word of his History. Upon which their Judge condemn'd him, and the honest Man was forthwith executed. Whitlocke says, Judgment was given against him, but Execution respited. I defy all Readers of History to produce any Passage in any History, from Herodotus to Richard, which teems with Falsities like this; and what follows is as teeming, and for Want of Wit, excites Indignation rather than Mirth, for there is not the least Appearance of Conscience in it; and a Man who was capable of writing at that Rate, was well qualify'd to palm so many Sham-Plots on the World as were contriv'd after the Restoration, when many honest Men were hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd, with all Circumstances of Barbarity and Cruelty, with which he charges the Execution of poor honest Burley, tho' not one of them did ever offer to beat a Drum.

The King's Negative being return'd to the Four Bills, it was debated in Parliament, Jan. 3. The Debate was begun by Sir Thomas Wroth, C. W. p. Burgefs for Bridgewater in Somersetshire, whom a Member of the same Parliament calls Jack Pudding to Prideaux the Postmaster. Wroth spoke to this Purpose: Bedlam is appointed for sir Tho. Madmen, and Tophet for Kings. Our Kings of Wroth's late have carry'd themselves as if they were fit speech for no Place but Bedlam. My humble Motion shall consist of three Parts. 1. To secure the King, and keep him close in some Inland Castle, with sure Guards. 2. To draw up Articles of Impeachment against him. 3. To lay him by, and settle the Kingdom without him. I care not what Form of Government you set up, so it be not Kings and Devils.

Commissary General Ireton spoke after him: The King has deny'd Safety and Protection to his People by denying the Four Bills. Subjection to him is but in Lieu of his Protection, which being deny'd, they may well deny any more Subjection to him, and settle the Kingdom without him. This is what is now expected. After so long Patience, we should now shew our Resolution, and not desert those valiant Men who have engag'd for us beyond all Possibility of Retreat, and will never forsake the Parliament, unless the Parliament forsake them first. The Debate continu'd with great Warmth from Nine a Clock in the Morning to Seven at Night; and when the House was ready for the Question, Lieutenant General Cromwel stood up and said, It is now expected the Parliament should govern, and defend the Kingdom by their own Power and Resolutions, and not teach the People any longer to expect Safety and Government from an obstinate Man, whose Heart God has harden'd. Those Men, who have defended the Parliament from so many Dangers, will defend them therein with Fidelity and Courage against all Opposition. Teach them not, by neglecting your own and the Kingdom's Safety, in which their own is involv'd, to think themselves betray'd, and left hereafter to the Rage and Malice of an irreconcilable Enemy, whom they have subdu'd for your Sake, and therefore are likely to find his future Government of them insupportable, and fuller of Revenge than Justice, lest Despair teach them to seek their Safety by some other Means than adhering to you, [Here he put his Hand on his Sword] who will not stick to your selves; and how destructive such a Resolution in them will be to you all, I tremble to think, and leave you to judge. Here's an Energy that's truly Roman. Yet the Lord Clarendon and Echarde represent Oliver's Language as the Dregs of Enthusiasm and Cant. The Question being put, That no farther Addresses should be

The King's Condition was now worse than ever; for in the Midst of the last Despair he exasperated the Powers that had him in their Custody by Double-dealing, treating with the Parliament for Peace, and with the Scots for War, at the same Time. The Folly of which Counsels was as apparent as the Danger of them.

The same Day the House voted to revive the Committee of Safety, held at Darby House, by which Title it sometimes went. This Committee was first establish'd by an Ordinance the 7th of February, 1643. and Scots Commissioners were joyn'd with the English, to act as a Council of State, but under the Name of a Committee of Safety, which had been laid down for some Time, and was now reviv'd: The Members were, Algernon Earl of Northumberland, Robert Earl of Warwick, Henry Earl of Kent, Edward Earl of Manchester, William Lord Say and Sele, Philip Lord Wharton, John Lord Roberts, William Pierrepont, Esq; Sir Henry Vane, sen. Nathaniel Fiennes, Esq; John Crew, Esq; Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir William Armine, Sir Arthur Haselrigg, Sir Henry Vane, jun. Robert Wallop, Esq; Oliver St. John, Esq; Oliver Cromwel, Esq; Sir John Evelyn, Samuel Brown, Esq;

When the Vote for Non Addressees was sent to the Lords it past a hot Debate, and upon a Division there were 10 to 10; but the Majority on a second Thought gave it the Affirmative; and the Army sent a Declaration, January the 15th, to thank the Parliament for passing that Vote. The House of Commons wrote a Letter the Day before to Sir Thomas Fairfax, to send a convenient Number of Foot to garrison White-hall, and a Party of Horse to quarter in the Mews.

Several Counties sent Addressees of Thanks to the Parliament, for the Vote of no Addressees to the King, particularly Somersetshire, guided then by Prideaux, Post-master General, a very fierce Republican, who got a great Estate by his Zeal against the Church and Churchmen: Prideaux employ'd Col. Pyne in this Business, and the Somersetshire Address; after thanking the Parliament promis'd to live and die with them and the Army. But the Addressees were so aham'd of what they had done, that most of them retracted it in a counter Address.

About this Time the Parliament restor'd the Earl of Pembroke to an Office, of which he had been unjustly depriv'd. Upon the King's making a Garrison of Oxford, the Marquis of Hertford was remov'd, and the Lord Pembroke made Chancellor of that University. One cannot read what the Earl of Clarendon writes on this Occasion without Pity. The Earl of Pembroke was contented to be employ'd as Chancellor, who had taken an Oath to defend the Rights and Privileges of the University, notwithstanding which, out of the extream Weakness of his Understanding, and the miserable Compliance of his Nature, he suffer'd himself to be made a Property, &c. One can think no other by the History, but that the Author was as well born as Hampden, and as rich as Northumberland, by the Air that is given it from one End to the other. The great Quality of the Earl of Pembroke cannot defend him from Libel. This same Earl of Pembroke was regularly chosen Chancellor of the University seven Years before, on the Resignation of Laud, and most irregularly turn'd out of his Office by the King's Command, two Years after. A. D. 1647. Thus it appears he was only now restor'd to what he had been unjustly deprived of; and the insolent and daring Opposition he met with from those very Doctors who had chosen him Chancellor, shows how devoted they were to Duty and Obedience, for which the Earl of Clarendon so much flatters them, or else for choosing himself their Chancellor some Years after; though he himself too was turn'd out in a few Years, being, as A. Wood says, accus'd of divers Crimes. In speaking of the University he speaks of the Covenant, against which he assures us the Convocation of Oxford publish'd Reasons so invincible, that no Man, no nor the Assembly of Divines then sitting at Westminster, and forming a new Scheme of Religion, ever ventur'd to answer it. If this had been true, these Reasons would have had better Luck than any which were ever publish'd by Convocations. I have as much Contempt for the Covenant as the Historian or any of his Admirers, though not for the same Reasons: The Severity, Formality, and Subscription render it contemptible to me; so does the Force it puts upon the natural Liberty which every Man has and will have in the Way of Thinking. I would have Subscription abandon'd to those that never had any Thing on their Side but Coercion. The Falsity of the Assembly being then on a new Scheme of Religion, is as absurd as malicious; for that Synod made not the least Alteration in Matters of Faith and Doctrine which are only religious, though the Historian thinks that Discipline is only religious. He also assures us they were then sitting about a Catechism, which they had presented to the Parliament two or three Years before. The Truth is, the Covenant was establish'd by a Law; and the Legislators would have been greater Fools than their Enemies, if they had suffer'd the Assembly, or any one else to enter into Disputation about it with the Doctors of Oxford, who could not but have the last Abhorrence for a Law which would deprive them of all the Honours and Emoluments, to which their Doctorships intitled them, so they prov'd the Covenant to be full of Illegality, Wickedness and Perjury: They might as easily have prov'd it to be full of Brimstone and Fire. His Lordship telling us very gravely, that the Gates of Hell were never open'd wider than when Bishop Wilkins was made Warden of Wadham, and Bishop Reynolds Dean of Christchurch. King Charles II. solemnly took that Covenant no less than three Times. They plac'd in the Room of the learned, courageous and loyal Heads of Houses, Fellows and Scholars, A. Wood adds, Trencher Scrapers, factious Presbyterians, according to the Lord Clarendon. A. Wood draws their Pictures with more Likeness and as much Malice; They had mortify'd Visages, puling Voices, Eyes lifted up, Hands lying on their Breasts, short Hair, quirpo Clothes, and Looks like Prentices. This Wood is the wittiest of them all, as the Historian is the most florid. A. Wood too tells us, Hell was broke loose. Before they came to Oxford, there was no Place in England so happy in Observance of religious Ceremonies; but after the factious Presbyterians came, there appear'd nothing but Confusion and Darkness; there being nothing in the World so illuminating as Altars, Tapers, &c. The Earl proceeds, These factious Presbyterians sow'd the Seeds of Ignorance, Prophanation, Atheism and Rebellion.

Some of the first who took Degrees after the Degree Earl of Pembroke was restor'd to the Chancellorship, and the Covenant was establish'd, were, Oxford, Charles Dormer, Earl of Carnarvon, James and by Her. whom.

A. I might have swell'd this List to a great Bulk, if I would have remembered all the eminent Names that took the Covenant in the University of Oxford; but I chose rather to mention those that will be allow'd to be as good Churchmen as the Lord Clarendon, than those that may be thought to favour the reform'd Religion as profess, in Scotland, France and Holland, &c. There are not Men more eminent for Learning, Quality, Piety and Genius, in the History of that University; yet the Earl of Clarendon affirms, that Ground was unskilfully cultivated that Weeds grew up, that poisonous Seeds were sown; that all the Governments were tyrannical, and as his Lordship and A. Wood handsomely phrase it, Hell was broke loose, and Hell Gate wide open'd.

Now let us read some of the Names that took Degrees in this University, when King Charles the Ist. was there in Person, when the Learned, Courageous, and Loyal, were its Ornaments, and the full Observances of Ceremonies its Glory, according to our two most excellent Historians. Edward Shireburn, Esq; Edward Windham, Esq; Capt. Roger Sanders, Mr. Anthony Lightfoot, Capt. John Miller, Sir Francis Chalk, Mr. William Jay, Charles Whittaker, Esq; Dr. Edward Buck, Dr. William Croot, Mr. John Gurgany, Sir Henry Moody, Sir Troylus Turberville a Papist, Capt. John Merret, Dr. George Morley, Dr. Edward Wolley Bishop of Confert, Mr. John Lakenby a Papist, Mr. John Douck, Mr. Martin Lewillyn, Mr. William Joyner Papist, Sir John Lamb, William Killingtree, Esq; and a greater Number more, Men of equal Worth and Eminence. The Truth is, every Word which the Earl of Clarendon and A. Wood say of the Ignorance and Confusion in the University, after the Earl of Pembroke's Visitation without Ground, may with good Ground be said of it before that Visitation; A. Wood himself owns as much: "Notwithstanding the chief Members of the University had put up a Petition to his Majesty against the promiscuous conferring of Degrees, and the Danger that the University was like to fall in to, if some Remedy in that Matter was not taken; as namely, That the solemn Arts and Sciences would be destroy'd, the Fountains of the University dry'd up, hopeful Scholars be discourag'd, and the University dishonour'd; yet nevertheless his Majesty recommended the same Sort of Persons:" By which it appears, that even while the King was on the Spot, the Confusion and Darkness thicken'd; the Arts and Sciences were in Danger of being destroy'd, and the University was dishonour'd several Years before the Pembrokeian Visitation. So unhappy is the Lord Clarendon in his History, as to be most fierce against the Parliamentarians in those Cases, where his Friends themselves gave the most Offence. He takes no Manner of Notice that by the Articles for the Rendition of Oxford, that University was subjected to this Visitation, but goes on declaiming against the Injustice of it, when it was a Condition of their being taken to Mercy.

The University of Cambridge was all along within the Parliament's Jurisdiction, as being the Capital of the Eastern Association; and therefore they sent the Earl of Manchester thither, almost as soon as the Ordinance past for taking the Covenant, to tender it to the Heads, Fellows and Scholars of that University: He took with him his two Chaplains, Mr. Asb, and Mr. Good, who have very hard Words given them for accompanying him in that Mission, which was to administer the Covenant to the Members of the University, and to remove such as would not comply, many of whom were in Arms against the Powers that impos'd that Oath on them as the best Security they could take for their peaceable Behaviour. The Contest was left to the Decision of the Sword, between King and Parliament. His Majesty in the Beginning of the War bid very fair for the Success of it; and the Academicks were afraid that their taking the Covenant would hinder their Church Preferments, which are the Inducements to their very hard Studies; so most of the Masters, Fellows, and Scholars refus'd it; and some took it, as Dr. Edward Rainbow, afterwards Bishop of Carlisle, Dr. Thomas Bamburg, Dr. Thomas Eden, Dr. Richard Love, Master of Bennet College: And the Earl of Manchester's Behaviour is much commended for his Mildness; but the invincible Obstinacy of the Masters, such as Cosens, Stern, Cumber, was so well imitated by the Youngsters, that great Numbers refus'd to obey the Ordinance. Most of the Heads were outed of their Headships, and yet the Lord Manchester's two Chaplains, as we read in Fuller, were complain'd of, That their over Remissness would obstruct Reformation both in Church and University. The Alterations made on this Occasion are as follow,

If one could break in upon Decency with as much Pleasure as does the Author of the History of the Rebellion, one might offer the Comparison, and demand whether the University lost any Thing by the Exchange, in taking Cudworth, Arrowsmith, Whichcot, Palmer, Tuckney, Minshall: The Names of the other are before the Reader, and those of them whose Characters are most known, make up what is otherwise wanting in Bigotry and Zeal.

I do not enter into the Detail of Parliamentary Proceedings, having not Room for them within my Compass, especially considering what Sir Simons D'Essex says, That the Orders and Ordinances of this Parliament, in Bulk and Number did not only equal, but exceed all the Laws and Statutes made since the Conquest. I shall insert one of their Orders, because it shews us how impartial and upright the Earl of Clarendon is in representing this Parliament as a Company of Neroes and Dioclesians, who persecuted the Clergy of the Church as the Pagans did the Christians, and turn'd them out of their Livings to beg and starve; whereas by a Law they made Provision for the Wives and Families of such Clergymen who chose rather to quit their Benefices than worship God as the Protestants do abroad.

Die Jovis, Nov. 11, 1647.

Order'd,

THAT the Wives and Children of all such Persons as are, or have been, or shall be sequester'd, by Order of either House of Parliament, shall be comprehended within the Ordinance, that allows the fifth Part for Wives and Children, and shall have their fifth Part allow'd unto them; and the Committee of Lords and Commons for Sequestrations, and the Committee of plunder'd Ministers, are requir'd to take Notice hereof, and yield Obedience hereunto accordingly.

But when the Lord Clarendon procur'd that charitable Act, which turn'd out 2 or 3000 pious, worthy Divines, as Mr. Locke calls them, there was not one Penny allotted to them, their Wives and Children, nor any Allowance for any Layings out and Improvements, but they must all Starve or Subscribe; and I can very well remember, that great Numbers of Families, as well Laity as Clergy, were beggar'd by infamous Processes in Spiritual Courts, purely for Conscience sake, and presuming to have more Religion than their Neighbours.

Levellers.

We have mention'd the Divisions and Disturbances in the Army, occasion'd by the Agitators, and now there grew out of them another Party, who were call'd Levellers by Way of Derision only, for what is said of their being against all Degrees of Honour or Riches, and levelling the Count with the Cobler is false. They were for a Commonwealth, and that not being to be accomplish'd without the Death of the King, and Renouncing all the Royal Family; those Fanatics first enter'd into those wicked Counsels, which were afterwards so wickedly executed. Col. Rainsborough, Col. Harrison, Col. Eyre, Major Scot, Lieut. Col. Lilburn, Capt. Reynolds, Capt. Bray, were the chief Movers in this Levelling Party, which had infected 9 Regiments of Horse, and 7 Regiments of Foot, who besides their Officers, had a Council of Agents to manage their Affairs, and they were so bold as to require the Parliament to dissolve themselves in a Year's Time, and to alter the Method of Elections to Biennial Parliaments, and otherwise, that it be declar'd, that the King's Consent is not necessary in passing of Laws, the first direct Attack upon the Royal Authority; that Liberty of Conscience be establish'd, Popery and Prelacy excepted; that Birth and Place do not confer any Exception to the Law; whence they were term'd Levellers, and not for their Hatred to Titles and Offices, Major General Harrison, and Col. Rainsborough, having as much Gallantry that way as Waller or Hollis. This Party publish'd two smart Pamphlets, one call'd, The Case of the Army, which was voted to be destructive to the Privileges of Parliament, and the fundamental Government of the Kingdom. The other entituled, The Agreement of the People. And at the general Rendezvous at Ware, several Regiments distinguish'd themselves by Papers in their Hats with that Inscription. General Fairfax spoke severely to those and the other Regiments; and to give a Check to this mutinous Spirit, order'd Col. Eyre and Major Scot to be committed. In Lilburn's Regiment there was but one Captain left, all the rest being driven away by the Mutineers, and the remaining one, Capt. Bray, complied with them, for which General Fairfax order'd him to be seiz'd at the Head of the Regiment. He also call'd a Council of War, before which several of the Offenders were brought, of whom 3 were condemn'd to be shot, and one of them executed at the Head of Lilburn's Regiment, which so terrify'd the rest, that they promis'd to be more obedient for the future; and Col. Harrison and Col. Rainsborough's Regiments saw their Errors and submitted. Col. Rainsborough, who had been order'd to command the Fleet as Vice-Admiral, was requir'd to clear himself of this Mutiny before he went to Sea, and Major Scot to give an Account of his Conduct. But this did not hinder a Representation to the General, under the Hands of Col. Lilburn and his Officers, Acknowledging and promising their Obedience due to him, and praying him to mind the Parliament of considering and resolving those Things which have been presented to them from the Army; and as soon as the necessary great Affairs first to be settled shall be transacted, that a Period may be set to this Parliament. Whitlocke tells us, " 'Twas thought a Piece of high Insolence of the Army, so often and so earnestly to press the Dissolving of that Authority under which themselves had so highly acted. " But some of the Officers were suppos'd to have Hopes of coming in themselves to be Members of Parliament upon new Elections, and some were thought to act upon better Principles of the Nation's Freedom, by not being subject-

Crom-wel's Art and Difficultation.

King's Trial first propos'd.

The Part that Cromwel acted at this Juncture was very artful; he had at first play'd behind the Curtain, and set on the Agitators, without appearing in their Agency; but when he was treating with the King he drop'd them as utter Enemies to that Treaty, and at the last mentioned Rendezvous declar'd himself so openly against them, that he rode up to one of the mutinous Regiments, accompany'd with his Officers, and seeing the Papers in their Hats, commanded them sternly to throw them away, which they not obeying, he immediately shot one of them dead on the Spot, and order'd others to be seiz'd and brought to Trial. When he return'd to the Parliament he valu'd himself much on this Service. He had not long before countenanc'd the Army in Opposition to the Parliament, who were about treating with the King; and now that Treaty is, as he thinks, in his own Hands, he oppos'd the Agency, and labour'd to obstruct it, pretending his so doing was only in order to keep the Army in Subjection to the Parliament, who being very desirous to have this Spirit suppress'd in the Army by any Means, not only approv'd what he had done, but gave him their Thanks for it. To which, says Ludlow, I gave as loud a No as I could though single. The King then was in Treaty with the Scots Commissioners, as has been related, which made him refuse the four Bills which Cromwel's Party in the House had promoted, as the Ground-work of the Agreement he was to make with the King, whom Col. Hammond prevail'd with to send Letters of Compliment to Fairfax and Cromwel, congratulating their Success against the Agitators, and conjuring them by their Engagements, their Honour and Conscience, to agree with him, and not expose themselves to the fantastick Giddiness of the Mutineers in the Army. Sir John Berkeley carry'd these Letters, and had Orders to explain his Majesty's Sentiments further viva voce. The Governor had before sent his Chaplain Mr. Troughton on the like Message to the Generals, and as Sir John was going to the Head Quarters, then at Windfor, he met Troughton about Bagshot, who acquainted him, he had no good News to carry to the King, the Army having taken new Resolutions touching his Person. Riding a little further he met with Cornet Joyce, who told him, he was astonish'd at his Design of going to Windfor, for that the general Council of Agitators there had declar'd for bringing the King to a Trial, and their Declaration was likely to succeed. Sir John coming to Windfor deliver'd his Letters to the General, who order'd him to withdraw, and after half an Hour's Attendance he was call'd in, and told in a stern Manner, That they were the Parliament's Army, and therefore could say nothing to the King's Motion about Peace, but must refer those Matters and the King's Letters to their Consideration. Cromwel and Ireton receiv'd him very coldly, and shew'd him the Letter which Troughton brought from Col. Hammond with a disdainful Smile. At Midnight he had a private Conference with another General Officer, suppos'd to be Scout-Master-General Watson, who said, You know that I and my Friends engag'd our selves to you, that we were zealous for an Agreement, and if the rest were not so we were abus'd. That since the Tumults in the Army we did mistrust Cromwel and Ireton, of which I inform'd you, and come now to tell you that we mistrust neither, and that we are resolv'd, notwithstanding our Engagement, to destroy the King and his Posterity; to which End Ireton has made two Propositions this Afternoon; one, That you should be sent Prisoner to London. The other, That none should speak with you on Pain of Death; and I do now hazard my Life by doing it. The Way design'd to ruin the King is to send 800 of the most disaffected in the Army to secure his Person, and then to bring him to a Trial, and I dare think no further. This will be done in 10 Days, and therefore if the King can escape let him do it as he loves his Life. He then told him the Reason of this Change, which was, that notwithstanding the pretended Suppression of the Mutineers, the Agitators had still two Thirds of the Army in their Interest, and had told Cromwel and Ireton they would leave nothing unattempted to bring the whole Army to their Sense, and if all fail'd they would separate from the rest, and join with any who would assist them in the Destruction of those that should oppose them, upon which Cromwel and Ireton argu'd thus; if the Army divide the greater Part will join with the Presbyterians, and will in all likelihood prevail to our Ruin, by forcing us to make our Applications to the King, wherein we shall rather beg than offer any Assistance, which if the King shall give, and afterwards prevail, if he shall then pardon us, it will be all we can pretend, and more than we can certainly promise our selves. The Conclusion was, that in case they could not bring the Army to their Sense, it would be best to comply with them, a Schism being utterly destructive to both. In pursuance of this Resolution Cromwel bent all his Thoughts to make his Peace with the Party that was most opposite to the King, acknowledging, as he knew well how to do on such Occasions, That the Glory of this World had so dazzled his Eyes, that he could not discern clearly the great Works that the Lord was doing. He sent comfortable Letters to the Mutineers who were in Custody, assuring them nothing should be done to their Prejudice, and by these and the like Arts he perfected his Reconciliation.

His Majesty was well advis'd by Berkley to King continue his Escape as soon as possible, and the trives to Queen had sent a Ship to lie off the Isle of escape. Wight to that Purpose, which she earnestly press'd, but the King was determin'd to finish the Treaty with the Scots first, and that obliging him to deny the four Bills, Col. Hammond suspected he would not have done it without such Intentions, upon which he took so much Care of the Guard about him, that no Opportunity offer'd, and the Scots Invasion, and the Insurrections of England, in a word the second Civil War begun by the King's Agents, having not the least Probability of ending otherwise than it did, in the Destruction of all that engag'd in it, the Death of the King is again chiefly to be imputed to rash and weak Counsellors, who put him upon appealing again to the Sword, which had before decided the Cause against him. In common Policy there were but two Ways to save his Life, after the fatal Resolution taken at Windfor was known, either frankly to pass the four Bills, and fall in with both Parliament and Army, or to make his Escape, which his evil Counsellors had render'd impracticable, by delaying his Agreement with the two Houses, who were so provok'd by his rejecting their Bills, that they came to the beforemention'd Note, of making no further Addresses to him. Coka gives another Turn to the Alteration of Cromwel's Mind as to his concluding with the King, and that it was occasion'd by a Letter one of his Spies intercepted from his Majesty to the Queen, wherein he told her, That tho' he assented

sented to the Army's Proposals, yet if by assenting to them he could procure Peace, it would be easier then to take off Cromwel, than now he was the Head that govern'd the Army; which is agreeable enough with what Oliver said in Parliament, That the King was so great a Dissembler, and so false a Man, that he was not to be trusted. He alledg'd many Particulars, and Echard very wisely tells them too, as if there was no Truth in them, "That while the King so lemnly profess'd that he referr'd himself wholly to the Army, and depended only upon them for composing the Kingdom's Distractions, at the same Time he had secret Treaties with the Scots Commissioners how he might embroil the Nation in a new War, and destroy the Parliament, the Lords concurr'd with the Commons in the Vote of No more Addresses, on the 17th of January." Echard calls this a surprising Vote, one of his insipid Epithets, there being no Surprise in it at all; and in the Declaration publish'd by the Parliament to justify that Vote, he tells us, They loaded the King with lending Ships to the French King to reduce Rochel, with a Design to bring over German Horfe, with grinding the People by Loans, Privy Seals, Coat and Conduct Money, Patents, Monopolies, and that one Compendium of Slavery Ship Money; every Syllable of which is as true as Truth it self, and so is what follows; With torturing Mens Bodies by Whipping, sitting Noses, cutting off Ears, burning Cheeks, filthy Imprisonments, with lording it over Souls by the Oath ex Officio, Excommunications, Ceremonies, Articles, New Canons, and Canon Oaths; with a scandalous Declaration for dissolving the Parliament in 1640. with writing Letters to the Pope, with an unparallel'd Way of coming to the House of Commons, &c. Every one is by this Time satisfy'd what a very small Historian this same Mr. Echard is, and yet see how erect is the Look of his History! This Declaration, and their Grand Remonstrance, are the original mighty Libels from which the whole Swarm of little Libellers seem to have since copy'd. There is no need of appealing to him, because his Judgment and his Evidence will not be much minded; but I appeal to every the least Dabbler in History, even less than himself, whether every Tittle of that Declaration is not Fact, and whether the Parliament had not Reason to say, as they did, We could give many Reasons more, why we will make no more Addresses. He thinks he has something on his Side when he quotes Mr. Hollis, who hated Cromwel as much as Mr. Hyde did, and had been persecuted by the Independent Party more than Mr. Hyde had been by the Presbyterians, which gives one good Reason to suspect he had more Regard to Pique and Revenge than to Sincerity and Impartiality, and steer'd by such another Compass as the Lord Clarendon did. The above-mention'd Declaration was drawn up by Mr. Fiennes with much Asperity, 'tis true, but with as much Truth: It charges his Majesty with rejecting all Offers of Accommodation after six several Applications to him, and the Charge is well enough grounded. The Lords agreeing with the Commons in the Vote for no more Addresses, the Council of the Army declar'd, That they resolv'd to endeavour to preserve the Peerage, and the Rights of the Peerage of England, notwithstanding any Scandal upon them to the contrary. Among the rest who spoke against the surprising Vote, according to the Earl of Clarendon, was Sir John Maynard, who was then a Prisoner in the Tower; Voted the 7th of September, 1647. That Sir John Maynard be discharg'd from being a Mem-

A. D. 1648. ber of the House, and be committed to the Tower during the Pleasure of the House; and further, That an Impeachment of High Treason be drawn up against him. On the 8th of September Sir John Maynard was sent to the Tower; and on the 28th of October, Impeachments against the 7 Lords were argu'd upon, and an Impeachment against Sir John Maynard. Thus we find him fast in the Tower, and under an Impeachment for High Treason. But granting that it was the Pleasure of the House that he should be at Liberty to practise the Law in Westminster-Hall, in Term-time, he had been expell'd the House of Commons four Months before the Vote for Non-Addressing past, on the 3d of January; and besides, he was remanded to the Tower before the Declaration past: Yet the Lord Clarendon has not only restor'd him to his Seat in the Parliament House, but made a Speech for him, and assures us he spoke it with Vehemence, and that his Argumentation made a great Impression upon all Men who had not prostituted themselves to Cromwel. Is it not great Pity that this good Argumentator was all the while in the Tower, and arguing with the Lords, by a Paper he sent them from thence, against their being competent Judges of him, who ought to be try'd by a Jury. But what is most pleasant in this Piece of History is, that his Lordship tells us, Maynard, a Prisoner in the Tower for High Treason, and expell'd the House, was so disgusted at the Parliament for not hearkening to him, that he withdrew, and came no more to the House in very many Months, nor could he come without Leave of the Lieutenant of the Tower, nor had he any Business there, having been discharg'd from being a Member of the House at the same Time that Serjeant Glyn was. I have digress'd the longer on this Passage in the History of the Rebellion, because it will convince every one, that the same Imagination which could take a Man out of Prison, place him in the Parliament House, and make a Speech for him, must work finely when it is giving Beauty or Deformity to a Picture. The Historian taught Echard to labour his Matters with Epithets, as this monstrous Declaration, this monstrous Determination, produc'd the Second War, the People were so generally offended with it; whereas the second War was produc'd by the King's Treaty with the Scots, and the Intrigues of the Presbyterians and Royalists, who were now alike afraid of the Army. The first Rumour of a Revolt from the Parliament came from Wales, where Major General Langborn, who had been very serviceable to them, was seduc'd from their Service by the Temptations and Offers of certain Agents for the King. The General having some Suspicion of his holding Correspondence with the Cavaliers, order'd Col. Fleming to relieve Col. Poyer, Governor of Pembroke Castle, who was in the Secret with Langborn; but Poyer refus'd to deliver it, and the Parliament pass'd on the 4th of March an Ordinance for reducing the Castle, and bringing Poyer and his Adherents to Justice. Orders were sent to Major General Langborn to disband his Forces, but the Soldiers would not obey them, suppos'd to be encourag'd in their Disobedience by Langborn, who soon after declar'd himself, and seiz'd the Parliament's Commissioners who were sent to disband his Army.

In the mean time there was a very dangerous Tumult in the City of London; it began in Moorfields, about Tipling and Gaming, on Sunday, April the 9th, contrary to that Ordinance which suppress'd the impious Book of Sports. The Rabble set upon and overpower'd the Train'd Bands about Finnesbury, from thence they

A. D. 1648. they went to White-Chapel, where they seiz'd the Colours of a Company of Foot. Others went to Smithfield, and some to Whitehall, but the Horse-Guards dispers'd them. Next Day, the 10th of April, they increas'd, surpriz'd Newgate and Ludgate, took the Keys, went to the Lord Mayor's, and took thence a Drake, in which Action some of them were slain. They remov'd the Drake to Ludgate, and became so numerous, that the Lord Mayor left his House, and remov'd to the Tower. Their Number still increasing, they were very earnest to get Arms. They broke open a House in Milk-street, and other Houses, to arm themselves with the Weapons they found there. They possess'd themselves of the Magazine at Leadenhall, beat up Drums, and cry'd out, For God and King Charles. The General, now Lord Fairfax by the Death of his Father, call'd a Council of War, where the Question was put, Whether they should hazard the Two Regiments at the Meuse and Whitehall, or stay for more Force? And it was agreed, rather than delay the Business, which must needs be dangerous, and hazard much Blood, they would engage with those two Regiments only. Accordingly the next Morning the Two Regiments enter'd the City at Aldersgate, and march'd to Leadenhall, where they attack'd the Mutineers, who fir'd their Drake, wounded Capt. Merriman and his Lieutenant, and kill'd a Woman. The Soldiers wounded several of the Rabble, and a Waterman who shot off the Drake was kill'd. Many of the Rout were apprehended, and the rest dispers'd themselves. The City Gates were set open, and all Things quiet before Ten a Clock in the Morning. 'Tis very surprizing that a Person who has no greater Share of Common Sense than Mr. Echard has, should pretend to Wit as he does: These young Persons with Stones and Clubs took the Colours from the Train'd Bands, and in a childish Bravery marching into the Street, frighted Warner the present Lord Mayor. Fairfax entering with some Regiments of Horse and Foot, easily dispers'd them, because no great Man would undertake to be their General. The Citizens were forc'd to raise 1000 Pounds for a Gratuity to the Two Regiments, just now it was several Regiments of Horse and Foot, their new Deliverers. There's nothing so ridiculous as a Man's pretending to be witty without Wit. These young Persons were other People and Malignants, as well as Apprentices, according to Whitlocke; and the several Regiments of Horse and Foot only a small Part of the Army, who behav'd themselves with much Gallantry and Resolution against a great Multitude of Men, not Boys and Girls, as in Echard; and it was no small Happiness to the Parliament that this Insurrection was well quieted, which in those Times of Discontent and Distraktion, if it had not been so soon appeas'd and nipp'd in the Bud, might have prov'd of most dangerous Consequence to the Parliament and all their Friends. Whitlocke afterwards reflects thus gravely upon it: "We may take Notice of the Inconstancy of worldly Affairs: When that Parliament and their Army had subdu'd the Common Enemy, then they quarrell'd amongst themselves, the Army against the Parliament. When they were pretty well pieced together again, as upon the Votes for Non-Addressees, then the Apprentices and others make an Insurrection against the Parliament and Army." These are the Reasonings of a wife and sober Man, and instead of such Wisdom and Sobriety, the Archdeacon presents us with Drollery and Grimace. The City petition'd the Parliament for a Thanksgiving on Oc- casion of their Deliverance from the late Tumult. They humbly thank'd the General and the Committee of the Militia for their great Care and Pains in suppressing it. We have mention'd what the Earl of Clarendon says of the miraculous Effects of the Parliament's monstrous Declaration and monstrous Determination, that it made them universally detestable. The first Instance of it in true History, is the Address of the Gentlemen of the Grand Jury in Hampshire, where in they acknowledge the Goodness and Wisdom of the Parliament, in the Votes of no further Addressees to the King. The next is the Address which Sergeant Weld brought from the Gentlemen of the Grand Jury of the County of Somerset, where the Earl told us they were Cavaliers to a Man, excepting two Gentlemen, wherein they acknowledge the great Care and Pains of the Parliament for the Peace of the Nation, particularly in their late Votes touching the King, desiring the Judges to return their humble Thanks to the Parliament. This is the Universality of the People's Detestation of those Monstrosities which the Earl talks of. The Somersetshire Grand Jury complain of Malignants, Apostates, and Neutrals; of Alehouses, of Cavaliers being in Offices, and practising as Counsellors and Attornies. The Occasion of Complaint as to Persons in Offices, Counsellors and Attornies, has continu'd there ever since; and indeed it is a crying Grievance, as clothing Insolence and Oppression with the Robe of Authority and Law.

The Storm gathering in Scotland was soon perceiv'd. The Parliament's Commissioners at Edinburgh, the Earl of Nottingham, Mr. Goodwin, Mr. Ashurst, Mr. Stapleton, and Colonel Birch, sent Information that the Parliament in Scotland had appointed a Committee of Danger preparatory to their Design of invading England, from whence came Capt. Wogan, a Revoltor from the Parliament, with about 400 Horse, and was follow'd by Sir Thomas Glemham, Sir Philip Musgrave, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and other Delinquents, who staid in Scotland till the Scots Army march'd for England, against which the Earl of Argyle and several Lords protested. The Parliament's Commissioners demanded to have Wogan and the Delinquents deliver'd up, but the Scots gave no satisfactory Answer to them in that and all other Demands.

About this Time the Earl of Kent and the Commissioners Lord Grey, Sir Tho. Widdrington, and Bulstrode were to me in detecting the Falsities in the History of the Rebellion, were appointed Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal. The Lord Pawlet was order'd to be try'd for killing one Henry II. lery, on whose Widow the Parliament bestow'd 100 l. Dr. Clark, Dr. Exton, and Dr. Doriflaus, were made Judges of the Admiralty. Sir Oliver Cromwel's Composition was remitted for his Kinsman Lieutenant General Cromwel's sake; and the Lords acquainted the Commons at a Conference, that the Duke of York, with the Duke of Gloucester and the Lady Elizabeth, being together playing in a Room after Supper by themselves, the Duke of York privately slip'd from them down the Back Stairs, York without Cloak or Coat, in his Shoes and Stockings, by Way of the Privy Garden, having got a Key of the Door, by which he escap'd thro' the Park, and could not be found; none of his Servants who attended him being missing. 'Twas suppos'd that he went off by private Instructions from his Father, tho' it is not easy to discern the Wisdom of it, the Duke having a Princely Allowance from the Parliament, who were better able to keep him than those he had recourse to;

A. D. 1648. and as his Person was very safe, under the Care of the Noble Earl of Northumberland, so the Merit of conveying him away, which the Earl attributes to one Col. Bampfild, was not considerable enough to deserve so much Room in his History.

Colonels

Langhorn,

Poyer, and Powel.

In the mean while Col. Poyer increas'd in Strength: Col. Powel was come into him: Sir Nicholas Keymis had seized Chepstow Castle, with some Welch Gentry and Peasantry, whose Understandings were of the same Size with that valourous Knight's, of the same Order with him of Mancha. Major General Langhorn had put himself at the Head of a greater Parcel of ancient Britons, against whom Lieutenant General Cromwel was order'd to march with two Regiments of Horse and three Regiments of Foot. Col. Horton, who commanded the Parliament's Forces in South Wales, publish'd a Declaration to satisfy the Country People as to the Parliament's Proceedings in disbanding Langhorn's Forces, to ease them of free Quarter, and of the Danger Poyer had brought them into; but Whitlocke says the Welchmen did not understand what he said. Keymis had not been long possess'd of Chepstow Castle before he was besieged by Col. Herbert and Col. Horton, who with about 3000 Horse and Foot of the Parliament's Forces, met Major General Langhorn, Major General Stradling, Col. Powel, and other Revolters and Cavaliers, to the Number of 8000 Men, attack'd and routed them. Stradling was taken Prisoner, Langhorn wounded, many slain, 26 Captains and 100 Subalterns and 3000 Soldiers taken, with their Colours and Arms. The Parliament had bestow'd Lands to a good Value on the ungrateful Langhorn, which were now given to Col. Horton. Mr. Elkenhead and Mr. Parker, two Lawyers, were made Judges to try the Mutineers in Wales, and their Leaders were sent up to London to be try'd by a Council of War. Thus was another Civil War begun, and Blood spilt, with no more Prospect of Success, than if Sacheverel's Mob should have attack'd the Duke of Marlborough's Army; and every reasonable Man must with Indignation behold a Company of Desperadoes involving their Country in new Miseries out of Pique and Revenge. These Doings were not likely to make Men have more Compassion for the King's calamitous Condition. The North Welchmen were to have risen at the same Time with the South, and the Lord Clarendon vouches for the Lord Byron, that he had dispos'd all North Wales to be ready. How this agrees with Whitlocke? The Counties of Flint, Denbigh, and Montgomery, the best half of all North Wales, enter'd into an Association for securing those Counties against the Enemy, for which the Parliament order'd them hearty Thanks. The Earl of Clarendon musters those Mutineers every where to the greatest Advantage, tho' they are so soon to be reduc'd and ship'd off to America, where they liv'd better than ever they had done before. He gives a notable Account of a notable Insurrection in Kent, carry'd on by Roger L'Estrange, who made this Government this Requital for saving him from the Gallows. He was chief Counsellor to one Hales, who went by the Name of Squire Hales, and expected to be General to the Kentish Gentlemen, as the Lord Clarendon calls them; but Whitlocke calls them Kentish Rioters, whose Intention was to plunder, which they executed with the greatest Outrage where they had the Power: But upon General Fairfax's moving towards them with seven Regiments of Horse and Foot, the Rioters would have enter'd into a Treaty, which he refus'd, saying, he knew no Authority they had to appoint Commissioners; and truly the best Authority

Langhorn routed.

Kentish Insurrection.

they had was Roger L'Estrange's Warrant, as the Lord Clarendon owns, and yet they became so formidable, that he assures us, they had Horse and Foot enough to meet any Army that was like to be brought against them, tho' as numerous as they were, these Gentry were then running away as fast as they could run from General Fairfax, who indeed had not so many Men, but those he had were old Soldiers, and the Rioters a Crew got together rather to rob than to fight. They barricaded a Bridge which led to Gravesend, but were driven from it by Major Husbands; and Whitlocke tells us of whom this Royal Army consisted, of Peasants, Farmers, and London Prentices, with some Knights, Gentlemen and Cavaliers. The General came up with them at Maidstone, and, after a very warm Engagement, forc'd his Way into the Town, kill'd 200 of the Mutineers, took 1400 Prisoners, and 400 Horse. Those of them that were left made towards London under their General the Lord Goring, now Earl of Norwich, for the Royalists could rise in Title, tho' they sunk in Fortune. Their main Hope was, that the City of London would have favour'd them, but the Citizens had been too lately mortify'd to venture again on such a rotten Bottom; and General Fairfax having order'd a Body of Horse to keep close to their Rear while he came after them slowly, the Lord Goring slip'd over to Essex Side with about 500 Rioters, or, as the Lord Clarendon words it, young Gentlemen grown up in Loyal Families, who had been too young to appear before, and now were not likely to grow much older. Sir Richard Hardress, with about 2000 more Kentish Rioters, had laid Siege to Dover Castle, and taken the Block Houses; but upon the Approach of Sir Michael Livesay and Col. Rich, he rais'd the Siege and fled. The first Action by which Goring and his Army distinguish'd themselves in Essex, was the seizing Sir William Hicks at Bow, and plundering some Gentlemen's Houses. Sir Charles Lucas had been very active in that County, and the Lord Capel in Hertfordshire, and, with as many more Rioters as they could raise, they join'd Goring, whose Numbers, by the Junction of the Suffolk Men, exceeded General Fairfax's, who, not without much Trouble, pass'd over from Gravesend to Essex, having quieted the County of Kent; and Goring with his Company, got into Colchester, where Fairfax had Colchester so safe enough; and the boasted Defence of that Town was occasion'd purely by that General's Humanity and good Conduct to save Mens Lives, and the Effusion of Blood. He knew they would be obliged to surrender without Storm for want of all Sorts of Provisions, and he was resolv'd it should be at Discretion, which spun out the Siege to a greater Length than was usual with that Army. There were so many of the Rioters, that Fairfax did not think fit to attack them before the Forces which were gathering in Norfolk, Cambridge, and the Associated Counties, came up. General Ireton compar'd the Town and those therein to a great Beehive, and the Parliament Army to a small Swarm of Bees sticking on the Outside of it. But the more the Enemy were, the sooner would the Provisions be spent, and Reinforcements came daily to Fairfax. The Scots being about to enter England, Sir Marmaduke Langdale seiz'd Berwick, and Sir Thomas Glenham and Sir Philip Musgrave took Carlisle. There was a Design to seize York, but it was prevented by the Folly and Rashness of some Cavaliers in that City, who mistaking a Troop of Parliament Horse for some of Langdale's Company, cry'd out, King Charles, and so were discover'd and suppress'd.

A. D. 1648.

Major

A. D. 1648. Major General Lambert, and Sir Arthur Hasle-rigg had about 3000 Men in the North, on the Borders of Scotland, which were scarce sufficient to hinder the Countries joining with Langdale; but being join'd by four Regiments of Foot, and two of Horse, they shut up Langdale and Musgrave in Berwick and Carlisle, and dispers'd a Regiment of new rais'd Men; which Langdale himself was marching to Carlisle.
While these Mutinies were transacting in these Parts, Dr. Hudson, to serve the Cause in the Field as well as the Pulpit, got a Company together in Lincolnshire. For these Doctors having plac'd the Essence of Religion in Manors, Titles, Prerogatives, Powers, and other worldly Matters, could with as much Decency fight as preach for them. Col. Waite overtook Hudson and his Military Rabble near Stamford, fell upon them, kill'd him and others of his Company, took some of the principal Mutineers to be made Examples, and discharg'd the rest.

Dr. Hudson killed. Sir John Owen laid Siege to Carnarvon Castle, in North Wales, wherein were Col. Mason and Col. Mitton. Owen hearing that Col.
Carter, and Lieut. Col. Twisselden were coming from Chester, to the Relief of Mason and Mitton, drew off from the Siege. The Number of his Men was about equal to that of Carter's, and both Parties meeting, the Parliament's Forlorn was forc'd to a disorderly Retreat. The Enemy pursu'd with their whole Body upon the Reserve of the Parliament's, who receiv'd their Charge; and after a hot Dispute, routed them.
Capt. Taylor singly encounter'd Sir John Owen, after he had broken his Sword upon his Head clos'd with him, dismounted and took him Prisoner; upon which his Party immediately fled. About 30 of them were kill'd, and 80 taken Prisoners; several of them Persons of Distinction. After the Rout of Langhorn, the Royalists retreated to Pembroke, and defended it against Cromwel himself for a few Days; but upon offer of Conditions, the Soldiers oblig'd their Officers to surrender, and Langhorn, Poyer, Powell, Matthews and Bowen were sent Prisoners to London, to take their Trial, for the Blood they had spilt in this chimerical Insurrection. Cromwel was in haste to give the Scots a Meeting, or he would not have given so good Terms to the Welshmen, who were permitted to return to their Homes.

*Earl of Holland
rises.* There was another doughty Enterprize of the Earl of Holland's, who had receiv'd a Commission from the King to be General of as many Men as he could get together in so hopeful a Cause. Indeed Whitlocke calls it a rash Action, and speaks of some Discourse between the Earl of Holland and himself before he attempted it. His Lordship said, Peoples Hearts were generally set on a Personal Treaty; and he did believe if a considerable Party should shew themselves in Arms for it, they would soon rise to a great Body, and be able to bring the Parliament to Reason. He was answer'd,
"The Parliament's Army is a fram'd Body of old Soldiers, prosperous in their Actions, and well provided of all Things necessary; and it will be a rash and desperate Attempt for any to imagine to make Head against them, and raise a new Body. There is no Trust to be given to Peoples Minds or Promises in such Designs: They will not stir except they see the Tide turning, and some precedent Success, which cannot be in this Case; but those who shall adventure upon such Business, will certainly be lost in it. The Earl of Holland argu'd earnestly to the contrary, and how honourable, just and pious a Thing it would

A. D. 1648. "be to rescue our Country from the Misery and "Slavery they are now under, especially if it "were done by those who in the Beginning had,
"perhaps, too much Hand in the bringing these "Stereights upon us." The Reply was, "It would "be worse in those Men than in any others;
"for that it would be look'd upon in them as "Breach of Faith and Treachery to those who "had before intrusted them." For he had engag'd in it at first, and deserted the Parliament to serve the King at Oxford, where he was soon weary of the Management, and return'd a Penitent to London, publishing a Declaration, that he left the King because he saw Irish Rebels so eminently favour'd by him. In this heroick Action join'd the young Duke of Buckingham; and his Brother, in Gratitude for the Parliament's taking off the Sequestration of the Duke's Estate on Account of his Minority, when he first engag'd with the King. The Discourse between the Earl of Holland and Mr. Whitlocke confirms what I have observ'd of the Timidity and Rashness of every one of these Undertaka-ings, which were no farther considerable to the Parliament, than as they disturb'd the publick Peace, and postpon'd the Settlement of the Nation, and the Service of Ireland; yet the Earl of Clarendon gives Importance to the least Stir on the Side of his Party; and now he informs us, that both the Parliament and Army were apprehensive of the Lord Holland's Motions, which at the same Time they despis'd so much as to know of the very Day and Hour of his setting out with 100 Horse, and yet made no Attempt to stop him in London. The Earl of Holland intended to possess himself of Reygate in Surrey; but Major Gibbon, and a Part of Col. Riches Horse enter'd the Town the Day before, which cut off his Communication with the Malecontents in Kent. The Earl retreated towards Kingston, and was pursu'd by the Parliament's Forces, who took several of his Men Prisoners between Ewel and Nonsuch; the rest hasten'd their March towards Kingston; but being overtaken by the Parliamentarians, a hot Skirmish ensu'd, in which the Lord Francis Villiers, Brother to the Duke of Buckingham, was slain, and the Earl of Holland's Band routed; the Remainder fled over Kingston Bridge to Harrow on the Hill, and were hunted several Ways by several Parties of the Parliament's Troops; the greater Number of them kept with the Earl of Holland, who got as far as St. Neots, intending probably for Colchester or the North, if the Enemy would have given him Time; but Col.
Scrope, who quarter'd at Hertford, and had Intelligence of Holland's Flight, pursuing him, his Forlorn came up with the Cavaliers, attack'd and routed them, before the main Body enter'd the Town. The Duke of Buckingham, with 60 Horse escap'd into Lincolnshire, and went beyond Sea. The Earl of Holland was taken in his Chamber; and the rest of his Followers were made Prisoners, by which Scrope's Men were en-rich'd with Plunder, there being many Gentlemen in their Company, as the Earl of Peterborough, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Col. Skemister, Col. Howard, Col. Legg, Lieut. Col. Goodwin,
Major Holland, Major Stepkin, and 100 others, Col. Dalbier, who deserted the Parliament, and Mr. Digby, Son to Sir Kenelm, were kill'd.
Pray mind how the Earl of Clarendon represents the killing of them; Whether out of former Grudges, or that they offer'd to defend themselves, was not known; whereas it was notoriously known that they fought, and were routed according to Sanderfon. The Lord Andover who was in this Party, made his Escape, but was taken

A. D. 1648. as he was about transporting himself to Holland: And thus we have clear'd the Country of these Troopers.

Ships revolt to the Prince of Wales.

The Industry of the King's Friends had got them some Interest at Sea as well as at Land; and Col. Rainsborough being sent to command the Fleet in the Room of the Earl of Warwick, the Seamen taking Offence at it, and Batten Vice-Admiral offended also at Rainsborough's being put over his Head, revolted to the Prince of Wales with seven or eight Men of War. The Seamen having put Rainsborough ashore, sail'd with the revolted Ships to Holland, and the Parliament to humour the Revolters, voted that the Earl of Warwick should again be Lord High Admiral, upon which his Lordship going down to the Fleet, kept the other Ships from revolting, and oblig'd the Prince, who was in the Downs, to return with great Expedition to the Coasts of Holland, whether Warwick pursu'd him, it is thought, with too much Respect, considering the two Fleets were at War. The Earl of Clarendon makes the most of this Revolt of the Fleet, and throws the City of London into a terrible Panick on the Prince's coming into the Downs; though the Expedition amounts to no more than the taking a Cloth Ship, and a Sugar Ship, a Ransom of 12000 Pounds from London, and a Quarrel about dividing the Spoil.

Scots Invasion.

The Duke of Hamilton, who had been kept so long in Prison by the King's Order, without sufficient Proof of the Charge against him, and was discharg'd by the Parliament when their Forces took the Mount in Cornwall, having by his Interest and Intrigues in Scotland, prevail'd with the Convention of Estates to raise an Army and make him General of it, he undertook to redeem the King from his Captivity, as Knights of Romance were wont to go on Adventures to deliver Captives from enchanted Castles. This Army consisted of 20000 Foot, and 5000 Horse, well accommodated with all Necessaries. The Kirk did not approve of this Undertaking, and refus'd to give it their Blessing, as having no Prospect of a good Issue, when it was to protect such Men as Langdale, Musgrave, Morris, Goring, L'Estrange, Keymis, Owen, and others, the most inveterate Enemies to the true Reform'd Religion, as they term'd it in Scotland. The Earl of Clarendon was made Lieutenant General of this Army, under whom commanded Major General Middleton, as General of the Foot, Gen. Bayly, Major Gen. Maffey, and other Officers, who had serv'd the Parliament well, came now on this Service, but their Success chang'd with the Cause; and Men who fought well out of Principle, seldom fight as well out of Pique or for Pay. Monroe, who had commanded the Protestant Forces in Ulster, was sent for to join Duke Hamilton, the reducing the Irish Rebels being not now judg'd so necessary a Work as the restoring of Episcopacy in England. The Scots Presbyterians must have been Mirrors of Stupidity, if they flatter'd themselves that the King and the Bishops would ever have establish'd the Presbytery in England, or if they did establish it, that such an Establishment would last a Minute longer than till it was in their Power to destroy it. I do not make use of the Earl of Clarendon's Observations on the ill Conduct of the Scots Army, nor shall I rack my Invention to find out Excuses for their being beaten; they might have seen, if they had had Eyes, that Cromwel and the Parliament Generals had either a very great Contempt of them, or intended to draw them as far forward into the Country as they could, that they might have the more Difficulty to get out of it again, and that in both Cases they made sure of beating them whenever they could come at them, A. D. 1648. which was very mortifying to an Army, which the Arch-deacon's Bishop Gutbry says, Was the greatest and best furnish'd that ever Scotland sent forth.

Cromwel, after the Reduction of South Wales, Langdale resolv'd to join Lambert, though 300 Miles off, defeated. and give Battle to those gallant Invaders. Lambert was therefore order'd to keep them in play till Cromwel came up; which he did very well, by skirmishing with the Scots daily; and sending timely Intelligence of their Advances, Lambert fell upon Langdale, who had join'd the Scots with 2000 English, within 2 Miles of Preston, and routed him, and Cromwel entering the Town, charg'd the Scots in the Streets, which the Parliament's Forces clear'd of the Enemy, who were put into Disorder, many slain, and many more taken Prisoners. Duke Hamilton, with most of the Scots Horse and Foot, retreated over the Bridge, and the Parliament's Horse and Foot following them, after a warm Engagement they were beaten from the Bridge. Cromwel's Men still pursuing the Scots possess'd the Bridge over Darwent, and a few Houses. The Enemy drew up within Musket Shot of them, but Night coming on they march'd off, having had about 1000 kill'd, and 4000 taken. The Duke retreated with 8000 Foot and 4000 Horse. Cromwel follow'd him with 3000 Foot, and 2500 Horse and Dragoons, and skirmishing with him at Wiggan, took Major General Vandruske, Col. Hurrey, and Lieut. Col. Ennis Prisoners. The Enemy march'd hastily towards Warrington, and made a Stand at a Pass, which was disputed with great Resolution on both Sides for 2 or 3 Hours, at last Cromwel beat them from their Post, kill'd 1000, and took 2000 Prisoners. The Duke with the Scots possess'd the Bridge at Warrington, but upon Cromwel's Approach he receiv'd a Letter from Lieutenant General Bayly desiring to capitulate, which being agreed to, the Terms were for him and his whole Body to surrender themselves Prisoners of War; accordingly 4000 Men and Arms were taken, and Duke Hamilton's Infantry entirely ruin'd. The Duke with 3000 Horse made towards Nantwich, where the Gentlemen of the County took 500 of them, and Lieutenant General Cromwel sent an Express to the Lord Gray, and Sir Edward Read, to gather all the Strength they could and pursue the Enemy, which they did, and overtook the Duke at Uxeter in Staffordshire with about 2000 Horse; who were fatigu'd and tir'd, and expecting Cromwel to be nearer at Hand than he was, deliver'd themselves up to the Lord Gray, Col. Waite, and the other Parliament Officers, who sent them Prisoners to Asby de la Zouch, and the other Scots Generals were elsewhere confin'd in order to be examin'd by whose Invitation they came into England, for now the Parliament Army was so near the End of their Business, it was rational to think that a Time of Payment was approaching, when those that had given them so much Trouble, and occasion'd a second Loss of so much Blood, was to be accountable for it. The evil Counsellors who hinder'd the Negotiations for a Peace, to save themselves and the Bishops, had been great Fomenters of the New Civil War, and when they are brought to Punishment the Parliament, according to Clarendon and Echard, were satiating their Thirst of Blood. The Committee of Safety which sat at Derby House to take Care of the Affairs of the Commonwealth, had Orders to make Inquisition for the chief Agents and Movers in the Scots Invasion, and the several Insurrections in England. To this Committee was given Power to suppress all all Tumults and Insurrections, and to that Purpose to raise Forces as they saw Occasion. Had the evil Counsellors consider'd the King's Danger as much as they did their own, or had their Considerings been as weighty as the Lord Clarendon would have us believe, such Attacks on the Supreme Power then in being, as was that of the Committee of Safety, would have pointed out to the last dreadful one on the Sovereign, and have soften'd their hard Hearts to a Compliance with the Parliament's Propositions of Peace. Echard tells us, that after Cromwel had routed Hamilton's Army, he had Carlise and Berwick deliver'd up to him, and then he enter'd Scotland, whereas he enter'd Scotland at the Invitation of the Marquis of Argyle and his Party, and Berwick and Carlise were deliver'd, and Monroe transported himself into Ireland, by Command of that Marquis and the governing Power in Scotland, who came to an Agreement with Cromwel about settling the Government. Another Convention was call'd, who condemn'd the Proceedings of the last Assembly, and the Ministers declaim'd against the late Expedition as sinful. A Day of Humiliation was appointed to implore God's Pardon, and the chief Agents, particularly the Lord Chancellor Loudon, made his Recantation and Submission with Tears. There could not be a more monstrous Mixture than the Kirk Faction with the Cavaliers. What Milton says of the Generation between Sin and Death, has produc'd nothing more horrid and unnatural, yet Echard took no Notice of it, and now the Birth is destroy'd, he only jests aukwardly on the Use of scriptural Phrases in the Language of those Presbyterians, who complimented Cromwel as their Deliverer, and he laying his Hand on his Breast, Return'd as good Scripture, says the Reverend Historian, demurely looking on their grave Countenances, and smiling to see what Idiots he had made of these Politicians at their own sanctify'd Weapons. Every Word of which is as false as it is profane and insipid; nor is what follows truer, that there the Marquis of Argyle and Cromwel concerted concerning the Ruin of the King, and Extirpation of Monarchy, and the very Form of the future Regicide. The most ancient and honourable House of Argyle, as illustrious for their Love and Services to their Country, as for their Nobility and Ancestry, have not been spar'd by Echard, though at the Expence of Truth and good Manners. This Charge here is so notoriously false, that the Lord Marquis was at his Trial clear'd by his very Enemies of being concern'd in the King's Death, as we read in Burnet. Every one knows, and Sir John Berkley in his M.S. acknowledges, that the Ruin of the King was concerted at a Council of Officers at Windsor, several Months before Cromwel went to Scotland, and if there was no Respect among them to Truth, there should have been more Decency observ'd towards so great a Name as that of Argyle, but the Mischief of it is, the Marquis was a Presbyterian, and the Archdeacon observes Decorum and Truth alike, when he shews his laudable Zeal for the Laudean Prelacy, which he and his Heroes would have maintain'd at all Ventures, and matter not what Sacrifices they made to it. His Account of the Surrender of Colchester is worthy all his other Accounts, and has not one Blemish of Sincerity. I have taken Notice, that the Lord Fairfax being desirous to spare the Lives of the Soldiers both within and without the Town, made a Blockade of it, and there were few Actions as long as it lasted but Skirmishes and Picquerings. The Lord General was resolv'd to starve them, and this gave Occasion to Echard to extol the Bravery of the Cavaliers in eating Horses, Dogs, and Cats, rather than submit to be executed, they having no Hopes of better Conditions than at Mercy. The Behaviour of Goring, Lucas, &c. had been very barbarous and daring in this mad Enterprize. Lucas broke his Parole to the General in taking Arms against him, whose Prisoner he was; and therefore, as Whitlocke says, not capable of Command or Trust in martial Affairs; yet so sturdy, that when the Lord General having Intelligence that the Soldiers and Townsmen were hinder'd from surrendering purely by the Obstinacy of their chief Commanders, sent the latter a Summons; Lucas said, If any more Letters came of that Kind they would hang up the Messenger. But he was more sturdy when he put to Death with his own Hand some of the Parliament's Soldiers in cold Blood, as we read in Whitlocke. The Lord Goring when he first came to Chelmsford, seiz'd Sir William Masbam, Mr. Barnardiston, and the Committee of Essex sitting there, carry'd them with them to Colchester, and made them Partakers of the Hardships of the Siege, notwithstanding the Parliament had offer'd the Lord Capel's Son, Col. Legg, and many other Gentlemen of like Quality, in Exchange for them, and had a hundred to one in their Custody for such Uses. But these Men of Wisdom and Honour wanted Discretion and Generosity, or they would not in their desperate Circumstances have carry'd away Members of Parliament, or if they had carry'd them away, they would not have us'd them unhandsomely, nor have refus'd to exchange them, when the Parliament had it in their Power to make Numbers suffer the like Extremities which the Committee Men suffer'd in Colchester, from whence Goring turn'd out the Women, and expos'd them to the Fire of Fairfax's Men, who spar'd them as much as they could, and the General let the Cavalier Commanders know, that if they did not take them in again, they should be answerable for their Blood. When at last they were compell'd by Famine to deliver up the Town, as was the Lord Fairfax's Intention, his Lordship would give them no other Terms than Quarter for their Lives, Colchester taken, but not to exempt them from Execution by Martial or other Law. Accordingly General Fairfax being possess'd of the Town, held a Council of War, who condemn'd Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lisle, and Sir Bernard Gascoyn, to be shot, for Satisfaction to Military Justice, as the Lord General wrote the Parliament, and in Part of Revenge, for the innocent Blood they had caus'd to be spilt, and the Trouble, Damage, and Mischief they had brought upon the Town, the County, and the Kingdom. Instead of such Reasoning, the Earl of Clarendon and the Archdeacon launch out into Panegyrics on Lucas, Lisle, and Gascoyn an Italian Papist. Sir Roger Manly, as sober and judicious an Author as the best of them, assures us, The Stone Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle fell upon, being sprinkled with their Blood, could not be cleansed of it, but continues still a Monument of this horrid Impiety. What admirable Historians they be!

The Earl of Clarendon affirms, the News of Lucas and this bloody Resolution reaching the Lord Goring, Lisle &c. the Lord Capel, the Lord Loughborough, and the other Prisoners of Quality, they wrote a Letter to the General that they might be shot with them, which is extremely probable. The two Knights being thus murder'd, and the bloody Sacrifice made, the Italian Papist Sir Bernard Gascoyn was sav'd, and the Earl gives us as notable a Reason

A. D. 1648. son as is given in his History for many other Things: The Council of War were afraid as soon as they knew who he was, one of the Great Duke's Subjects, that the Great Duke would have suffer'd Reprizals on their Friends and Children who travell'd into Italy, who might pay dear for it for many Generations. The Marquis Palcotti, an Italian of much greater Quality, and Brother to an English Dutches, was hang'd here a few Years ago, but No-body was afraid of travelling into Italy after it. Such Fact and such Argument tally to a Nicety. The Lord Goring, the Lord Capel, Lord Loughborough, Sir William Compton, Sir Abraham Shipman, Sir John Watts, Sir Lodowick Dyer, Sir Henry Appleton, Sir Donart Strutt, Sir Hugh Onelly, Sir Richard Malevercr, were put into several Prisons; and by this List we see what Force there is in another of the Earl of Clarendon's Reasons: The Council of War condemn'd Sir Bernard Gascoyn, only that being a Knight, it might make three of that Order Examples. We see there were Knights enough besides him; but the Truth is, he being a Papist, they thought it just that he should be an Example to the Romanists, and spar'd him only because he had done and could not do so much Mischief as Lucas and Lisse. The General having settled that Town, Yarmouth and all the County of Suffolk, which began to be in a little Motion on the late Appearance of the Prince's Fleet on that Coast, return'd to his Head Quarters at St. Alban's; and thus were all the Insurrections entirely suppress'd in about 4 Months Time, except Pomfret Castle, which, as has been observ'd, was surpriz'd by the Treachery of one Morris, formerly a Parliament Officer, and the Weakness of the Governor, who plac'd entire Confidence in Morris. That Deforter shew'd again how well he deserv'd the fine Character that is given him by Echard, in contriving and executing a Design to assassinate Col. Rainsborough in his Lodgings at Doncaster, one of the bravest Things the Cavaliers have to boast of in the first or second Civil War.

The last Commotions had given Spirit to the Hollis Party in the House of Commons. The Officers and Soldiers were busy in subduing their Enemies, and in their Absence Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir John Clotworthy, Sergeant Glyn, Mr. Walter Long, impeach'd Members, retook their Seats in the House of Commons, but were soon forc'd to quit them. Several Counties were put upon petitioning for a Personal Treaty with the King, as the only sure Method of curing the present Distempers. The City of London, who had a Set of Petitioners Pro or Con always ready, was not backward on this Occasion, but presented a Petition to the same Purpose. 1. That the King may be free from Restraint. 2. Invited to a Treaty. 3. The Armies disbanded, and the Self-denying Ordinance be effectually observ'd, every Article of it struck at the victorious Cromwel, his Party, and Principles. Cromwel had not then beaten the Scots, nor were the other Risings suppress'd, which embolden'd those that wish'd well to them to speak their Minds the more freely; and now the Two Houses resolve again, That a Message be sent to the King, to acquaint him, that they desire a Treaty with his Majesty in what Place of the Isle of Wight he shall appoint. The Lords chose the Earl of Middlesex, and the Commons Major Bulkley and Sir John Hippsley to go to the King on this Message.

His Majesty had liv'd in much Solitude since the last Commissioners left the Island; he expected great Things from the Scots, and from every one else that had undertaken to do any thing for him; it being his Misfortune that his Counsellors and chief Agents were never deficient in Promises and Schemes, however they fail'd in Performances. It was now during his Confinement in Carisbroke Castle, according to Echard, that he finish'd Eikon Basilike. The Eikon Basilike Author does not say, It is said, It is like. is thought, but affirms positively, Here he completed his celebrated Book, which he never began. There is not so good Evidence for any one historical Fact, as for Dr. Gauden's writing that celebrated Book, which I must confess I never read with those Emotions that are attributed to the Readers of it by certain Enthusiasts. For as I am well acquainted with this King's Reign, and have been taught by the Lord Clarendon that it was full of Male-Administration, there would be some Penitence, some Sorrow for it, were the Author's Sentiments really so devout and pious as is there affected. The Language, as far at least as I am capable of judging, is entirely Clerical, and not in the least agreeable to King Charles's Manner in his Messages and Declarations, most of them drawn by himself, in a close succinct Stile; whereas that of Eikon Basilike is redundant and declamatory, and as little becoming the Majesty of a Prince, as a Cassock would become a crown'd Head. To hint one Thing only; The most pious Prayer in the Book, stil'd a Prayer in Time of Captivity, is taken almost Word for Word from the Prayer of Pamela, to a Pagan Deity, in Pembroke's Arcadia, a Romance. Edit. 1647. p. 248. But there is no need of Conjecture where the Proof is so plain. Dr. Walker, a pious Divine of our Orthodox Church assures us, that Dr. Gauden gave him the original Book, in his own Hand Writing, to convey it to the Press, and that he actually gave it to one Peacock, who deliver'd it to Royston, the King's Printer. The Earl of Anglesey left a Writing sign'd by him, to undeceive the World, and inform them who it was that wrote Eikon Basilike.

"KING Charles II. and the Duke of York, " did both (in the last Sessions of Parliament, 1675. when I shew'd them in the " Lords House the-written Copy of this Book, " Eikon Basilike, wherein are some Corrections " and Alterations written with the late King " Charles the First's own Hand) assure me, that " this was none of the said King's compiling, " but made by Dr. Gauden, Bishop of Exeter; " which I here insert for the undeceiving others " in this Point, by attesting so much under my " Hand, ANGLESEY.

Dr. Gauden, as the Reverend Dr. Walker informs us, acquainted him with the Design of Tracts, writing the Book before he wrote it, shew'd Vol. 3. p. him the Heads of several Chapters, and some of 755. and the Discourses, asking him his Opinion of it Seq. after Perusal; Dr. Walker reply'd, It will be much for your Reputation, Honour and Safety; but I stick at the Lawfulness of it, as a pious Divine must necessarily do, saying, How can you satisfy your self in so imposing on the World: Gauden answer'd, Look on the Title, 'tis the Portraiture, &c. and no Man draws his own Picture. Walker some Time after ask'd Gauden, If the King had ever seen the Book, which the Reverend Historian avers was incontestably prov'd to be his own writing by a Cloud of it-nesses. To which Dr. Gauden reply'd, " I know " it certainly no more than you, but I us'd my " Endeavours that he might; for I deliver'd a " Copy of it to the Marquis of Hertford, when " he went to the Treaty at the Isle of Wight, " and

 " any private Opportunity, that he would deliver " to his Majesty, and humbly desire to know his " Pleasure concerning it : " But the Violence which threaten'd the King hastening so fast, Gauden ventur'd to print it, and never knew what was the Issue of his sending it. He told Walker, He could not certainly say King Charles II. knew that he wrote the Book, because he never took express Notice of it ; but added he, I take it for granted he does know it, and am sure the Duke of York does, for he has often spoke of it to me, and own'd it as a seasonable and acceptable Service. Dr. Walker concludes, " Mrs. Gauden, the Bishop's Wife,
 " Mr. Gifford, who transcrib'd the Copy that was " sent to the Ile of Wight, and myself, believ'd
 " Dr. Gauden wrote it, as much as we could " believe any Thing ; and when we spake of it " in his Presence or in his Absence, did it with" out the least Doubt of his having wrote it,
 " being as much assur'd of it as possible we " could be of any Matter of Fact : And 'tis un-" accountably strange that all we who had the " best Reason and fairest Opportunities to know
 " the Truth, should all be deceiv'd or impos'd
 " upon, which we were to the highest Degree " imaginable if Dr. Gauden wrote it not. Then mentioning the Printing of it, he tells us, he had fix of the first Impression given him by Dr.
Gauden for his Trouble in the Matter; one of which, to use his own Words, I have still by me. Fact is not capable of plainer Evidence, especially as it stands corroborated by Dr. Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, who wrote thus of it ; " In " the Year 1673. in which I had a great Share " of Favour and free Conversation with the then " Duke of York ; as he suffer'd me to talk very " freely to him about Matters of Religion, and " as I was urging him with somewhat out of " his Father's Book, he told me, That Book
 " was not of his Father's writing ; that the " Letter to the Prince of Wales was never " brought to him, and that Dr. Gauden writ
 " it, who after the Restoration brought the " Marquis of Hertford, then Duke of Somerset,
 " and the Earl of Southampton, to the King
 " and the Duke, and both Somerset and South- " ampton affirm'd Dr. Gauden wrote it. That " the Earl of Southampton shew'd it to the King
 " at the Ile of Wight Treaty, who read it and " approv'd of it as containing his Sense of " Things ; upon this the Duke of York told
 " Dr. Burnet, that though Skeldon and the other " Bishops oppos'd Gauden's Promotion, because " he had taken the Covenant ; yet the Merits " of that Service carry'd it for him." The learned Prelate adds, There has been a great deal of disputing about this Book ; some are so zealous for maintaining it to be the King's, that they think a Man false to the Church that de- nies it to be his : Dr. Burnet of the Charter-house

 P. 13. ting, and Lilly besides saying, that he doubted it, a little after it came out, adds several Reasons for it, which I think are not wanted. The Bishop of Salisbury takes Notice with what View it was written, and why held in so much Adoration by the King's Friends The Pie- ty of the Prayers made all People cry out against the Murder of a Prince who thought so seriously of all his Affairs in his Meditations before God : And was it not very likely that such Piety and Meditations should co-operate with the Treaty with the Irish Rebels, with the Treaty with the Scots for the second Civil War, with the Variety of Insurrections in all Parts of the Kingdom, and the Blood that was spilt in them, and with his Majesty's arduous Desire, and frequent Contrivances to make his Escape from his Imprisonment : The latter miscarrying, and in Part by the Diligence of an Officer of the Garrison, one Major Rolph, an Agitator, the Royalists charg'd him with a Design to assassinate the King some how or other. I don't wonder that the Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Echard exert themselves on this monstrous Plot, though there is not a Word of Truth in it ; nor that Sir

Roger Manly, another fair Gentleman-like Author, call'd Rolph, Parricide and Villain ; but the Wonderment is, that the Lords should give so much Credit to Osborn, who inform'd against Rolph as to commit him to Prison ; Osborn was in the Depth of the Contrivance for the King's Escape : The Iron Bar of his Majesty's Window was fil'd through ; and Larrey says, the King had his Head out of the Window, when he heard a Noise, which oblig'd him to go to Bed again ; it was Hammond the Governor, who having had Notice of the Plot from Rolph, who had encourag'd Osborn to engage in it, ran thither to see what was doing : The King had not Time to clear himself of the Window, so he slip'd into Bed, where Hammond found him, and searching, perceiv'd the Bar of the Window was cut ; Rolph discovering it, gave Information, upon which Hammond chang'd and doubled the Watch, leaving no Hopes of escaping. Lilly bought the Saw, and sent it to the King as is said elsewhere more at large. However, Os- born turns the Plot against Rolph, and gives Evidence that the latter had concerted his Majesty's Escape with Osborn, that he might murder him when he attempted it. The Earl and Arch-deacon put on grave Faces to cry out against the Horror of this Conspiracy, and the Wickedness of the Parliament, who had no Mind to have the Matter examin'd, Hist. Reb. but the Clamour of the People was so great, that after many Delays, they voted Rolph should be tried at Winchester, and thither they sent their Serjeant Wyld, to be the sole Judge of that Criminal, before whom the major Part of the same Jury, who found Capt. Burley guilty, was impannel'd for the Trial of Rolph. This is a teeming Passage, and has many Births to deliver of the Chimera Kind. Sanderson, who will be allow'd to be as good a Churchman as the Earl or the Archdeacon, owns the King did not believe Osborn's Informations, which is confirm'd by Whitlocke : " His Majesty declar'd to divers
 " of his Party, and wish'd them to declare it to " others, that the Governor Col. Hammond, was " a Man of Honour and Trust, and had carried " himself civilly and respectfully to him ; that " Osborn had unjustly and ungratefully aspers'd
 " the Governor ; for Col. Hammond was charg'd
 " by Osborn, as well as Rolph." And as touching the Preservation of his Person from Poison or any such horrid Design, the King said he was so confident of the Honesty and Faithfulness of the Governor, that he thought himself as safe in his Hands as if he were in the Custody of his own Son. I wish I could be as confident of the Honesty and Faithfulness of the Historians. It could not well be the same Jury that found
Burley guilty, which was impannel'd for Rolph ;
Burley's being a Petty Jury, and Rolph's the Grand Jury, who found the Bill against him Ignoramus ; and his Indictment never came to the quitted.
 Petty Jury ; tho' the Earl remembers the Speech the infamous Judge Wyld, as he decently terms him, made to them. The Parliament was so far from endeavouring to sink the Matter as his Lordship avers that they order'd the Evidence Osborn had

A. D. 1648. had given against Rolpb, to be immediately printed. Col. Hammond wrote to them, desiring that Osborn's Charge against Rolpb may come to a speedy Hearing, it reflecting so highly upon the Army and upon him, and being an horrid Scandal, of which he clears himself, Mr. Rolpb, and all the Officers; but instead of clearing them, the Lord Clarendon lays the Charge home against not only Rolpb, but the House of Commons, who were sensible of the Plot, but would have screen'd the Plotter, and have prevented his being brought to a Trial, had it not been for the Clamour of the People, who really made no Clamour at all, nor believ'd a Word of the Charge given by Osborn against Rolpb, who was committed by the Lords without any Cause, as the Commons said, and that they found Reason to clear him. They also order'd him 130 Pounds for his unjust Imprisonment. And so far was the King or Hammond from believing any Thing of the Charge against Rolpb, that he was afterwards, as Sanderfon himself acknowledges, appointed the chief Officer in the Guard of his Majesty's Person.

Treaty voted.

It behov'd the Parliament to make what Dispatch they could with the Treaty, that it might be concluded before the Army was at Leisure to interpose in it; and it behov'd the King to issue it as fast as he could for the Safety of his Person and Government, both struck at by the Army; yet an unseasonable Debate about Bishopricks is started, and the Peace delay'd on that Account so long, that the Soldiery had Time to break off the Treaty, and bring their wicked Purposes to pass; for no farther can any good Englishman go with the Parliament in this Quarrel, than the last Ile of Wight Treaty; and no farther do I in the least justify the Proceedings of the Parliamentarians, than while they were free, especially from all Military Force. After the Soldiery had garbled the House, the Power was usurp'd, and illegal, and this illegal usurp'd Power, and no other proceeded against the King. However, the Author of the History of the Rebellion and Echard's Accounts of it are so full of Ribaldry and Falstity, that they make even this very bad Matter still worse than it was. The first Proposal of the Treaty came from the Lords, who sent down these Votes to the Commons. That the Vote against further Addresses be recalled. That such Persons and Servants as his Majesty shall send for, be admitted to wait on him. That the Place of Treaty be Newport, in the Ile of Wight. That the Instructions to Col. Hammond for safe keeping the King be recall'd. That five Lords and ten Commoners be nam'd Commissioners: To which the House of Commons concurr'd, and new Instructions were sent to Hammond, August the 25th. That the King be remov'd to Newport. That he be in the same Condition and Freedom as at Hampton Court. That no Person who had been in Arms against the Parliament, nor no excepted Person nor Foreigners be admitted to be near him. That his Majesty pass his Royal Word not to go out of the Island during the Treaty, nor twenty Days after. The Parliament had the Fleet and the City of London on their Side; and the Scots would have given them what Assistance they could; but all that was little in the Ballance against a victorious Army, at the Disposal of two of the best Heads of those Times, Cromwel and Ireton, which Consideration should have quicken'd the Counsels that tended to Peace. Col. Hammond gave his Majesty the Liberty of the Island on his Parole; and the Parliament order'd a liberal Allowance for his Expence. His Chaplains were allow'd to attend him; and Sir Peter Killegrew was sent with a Letter, and the last Votes of A. D. 1648. both Houses inclos'd; to which his Majesty return'd the following Answer:

My Lord and Mr. Speaker,

I Have receiv'd your Letter of the 25th Present, and Votes, which though not so full as I could wish, for the perfecting of a Treaty; yet because I perceive by what you have done, that I am in some Measure fit to begin one; such is my incessant and earnest Desire to give a Peace to these my distracted Dominions, as I accept the Treaty, and therefore desire that such five Lords and ten Commons, as my Two Houses shall appoint, be speedily sent, fully authoriz'd and instructed to treat with me, not doubting what is now wanting, will at our Meeting, upon Debate, be fully supply'd, not only to the Furtherance of this Treaty, but also to the consummating of a safe and well grounded Peace;

So I rest, your Friend,

CHARLES REX.

With this Letter his Majesty sent a List of such Persons as he desired might attend him.

Sir Fulk Grevill, Colonel Titus, Capt. Burroughs, Mr. Crescet, Mr. Firebrace, Mr. Anstie.
George Kirke, Esq; James Leviston, Esq;
William Murray, Esq; John Asburnham, Esq;
Col. William Legg, Grooms of the Bed-Chamber.
Mr. Hugh Henn, Mr. Humphry Rogers, Equerries.

Mr. William Levett, Sir Edward Sydenham,

Robert Blackbourn, Esq; Edmund Warcup, Esq;

The Place Newport was Sir William Hodges's at Newport, but before the Parliament's Commissioners arriv'd there, a Petition was presented to the House of Commons from Thousands of well affected Persons in and near London, on the 12th of Sept. wherein they gave Reasons why they first assisted the two Houses, and set forth what they expected, That the Parliament would have made good the Supremacy of the People from all Pretences of negative Voices either in King or Lords. That they would have done Justice upon the capital Authors and Promoters of the former or late Wars, &c. They could hardly speak plainer against the King's Person, the Monarchy and Peerage. And it was apparent enough that these Thousands of well affected would have the Army to stand by them, so they were formally thank'd, and not due Care taken to close with the King before the Petitioners had a Strength to back their Petition, as was done 2 or 3 Months after.

On the 12th of Sept. the Parliament kept a Day of publick Humiliation, for a Blessing on the Treaty of Peace, and the King and his Household did the same on the 18th, his Majesty drawing up himself the Form of Prayer to be us'd on that Occasion, with the Common Divine Service. The King wrote to the Parliament for blank Passes to be sent by Richard Parsons to Scotland, for Commissioners from thence, which the two Houses would not grant. His Majesty's Letter ends thus, From our Court at Newport in the Isle of Wight, this 8th of Sept. 1648. so that he did not look upon himself as in a Prison but as in his own Palace; and certainly Matters might now have been happily accommodated, had the Laity been a greater Majority in his Counsels. The two Houses refus'd Passes to the Lord Carnegie and Sir Alexander Gibson, but granted one for Sir James Carmichael. After Sermon the Commissioners, who arriv'd at Newport the 15th of Sept. went to the King, the Earl of Northumberland told him they were come to treat. His Majesty said, I am glad of it, and desire God to perfect this blessed Work. I profess I am in Charity with all of you, and not willing to seek Revenge against any, nor give Occasion of Delay. Then the Commissioners presented three Bills to his Majesty, for Religion, the Militia, and Recalling his Majesty's Proclamations. In the Preamble of the latter the Parliament laid the Bloodshed upon him, which the King desired might be repited till the End of the Treaty. His Majesty agreed to recall all Declarations against the Parliament. To settle the Militia in the two Houses for 20 Years. To leave 37 Delinquents to be excepted out of the Act of Indemnity. To revoke all Commissions given to raise Men in Ireland, and leave the Management of that War to the Parliament. To abolish Archbishops; and that the Bishops, who remain provisionally should not exercise Authority, Jurisdiction, or Ordination, but with the Advice and Assistance of the Ministers. That the Presbyterian Government should be established for 3 Years, at the End of which the Assembly of Divines, his Majesty naming 20 more, should determine the Case of Church Government for the future. By which as much of Episcopacy was given up as any reasonable and honest Presbyterian ever did, or ever ought desire. And to say after all this, that the King was a Martyr for the Church, seems to be the most egregious Nonsense that ever was offer'd for Argument or Fact.

Three Days after the opening of the Treaty the Commissioners wrote to Mr. Lenthall the Speaker for a Remittance of 4000 Pounds to Southampton; Mr. Cresset, who had the Care of the Household, having inform'd them, that he could not maintain his Majesty and their Officers at the usual Allowance, and they said, the Honour of the Parliament would suffer without it. The foot the Commissioners treated upon were the Propositions presented at Hampton Court. The Time allow'd for the Treaty was 40 Days. The Demands and Answers to be in writing, and nothing that was not so to be binding, nor till the whole Treaty was concluded. Scotland was not included in this Treaty.

On the 25th of Sept. a Week after the Opening of the Treaty, his Majesty consented to the first Proposition, to vacate all Oaths, Declarations and Proclamations against the Parliament, and to indemnify all their Actions in the War, which the King acknowledges they were necessitated to undertake in their just and lawful Defence. His Majesty the 9th of October, confirm'd the Calling and Sitting of the Assembly of Divines, consented to the Directory of Worship instead of the Common Prayer, which he consented should be taken away out of all Churches and Chapels. He yielded up the Militia for 20 Years. He agreed to the Payment of the Parliament's Debts, to disable all the Lords he had made since the Lord Littleton carry'd away the Seal, to sit in the House of Peers.

During this Treaty the Parliament receiv'd Letters from Colonel Michael Jones in Ireland, giving an Account of the Arrival of the Marquis of Ormond in that Kingdom, with a Commission to conclude a Peace with the Rebels, at the very Time that the King was treating with the Parliament to carry on the War against them. There was also this Letter of Ormond's to the Chief of the Irish Massacrers intercepted.

AFTER our very hearty Commendations, being arriv'd in this Kingdom qualified with Power to treat and conclude a Peace with the Confederate Roman Catholics, or such as shall be deputed and authorised by them in that Behalf, we have thought fit by these our Letters to desire you, to make the same known to the Assembly now at Kilkenny; as also, that in pursuance of the Paper of the 13th of May last, deliver'd to their Commissioners at St. Germain's, we expect to receive from them by Persons fully authorised to treat and conclude, such Propositions as they shall think fit, at our House at Carrick, whether we intend to remain for the better Accommodation, and more speedy Dispatch of this Affair, as soon as we shall be advertised

Your very loving Friend,

ORMOND.

To our loving Friend Sir Richard Blake, Chairman of the Assembly of the Confederate Roman Catholics at Kilkenny.

I desire the Reader to compare this Letter, wherein Ormond tells the Massacrers, he is qualified by the King's Commission to treat and conclude a Peace, with what the King told the Parliament's Commissioners at Newport the 1st of November, about a Month after Ormond's Letter was written. He declar'd, That since the first Votes for the Treaty at the Isle of Wight, he hath not transacted any Affairs concerning Ireland but with those Commissioners. Now the Vote for that Treaty was the 29th of July, 1648. and Ormond communicated the Commission he had to treat with the Irish Rebels to their Chairman at Kilkenny about 9 Weeks after. It cannot be said the King did not treat, but Ormond treated, because whatever a Prince's Plenipotentiary does by his Warrant, the Prince in Effect does it himself. And notwithstanding the very great Encomiums on this King's Integrity, in Clarendon and Echard, it is certain there's great Reason to object to it. Lilly, who was not the more a Fool for his being a Conjuror, in the vulgar Acceptation of the Word, says of him, He had much of Self-ends in all he did, and a most difficult Thing it was to hold him close to his own Promise, so that some foreign Princes bestow'd on him the Character of a most false Prince, and one that never kept his Word, unless for his own Advantage. Again, Though in a Time of Parliament he often promis'd to redress any Grievances, yet the best Friend he hath cannot produce any one Act of Good for his Subjects done by him in the Vacancy of a Parliament. I wish there had been no Reason for him to say what he does a little too coarsely. How does this agree with that strict Piety and Devotion for which the Author of the History of the Rebellion and Echard pay this Prince so much Adoration.

The Author of the History of the Rebellion, with his wonted Simplicity and Sincerity, introduces two Divines, Dr. Spurstow and Jenkins, of whom neither was then present, or not authoris'd so to be, arguing with his Majesty about Episcopacy; They urg'd the common Allegations, that Bishops and Presbyters in the Scripture Language signify'd one and the same Thing, intimating, that the Argument was the worse for being common and scriptural; that if the Apostles exercised a larger Jurisdiction, it had been granted them as Apostles. The Presbyterians could not say that; for the Apostles could not exercise so large a Jurisdiction; they could not imprison, levy Money by distress, or have any temporal Jurisdiction under Pagan Emperors and Kings. The Earl and the Laudean Prelates, if they know any Thing at all of History Ecclesiastical and Civil, must know, that the Powers of the Earth were declar'd Enemies to Christianity, and made no Grant of temporal Authority to the Apostles or their Successors till the Roman Empire became Christian. The King, says the Historian, with exemplary Gravity, press'd them with those Texts of Scripture which have been constantly urg'd by those who maintain the Jus Divinum of Bishops, the Authority of the Fa- thers, and the Government of all Christian Churches for fifteen Hundred Years. Did the King prove by Scripture, that Timothy and Titus were Archbishops or Bishops, had Chancellors, Spiritual Courts, Temporal Baronies, Palaces, Lordships, &c. when there was not one of them known, when one of them could not be known in the Christian Church. Indeed the Case is very different now, for those temporal Baronies, Palaces, Lordships, &c. are annexed to Dioceses by the Laws of the Land, and are as much the Diocesan's legal Possessions as Right can give legal Possession to any one. But this argues not that it was exactly so from the Beginning, which is all that is controverted. The Historian again as notably as before, The Government of all Christian Churches could not but be by themselves acknowledged to be by Bishops; yes such Bishops as Titus and Timothy, praying, preaching, ordaining, and superintending Bishops. Bishops then travell'd a foot from one Diocese to another in the Exercise of what the Historian terms their larger Jurisdictions. He proceeds, The Commissioners reliev'd their ill manner'd Clergy, which is spoken with a great deal of good Manners, considering it is not true, for their Clergy behav'd with as much Decency as their Opposites. Dr. Seaman, Master of Peter House, Cambridge, for nothing will go down with these dignify'd Persons but some Dignity, was the Divine who handled this Argument, and was a Divine of as great Eminence for Controversial Learning as any of that Age; his Majesty own'd his singular Ability in this Controversy. Yet the Earl adds, His Majesty with wonderful Acuteness fully answer'd all their Arguments; not answer'd, but fully answer'd, whereas he did not answer one of them, and it cannot be answer'd till those Men can prove impossibilities, which they do as often attempt as any Men ever did. The King said, Calvin Episcopacy and Beza, and most learned Men of the Reform'd asserted Religion, approv'd of Episcopal Government, but the King did not say what Sort of Episcopal Government. They approv'd of praying, preaching, ordaining, and superintending, without temporal Prerogatives, Powers, Principalities, Dignities, &c. It was at this Time and Place that Archbishop Usher presented the King with his Reduction of Episcopacy, which fully answer'd every Argument made use of in favour of the Laudean Prelacy, by shewing how it was to be reduc'd to the Primitive, the Archbishop declares, That the Presbyters had a Hand not only in delivering the Doctrine and Sacraments, but also in the Administration of the Discipline of the Church with the Bishop, who was the chief President, stil'd by Tertullian, Summus Sacerdos. The rest of the Dispensers of the Word and Sacraments were join'd in the common Government of the Church. Pope Cornelius, or Cornelius Bishop of Rome, always conferr'd with the Presbytery in the Exercise of Church Discipline; and the Presence of the Clergy was thought so requisite in Matters of Episcopal Audience, that it was concluded in the Council of Carthage, that the Bishop might hear no Man's Cause without the Presence of the Clergy, which was inserted in the Canons of Egbert, Archbishop of York in the Saxon Times, and afterwards into the Body of the Canon Law it self. You see how fully the King answer'd all the Arguments of the Presbytery. Archbishop Usher then directs his Majesty how he might have proceeded in the Alteration of Church Government without wounding his Conscience. "True it is, that in our Church this Kind of Presbyterian Government has been long disus'd, yet seeing

A. D. 1648. "it still professeth that every Pastor hath a Right to rule the Church, from whence the Name of Rector also was given at first to him, and to administer the Discipline of Christ as well as to dispense the Doctrine and Sacraments, and the Restraint of the Exercise of that Right proceedeth only from the Custom now received in this Realm. We remember what the Earl said, that it was not from Custom but Jure Divino prov'd by Texts of Scripture. No Man can doubt but by another Law of the Land this Hindrance may be well remov'd; and how easily this ancient Form of Government, by the united Suffrages of the Clergy might be reviv'd again, and with what little shew of Alteration." He proceeds to set forth, &c. which was the same Way of arguing us'd by the Parliament's Commissioners: Whatsoever was not of divine Institution might be verily lawfully alter'd; for it had its Original from Men, it might by Men be chang'd or revers'd. That Episcopacy, as it was establish'd in the Church of England, was not that Episcopacy that was mention'd in Scripture, and that therefore the Laws which supported it, might be justly taken away. I do verily believe that the Archdeacon does not know this to be the true State of the Case, and that tho' he has written an Ecclesiastical History, he knows no more of it than he appears to know of the History of England during the Reigns of the Royal House of Stuart, tho' he has written that also. He tells us, 'tis no Matter after whom, since it is false, that the King was much better vers'd in the Argument of Church-Government than Mr. Vines, Mr. Caryl, Dr. Seaman, &c. That Jenkins and Spurstow were like a Couple of Bull-Dogs let loose upon his Majesty, when neither Spurstow nor Jenkins were Assitants to the Parliament's Commissioners; yet Spurstow very plainly and fiercely told the King, he would be damn'd if he did not abolish Episcopacy; which besides that Dr. Spurstow did not say it, is so contrary to the Character of that Divine, full of Meekness and Moderation, as to bear the Falsity in the Front of it. Dr. Spurstow, says Dr. Calamy, was a Man whose Conversation was innocent, chearful, and very acceptable, of a very peaceable Disposition. It is very pleasant to see how the rigid Ecclesiastical Writers endeavour to glew their temporal Honours and Emoluments to the spiritual Function, and how they strive to make those Things the Essence of Religion which have not the least Relation to the Doctrine of Christ. If they would say that the Laws of the Land give the Ecclesiasticks as good a Title to their Dignities and Revenues as the Laicks have to their Estates, they would, as I have often observ'd, talk reasonably, and nothing could be said to them but what Archbishop Usher says; but to pretend that they have a divine independent Right to their Prerogatives and Lordships, is an Insult on common Sense.

The rare History which Echard takes from two rare Historians, Walker and Wagstaff, whose Names I hardly ever before heard of, being all secret and suspected, I leave it where I found it; but this Saying of the King's is very orthodox and politick; I will hold out till I make some Stone in this Building my Tomb-Stone, and so I will do by the Church of England; and so is this other, which could not but endear him to the Laudeans; The concurrent Opinion of the Clergy, as to Sacrilege, is a much better Information to my Conscience, than any Law of the Land can be; which I do not believe the King ever said, it being so contrary to Reason and Justice. Sacrilege, if understood to be stealing the

Chalice or Pulpit-cloth, is doubtless to be abhor'd by all Men; but to alienate Lands from one Religious Use to put them to another, or from a particular to a general Interest by the Laws of the Land, may be as well call'd Sodomy as Sacrilege. These Men buttress up their Cause with Substantives and Adjectives, such as Schism, Sacrilege, Rebellion, Sedition, Fattious, Fanatical, and the like. Echard tells us of a kind of a History of this Treaty, written by his Majesty for the Use of the Prince, and of several other Papers drawn up by the King with great Exactness; but neither himself, nor Walker his Original, could think justly enough to observe, as Bishop Burnet does, King Charles I. minded little Things too much, and was more concern'd in the drawing of a Paper, than in fighting a Battle. Had these Men been capable of thinking justly, they would not have written Histories, they would have better examin'd their Abilities and Intentions, and have left it to Rusworth and Whitlocke to convey the Truth to Posterity, and if they had so done, this History had been needless. While his Majesty and the Parliament's Commissioners were thus busied in Debates about Bishops and Bishops Lands, the Army were as busy in suppressing the Insurrections; and having done that Work, their Council took into Consideration Council of who was the Author of the first and second War, the Army's and who was to be accountable for the innocent Remon-Blood which had been spilt. They consider'd Remon- it with great Formality, but Cromwel and Iron-ron had before determin'd that Matter among themselves and their Creatures. It must be confess'd that the Lord Fairfax, however he shew'd himself cool in the Affair afterwards, was now as warm in it as either of these two Generals; for the Commissioners of the Army having drawn up a Remonstrance, it was deliver'd to the House of Commons by Col. Ewer and seven other Officers; That the King be brought to Justice, as the capital Cause of all; and Fairfax wrote a Letter to the Parliament, desiring that Remonstrance might have a Present Reading. The Paper set forth the King's Miscarriages, his double and dilatory Proceedings in Treaties, particularly that now on foot. The Army desir'd, He might no more come to Government, nor to London; That Delinquents be punish'd; That the Prince and Duke of York be summon'd in by a Day, and if they do not come, be declar'd Traitors. The Duke of Gloucester not being nam'd, it gave occasion to surmise that the Army intended to choose him King, for the early Affection he shew'd to the Protestant Religion, which neither of his two elder Brothers did at that Time much care for, nor he himself afterwards; That no King be hereafter admitted but upon Election. This Petition was presented the 20th of November, and it was too visible that the Parliament would be oblig'd to comply with the Army; yet the Dispute about Episcopacy goes on still at the Isle of Wight with as much Alacrity as if his Majesty was in no Danger at all. There were so many Prelates and Doctors with him, that one would have hop'd some of them would have preferr'd his Preservation to that of their own Preferments, and have advis'd him to do as he was advis'd by Archbishop Usher. The Remonstrance occasion'd a high Debate, which was at last adjourn'd, to the great Dislike of the Army, and much more, when the further Consideration of it being put to the Vote, it was carry'd in the Negative by 90 Voices, which are the Number of the Secluded Members, so much talk'd of in History. The Army's Remonstrance having been presented to the Parliament, they dispatch'd Col. Ewer

A. D. 1648. Ever to the Isle of Wight with Orders to Col. Hammond to give up that Government and the Custody of the King to Ever, and himself to attend the General at his Head Quarters at Windsor. The Commons hearing of it, voted that Hammond should continue in both those Charges; but the late Governor thought it the wiser Way for him to obey his General; and so delivering up his Prisoner and his Government to Col. Ever, he waited upon his Excellency, who, to prevent his Return to the Isle, put him under a Sort of Arrest, from which he was not immediately discharg'd, tho' the Parliament had written to him to suffer Hammond to return to the Isle of Wight in the same Quality as he left it. The Reverend Historians conceal the King's Attempt to escape from Carisbroke Castle, that there may be no Excuse for the Parliament's Officers confining him more strictly; but Lilly, who was the very Person that bought the Saw for him to cut the Iron Bars, at the Request of Mrs. Whorwood before-mention'd, writes thus: "His Majesty laid his Design to escape out of Prison by sawing the Iron Bars of his Chamber Window, a small Ship was provided and anchor'd not far from the Coast to bring him into Suffex; Horses were also provided to carry him through Suffex into Kent, that so he might be at the Head of the Army under Goring. Lady Whorwood came to me and acquainted me herewith. I got G. Farmer, an ingenious Lock-Smith in Bow-Lane, to make a Saw, which I sent, with some Aqua-fortis besides. His Majesty in a small Time did his Work. The Bars gave Liberty for him to go out. He was out with his Body till he came to his Breast, but then his Heart failing, he proceeded no farther. When this was discover'd, as soon after it was, he was narrowly look'd after, and no Opportunity could be devis'd to enlarge him." The Remonstrance was follow'd with a Declaration from the Army, complaining, That they are wholly rejected; That they should rejoice if the Majority of the House of Commons would become sensible of the Destructiveness of the late War; and would exclude from Communication in their Councils all such corrupt and apostatiz'd Members as have obstructed Justice, &c. They desire that so many of them as God had kept upright, would by Protestation or otherwise acquit themselves from such a Breach of Trust, and would withdraw from such as persist in the Guilt thereof, as having materially the chief Justice of the Kingdom remaining in them, and they shall adhere to them, and be guided by them; and that they are drawing to London for these Ends, &c. plainly intimating, that if they did not themselves exclude the Members against whom they had Exceptions, it should be done by the Army when they came to Westminster.

Oliver Cromwel continu'd still to act by his Instruments, and did not as yet publicly appear against the Person of the King more than Fairfax did. I find him at a Place call'd Knottingley at this very Time, as by the following Letter, which being under his own Hand, will be of Importance enough to excite the Reader's Curiosity.

S I R,

I Suppose it is not unknown to you how much the Country is in Arrear to the Garrison of Hull, as likewise how probable it is that the Garrison will break, unless some speedy Course be taken to get them Money, the Soldiers at this Present being ready to mutiny, as not having Money to buy them Bread, and without Money the stubborn Towns-People will not trust them for the Worth of a Penny. Sir, I must beg of you, that as you tender the Good of the Country, so far as the Security of that Garrison is mention'd, you would give your Assistance to the helping of them to their Money which the Country owes them. The Governor will apply himself to you either in Person or by Letter. I pray you do for him herein as in a Business of very high Consequence. I am the more earnest with you, as having a very deep Sense how dangerous the Event may be of their being neglected in the Matter of their Pay. I rest upon your Favour herein, and subscribe my self,

S I R,

Your very humble Servant,

Knottingley, Nov.
25. 1648.

O. CROMWELL.

For my Noble Friend Thomas St. Nicholas, Esq;

General Fairfax wrote to the Lord Mayor and Common Council, That he was marching to London in Pursuance of the late Remonstrance and Declaration, and for preventing Disorder, desir'd 40000 Pounds, Part of their Arrears due from the City, to be got ready, which the House of Commons desir'd also, but wrote to his Excellency, That it was their Pleasure he do not remove the Army nearer to London, which the General took no Notice of, but march'd directly thither, and took Quarters for himself and his Army in Whitehall, St. James's, London, the Meuse, Tork House, and other vacant Houses, and in the Villages near the City; and the Parliament receiv'd Letters from the Isle of Wight, that the King was remov'd to Hurst Castle, on the Neck of Land projecting from Hampshire to that Isle. The Parliament voted, That the seizing upon the Person of the King, and carrying him Prisoner to Hurst Castle, was without the Advice and Consent of the House; and the next Day, after having debated it all Night, they voted, That his Majesty's Concessions to the Parliament's Propositions, are sufficient Grounds for settling the Peace of the Kingdom. This Vote pass'd the 5th of December. Three Days after the Army had taken Quarters all around them, yet such was the Spirit of the Presbyterians in the Two Houses, that, in Defiance of so great a military Power, they declar'd against the Violence of the Army with respect to the King's Imprisonment, and the threaten'd Proceedings against his Person. How ingrate, how infamous are the vile Reflections of those Ecclesiastical Writers and Preachers, who charge the Presbyterians with the Death of the King, which they clear'd themselves of in this so solemn and so dangerous a Manner? 'Tis probable most of the rural Priesthood do not know this, their Knowledge being not always too extensive; but the Archdeacon, and some historical Doctors that have intimated as much in their Writings and Preachments, do know this, and yet, contrary to their Knowledge, declaim against the Presbyterians as King-killers, which it is hop'd they did or will repent of before they give in their last Account at the tremendous Day of accounting.

On the next Day after this bold Vote, Col. Force on Rich's Regiment of Horse, and Col. Pride's Regiment of Foot were set as Guards on the Two Houses, and the City Train'd Bands discharg'd. Thus in Reality the Parliament were Prisoners to the Army, and whatever they did afterwards was by Constraint, and consequently null. Pride drew

A. D. 1648. drew up some Companies of Foot in the Court of Requests, upon the Stairs, and in the Lobby, and as the Members stood to enter the House, the Colonel seiz'd upon those whose Names were written in a Paper he held in his Hand, and whom he was directed to sometimes by one of the Door-Keepers, and sometimes by the Lord Grey of Groby. As fast as he seiz'd them, they were carry'd away, some to the Queen's Court, some to the Court of Wards, and other Places, by Warrant from the General and the Council of Officers. The Members thus carry'd away were Sir Robert Harley, Col. Edward Harley, Sir William Waller, Sir Walter Earl, Sir Samuel Luke, Sir John Meyrick, Sir Martin Lister, Lord Wenman, Mr. Knightley, Sir Gilbert Gerard, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, Mr. Francis Gerard, Mr. Swinfin, Sir Edward Partridge, Mr. Crew, Sir Edward Stephens, Mr. Butler, Sir Harbottle Grimston, Mr. Bulkeley, Major General Massey, Mr. Walker, Mr. Robert Pye, Mr. Pelham, Col. Leigh, Sir Anthony Irby, Mr. Lane, Mr. Doderidge, Mr. Wheeler, Mr. Drake, Mr. Green, Mr. Boughton, Mr. Prynn, Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, Commissary Copley, Col. Strobe, Mr. Priestley, Sir Simonds D'Ewes, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir Richard Onslow, Sir Thomas D'Acres, Sir Thomas Soam, Mr. Drake, Major General Browne, Mr. Clement Walker.

Col. Harrison and Sir Hardress Waller were very active in this Force put upon the Parliament, who had still a Majority sufficient to declare against it, and sent their Sergeant at Arms to acquaint those Members, It was the Pleasure of the House that they should forthwith attend their Service; but the Officers, who were plac'd as Guards upon them, took no Notice of it. A Committee was sent to the General, Sir John Evelyn, Col. Birch, Sir Thomas Widdrington, Mr. Pierrepont, Mr. Aphurist, and Mr. St. John, to confer with him, and maintain a good Correspondence between them. The Lord Fairfax desir'd Time to advise with his Council of War about his Answer. The same Committee was order'd to attend the General again for it, but instead of an Answer, Col. Astel and Col. Whalley brought to the House a Paper, entituled, The Proposals and Desires of the Army; wherein they complain, That having formerly impeach'd Denzil Hollis, Esq; Lionel Copley, Esq; Major General Massey, and other Members, of Treason, who had been expell'd the House, and their Seats supply'd by new Elections; yet the Faction having taken Advantage of the Absence of several Members in the Publick Service during the late Insurrections, and others who through Tumults could not safely attend, those that were so impeach'd had been re-admitted to sit and vote as formerly; That Major General Browne, now Sheriff of London, had with the said impeach'd Members invited the Scots to invade this Kingdom, and they as Adherents to the Scots had been voted to be Traytors; yet these Confederates, and other treacherous Members, to the Number of 90 and odd, did by their Counsels and Votes endeavour to hinder the House from declaring against their confederate Invaders. They desire that Major General Browne be secur'd, and the rest of the ninety odd Persons excluded the House; and the Votes declaring the King's Concessions to be a sufficient Ground for Settlement of Peace, notwithstanding the Insufficiency and Defect of them, be recall'd. Echard says, The Soldiers deny'd Entrance into the House to 160 Members more, whereupon the rest of the Presbyterian Party being terrify'd with the Usage of their Fellow

Members, declin'd the House, leaving it in the Possession of about 150. He has represented this House of Commons as a pack'd Assembly of about 150 Members in other Parts of his History, and there are now 50 seiz'd, 160 deny'd Entrance, 100 at least suppos'd to decline, and 150 left? So coherent is this exact Historian with his own as well as with other Histories. Whitlocke informs us, that several of the seclused Members offering to enter the House, they were forbidden, because some Matters were to be debated concerning themselves; and it has ever been the Practice for Persons to withdraw while what is in Debate concerns them. The Parliament voted to take the Army's Remonstrance and Proposals into Consideration. But that did not hinder the sending Col. Dean with two Regiments of Foot and some Troops of Horse into the City, to seize the Money in Haberdasher's Hall, Weaver's Hall, and Goldsmith's Hall, of which his Excellency acquainted the Lord Mayor beforehand, and gave his Reasons for so doing; "Because they had not paid their Arrears of the Assessment, nor furnished the Money which he desir'd of them; and the Army had by Order of Parliament quarter'd in several Counties on those who did not pay the Assessment till the same was paid, that yet if the City would advance the 40000 Pounds, Part of their Arrears, the Soldiers should not be further trouble-some to them."

'Twas at this Time that the Scandal arose of turning St. Paul's Church into a Stable, according to Sanderfon; but tho' it can be prov'd that the Cavaliers turn'd several Churches to as beastly Purposes, if Slaughter and Blood may be so deem'd; yet Whitlocke assures us, The Foot were quarter'd in private Houses, and the Horse in the Inns, of which there were enough to take in the Horse without setting up Mangers in the Cathedral of St. Paul. A Party of these Soldiers by Mistake went to the Excise-Office to seize the Money there, for which having no Order, the General recall'd them, and wrote a Letter to the Commissioners of the Excise to excuse it, his Intention being only to oblige the City of London to pay the Arrears due from them to the Army, and not to take any Part of the Publick Treasure appropriated to other Uses. They took 28000 Pounds out of Weaver's Hall, and the Parliament repaid it. The General and Council of Officers had an Address presented them, of the Nature of the former, call'd The Agreement of the People, which was a Scheme of future Government suppos'd to be drawn up by Ireton, of the People, and put it entirely in a Representative of 300 Members, to be chosen after a new Method, and this Parliament to be dissolv'd in April next. Officers and Malignants to be incapable of electing or being elected, &c. The next Day the 12th of December the House voted, That the Vote for revoking the Order of disabling the Eleven Members, and re-admitting them into the House when a Charge of so high a Nature lay against them, was unparliamentary, and of dangerous Consequence, and was now made null. They also voted, That the Vote of this House of concurring with the Lords to take off the former Non-Address, which forbid any more Addresses to the King, was highly dishonourable to the Proceedings of the Parliament; and apparently destructive to the Good of the Kingdom: Also, That the Vote of Non-Addresses shall stand; and that the Vote for Revocation of them, and that for a Personal Treaty with the King in the Isle of Wight, were highly dishonourable to the Proceedings in Parliament, and apparently destructive to the Good of the Kingdom. In the mean Time,

A. D. 1648. Time the secluded Members, who were about 140, by Force or Voluntary in disgust for the Exclusion of their Brethren, publish'd a Pamphlet, entitled, A solemn Declaration of the Members secluded the House by the Army, that all Acts, Ordinances, Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons since the Seclusion of the Members and Continuance of the Armies Force upon it, are no way Obligatory, but null and void. The Parliament voted it "to be false, scandalous, and seditious, tending to destroy the Government; and that all who had a Hand in it shall be incapable of any Office or Trust, or to be a Member of Parliament, and that every absent Member before he sit shall disavow the same." Mr. Prynne was the suppos'd Author of it; but Hollis, Brown and the rest of them, approv'd of it. Lieutenant General Cromwel was now the visible Head of the Majority in Parliament, and Court was made to him accordingly. He took up his Lodging in White-hall, and lay in one of the King's richest Beds. The Lord Fairfax acquiesced in all his Counsels, insomuch that when the House sent to him that a Charge might be brought in concerning the secluded Members, he answer'd fully, The Business is of great Concernment; and I believe the House will not expect a present Answer from me, but I will prepare it as speedily as I can; and in the mean Time desire the House not to trouble themselves to send any more to me about it: But the same Day sixteen of the secluded Members were set at Liberty by his Order to sit again in the House if they pleas'd, and so might others of them have done, but they neglected their Duty, and gave Cromwel's Majority the better Opportunity to execute what he had most wickedly contriv'd, though as yet he did not appear in it, but seem'd to be as much Republican as Vane or Ludlow: Mr. Lenthall the Speaker, Lieutenant General Cromwel, Sir Thomas Widdrington, and Mr. Whitlocke had a Meeting the next Day, December the 21st, to confer about the present Affairs, and particularly the Actions of the Army. Cromwel was very earnest for a Settlement of the Commonwealth, and desir'd Sir Thomas Widdrington and Mr. Whitlocke, to draw up a Form of that Settlement, to endeavour to bring the Army into some fitter Temper, and to have the secluded Members readmitted, which Form was to be presented to the House, and the Council of the Army. They with much difficulty undertook the Business, and at the Speaker's House three or four Days after met with several Gentlemen to consult further about the Settlement, That all might not be left to the Sword; but here they were left by Cromwel, whose Majority having voted to bring the King to a Trial, he resolv'd to terminate that bloody Affair first, and to talk of a Settlement afterwards. When it was debated the 23d of December to bring the King as the greatest Delinquent to Justice, 'twas objected even in this House of Commons, "That he was not capable of being so brought by his Subjects, but by God alone: That having subdu'd him and his Party, there was no need of any Thing further, than to secure the Parliament from their Enemies rising against them any more, and that might be done without bringing the King to any judicial Trial:" A Thing not read of in any History; whether that may be so or not, we will leave to Milton, who however has as much Heat as Argument on this Subject; but as the Parliament did not allow their entering into a War to be Rebellion, so surely the King's taking Arms against Tumults and Insurrections could not be Treason. Both King and Parliament strenuously deny'd that either of them began the War. If it was not the King, the Guilt of the Blood lay not at his Door; If it was the King, which his Majesty and all his Historians do utterly deny; yet what Judicatory could call him to Account? The Lords rejected the Ordinance for his Trial with Indignation, and even that Ordinance was irregularly obtain'd by unheard of Force put upon the Parliament, under the Power of the Soldiery. The Lords Negative is as illegal. Fundamental a Part of the Laws of England as the Commons Affirmative; and there can be no Law without their joint Consent; therefore every Act of the governing Powers, from Pride's Purge to the Death of the King, is illegal, barbarous and tyrannical, and well deserves an Anniversary of Humiliation, if so many of the smaller Clergy did not make such a scandalous Use of it, as to assert Falsities for Truths in the most solemn Places, and defile Divine Service with Invectives against the Presbyterians, whom they injuriously charge with the Death of the King; where-as they only in Form and in a Body protested the Presbolderly against it, as will be prov'd hereafter; and I leave it to the Reader whether Ignorance is an Excuse for so much Malice and Injustice; and they have nothing else to plead for it.

William Lilly, who kept a Sort of Correspondence with the King by Means of Mrs. Whorwood, informs us, "That about September the Parliament sent their Commissioners with Isle of Propositions unto him into the Isle of Wight, Wight the Lord William Say being one. The Lady Treaty Whorwood comes again to me from the King, miscarry'd, or by his Consent to be directed: After Perusal of my Figure, I told her the Commissioners would be there such a Day; I selected a Day and Hour when to receive the Commissioners and Propositions, and as soon as the Propositions were read to sign them, and make haste to come up to London, the Army being then far distant, and the City enrag'd against them. He promis'd he would so do. That Night the Commissioners came, and old Say and his Majesty had private Conference till One in the Morning. The King acquaints Say with his Intention, who clearly dissuaded him from signing the Propositions, telling him they were not fit for him to sign; that he had many Friends in the House of Lords, and some in the House of Commons; that he would procure more, and that they would frame more easy Propositions. This Flattery of this unfortunate Lord occasion'd his Majesty to wave the Advice I and some others that wish'd his Prosperity had given, in Expectation of that which afterwards could never be gain'd. The Army having some Notice hereof, from one who had an Eye upon old Say, hasten'd unto London, and made the Citizens very quiet; and besides the Parliament and Army kept a better Correspondency afterwards with each other." King Charles said of this William Lilly, That he understood Astrology as well as any Man in Europe, and never the fitter for that to make him a Counsellor. Say was to have been Lord Treasurer, and his Son Nathaniel Fiennes, Secretary of State, if his Scheme had succeeded. If this Account be true then as has been already hinted, his Majesty was not so entirely devoted to Prelacy, as to be a Sacrifice for it; and 'twas in Expectation of what Lord Say would do for him, that he defer'd closing with the Parliament till the Army interpos'd and would not let him.

Trial of the King debated.

A. D. 1648. gave new Provocations by the most execrable and bloody Attempt that ever happen'd in a Christian Country, if such Assassins deserve the Name of Christians. Col. Rainsborough had been order'd to command the Blockade of Pomfret Castle, surpriz'd by the Traytor Morris; and Sir Henry Cholmley, who had that Commission from the Committee of Yorkshire, thinking himself injur'd, complain'd to the Parliament, who had in Consideration some Means to save the Honour of Sir Henry, and content Col. Rainsborough; the latter, while the Affair was in Dispute, took up his Quarters at Doncaster, and having no Enemy nearer than Pomfret, he thought himself so secure that there was not so strict Guard kept as was convenient: Morris having Notice of it sent 40 Horse in the Night from Pomfret to Doncaster, where they kill'd the Centinel, and three of the Bravoes advancing into the Town, ask'd for Col. Rainsborough's Lodgings, which being directed to, they went up Stairs to his Chamber Door, the Colonel a Bed, and said they had a Letter from Lieutenant General Cromwel; Col. Rainsborough rose, and open'd the Door to them, expecting such a Letter that Morning, and presently the three Pomfret Soldiers fell upon him, shot him into the Neck, into the Heart, and gave him other Wounds, tho' one of them had been sufficient to murder him, leaving him dead upon the Place, and making their Escape without any Alarm given. Thus Whitlocke tells the Story, and as he is us'd to speak Truth, one may believe him sooner than the Author of the History of the Rebellion, who is us'd to speak the contrary. The Parliament highly resent'd this barbarous Act; and every generous Mind detest'd it, and the Doers of it. Lieutenant General Cromwel was directed to take special Care that the Murder of Col. Rainsborough be strictly examin'd into. This detestable Murder is represented in the History as a gallant Action, and the Author is in great Pain for the Murderer Morris, who had deserted the Parliament Service, and by Treachery got Possession of Pomfret Castle, abusing the Confidence the Parliament's Governor, Col. Cotterel had in him, so far as to let him lye in the same Bed, by which Means he got an Opportunity to seize both him and the Castle; Morris telling him he should take Courage, for he would get him the King's Pardon. A pretty Fellow to get Pardon for others, who was so near the Gallows himself. This Deserter is a Man of Gallantry, Honour, Loyalty and Trust in the History of the Rebellion; and 'tis to be suppos'd the Reader will judge of the other Characters there by Morris's, whom Lambert soon after besieg'd, with particular Instructions to secure the Murderers, if possible, that they might have the Reward due to such Criminals. The Historian then tells us a Romantick Story of the Defence those Assassins made, how many of them fought their Way through Lambert's Army, and that of the six who were to be deliver'd up to Punishment by the Articles of Surrender, every one made his Escape, as it was permitted them to do, by Battle or otherwise, in so many Days, all which is Invention to honour the Memory of those Cavalier Worthies, who did indeed make their Escape some how or other; but poor Morris, as the same Author styles him, being afterwards taken in Lancashire, was hang'd for the Murder, with one Cornet Blackburn, another of the Murderers, whom for that Merit the Historian makes a Lieutenant Colonel. There is a Judgment attach'd to the Death of Morris; they hung him in the Place where he had before done good Service for the REBELS.

About the same Time a Petition was deliver'd to the General at St. Alban's for Justice upon the principal Invaders of their Liberties, namely the King: 'Twas sign'd by the Officers of Col. Ingoldsby's Regiment, and is the first that spoke so plain, which is the more remarkable, because Col. Ingoldsby is excus'd by the Lord Clarendon as to the Guilt of the King's Death. The Persons to be excepted out of the Indemnity Act, had the Treaty been accomplish'd, were at last reduc'd to seven only; the Lord Digby, the Earl of Newcastle, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Sir Richard Greenville, Judge Jenkins, Sir John Winter, and Sir Francis Dodington; Sir John Winter was afterwards chang'd for Sir John Byron; this small Exception was another Provocation to the Army, who had demanded Justice against a very great Number of Delinquents, that the Consecutions might go to discharge the Arrears due to them. The County of Somerset sent up such a Petition as that of Ingoldsby's Regiment, which was deliver'd by Sir Thomas Wroth, whom Richard contemptuously calls one Wroth. True it is, the fierce Party in the House of Commons prosecuted their Design against the King with great Eagerness, and those of a contrary Opinion; as Widdrington, Whitlocke, Pierrepont, Popham, &c. durst not oppose the others, knowing that they should be presently secluded the House if they did so, or that any Opposition would be to no Purpose. Thus they remain'd passive till the odious Business was over. The fierce Party in the House were so conscious of the Foulness of it, that they endeavour'd to throw it upon the Army, as most proper for such Workmen to do such unheard of unwarrantable Work, and for irregular Men to do an irregular Thing: But the Officers saw through their Design, and resolv'd they should openly avow and share in it at least, if they would not take it all to themselves; and in truth they found too many forward enough to engage in it, insomuch that it was carry'd by Vote in the House of Commons, to name a Committee of thirty eight Persons, to consider of drawing up a Charge, and for that Purpose to receive all Informations and Examinations of all Witnesses for Matters of Fact against the King, and all other Delinquents that may be thought fit to be brought to condign Punishment. The House now did not consist of above 200, and there were hardly so many present when this Vote past; yet the Majority for it was not great; about 20; the rest of the Members, though they were Republicans, not being for proceeding judicially against the King, but for confining him in some safe Place, and taking the Government to themselves as a Common-wealth. This terrible Vote past the 23d of December, and two Days after the formidable Committee was appointed, Mr. Smith their Clerk came to Sir Thomas Widdrington, and Mr. Whitlocke, Commissioners in Chancery, with a Message requiring both of them to attend the Committee that Day, to give them Advice in some Matters of Importance; they both knew what the Business was; and Whitlocke said, He was resolv'd not to meddle in the Trial of the King, it being contrary to his Judgment as he had declar'd in the House. Sir Thomas Widdrington told Smith, he was of the same Opinion, and would have no Hand in it; but he knew not whether to go to be out of the Way, that the Committee might not know whether to send to him. When Smith was gone, Whitlocke said to Widdrington, My Coach is ready, and I was this Morning going out of Town, purposely to avoid this Business, if you please to go with me you may be quiet at my House in the Country till all is over, and I shall be glad of your Company, so they both went so does the third Address.

went accordingly. The Committee having prepar'd the Charge reported it to the House, That Charles Stuart had acted contrary to his Trust in departing from the Parliament, setting up his Standard, making War against them, and thereby been the Occasion of much Bloodshed and Misery to the People, whom he was set over for good, that he gave Commissions to Irish Rebels, and since was the Occasion of a second War, and had done contrary to the Liberties of the Subjects, tending to the Destruction of the fundamental Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom. This strange Experiment was introduc'd, as most Things were in those precious Times, with a Day of Fasting and Humiliation, when Mr. Watson a Presbyterian Minister whom I well remember in the Reign of King James II. to be under a severe Prosecution for his Religion, preach'd before the House of Commons, and when the Question was put, Whether he should have their Thanks for it, 'twas carry'd in the Negative, because he did not acknowledge the Parliament. Does not the Reader perceive what King Killers the Presbyterians then were? And how honest those Writers and Preachers are, who represent them, and inveigh against them as such. Cromwel's Majority was so angry with Mr. Watson, that it was put to the Vote, Whether there should be any more set Fasts? But it drop'd for the sake of Mr. Brook and Dr. Owen, two other Ministers, who were more grateful to the Army, as the Army was more grateful to them.

While Preparations were making for his Trial, his Majesty was remov'd from Hurst Castle, where he liv'd in a most disconsolate Condition, and wrote this Verse of Ovid with his Diamond in one of the Windows;

Qui decumbit Humi non habet unde cadet.

a reasonable Reflection, unaffected and natural, short, like the Reflections of Misery, and not wordy, like the Sentiments in Eikon Basilike, which are the more Suspicious, because Passion is an Enemy to Words. Grief never declaims, though it is always complaining, and Sighs, as 'tis said that Book was intended to be call'd, cannot be breath'd out in round Periods of 10 and 12 Folio Lines. Col. Ewer, who brought the King from Carisbrook to Hurst Castle, continu'd Governor there with the Charge of his Majesty's Person, and though there is a mighty Clamour made about the Insalubrity of the Air, yet Whitlocke very particularly observes, that his Majesty had his Health there, and all good Accommodations, till he was again remov'd to Windfor Castle. Col. Harrison came to Hurst Castle for him with his Regiment of Horse, and having receiv'd him of Col. Ewer, he went into his Majesty's Coach, and rode with him all the Way to the greater Grief of the Earl of Clarendon, because he did not keep off his Hat, after the Parliament had voted, that the Knee and other Ceremonies to the King should be forborn. On the 21st of December they came to Winchester, where as Sanderfon and Echard tell us, the Honourable Mayor and Aldermen met him at the Town's End, and after a Speech presented him with their Mace. Col. Harrison gave the honourable Mayor to understand, That by the Act of no Address to the King their Worships were all Traytors, which threw them into such a Panick, that though they promis'd never to do so any more in Terms moving enough to create Pity, yet they could not get out of their Heads the Punishment which is due to Treason. The Lord Clarendon informs us, that Col. Har- rison was much given to praying and preaching, which being such merry Things with him, I wonder his Lordship should give way to them when his Majesty was leading to Destruction. Another Remark is, that though he was a Butcher's Son, yet as a Colonel of Horse and Major General, he was very respectful to the King, and kept himself bare, which contradicts what I said of his keeping on his Hat; but as I took it from Sir Roger Manly, and think one Authority as good as the other, the Matter must be left to the Reader. As the King and the Major General rode together in the Coach, his Majesty express'd himself apprehensive of some ill Design against him, by hurrying him away thus from the Isle of Wight, and from one Place to another. But the Major General assur'd him the Parliament abhor'd any Thoughts of Proceeding against him otherwise than in an open Manner, which had been intimated to the King before, and made him very desirous to make his Escape when 'twas too late to attempt it, which Col. Harrison shew'd he was apprehensive of, and was the more diligent to prevent it. The Lady D'Aubigny had brought herself into Trouble by her corresponding with the Cavaliers at Oxford, during her Residence at London in the first War; and 'twas talk'd that she should be try'd for it. She had lately marry'd the Lord Newburgh, who liv'd in the little Park at Bagshot, which his Majesty was wont to take great Delight in, and now express'd a great Desire to dine with that Lord and Lady at the Lodge there. Harrison did not at all like it, but the King shewing he would not be hinder'd, unless it was by force, the Colonel gave way to it, and consented that his Majesty should send a Servant to let the Lady Newburgh know he would dine with her; for that Lord and Lady held private Correspondence with him by a Cypher concerted between them, and had given him Notice, that he would be sent for from Hurst Castle, advising him to find some Way that he might dine at the Lodge, and if he could, to lame his Horse, that he might take another out of the Lord Newburgh's Stables, where was kept one of the fleetest in England, on which he might mount, and if he could get out of the Company that encompass'd him, he might possibly, by the Swiftness of his Horse, and his own Skill in the most obscure Ways in that Forest, convey himself to another Place, and so to others, where good Horses were laid for him. But Colonel Harrison was the most improper Man in the World to be impos'd upon by a small Design; he order'd a Party of Horse to get to Bagshot before them, and search all the Lodge, and all the Avenues, and the fleet Horse being just then lam'd by a Stroke, the King would not venture upon another, so this hopeful Project came to nothing.

The Lord Clarendon beats the Drum Ecclesiastick very often, and now he informs us, That the Preachers, who had at first been most furious for the War, now preach'd as furiously against all wicked Attempts and Violence against the Person of the King, and foolishly urged the Obligation of the Covenant, there is so much Wisdom in his Lordship's History, that one may be sure when he says a Thing is foolish, that it is so, for the Security of his Person. All the Reason they had to be such Fools was in the Words of the Covenant it self, Article 3d, We shall with the same Sincerity, Reality and Constancy, in our several Vocations, endeavour with our Estates and Lives, mutually to defend the King's Majesty's Person and Authority. The other Articles of the Covenant had been obtain'd

A. D.
1648.The King's Design to escape,

by

A. D. 1648. by the King's Concessions to the Scots, and at the Ile of Wight. The War he had begun was ended, the Causes of it remov'd by those Concessions; and that War to bring Delinquents to Justice, and defend their just Rights, is declar'd to be lawful by the Parliament, which brought in this King's Son, therefore there remain'd no Obligation so strong upon them by the Covenant, as the Preservation of the King's Person; for though the Resistance they gave him was a main Cause of his present Calamity, yet it cannot be said so much to have involv'd him in it, as the evil Counsels of those evil Counsellors, whom to the last he so obstinately protected against Justice.

A. D. 1648. On New Years Day the Names of the Commissioners for the Trial of the King were reported to the House. Whitlocke informs us, "They were some of the Lords and Commons, Officers of the Army, Aldermen, and Commanders in London, and some Gentlemen from the Counties, in all 150 Persons." But they could not get above 70 or 80 to go through the Drudgery of this wicked Work, and not one of the Peers who were named did meddle in it. These Proceedings were founded on this Vote, That the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament do declare and adjudge, That by the fundamental Laws of this Realm, it is Treason in the King of England, for the Time to come, to levy War against the Parliament and Kingdom of England. 'Tis strange they should put in for the future, when their Army could as well have supported the Vote, had they said, it always was, is, and ever shall be, Treason. There would have been as much Law in it as in their wording of it. This Vote being sent up to the Lords for their Concurrence by the Lord Grey of Groby, they rejected it Nemine Contradicente, 17 Lords being present, unless some Hesitation in the Lord Say may be term'd Opposition. The Earl of Pembroke hearing his Name was inserted in the List of Commissioners for the King's Trial, he loudly exclaimed against it, and refused to act, as did the Lord Fairfax, though I can see no manner of Reason for it, after he had contributed so much to that Trial, by suffering Pride's Purge to pass, and recommending the Army's Remonstrance to the speedy Consideration of the Parliament, wherein they desir'd, that the capital Delinquent might be brought to Justice. If he could not have hinder'd Cromwel's acting as he did, he might have let him act by himself, and his discountenancing the Force put upon the Parliament would have gone a great way in preventing it, considering what a great Majority the Presbyterians had in the House before the Purge. The Lords adjourn'd for 10 Days, to perplex the Matter as much as lay in their Power, but the Commons voted, That all their Members, and others appointed to act in any Ordinance, wherein the Lords are join'd with them, shall be empower'd and injoin'd to sit, act, and execute in the said several Committees, notwithstanding the House of Peers join not with them. They order'd, That the Ordinance for the Trial of the King, and the declaratory Vote from which the Lords dissented, and which was intended for both Houses, shall now be by the Commons only; and turning themselves into a grand Committee, they resolv'd, Nemine Contradicente, Vote for Treason in the King.

Republican Votes.

1. "That the People, under God, are the Original of all just Power.
2. "That the Commons of England assembled in Parliament being chosen by, and representing the People, have the supreme Authority of the Nation.
3. "That whatsoever is enacted, and declar'd red for Law by the Commons in Parliament, A. D. 1648. hath the Force of Law, and all the People of this Nation are included thereby, although the Consent and Concurrence of the King, and House of Peers, be not had thereunto.

Thus was kingly Government abolish'd before the King was put to Death, for which only Forms were wanting, but such Forms as turn'd Justice into Farce. On the 6th of January the Ordinance for the Trial of the King pass'd, and the Scots Commissioners sent a Letter to the Parliament, pressing for Unity of Counsels between the two Kingdoms, and that they would not proceed to try and execute the King till the Advice of that Nation was had. But it is not strange that neither the Parliament or Army paid any Deferrance to their Interposition, which they so ill deserv'd of them by their late invading the Kingdom in a hostile Manner; and it was not likely their Arguments would succeed, when they had before try'd their Arms in vain.

The King being brought to Windsor was delivered to the Governor, Colonel Whitchcot, by Colonel Tomlinson, who commanded the Troop that guarded him after Colonel Harrison left them. The King appear'd to be pretty well satisfy'd with his Removal from Hurst thither; he liv'd more at ease, and was more chearful, having so little Intelligence, or Apprehension of what was doing against him, a few Days before his Removal thence to the last Stage of his Life, that he said, He doubted not but within 6 Months to see Peace in England, and in case he was not restor'd by his Subjects in England, he should be righted from Ireland, Denmark, and other Places. A very unseasonable Discourse in such a Place, and before such Company.

I can't imagine what Occasion there was for this Falsity in the History of the Rebellion, it gives no Strength to the Party the Author espouset, nor Credit to his Cause: When the Day came to which the House of Lords adjourn'd, they found their Doors all lock'd. That was not all, They found their Doors fasten'd with Padlocks; when in truth, their Doors were as they us'd to be, and when the Day came they enter'd their House, according to Whitlocke, and pass'd several Ordinances. They debated the last Votes about the Trial of the King, and the publishing something to satisfy the People, upon what Grounds they rejected the Ordinance for his Trial. But they had enough offended the Parliament and Army already, and so they came to no Resolution. The same Day Sergeant Dendy, Sergeant at Arms to the House of Commons, and now acting as such to the Commissioners for trying the King, rode into Westminster Hall with the Mace on his Shoulder, Officers attending, and six Trumpets; all on Horseback, and Guards of Horse and Foot in the Palace Yard. The Trumpets sounded in the middle of the Hall, and the Drums beat in the Palace Yard, after which Proclamation was made, to give Notice, That the Commissioners for Trial of the King's King would sit to Morrow, the 10th of January, and that all those that had any Thing to say against him might then be heard. Sergeant Dendy made the same Proclamation at the Old Exchange, and in Cheapside. The Parliament voted, *That the Style of any one particular Person, should not be inserted as the Style of any common Writ, or otherwise, for the Time to come. That the present Great Seal should be broken, and a new one forthwith made. That the Arms of England and of Ireland shall be engraven on one Side of the new Great Seal, with this Inscription; The Great Seal of England. Ludlow, Col. Purefoy, Col. Harvey, Col. Fleetwood, Col. Horton, Col. Hammond, Col. Scroop, Col. Harrison, Col. Pride, Col. Whalley, Col. Hewson, Col. Ewer, Col. Stapely, Col. Downs, Col. Dean, Col. Goffe, Col. Lillburn, Col. Walton, Col. Wayte, Col. J. Temple, Col. Peter Temple, Col. Tomlinson, Col. Venn, Col. Moore, Col. Roe, Col. Lassells, Col. Titchburne, Col. Berkstead, Col. Okey, Col. Hutchinson, Alderman Pennington, Alderman Andrews, Alderman Scot, Peregrine Pelham, Esq; John Lisle, Esq; Miles Corbet, Esq; Cornelius Holland, Esq; Mr. Francis Allen, Thomas Challoner, Esq; John Challoner, Esq; John Allured, Esq; Henry Smith, Esq; Mr. Humphry Edwards, Mr. John Fry, William Cawley, Esq; Gregory Clement, Esq; Henry Wallop, Esq; Mr. Nicholas Love, Mr. Vincent Potter, John Carew, Esq; William Say, Esq; Simon Mayne, Esq; Daniel Blagrove, Esq; John Dixwell, Esq; Thomas Wogan, Esq; Mr. John Blakeston, Mr. Gilbert Millington, William Heveningham, Esq; Henry Marten, Esq; Mr. — Dove, Augustine Garland, Esq; John Jones, Esq;

Mr. Recorder Steel, Attorney General.
Mr. John Cook, Solicitor General.
Dr. Dorislaus, Sergeant Ask, to draw up the Charge, and manage it.
Col. Humphrey Sword Bearer.
Col. Fox, Captain of the Guard of Partizans.
Mr. Phelps, Mr. Broughton, Clerks to the Court.
Mr. Dendy, Sergeant at Arms.
Wolfred Payne, Radley Powell, — Hull, Messengers.
Israel King, Cryer.

There were many others nam'd in the Commission who refus'd to act, and sit in Judgment, though they are crowded into some Lists.

William Lenthall, Esq; Speaker, Lord Fairfax, General, Major General Skippon, Colonel Desborough, Col. Duckenfield, Col. Lambert, Col. Maynwaring, Col. Overton, Col. Rigby, Col. Sydney, Col. Rowland Wilson, Col. Fenwick, Sir William Allison, Sir William Armyn, Sir William Brereton, Sir Godfrey Bosvile, Sir Edward Baynton, Sir Arthur Haslerigge, Sir Thomas Honeywood, Sir Peter Wentworth, Sir William Roberts, Sir Peter Temple, Sir John Barrington, Sir William Marmion, Phil. Lord Lisle, Alderman Fowkes, Alderman Atkins, Mr. Berners, Sergeant Thorp, Mr. Bond, Mr. Boon, Mr. Corbet, Mr. Fagg, Sergeant Nicholas, Mr. Hill, Mr. Skinner, Mr. Trenchard, Mr. Nelthorp, Mr. Nutt, Mr. R. Salway, Mr. H. Salway, Mr. Weaver, Mr. Mildmay, Mr. Larrey, Mr. Gourdon, Mr. Darley, Mr. Burrell, Mr. Aislaby, Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Gratwick.

Some there were who sat a Day or two out of Curiosity, or as one would hope, with good Intention to do the King Service, for as soon as they found that their Fellow-Commissioners were resolv'd Men, and that there was no going back if they sat longer, they deserted the Commission, and appear'd no more among the Commissioners, as the Lord Mounson, Lord Grey, Sir John Danvers, Col. Lassells, Col. Harvey, Sir James Harrington, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir Henry Mildmay, Henry Wallop, Esq; Thomas Challoner, Esq; Mr. Fry, Mr. Dove; though Echard assures us, the Lord Grey of Groby, Sir John Danvers, and both of the Temples, stay'd to the last of the Trial, and sat when Sentence was given.

On the 13th of January the High Court of Justice sat for the Trial of the King. The Names of the Commissioners being call'd over, High Court those that were absent were summon'd to make of Justice. their Appearance, which some of them evaded, and others, particularly Col. Rowland Wilson, positively deny'd. They agreed that the Place of Trial should be Westminster Hall, at the End where the Courts of Chancery and King's Bench are kept, both which were thrown into one, and the Term was adjourn'd 14 Days on account of the Preparation for the Trial. Some Members of the House of Commons mov'd, that the Ordinance for Adjournment of the Term should be sent up to the Lords for their Concurrence, but the Majority oppos'd it, as a waving of their own Authority, they having pass'd an Act for it without the Lords, who on the 18th of January sent down an Ordinance which they had pass'd, notwithstanding the Earl of Clarendon had put Locks and Padlocks on their Doors to shut them out of their House, to the Commons for their Concurrence. It was to the same Effect as to the Adjournment of the Term, but the Commons laid it aside; as this Ordinance was to forward the Trial of the King; and as the Lords sat after the High Court of Justice was at work, it shews that their Lordships would have continu'd to sit if the Commons would have let them, tho' they abhor'd all the Steps that were taken for putting the King to Death.

On the 19th of January the King was brought from Windsor to St. James's, by Order of the High Court, where Mr. Hugh Peters waited upon him; and his Majesty desiring one of his Chaplains might attend for his Satisfaction in some Scruples of Conscience, Dr. Juxon, Bishop of London, was order'd to go to him the next Day. Col. Tomlinson continu'd to command the Guard about his Majesty, who, as Echard writes, was a Man of better Breeding than Colonel Harrison, but behav'd with greater Rudeness and Barbarity. The Earl of Clarendon and the Archdeacon's Histories of the ensuing Tragedy, are so larded with Untruth and Libel, that it takes off much of the Horror which the bloody Action naturally excites. Echard introduces it with a State of the Nation, written by a considerable Writer, whose Name however he is asham'd of, and ought to have been asham'd of his Writing, made up of Presbyterians, Rebellion, Malignants, Rebels, Episcopacy, Rebellions, vilest Instruments, rotten Members, Traitors, Essex, Tower Hill, Covenant,

A. D. 1643. nant, Stalking Horse, Almanacks, Blasphemy, Sedition, Madness, City of London, Calvinism, Levites, Rabshakehs, Caterpillars, Locusts, &c. He says he writes down all these peaceable Things that he may take a little rest, though a sensible Man might as well sleep in a Hurricane.

Whitlocke.

On Saturday the 20th of January, the Commissioners of the High Court of Justice met in the Painted Chamber, and proceeded thence to the Court erected for them in Westminster Hall; the President, Sergeant Bradshaw, had the Sword carry'd before him by Col. Humphry, the Mace by Sergeant Dendy, and 20 Gentlemen attended as his Guard of Partizans, commanded by Col. Fox. After an O Yes, and Silence made, the Act of the Commons for sitting of the Court was read, an Act of no more Validity than if it had been made by the Clerk who read it, for those Commons were not the Parliament of England, no, not the House of Commons of England, the much greater Number of the Members being driven out, and kept out by the Soldiers. When the Court was call'd, 60 of the 150 Commissioners, appear'd and answer'd to their Names. The King was brought from St. James's to Whitehall, and from thence by Water, guarded by Musketeers in Boats, to Sir Robert Cotton's House near Westminster Hall, and from thence to the Bar of the Court, attended by Col. Tomlinson and Col. Hacker, the former afterwards knighted, and the latter hang'd in the next Reign. Thirty Officers and Gentlemen waited with Halberts behind his Majesty's Chair of Crimson Velvet within the Bar. The Commissioners were all cover'd, and so remain'd. The King also kept his Hat on, and paid no Reverence to these pretended Judges, most of whom, as Soldiers, were wont to wear Helmets and Head-pieces, but now they charg'd their Sovereign bare fac'd, arm'd with the Civil and Military Power of England, which they so highly abus'd and dishonour'd, putting the most daring Affront on the very Name of Justice: Echard assures us, that the President Bradshaw was so afraid of being knock'd on the Head, notwithstanding his two Guards of Partizans, and Halberdiers, and 3 or 4000 Horse and Foot surrounding the Hall of Justice, that he wore a thick high Crown'd Beaver Hat, lin'd with plated Steel, to ward off Blows, and that this Hat, as much a Nonentity as it apparently is, is kept as a Rarity in the Museum in Oxford, as well to shew the Sagacity as the Loyalty of that famous University. This high crown'd Hat did not at all become his scarlet Robe, his crimson Velvet Chair of State, his Desk before it with a crimson Velvet Cushion, prepar'd for his judicious Loll, the like of which I have seen in other Places, as Emblems of Authority and Gravity. The Judges knew full well that the King would not submit to such an illegal Tribunal. They knew if he had submitted it would have been of no use to him; for if he had escap'd with Life, that insolent and tyrannical Attempt to try him for it, could not have gone off with Impunity. They had, it is true, got Witnesses enough to prove the King had been in several Actions where much Blood was spilt, and no doubt there were Thousands who could prove, that they had seen him in Arms at Edgehill, Brentford, Newbury, Naseby, &c. But that was not the Case, if the King began the War, of which they were not, and could not be proper Judges, being all of them Parties; he was not then accountable to that Court. If he did not begin the War, every Action which he was in was in his own Defence, and the Blood shed not to be laid at his Door. Instead of talking reasonably upon it, the Earl of Clarendon, Sir Roger Manly, and Archdeacon Echard, declaim in the Stile of the Fish-Market, Rogues, Rebels, Hellish Rogues, Incarnate Devils, Pettifoggers, Brewers, Carmen, Cobblers, Goldsmiths, Impudent, Execrable, Impious, Nonsense, Imperious, Impiously Impious, Barbarians, Miscreants, Butchers, Bloody Keepers and Slaughterers, Enthusiasticks, Fanaticks, and a great deal more of it, with such a Confusion of Rage and Ribaldry, as turn this truly tragical Scene, which plainly told dissolves the most obdurate Mind with Compassion and Tenderness, into railing and raving. To shew a just Resentment is natural, but to bellow and foam at the Mouth shews that these Men had some other Wound besides that which was given the Publick. I shall follow Whitlocke's Relation of the King's Trial, who must be better acquainted with it than any one of these Historians.

The President made a short Speech to the King, acquainting him with the Cause of his bringing thither in order to his Trial, upon a Charge against him by the Commons of England, which was then to be read, and his Majesty to give his Answer to it. The King offer'd to speak before reading of the Charge. And when Mr. Broughton the Clerk began to read it, his Majesty interrupted him, saying, I am not intrusted by my People; they are mine by Inheritance, as Ludlow words it, who was present, but it is an odd way of wording it; and if one was Heir to Cattle or Swine it could not be more coarsely worded. After this Interruption the Charge was read, by which he was charg'd by the "Name of Charles Stuart, King of England, as guilty of all the Blood that had been shed at Keinton, Brentford, Newbury, and other Places where he had been present in Arms against the Parliament, and other Particulars very large." The King paus'd at the Reading of the Charge, and after it was read, demanded of the President, "By what lawful Authority he was brought thither." He was answer'd, as Harry Marten now directed, "In the Name and Authority of the Commons in Parliament assembled, and the good People of England." Cromwel had told the Commissioners, that the King would certainly make that Demand, and Marten immediately help'd them to that Answer. The King reply'd, "He saw no Lords there, which should make a Parliament, including the King." He agreed, "That the Kingdom of England was Hereditary and Successive, and he should betray his Trust if he acknowledg'd or made Answer to them, for that he was not convinc'd that they were a lawful Authority." As most true it is, they were not, and the King could not acknowledge them without betraying his Trust. Besides, he had as good have pleaded Guilty as have pleaded at all, for plead or not plead he was sure to be condemn'd and to suffer, and this Formality of a Trial was an Aggravation of the Injustice and Barbarity. The President having requir'd his Majesty again and again to answer, and being always refus'd, as the Court expected, the King was remanded to Sir Robert Cotton's House, and thence to St. James's; while Cromwel and his Companions went to Whitehall to keep a Fast together, which most of them must do with the greatest Impiety and Hypocrisy; for though probably Ludlow, Scroop, and other Republicans, might really believe what they had voted to be true, that the Original of just Power was in the People, and that the Arguments us'd by Milton were sufficient to satisfy their Consciences, I say, tho' in this case Commonwealth's Men might be so far deluded, as to think they were

A. D. 1645. were doing a solemn Act of Justice, and that it was their Duty to implore the Assistance and Blessing of the Almighty, yet Cromwell and his Emissaries, who were no Commonwealth's Men, must be the greatest Hypocrites that ever dissembled with God and Man, in praying for the abolishing of what they call'd one Tyranny, on Purpose to set up a worse in the Place of it.

Before Cook the Solicitor began to read the Charge, the King held up his Cane, and laid it softly upon Cook's Shoulder three Times, bidding him Hold; and before that, when the Names of the Commissioners were to be call'd over, the First in the Act being the Lord Fairfax, and no Answer made, he was call'd again, when a shrill Voice from one of the Boxes where the Ladies were, was heard, saying, He has more Wit than to be here; and afterwards when the Charge was read, In the Name of all the good People of England, the same Voice cry'd, No not the tenth Part of them, which I believe was true. This surpriz'd and offended both the Court and Officers, who order'd Inquisition to be made whence and from whom was that Voice, threatening to shew their Resentment, but not to let fly at the Lady, as Echard and other such Writers affirm. Upon Inquiry, it was found to be the General's Wife, the Lady Fairfax, who spoke thus, and she was perswaded to leave the Place after having given such Offence. Manly informs us she said the tenth Part only, Echard that it was the hundredth. He cannot help magnifying and diminishing, as he fancies it is for the Glory of his Cause. The King leaning on his Cane, the Head made of Gold fell off on a sudden, which it might very well do by his Majesty's leaning upon it with more Weight than usual, considering what Attention he might give to the Proceedings of the Court; and yet Echard tells us that Incident made so great Impression on the King's Mind, that he could not help discovering it to Bishop Juxon, and neither he nor the Bishop could discover how it happen'd, tho' methinks the Discovery was not very difficult. The Reverend Historians take Notice of the falling off of the Top of his Majesty's Cane, and tell us that the Commonwealth's Men were so brutal, none of 'em would stir to take it up, which he was forced to do himself. Another notorious Falstie! For Lilly, who was then present, says, I saw the Top of his Staff unexpectedly fall off to the Ground, which was taken up by Mr. Rushworth. It was urged to the King, when he insisted so much on the Authority of the Court, "That the Commons assembled in Parliament could acknowledge no other Sovereign but God, for that upon his and the People's Appeal to the Sword for the Decision of their respective Pretensions, Judgment had been given for the People, who conceiv'd it to be their Duty not to bear the Sword in vain, and had appointed this Court to make Inquisition for the Blood that had been shed in this Dispute."

On Monday the 22d of January the Court met again, and Mr. Cook, Solicitor General, mov'd, "That whereas the Prisoner had refus'd to make Answer to the Charge against him; That now he might be directed to make a positive Answer, either by Way of Confession or Negation; which if he shall refuse to do, That the Matter of the Charge might be taken pro Confesso, and the Court might proceed according to Justice." The President then requir'd the King to answer to the Charge against him by the Commons of England. The King confess'd, "When he was last here he made Question of their Authority, and should have

A. D. 1645. satisfy'd himself with the Protestation he then made against the Legality of the Court." But he said, "It was not his Case alone that he stood for, but the Freedom of all the People of England; for if they without Law may make or alter Law, no Subject can be safe for his Life, or any thing that he calls his own." Then he said, "He would give his Reasons why in Conscience, and the Duty he ow'd to God first, and his People next, for the Preservation of their Lives, Liberties, and Estates, he conceiv'd he could not answer, till he were satisfy'd of the Legality of it."

President. "Sir, I must interrupt you, which I would not do, but that what you say is not agreeable to the Proceedings of any Court: You appear as a Prisoner before this Court, and are not to dispute their Authority, but to give a punctual Answer to the Charge."

King. "Sir, By your Favour, I do not know the Forms of Law; I do know Law and Reason: Though I am no Lawyer profess'd, but I know as much Law as any Gentleman in England; and therefore, under Favour, I do plead for the Liberties of the whole People of England more than you do; and therefore if I should impose a Belief upon any without Reasons given for it, it were unreasonable; but I must tell you, that by the Reason that I have, as thus informed, I cannot yield unto it."

President. "Sir, I must interrupt you; you may not be permitted: You speak of Law and Reason, it is fit there should be Law and Reason, and there is both against you. Sir, the Vote of the House of Commons in Parliament is the Reason of the Kingdom, by Law you should have rul'd and reign'd. Sir, you are not to dispute our Authority: You are told it again by the Court. Sir, it will be taken Notice of that you stand in Contempt, and your Contempt will be recorded."

King. "I do not know a King can be a Delinquent; let me tell you they may put in Demurrers against any Proceedings as legal; and I demand that, and to be heard with my Reasons. If you deny that, you deny Reason."

President. Sir, you have offer'd nothing to the Court. I shall speak something to you, the Sense of the Court. Sir, neither you, nor any Man, are permitted to dispute that Point: You are concluded, you must not demur to the Jurisdiction of the Court: If you do, I must let you know, that they over-rule your Demurrer. They sit here by the Authority of the Commons of England, and all your Predecessors and you are responsible to them."

King. "I deny that, shew me one Precedent."

President. "You ought not to interrupt while the Court is speaking to you. This Point is not to be debated by you, neither will the Court permit you to do it. If you offer it by Way of Demurrer to the Jurisdiction of the Court, they have consider'd of their Jurisdiction, and do affirm their own Jurisdiction."

King. "I say, by your Favour, that the Commons of England were never a Court of Judicature: I would know how they came to be so."

President. "Sir, You are not permitted to go on in that Speech and these Discourses."

Then the Clerk of the Court read this aloud:

"Charles Stuart, King of England, you have been accus'd on the Behalf of the People of England

A. D. 1647. " England of High Treason, and other Crimes ;
" the Court have determin'd that you ought to " answer the same.

King. " I will answer the same as soon as I " know by what Authority you do this.

President. " If this be all you will say, then " Gentlemen, you that brought the Prisoner,
" take Charge of him back again.

King. " I do require that I may give in my " Reasons why I do not answer, and give me
" Time for that.

President. " 'Tis not for Prisoners to re" quire.

King. " Prisoners, Sir, I am not an ordinary " Prisoner.

President. " The Court hath consider'd of " their Jurisdiction, and they have already af-" firm'd their Jurisdiction. If you will not an" swer, we shall give Order to record your De" fault.

King. " You never heard my Reasons yet.

President. " Sir, your Reasons are not to be " heard against the highest Jurisdiction.

King. " Shew me what Jurisdiction, where " Reason is not to be heard ?

President. " We shew it you here, The Com" mons of England ; and the next Time you are " brought you will know more of the Pleasure " of the Court, and it may be their final Deter" mination.

King. " Shew me wherever the House of " Commons were a Court of Judicature of that " kind ?

President. " Serjeant, take away the Pri" soner.

King. " Well, Sir, remember that the King " is not suffer'd to give in his Reasons for the " Liberty and Freedom of all his Subjects.

President. " Sir, you are not to have Liberty " to use this Language. How great a Friend
" you have been to the Laws and Liberties of " the People, let all England and the World
" judge.

King. " Sir, under Favour, it was for the Li" berty, Freedom, and Laws of the Subject,
" that ever I took to defend my self with Arms ;
" I never took up Arms against the People, but " for the Laws.

President. " The Command of the Court
" must be obey'd ; no Answer will be given to " the Charge.

King. " Well, Sir.

Then the Officers guarded the King back again to Sir Robert Cotton's House.

As he went out of the Court down the Stairs, he said, He was not so much troubled for any of the Blood that had been shed, as for the Blood of one innocent Man, the Earl of Strafford.
Indeed his Majesty had not so great Concern upon him on that score as he gave out, especially if what we are told is true, that having receiv'd a List of the Slain at Edgehill Fight, some Days after at Oxford he call'd for a Comedy of Ben.
Johnson's.

Westminster-Hall was very much crowded every Day of the King's Trial, and some who sat on the Scaffolds did not forbear to exclaim aloud at the Proceedings of the Court, and the irreverent Usage of the King by his Subjects, insomuch that the Court was interrupted, and the Officers and Soldiers had much to do to quiet the Ladies and others. It was indeed a preposterous Business, which could not be seen without Indignation, Bradshaw perpetually commands the King to answer, the King perpetually refuses it. Bradshaw knew his Majesty would not and could not own the Authority of an unlawful Court, and the King knew it would signify nothing as to his Safety if he had own'd it.

The next Day, January 23. the High Court of Justice sat again, and Mr. Cook the Solicitor mov'd, " That whereas the Prisoner, instead of " giving Answer to the Charge against him, did " still dispute the Authority of the Court ; That " according to Law, if a Prisoner shall stand as " contumacious in Contempt, and shall not give " an issuable Plea, Guilty or Not Guilty, where" by he may come to a fair Trial, that as by " an implicit Confession it may be taken pro
" Confesso, as it hath been done to those who " deserved more Favour than the Prisoner, and " that therefore speedy Judgment be pronounced " against him.

President. " Sir, you have heard what is mo" ved by the Council in Behalf of the Kingdom
" against you. Sir, you may well remember ;
" and if you do not, the Court cannot forget,
" what dilatory Dealing the Court hath found at " your Hands. You were to propound some " Questions ; you had our Resolution upon " them. You were told over and over again,
" that the Court did affirm their own Jurisdi" ction ; that it was not fit for you, nor for " any other Man, to dispute the Jurisdiction of " the supreme and highest Authority of Eng- " land, from which there is no Appeal, and " touching which there must be no Dispute ;
" yet you did persist in such Carriage as you gave
" no manner of Obedience, nor did you acknow" ledge any Authority in them, nor the high " Court that constituted this Court of Justice.
" Sir, I must let you know from the Court, that " they are very sensible of these Delays of yours,
" and that they ought not, being thus authoriz'd
" by the supreme Court of England, to be thus " trifled withal ; and that they might in Justice,
" if they pleas'd, and according to the Rules of " Justice, take Advantage of these Delays, and " proceed to pronounce Judgment against you.
" Yet nevertheless they are pleas'd to give Di" rections, and on their Behalf I do require you,
" that you make a positive Answer to this Charge " that is against you. Sir, in plain Terms, (for " Justice knows no Respect of Persons) you are
" to give your positive and final Answer in plain " English, whether you are guilty or not " guilty of these Treasons laid to your " Charge.

King. (After a little Pause) " When I was " here Yesterday, I desir'd to speak for the Li" berties of the People of England ; I was in" terrupted : I desire to know yet whether I " may speak freely or not ?

President. " You have had the Resolution of " the Court upon the like Question the last Day,
" and you were told, that having such a Charge
" of so high a Nature against you, your Work " was, that you ought to acknowledge the Juris" diction of the Court, and to answer your " Charge. Sir, if you answer to your Charge,
" which the Court gives you leave now to do,
" tho' they might have taken Advantage of your " Contempt, yet if you be able to answer your " Charge, when you have once answer'd, you " shall be heard at large, make the best Defence
" you can. But, Sir, I must let you know from " the Court as their Command, that you are not " to be permitted to issue out into any other Dis" courses till such Time as you have given a po" sitive Answer concerning the Matter that is " charg'd upon you.

A. D.
1647.

A. D.
1643.

King. "For the Charge, I value it not a Rush: It is the Liberty of the People of England that I stand for; for me to acknowledge new Laws that I never heard of before. I that am your King, that should be an Example to all the People of England, to uphold Justice, to maintain the old Laws: Indeed I do not know how to do it. You spoke very well the first Day I came here on Saturday, of the Obligations that I had laid upon me by God to the Maintenance of the Liberties of my People; the same Obligation you spoke of, I do acknowledge to God that I owe to him and to my People, to defend, as much as in me lies, the ancient Laws. Therefore until that I may know that this is not against the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, by your Favour, I can put in no particular Answer. If you will give me Time, I will shew you my Reasons why I cannot do it, and thus ———"

Here being interrupted, he said,

"By your Favour, you ought not to interrupt me. How I came here I know not, there's no Law for it, to make your King your Prisoner. I was in a Treaty upon the publick Faith of the Kingdom, that was the known ——— Two Houses of Parliament, that was the Representative of the Kingdom; and when that I had almost made an End of the Treaty, then I was hurried away, and brought hither, and therefore ———"

Here the President said,

"Sir, you must know the Pleasure of the Court.

King. "By your Favour, Sir ———"

President. "Nay, Sir, by your Favour, you must not be permitted to fall into these Discourses, you appear as a Delinquent, you have not acknowledg'd the Authority of the Court, the Court craves it not of you; but once more they command you to give your positive Answer. Clerk, do your Duty.

King. "Duty, Sir! ———"

Then the Clerk read a Paper, requiring the King to give a positive and final Answer, by Way of Confession or Denial of the Charge.

King. "Sir, I say again to you, so that I might give Satisfaction to the People of England of the Clearness of my Proceedings, not by Way of Answer, nor in this Way, but to satisfy them that I have done nothing against that Trust that hath been committed to me, I would do it; but to acknowledge a new Court against their Privileges, to alter the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, Sir, you must excuse me.

President. "This is the third Time that you have publicly disavow'd this Court, and put an Affront upon it; but how far you have preserv'd the Liberties of the People, your Actions have spoke it: But truly, Sir, Mens Intentions ought to be known by their Actions, you have written your Meaning in bloody Characters throughout the Kingdom. But, Sir, you understand the Pleasure of the Court. Clerk, record the Default. And, Gentlemen, you that took the Charge of the Prisoner, take him back again.

King. "I will say this one Word more to you: If it were my own Particular, I would not say any more to interrupt you.

President. "Sir, you have heard the Pleasure of the Court, and you are (notwithstanding you will not understand it) to find that you are before a Court of Justice.

A. D.
1643.

Then the King went forth with his Guards, the People crying Justice, Justice, to Sir Robert Cotton's House, where he lay, and the Commissioners adjourn'd to the Painted Chamber, which was their usual Place of Meeting.

On the 24th of January the High Court of Justice meeting again in the Painted Chamber, sent an Usher to Westminster-Hall to tell the People there assembled, that the Court was busied in examining Witnesses relating to the Charge against the King, and should not fit in Westminster-Hall that Day, but that all Persons appointed to be there were to appear on further Summons. Eckard very merrily describes the Witnesses, Wretched impertinent Fellows, of mean Condition and profligate Lives, scarce one of them a Gentleman. As for Instance, after his own List:

William Cuthbert of Pottrington in Holderness, Gent. William Brayne of Wixall in the County of Salop, Gent. Gyles Joyce of Wellington in the County of Salop, Gent. John Unison of Damorbham in the County of Wilts, Gent. John Moore of Cork in Ireland, Gent. Thomas Rawlins of Hanslope in the County of Bucks, Gent. Samuel Burden of Lineham in the County of Wilts, Gent. Henry Gooche of Gray's-Inn, Gent. &c.

But as the Facts to be prov'd were the King's being in Arms, does that wise Historian think the High Court of Justice could want Witnesses of all Qualities to prove them, after so many Battles and Sieges, wherein above 200000 Men were at several Times engag'd with him. No doubt they took the first that offer'd, and it was not a Work that Men of the most Honour would be forward in.

On the 25th of January the Court met again in the Painted Chamber, and examin'd Witnesses to prove the Setting up of the Standard by the King at Nottingham. The Witnesses were Robert Lacy Painter, Samuel Lawson Malster, Thomas Whittington Cordwainer, all of the Town of Nottingham; and several others swore, They saw the King in several Fights with his Sword drawn. What Eckard tells us of the Consultation about the Manner of the King's Death, is both false and incredible: Some were for hanging, drawing, and quartering; some for hanging him in his Crown and Robes. I can't imagine where he pick'd up such pitiful Materials for his Historiography. His Invention is too poor to furnish it, as wretched as it is, and there is not a Word of it in all the Writers I have met with.

On the 26th of January the Council publish'd the Heads of the Charge against the King, to prepare People to receive the Sentence they had resolv'd to pronounce the next Day. 'Twas express'd thus:

"That Charles Stuart being admitted King of England, and therein intrusted with a limited Power to govern by and according to the Laws of the Land, and not otherwise; and by his Trust being obliged, as also by his Oath and Office, to use the Power committed to him for the Good and Benefit of the People, and for the Preservation of their Rights and Privileges;

"Yet nevertheless, out of a wicked Design to erect and uphold himself in an unlimited tyrannical Power to rule according to his Will, and to overthrow the Rights and Liberties of the People, yea, to take away and make void the Foundations thereof, and of all Redress and Remedy of Misgovernment, which
"by

A. D. 1645. " by the fundamental Constitution of this Kingdom, were reserved on the People's Behalf; in the Right and Powers of frequent and successive Parliaments as national Meetings in Council.

" He the said Charles Stuart, for Accomplishment of his Designs, and for the protecting of himself and his Adherents in his and their wicked Practices, to the same Ends hath traitorously and maliciously levy'd War against the present Parliament, and the People therein represented, then they nam'd Nottingham, Beverley, and other Places where Fights were. And then go on;

" That he hath caused and procured many Thousands of the free People of the Nation to be slain, and by Divisions, Parties and Insurrections within this Land, and by Invasions from foreign Parts endeavour'd and procur'd by him, and by many other evil Ways and Means. His giving Commissions to his Son the Prince, and other REBELS and Revolters both English and Foreigners, and to the Earl of Ormond, and to the Irish REBELS and Revolters associated with him, from whence further Invasions upon this Land are threaten'd, upon the Procurement, and on the Behalf of the said Charles Stuart.

" All which wicked Designs, and evil Practices of him the said Charles Stuart, have been, and are carry'd on for the advancing and upholding of the personal Interest of his Will and Power, and pretended Prerogative to himself and Family, against the publick Interest, common Right, Liberty, Justice and Peace, of the People of this Nation, by and for whom he was entrusted as aforesaid; by all which it appeareth, that he the said Charles Stuart hath been, and is the Occasioner, Author and Contriver of the said unnatural, cruel and bloody Wars, and therein guilty of all the Treasons, Murders, Rapines, Burnings, Spoils, Defolations, Damages and Mischief to this Nation, acted or committed in the said Wars, or occasioned thereby.

Upon this Charge, and the King's Default of Plea being recorded, Solicitor Cook demanded of the Court, that they would proceed to Judgment, accordingly the Matter came into Debate in the Painted Chamber, and after some Arguments pro and con, it was resolved there, That the King as a Tyrant, Traytor, Murderer, and a publick Enemy, should be condemned to Death, by severing his Head from his Body; and this Sentence was order'd to be engross'd, that it might be read the next and last Day of the Trial.

King
condemn'd.

On the 27th of January the High Court of Justice sat in Westminster Hall; the President, for the greater State of the Business array'd in Scarlet. Echard, and the common Writers take the Robe to be put on as a Symbol of the bloody Sentence, as if Bradshaw had been honest enough to have thought there was more Blood in it than in other Sentences of Death; the Commissioners were for the most part in their best Array, and after they were call'd over, about 68 then present, the King came in with his former Attendance, and in his wonted Posture, with his Hat on. As he past by into the Hall a Cry was made, Justice, Justice, Execution, Execution, by some Soldiers and others of the Rabble. His Majesty desir'd to be heard. The President answer'd, that he must hear the Court, and then declar'd their Intentions to proceed against the Prisoner, but offer'd that he might speak so it were not Matter of

Debate. The King said, A hasty Judgment was not soon recall'd. The President enumerated the Prisoner's several Contempts and Defaults. Yet notwithstanding they did allow he should be heard what he had to say in defence of himself, as to the Charge against him; his Majesty reply'd, "If he had any Respect to his Life more than to the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject, he certainly should have made a particular Defence, for by that at least he might have delay'd an ugly Sentence which he believ'd would pass upon him. But now having something to say that concerns both, he desir'd before Sentence to be heard in the Painted Chamber before the Lords and Commons: He insisted that this Delay could not be prejudicial to them. And if they refus'd this he protested, that those fair Shews of Liberty and Peace were pure Shews, and that they would not hear their King. Bradshaw told him, That this was declining the Jurisdiction of the Court which was supreme, and tended to set up another, or a co-ordinate Jurisdiction, in Derogation of the Power whereby the Court sat, and to the manifest Delay of their Justice." The King answer'd, That if he did not say any Thing before the Houses, but what was for the Peace of the Kingdom, and Liberty of the Subject, then the Shame should be his." The King's vehement urging of this Point, which Ludlow intimates, was with Design to resign his Kingdom to his Son, had such effect upon the Court, particularly Colonel Downs, Col. Harvey, Col. Walton, and Mr. Cawley, that they prevail'd with them to adjourn to the Court of Wards, and consider his Majesty's Proposal. Col. Downs there objected against the Validity of the Witnesses, according to Echard's most authentick Memoirs, as if Witnesses could possibly be wanting for Facts done in the Face of 20 or 30000 Men; but Cromwell brow-beats him, and threaten'd him with favouring his old Master. Several of the Commissioners press'd to satisfy the King's Desire, and give him a Hearing in the Painted Chamber, but it was carry'd in the Negative by the major Vote; upon which Col. Harvey, Lord Mounson, and others before-mentioned, went away in discontent, and never sat with them afterwards. When the Commissioners return'd to the Court in Westminster Hall, the King was told, that they could not agree to his Demand. "That they were met there as a Court of Justice commissioned by the Parliament, of whose Authority they were fully satisfy'd, that by their Commission they were not authoris'd to receive any Proposals from him, but to proceed to the Trial of him. That in order thereto his Charge had been read to him, to which if he had pleaded, the Council for the Commonwealth were ready to prove it against him. That he had thrice demurr'd to the Jurisdiction of the Court, which Demurrer the Court had over-rul'd and register'd, in order to proceed against him as if he had confess'd the Charge, and that if he had any Propositions to make, it was proper for him to address to the Parliament, and not to them." His Majesty insisted on his former Desire. "He confess'd it was a Delay, but a Delay of very great Importance for the Peace of the Kingdom, which he look'd upon as much as his own Person, therefore he requir'd them, as they would answer it at the dreadful Day of Judgment, that they would consider it once again." Bradshaw reply'd, "They had consider'd it fully already, and were ready to proceed to Sentence if he had nothing more to say."

A. D. 1643. "say." The King answer'd, That he had nothing more to say, and desir'd what he said might be enter'd. I have by me the Argument which Cook the Solicitor had prepar'd in case the King had pleaded; and though I know little of Law Matters, yet I can see plain enough there is as much Law Learning in it as the Subject would bear, and as much forcible Eloquence as in any of the Speeches in the History of the Grand Rebellion, which was made by the Historian, who speaks very contemptibly of Cook not only as he was the Parliament's Lawyer, but as he was a Lawyer. The Subject is indeed shocking and terrifying to the last Degree, but it will serve to shew how wicked Men may become, even in Judgment as well as Interest and Passion.

It begins thus,

Coke's Answer to the King's Plea.

May it please your Lordship,
M<sup>T</sup> Lord President, and this High Court, erected for the most comprehensive, impartial, and glorious Piece of Justice, that ever was acted and executed on the Theatre of England, for the Trying and Judging of Charles Stuart, whom God in his Wrath gave to be a King to this Nation, and will, I trust, in great Love, for his notorious Prevarications and Blood-guiltiness, take him away from us.

The horrid Impiety of it makes one tremble, and there is nothing can reconcile one to the hearing of it, but the reflecting that in a few Pages more we shall find the Man who speaks it brought to Account himself for this Wickedness, and receiving his Reward.

As this must be far from a delightful Subject to moderate Persons, so I shall insert but little of it. He proceeds,

Before I speak of the War it will be necessary for the Satisfaction of rational Men, to open and prove the King's wicked Design, wherewith he stands charged. Now that he had from the Beginning of his Reign such a Design and Endeavour so to tear up the Foundations of Government, that Law should be no Protection to any Man's Person or Estate will clearly appear by what follows.

By his not taking the Oath so fully as his Predecessors did, that so when the Parliament should tender good Laws to him for the Royal Assent, he might readily answer, that he was not oblig'd by Oath to confirm, or corroborate the same.

By his dishonourable and perfidious Dealing with his People at his Coronation, when he set forth a Proclamation, that in Regard of the Infection then spread through the Kingdom, he promis'd to dispense with those Knights that by an old Statute were to attend at the Coronation, who were thereby requir'd not to attend, but did notwithstanding in a few Months after take the Advantage of their Absence, and rais'd a vast Sum of Money out of their Estates at the Council Table, where they pleading the said Proclamations for their Justification, they were answer'd, that the Law of the Land was above any Proclamation, like that Tyrant, who when he could not by Law execute a Virgin, commanded her to be deflower'd and then put to Death.

By his altering the Commissions and Patents to the Judges, who having heretofore had their Places granted to them so long as they should well behave themselves therein; he made them but during Pleasure, that so if the Judges should not declare the Law to be as he would have it, he might remove them, and put in such as should not only say but swear, if need were, that the Law was as the King would have it. A. D. 1643.

At the Close he says,

Upon all which Premises, May it please your Lordship, I do humbly demand and pray the Justice of the High Court; and yet not I, but the innocent Blood that hath been shed in the three Kingdoms demands Justice against him. The Blood is vocal, and cries aloud, &c.

For my self, I blefs God, I have not so much Fear as comes to the thousandth Part of a Grain. It is for a Cain to be afraid, that every Man that meets him will slay him. I am not much solicitous whether I die of a Consumption or by the Hand of Ravilliac's, I leave that to my heavenly Father; If it be his Will that I shall fall by the Hands of Violence, it is the Lord, let him do what he pleaseth. If my Indentures be given in before the Time of my Apprenticeship be expir'd, and I be at my Father's House before it be Night, I am sure there is no Hurt in all this. If I have but so much Time left, I shall pray my Father to forgive the Murderer; the Blood of Christ can wash away Sins of the deepest Stain: But know this, ye that have contriv'd any desperate Intentions against those honourable Justices, who have made you Free-men, unless you will return to Egypt; if God in Wrath to you and Love to any of his People should suffer you to imbrue your Hands in any of their innocent Blood, either you will repent or not; if you repent, it will cost you ten Times more Anguish and Grief of Heart than the Pleasure of the Sin can cause Delight; if you repent not, it had been better for you, you had never been born, &c.

The President as usual made a Speech before passing Sentence, which Echard, so good a Judge of such Things, says, was long and insolent, that he misapply'd Law and History, taking up and wresting whatever he thought fit for his Purpose. I do verily believe he has so done, but I do say the Archdeacon knows too little of History or Law to be a proper Judge of it. Ludlow, who heard the Speech, writes thus of it.

"Then the President enlarg'd upon the horrid President
"Nature of those Crimes of which he had been Brad-"accus'd, and was now convicted, declaring shaw's "that the only just Power of Kings was deriv'd Speech "from the Consent of the People, that whereas when he
"the People had invited him to see their Laws, pronounc'd "put in Execution, he had endeavour'd through- Sentence "out the whole Course of his Reign, to subvert against the
"those good Laws, and to introduce an arbitra- King.
"ry, tyrannical Government in the Room of "them; That to cut off all Hopes of Redress,
"he had attempted from the Beginning of his "Reign, either wholly to destroy Parliaments,
"or to render them only subservient to his own
"corrupt Designs; that though he had consent"ed, the publick Necessities so requiring, that "this Parliament should not be dissolv'd, but by "an Act of themselves, he had levied War against "them, that he might not only dissolve them,
"but by the Terror of his Power for ever dis"courage such Assemblies from doing their Du"ty. That in this War many Thousands of the "good People of England had lost their Lives;
"that in Obedience to what God commanded,
"and the Nation expected, the Parliament had "appointed this Court to make Inquisition for "this Blood, and to try him for the same: That
"this

A. D. 1647. "his Charge had been read to him, and he requir'd to give an Answer to it, which he having thrice refus'd to do, he acquainted him that the Court would proceed to Sentence." The President said further in his Speech, "That by Law Kings were accountable to their People, and to the Law, which was their Superior; and he instanc'd in several Kings who had been depos'd and imprison'd by their Subjects, especially in the King's native Country, where, of 109 Kings, most were depos'd, imprison'd or proceeded against for Mis-government; and his own Grandmother remov'd, and his Father, an Infant, Crown'd. He exhorted him to think seriously of the Crimes of which he had been guilty, and to purge himself of them by Repentance." At the End of his Speech he commanded the Clerk, Mr. Phelps, to read the Sentence, which recited the Charge; for all which Treasons and Crimes, the Court does adjudge that he the said Charles Stuart, as a Tyrant, Traytor, Murderer, and publick Enemy, shall be put to Death by severing of his Head from his Body. Echard says, While the President was pronouncing this, which by the way he did not pronounce, the King was observ'd, with a sort of Smile, to lift up his Eyes to Heaven, as appealing to the Divine Majesty. He desir'd to be heard, but it would not be permitted, being after Sentence; and as he return'd through the Hall, there was another Cry, Justice and Execution. 'Tis very probable the Soldiers were set on by Lieutenant Colonel Axell, and other fierce Officers to make this Clamour, and that a Rabble was plac'd there on purpose; for 'tis most certain that the Nation in general abhorr'd this Action and the Actors; and I cannot write of it without Tremour; but it always naturally leads me to the melancholy Reflection on those proud avaritious Counsellors, who kept the King so many Days in contesting the Point of Bishops and Bishopricks at the Isle of Wight, as gave the Army Time to draw to a Rendezvous, and break off a Treaty, which if it had not been for that Contest, might have ended happily, long enough before Cromwel was at Leisure to interpose in it, and King and Parliament having come to an Agreement, and the Army it self being divided, the Soldiery must have comply'd with it. I detest this Injustice and Cruelty so much, that I can almost fall in with the Ribaldry and Rage of Echard, Manly, Sanderson, and other such Writers; and tho' they talk with equal Nonsense and Fury I can bear it at this Time, and throw aside Milton against Saumaise, as hating to hear even a Pretence to Sense and Reason upon a Subject which I think is not capable of it, a Way of judging which I will not observe in any other Case, and cannot indeed be allowable in any other. This is most true, that the most publick, earnest and unfeign'd Endeavours were us'd by the Presbyterians, and especially by their Ministers, to prevent the King's Trial and Death; and as Echard had the following History before him, in Dr. Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life, he shew'd his very great Candor and Sincerity in sinking of it, and is there in all Pagan History a Parallel for the Baseness, Ignorance and Ingratitude of those of his Brethren, who on the Anniversary for the King's Death, in Cathedrals and other Churches, charge the whole Body of the Presbyterians with the Guilt of it? Mr. Calamy and other Ministers waited on the Lord Fairfax, and earnestly solicited him to declare himself, and rescue the King; but his Trouble had so discompos'd him that he could not be argu'd with; and the Army carrying every Thing before them, the Ministers publish'd a Declaration, wherein they set forth,

A. D. 1647.

"That they appear'd at first for the Parliament, on the Propositions and Orders of the Lords and Commons, June the 10th, 1642, for bringing in of Money and Plate, wherein they were assur'd it should be no otherwise employ'd than to maintain the Protestant Religion, the King's Authority, his Person in his royal Dignity, the free Course of Justice, the Laws of the Land, the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Privileges of Parliament, against any Force which should oppose them. That they were wholly unsatisfy'd with the Proceedings, since the Exclusion and Imprisonment of the Members of the House of Commons, and held themselves bound in Duty to God and Religion, the King, Parliament and Kingdom, to profess before God, Angels and Men, that they verily believ'd the taking away the Life of the King in the Way of Trial, then depending, was not only not agreeable to any Word of God, the Principles of the Protestant Religion (never yet stain'd with the least Drop of the Blood of a King) or the fundamental Constitution of the Kingdom, but contrary to them; as also to the Oath of Allegiance, the Protestation of May 5, 1641: and the solemn League and Covenant; from all which or any of which Engagements, they knew not any Power on Earth able to absolve them or others. At last they warn'd and exhorted, in the Name of the great God, all that belong to their Charges and Ministry, to keep close to the Ways of God, the Rules of Religion, the fundamental Constitution, and Government of the Kingdom, not suffering themselves to be seduc'd from it, by being drawn to subscribe the late Models or Agreement of the People, which directly tended to subvert the fundamental Government, and to mourn bitterly for the Sins of all Degrees of Men, and beg of God that he would restrain the Violence of Men, that they might not dare to draw upon themselves and the Kingdom the Blood of their Sovereign." This was subscrib'd by, Cornelius Burges, D. D. William Gouge, D. D. Edmund Stanton, D. D. Thomas Temple, D. D. George Walker, Edmund Calamy, B. D. Their Ministers Declaration against his Death.

Of these all that are in Italick were turn'd out of their Livings as soon as this King's Son, Charles II. was restor'd; only for being Presbyterians, and most of the others were dead before it, or they had also met with the same Gratitude and Justice. One of them, Mr. Christopher Love, suffer'd Death for endeavouring that King's

A. D. 1647. Restoration; and another of them, Mr. William Jenkyns, was condemn'd for the same Endeavours, but repriev'd to die in Newgate afterwards, only for being a Presbyterian. And let us make our solemn Appeal to Posterity, what Sort of Mortals these must be, as to Sense, Charity and Humanity; for as to Religion, they can apparently be of none, that have past Sentence of Damnation in their Sermons, on all these Ministers and their Brethren, for killing this very King, whom with so much Boldness and Truth they labour'd to save: Here they publicly protested against the King's Trial, against the Agreement of the People, in Defiance of that victorious Army, who were Authors of both; and how they are thank'd for it we may hear every Thirtieth of January, not from Vicars and Curates only, in obscure Villages, but from Doctors and Dignitaries, in Cities and Universities, whose Knowledge or whose Conscience must be very extraordinary.

Whitlocke makes a judicious Reflection on the Behaviour of some Persons towards the King after Sentence. "Here we may take Notice of the abject Baseness of some vulgar Spirits, who seeing their King in that Condition, endeavour'd in their small Capacity, further to promote his Misery, that they might a little curry Favour with the present Powers:" Some of the very same Persons were afterwards as clamorous for Justice against those that were the King's Judges, as his Majesty foretold they would be, when they cry'd Justice and Execution. The Judges of the High Court of Justice, who were present and stood up to shew their Assent, when Sentence past on the King, were:

Serjeant Bradshaw President, Lieutenant General Cromwel, Commissary General Ireton, Sir Hardress Waller, John Lisle, Esq; Sir John Bowcher, William Say, Esq; William Heveningham, Esq; Alderman Pennington, Henry Marten, Esq; Col. Purefoy, Col. Barkstead, Col. Thomlinson, John Blakiston, Esq; Gilbert Millington, Esq; Sir William Constable, Col. Ludlow, Col. Hutchinson, Sir Michael Livesey, Col. Titchburn, Col. Roe, Col. Scroop, Col. Dean, Col. Okey, Col. Hewson, Col. Goffe, Cornelius Holland, Esq; Col. Ingoldsby, John Carew, Esq; John Jones, Esq; Miles Corbet, Esq; Francis Allen, Esq; Peregrine Pelham, Esq; Daniel Blagrave, Esq; Col. Walton, Col. Harrison, Col. Whalley, Col. Pride, Col. Ewers, Sir Thomas Maleverer, Col. More, John Alured, Esq; Henry Smith, Esq; Humphry Edwards, Esq; Gregory Clement, Esq; Thomas Wogan, Esq; Sir Gregory Norton, Col. Ven, Alderman Scot, Alderman Andrews, William Carley, Esq; Col. Stapely, Col. Downs, Col. Horton, Col. Hammond, Nicholas Love, Esq; Vincent Potter, Esq; Augustus Garland, Esq; John Dixswell, Esq; Symon Mayne, Esq; Col. Fleetwood, Col. *J. The Author of the History of the Rebellion, to make these poor Wretches poorer than they were, upbraids them with their Obscurity, and says the King knew but two of all his Judges before the Troubles, Sir John Danvers, and Sir Henry Mildmay. He cannot help it, though the Speaking Truth here could not much mend the Matter. The Lord Mounson and Mr. Holland were his Domestick Servants before the Troubles: And Larry tells us, that Mounson, the Lord Grey of Groby, and Danvers, did not sit the last Day of the Trial.

A. D. 1648. I have often wonder'd why it was that his Majesty made Choice of Dr. Juxon, Bishop of London, to assist him in his Devotions, when he was preparing for Death, having such able Men as Dr. Sanderfon and Dr. Hammond among his Chaplains. Whatever Discourses I have met with of Dr. Juxon's, seem to me the most cold and lifeless; and in the last Hours there could not be too much Piety and Fervour. The Lord Clarendon and Mr. Echard do not overabound in such Sort of Sensibility, and therefore they speak as well of this Bishop's Devotion as of Bishop Usher's, or Bishop Hall's. But many Years after I had made this Observation; the Bishop of Salisbury's Memoirs told us, Juxon did the Duty of his Function with a dry Coldness, which could not raise the King's Thoughts; and Ludlow relates it still with more Contempt. Adjutant General Allen was sent to acquaint Dr. Juxon with the King's Condition, and Desires that he might attend him. The Doctor being altogether unprepar'd for such a Work, broke out into these Expressions; God save us, What a Trick is this, that I should have no more Warning, and I have nothing ready; but recollecting himself a little, he put on his Scarfe and his other Furniture, and went with him to the King, where having read the Common Prayer, and one of his old Sermons, Bishop Juxon administer'd the Sacrament to him, not for-on's Degetting to use the Words of the Confession set down in the Liturgy, inviting all those that with the truly repent to make their Confessions before the King. Congregation, tho' there was none present but the King and himself. If any Thing could give one Offence against the Use of that excellent Form, it would be this miserable Instance; that a grave Doctor and Bishop should have Recourse to the ordinary Form in the most extraordinary Case that ever happen'd in divine Worship, and when it was hardly possible for a thinking Man to consider the Condition his Majesty was in without pouring out his Soul to Almighty God in his Behalf. If General Ludlow tells us the Truth, this is the saddest Effect which the too common Use of a holy Thing ever produc'd.

The High Court of Justice appointed a Committee, Commissary General Ireton, Sir Hardress Waller, Col. Harrison, Col. Dean, and Col. Okey, to inspect the Posts about Whitehall, for a convenient Place for the Execution of the King, who having made their Report to them, it was agreed that a Scaffold should be erected for that Purpose near the Banqueting-House, and Orders given to cover it with Black. The same Day that Sentence past, Dr. Juxon preach'd the old Sermon Ludlow mentions, in the King's private Lodgings at Whitehall; and his Majesty would not admit any one to his Presence, except his Children, that he might not be disturb'd in his Contemplations. His Electoral Highness, the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earl of Lindsey, and Earl of Southampton, having got Leave, desir'd to see him, and came to his Bed-chamber Door, but was told by Mr. Herbert, his Groom, that his Majesty desir'd them not to take it ill, but he could not then see them. Two or three Historiographers inform us, that these noble Lords offer'd to lay down their Lives to save the King's; and I do verily believe these Lords would cheerfully have done it; though I cannot believe they ever offer'd it, as being too absurd for such Noblemen to offer what could not be accepted according to the Sense of the Men in Power; for the Death of an innocent cannot satisfy for the Crimes of a guilty Person, as they impudently and injuriously stil'd his Majesty.

Hist. In-
dep. p.

The Barbarity of the Treatment his Majesty met with is a Scandal to Christianity, and one would think 'twas impossible to make it worse than it was; yet the Writers on the same Side with Eckard have so done, at the Expence of Truth and Credibility. For some Nights, says one of 'em, a Guard of Soldiers was kept within his Chamber, who with talking, clinking of Pots, opening and shutting of the Door, and taking Tobacco there, (a Thing very offensive to the King's Nature) should keep him watching, that so by distemp'ring and amazing him with want of Sleep, they might the easier bring him to their Terms. From this worthy Author Eckard borrows the pretended Proposal of the Grande'es of the Army, who are feign'd to tender to the King a Paper Book on the 28th of January, with Promise of Life, and some Shadow of Regality, if he would subscribe it, and agree to Pass an Act of Parliament for keeping on foot this Army, with Power to recruit and increase it to 40000 Horse and Foot, &c. which being really never propos'd to him, there is no Need of repeating his Majesty's Answer. This faithful Historian says, The King lay at Whitehall the Day on which Sentence pass'd, and Sunday Night so near the Place appointed for the Separation of his Soul and Body, that he might hear every Stroke the Workmen gave on the Scaffold, where they wrought all Night. This was a new Device to mortify him; and this is the honest Way of Writing in the History of the Rebellion, Manley, &c. Whereas, in Truth, the King, as Eckard tells us, was remov'd to St. James's two or three Hours after Sentence; and Ludlow assures us, that the Banqueting House was not appointed for the Place where the Scaffold should be erected till the next Day, Monday the 29th of January. These Historiographers matter not either Probability nor Credibility, and the Archdeacon is Master of their Manner. Himself owns that the King and the Bishop of London were left by themselves in Acts of Devotion; but the Historian he copies from tells us, The Parliament appointed John Goodwin of Coleman-street, the Balaam of the Army, that curseth and blesteth for Hire, to be Superintendent both over King and Bishop, so that they could hardly speak a Word together without being overheard by the long schismatical Ears of black-mouth'd John. Tho' every Word of this too is false, yet the Politeness and Eloquence carries it off, and there being such a History written by so exact, so fine, and so orthodox an Author, there was no need of the History of the Rebellion, and but little of the Archdeacon's, whose Story about Col. John Cromwel's bringing another Paper-Book to Lieutenant General Oliver Cromwel from the States of Holland, to write what he would in it, to be confirm'd by King and Prince, if he would save his Majesty's Life, having no better Authority than the other Paper Book to the King, and being not within the Bounds of the Probable and Credible, shall be left where it is. The King's refusing the Prayers of Mr. Calamy, Mr. Vines, Mr. Caryl, Mr. Dell, and Mr. Goodwin, all whom he dismiss'd according to Eckard, is very grateful to him; and the laying the Burthen of his Conscience on Bishop Fuxon only, is recommended as a Piece of Christian Heroism. However, those Ministers, and all the Presbyterian Ministers, did pray for him, as they were in Duty bound, and particularly one Mr. Cawton, a Presbyterian Minister, pray'd for him so heartily, that the Grande'es threw him into Prison, and he has no Thanks for it from the Archdeacon.

The Interview between the King and his Children the Day before Execution is so moving, that there is not a tragick Scene in any Drama which can affect one like it. The Tendernefs of it is exquisite, and much easier to be conceiv'd, or to be felt, than to be express'd. They were not long together, but long enough to be near Dissolution in Grief and Tears. His Majesty kiss'd the Princess Elizabeth, and bad her remember to tell her Brother James, whenever she saw him, 'twas his Father's last Command, That he should no more look upon Charles as his eldest Brother only, but be obedient to him as his Sovereign; That they should love one another, and forgive their Father's Enemies. The King added, Sweetheart, you'll forget this. She reply'd, No never while I live shall I forget it; and pouring forth a Deluge of Tears, promis'd to write down the Particulars. The King took the Duke of Gloucester, then in the ninth Year of his Age, upon his Knee, saying, Sweetheart, now they will cut off thy Father's Head. Upon which Words the young Prince look'd very stedfastly on him: Mark, Child, what I say, they will cut off my Head, and perhaps make Thee King; but, mark what I say! you must not be a King so long as your Brothers Charles and James do live; for they will cut off your Brothers Heads when they can catch them, and cut off thy Head too at last; and therefore I charge you do not be made a King by them. The young Prince with a Sigh said, I will be torn to Pieces first. Which falling so unexpectedly from a Lad, made his Majesty rejoice exceedingly. The following Relation is what the Princess Elizabeth, then in the 14th Year of her Age, wrote down as she promis'd.

"What the King said to me the 29th of January, 1648. being the last Time I had the Happiness to see him. He was glad I was come, and altho' he had not Time to say much, yet somewhat he had to say to me which he had not to another, nor did he leave in Writing, because he fear'd their Cruelty was such, as that they would not have permitted him to write to me. He wish'd me not to grieve and torment my self for him, for that would be a glorious Death that he should die, it being for the Laws and Liberties of this Land, and for maintaining the true Protestant Religion. He bid me read Bishop Andrews's Sermons, Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, Bishop Laud's Book against Fisher, which would ground me against Popery. He told me he had forgiven all his Enemies, and hop'd God would forgive them also, and commanded me and all the rest of my Brothers and Sisters to forgive them. He bid me tell my Mother that his Thoughts had never stray'd from her, and that his Love should be the same to the last. Withal, he commanded me and my Brothers to be obedient to her, and bid me send his Blessing to the rest of my Brothers and Sisters, with Commendations to all his Friends. So after he had given me his Blessing, I took my Leave. Further, he commanded us all to forgive those People, but never to trust them, for they had been most false to him, and to those that gave them Power, and fear'd also to their own Souls, and desir'd me not to grieve for him, for he should die a Martyr, and that he doubted not but the Lord would settle his Throne upon his Son, and that we should be all happier than we could have expected to have been if he had liv'd; with many other Things which at present I cannot remember.

His Majesty said to the Duke of Gloucester as before, and commanded him to fear the Lord, and he would provide for him. He then gave them all his Jewels except the George he wore, kiss'd them, embrac'd them, and parted from them in an Emotion, which must affect every one with Sorrow something like it.

Warrant for Execution.

Fifty-nine or sixty of the Judges sign'd the Warrant for the King's Execution. They are the same who sat when Sentence pass'd, excepting William Heveningham, Esq; Alderman Pennington, Col. Thomlinson, Cornelius Holland, Esq; Francis Allen, Esq; Alderman Andrews, Col. Hammond, Nicholas Love, Esq; who were either absent, or refus'd to sign it. The Warrant was directed to Col. Francis Hacker, Col. Huncks, and Lieutenant Colonel Phayer, and to every of them. This Tragedy is interrupted in Echard with an idle Story told to him by a Yorkshire Woman, the Forgery of which is naked and undisguis'd. There was a Cabal of Papists and Anabaptists who met at one Wandesford's House in the City of London, to consult about the King's Execution. Rushworth the Historian and Lilly the Almanack-maker are the Heads of this Cabal, and they also sent a Paper Book to the King for him to subscribe, taking upon himself the Guilt of all the Bloodshed in the War; in which Case they, Lilly the Almanack-maker, Rushworth the Historian, and the Lord Baltimore more a Papist, would set him upon his Throne again. Tho' this Story is so very foolish, yet it is related by him with as much Gravity as if it was true. Is it not very likely that Lilly the Conjuror should be so weak as to pick out Wandesford's House, who was a Cavalier, to carry on such a Cabal in? And had not Rushworth 100 Friends in the City in whom they could confide, and in whose Houses they might have met? The Gentlewoman from whom he had this lamentable Tale dy'd in the Year 1705. and his Chronology is to confirm it.

tion of the King.

On the Morning of the dreadful Day, January the 30th, the King rose very early, and call'd up Mr. Herbert, who lay by his Bed-side on a Pallat. Bishop Juxon came to him some Time after, and perform'd Divine Service, reading the 27th of St. Matthew, the History of our Saviour's Passion. The King supposing it had been selected on Purpose, as his Majesty might well think, and not that the Bishop would take the Run of the Day on so extraordinary an Occasion, thank'd the Bishop for his seasonable Choice, but that Prelate undeceiv'd him; It was the Lesson appointed by the Calendar for the 30th of January. Having taken the blessed Sacrament, and had Notice by Col. Hacker, That it was Time to go to Whitehall, where his Majesty might have some further Time to rest, the King came out with the Bishop and Mr. Herbert about Ten a Clock. He walk'd thro' the Gardens into the Park, guarded with a Regiment of Foot and Partizans to Whitehall, several Gentlemen walking bare before him; Dr. Juxon follow'd next to him, and Col. Thomlinson had the Charge of him. They brought him to the Cabinet Chamber at Whitehall, where he remain'd some Time at his Devotion. There were two or three Dishes of Meat provided, if he had thought fit to have din'd, but he refus'd, having communicated just before, and about Twelve a Clock eat half a Manchet and drank a Glass of Claret. From thence he went with Dr. Juxon, Col. Thomlinson, Col. Hacker, and the Guards, through the Banqueting House, adjoining to which the Scaffold was erected. It was hung round with Black, the Floor cover'd with Black, and the Ax and Block laid in the Middle of it. Several Troops of Horse and Companies of Foot were posted on each Side of the Scaffold, and great Multitudes of People came to be Spectators. His Majesty look'd earnestly on the Block, and ask'd, If there was no Place higher, and, directing his Speech to Col. Thomlinson, and the Gentlemen on the Scaffold, spoke to this Effect: I shall be very little heard of any Body here, I shall therefore speak a Word or two to you here. Indeed I could hold my Peace very well, if I did not think that holding my Peace would make some Men think that I did submit to the Guilt as well as to the Punishment; but I think it is my Duty to God first, and to my Country, for to clear my self, both as an honest Man, and a good King, and a good Christian.

A. D.

I shall begin first with my Innocency: In Troth, I think it not very needful for me to insist long upon this, for all the World knows that I never did begin a War with the Two Houses of Parliament; and I call God to Witnes, to whom I must shortly make an Account, that I did never intend for to incroach upon their Privileges.

They began upon me: It is the Militia they began upon. They confess'd that the Militia was mine, but they thought it fit to have it from me; and to be short, if any Body will look to the Dates of Commissions, theirs and mine, and likewise to the Declarations, they will see clearly that they began these unhappy Troubles, not I.

So that as to the Guilt of these enormous Crimes that are laid against me, I hope in God that God will clear me of it; I will not, I am in Charity, God forbid that I should lay it upon the Two Houses of Parliament. There is no Necessity of either.

I hope they are free of this Guilt, for I do believe that ill Instruments between them and me have been the chief Cause of this Bloodshed; so that by Way of Speaking, as I find my self clear of this, I hope and pray God that they may too.

Yet for all this, God forbid that I should be so ill a Christian, as not to say that God's Judgments are just upon me. Many Times he does pay Justice by an unjust Sentence, that is ordinary. I only say this, that one unjust Sentence that I suffer'd for to take Effect, is now punished by an unjust Sentence upon me; that is, so far I have said to shew you that I am an innocent Man.

Now, for to shew you that I am a good Christian, I hope there is a good Man [Pointing to Dr. Juxon] that will bear me Witnes that I have forgiven all the World, and even those too in particular that have been the chief Causes of my Death. Who they are, God knows, I do not desire to know. I pray God forgive them.

But this is not all, my Charity must go farther; I wish that they may repent, for indeed they have committed a great Sin in that Particular. I pray God with St. Stephen, that this be not laid to their Charge; nay, not only so, but that they may take the right Way to the Peace of the Kingdom; for Charity commands me not only to forgive particular Men, but to endeavour to the last Gaspe the Peace of the Kingdom. So, Sirs, I do wish with all my Soul; and I do hope there is some here that will carry it further, that they may endeavour the Peace of the Kingdom.

Now, Sirs, I must shew you how you are out of the Way, and will put you in a Way. First, you are out of the Way, for certainly all the Way you ever have had yet, as I could find by any thing, is in the Way of Conquest.

Certainly

1648.

Certainly this is an ill Way, for Conquest, Sirs, in my Opinion, is ever just, either for Matter of Wrong, or just Title, and then if you go beyond it, the first Quarrel that you have to it, that makes it unjust at the End that was just at first.

But if it be only Matter of Conquest, then it is a great Robbery, as a Pirate said to Alexander, That he was the great Robber, he was but a petty Robber; and so, Sirs, do, I think, the Way that you are in is much out of the Way.

Now, Sirs, to put you in the Way, believe it, you will never do right, nor God will never prosper you, until you give Him his Due, the King his Due (that is my Successors) and the People their Due. I am as much for them as any of you can be. You must give God his Due, by regulating rightly his Church according to his Scripture, which is now out of Order. For to set you in a Way particularly now I cannot, but only this, a National Synod freely called, freely debating among themselves, must settle this, when that every Opinion is freely and clearly heard.

For the King, indeed I will not.

Then turning to a Gentleman that touch'd the Ax, he said, Hurt not the Ax that may hurt me.

For the King, the Laws of the Land will clearly instruct you, for that therefore because it concerns my own particular I only give you a Touch of it.

For the People, and truly I desire their Liberty and Freedom as much as any Body whomsoever, but I must tell you, that their Liberty and their Freedom consists in having of Government, those Laws by which their Life and their Goods may be most their own.

It is not for having Share in Government, Sirs, that is nothing pertaining to them, a Subject and a Sovereign are clean different Things, and therefore until they do that, I mean, that you do put the People in that Liberty, as I say, certainly they will never enjoy themselves.

Sirs, It was for this that now I come here, if I would have given way to an arbitrary Way, for to have all Laws changed according to the Power of the Sword, I needed not to have come here, and therefore I tell you, and I pray God it be not laid to your Charge, that I am the Martyr of the People.

In truth, Sirs, I shall not hold you much longer, for I will only say this to you, that in troth I could have desir'd some little longer Time, because that I would have put this that I have said in a little more Order, and a little better digested it than I have done, and therefore I hope you will excuse me. I have delivered my Conscience. I pray God that you do take those Courses that are best, for the good of the Kingdom and your own Salvation.

Then Dr. Juxon spoke, Though it be very well known what your Majesty's Affections are to Religion, yet it may be expected that you should say somewhat for the World's Satisfaction in that Particular.

King. I thank you very heartily, my Lord, for that I had almost forgotten it. In troth, Sirs, my Conscience in Religion, I think, is very well known to the World, and therefore before you all I declare, That I die a Christian according to the Profession of the Church of England, as I found it left me by my Fathers, and this honest Man I think will witness it.

Then turning to the Officers he said, Sirs, excuse me for this Time, I have a good Cause, and I have a gracious God. I will say no more. A. D. 1648.

Then turning to Col. Hacker, he said, Take Care that they do not put me to pain, and, Sir thus, and it please you.

Then a Gentleman coming near the Ax, the King said, Take heed of the Ax. Pray take heed of the Ax.

He then said to the Executioner. I shall say but very short Prayers, and then thrust out my Hand.

Two Men in Disguises and Vizors stood upon the Scaffold for Executioners, then the King call'd to Dr. Juxon for his Night Cap, and having put it on he said to the Executioner, Does my Hair trouble you? He desir'd it might all be put under the Cap, which the King did accordingly, with the Help of the Executioner and the Bishop.

Then the King turning to Dr. Juxon, said, I have a good Cause and a gracious God on my Side.

Dr. Juxon. There is but one Stage more. This Stage is turbulent and troublesome, it is a short one, but you may consider it will soon carry you a very great Way, from Earth to Heaven, and there you will find a deal of cordial Joy and Comfort.

King. I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible Crown, where no Disturbance can be.

Dr. Juxon. You are exchang'd from a temporal to an eternal Crown. A good Exchange.

Then the King took off his Cloak and his George, which he gave to Dr. Juxon, saying, Remember. Being undress'd to his sky Colour Satten Waste-Coat, he bad the Executioner fasten the Block, and after a few Words of Ejaculation he laid his Neck down upon it, bidding him stay for the Sign, which was the stretching out his Hand, and that being given, his Head was at one Blow sever'd from his Body, the Executioner holding it up, the Soldiers and Rabble gave a great Shout, but all sober People that saw it wept bitterly, and the Lamentation over the whole Kingdom was deep and universal, excepting the Actors in this Tragedy, and their Adherents. Some Remarks might be made on his Majesty's insisting so much upon his dying a Martyr for the Laws, which no King of England had ever broken more than he had done; a Martyr for the People, who had labour'd under a heavier and longer Oppression in the first fifteen Years of his Reign than they had suffer'd in 150 Years before. But I am too much mov'd with writing this tragical Scene to have any such ungenerous Sentiments towards a suffering Prince, and shall leave the last Speech as it is left in Whitlocke to the Reader's own candid Reflections.

The Council of State after the King was beheaded, was willing to know the Meaning of his last Expression, Remember, and call'd Dr. Juxon before them, to give an Account of it, who told them, That the King immediately before his coming out to the Place of Execution, had charg'd him to carry to the Prince his George, with these his two last Commands, That he should forgive his Murtherers; and that if ever he came to the Crown he should so govern his Subjects, as not to force them upon Extremities.

Echard always over does every Thing that he has a mind to praise or dispraise; he has not Judgment to know and stop at a Medium. The King's Death struck all reasonable Minds with Horror. But that Women, and particularly a Dutch Commonwealth Woman should miscarry at the News only, is no more credible than what

A. D. 1645. Sanderfon, another such Historian says of it, that a Relique of the Block or Sand being apply'd to a blind Woman's Eyes at Deptford she was immediately restor'd to fight.

As to this King's Character, 'tis seen best in his History; for what the Lord Clarendon and Eckard after him, say of it, is no more his Picture than it is their own. If Bishop Burnet has any Likeness, he died greater than he liv'd, and shew'd, that which has been said of the whole Race of the Stuarts, that they bear Misfortune better than Prosperity. "His Reign, both in "Peace and War, was a continual Series of Errors, so that it does not appear that he had a true Judgment of Things: He was out of measure set on following his Humour, but unreasonably complying to those whom he trusted, chiefly the Queen. He had too high a Notion of the Regal Power, and thought that every Opposition to it was Rebellion. He minded little Things too much, and was more concern'd in the Drawing of a Paper, than in fighting of a Battle. He was too much inclin'd to the middle Way between a Protestant and Papist. He engag'd the Duke of Rohan in the War of Rockelle, and then forsook him. He was the Occasion of the Loss of the Liberty of the Spanish Netherlands, &c." For there is too much of it to be taken entire, and every Word diametrically opposite to the Earl of Clarendon and Archdeacon Eckard's Harangues. I take no Notice of what the latter tells us, of the Papists being concern'd in the King's Death, though I read it in a more faithful History, Calamy's Life of Baxter, for there is not the least likelihood that the Romanists, who had been so highly favour'd, and had fought and suffer'd so much for him, should be so solicitous to have his Head off, to make room for a Puritan Republick, who they might be sure would not fail to suppress, if not to extirpate them. All his Authorities have no Weight in the Scale against this simple and plain Argument. The Archdeacon, that he might go beyond all Historians in the Perfection of this King's Character, assures us there was nothing wanting towards it, but that he should have been more resolute and more imperious. Two Qualities which all the World agree to be his chief Characteristicks. I do not mention the pious Endeavours of the Queen, the Prince, and the States of Holland, to save the King's Life, they all having been unsuccessful, as they had never any likelihood of Success, for after the Parliament had pass'd an Act for the Trial of the King, and he had been try'd and condemn'd, the Issue could not be other

Papists not concern'd in his Death.

than it was with any manner of Safety to all that were concern'd in it. The Head and Trunk were put into a Coffin cover'd with black Velvet, and convey'd into the Lodgings at Whitehall, where the Body was embowell'd by the Army's Surgeon, and thence carry'd to St. James's, and put into a Lead Coffin, with this plain Epitaph, KING CHARLES, 1648. About a Fortnight after some of the King's Friends, the Duke of Lennox, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earl of Lindsey, the Earl of Southampton, and the Bishop of London, obtain'd leave to bury it; accordingly they remov'd it to Windfor Chapel, and bury'd it in the Vault of King Henry VIII, without the Form in the Common Prayer Book, the Governor, Col. Whicheot, not permitting it, it being put down, and therefore should not be us'd in that Garrison where he commanded; for which the Colonel shew'd no better Judgment than the Archdeacon does in making so much ado about it.

The High Court of Justice having reported their Proceedings to the Parliament, the latter declar'd, That the Persons employ'd in that important Service had discharg'd their Trust with Courage and Fidelity. That the Parliament was well satisfy'd with the Account of their Proceedings, ordering it to be engross'd and recorded among the Parliament Rolls, in order to transmit the Memory thereof to Posterity. And resolv'd, That the Commissioners of the Great Seal should issue a Certiorari to their Clerks, to record those Proceedings in the Chancery, and that the same should be sent to the other Courts in Westminster Hall, and to the Custos Rotulorum in each County. So very desirous were both the Parliament and the High Court of Justice to have this Matter remember'd, yet Eckard thinks he has taken sufficient Revenge of them, by printing their Names in his noble History with his Mark of Infamy, though it is most certain, that those Judges were so far from thinking their Judgment infamous, that they glory'd in it ever after. And one of them, Mr. Scot, desir'd his Part in it might be inscrib'd on his Tomb. Neither did the bloody Vengeance taken on them in the next Reign ever extort one Word of Remorse or Repentance, but even these deluded Men pretended to Martyrdom for the Laws of the Land and the Liberties of the People, though by what Law, and what Logick they argu'd thus, I cannot imagine. For it is most certain, that all their Proceedings in the Trial and Death of the King were as unjust as they were cruel, and as illegal as they were sanguinary.

DURING THE COMMONWEALTH.

A. D.
1649.

AM sensible how difficult it is to write the History of this Period with the least Hope of Success. The Friends of the late King and his Posterity represent the Parliament, who had assum'd the Power, as so many Monsters and Devils: Their Friends speak of them as of a Senate the nearest to the Glory and Majesty of the Roman, of any Assembly since the Triumvirates.

Is there no middle Way between these two Extreams? Or rather, may not we grant that they acquir'd their Power by Violence and Usurpation, and yet endeavour to prove that they exercis'd it with Wisdom and Honour?

I must lay by the Lord Clarendon and Echar'd's Histories when I enter on the New Government, for there is not one Feature like the Original in the Picture the one has drawn of it, and the other has slavishly copy'd.

The same Day on which King Charles the First was beheaded the Parliament pass'd an Act, Prohibiting any to proclaim the Prince of Wales, or any other, to be King or chief Magistrate of England, or Ireland, without Consent of Parliament, on pain of High Treason; which Act was sent to the Sheriffs of all the Counties of England to be proclaim'd there. The same Day Duke Hamilton and the Lord Loughborough escap'd out of Windsor Castle. Sir Lewis Dives got through a Necessary House in Whitehall, standing over the Thames, and on February the 1st, the Lord Capel, by a desperate Attempt, made his Escape over the Tower Moat. The Duke was soon retaken by some Troopers in Southwark, who knew him disguis'd as he was, and knocking at an Inn Door, and Lord Capel was discover'd by a Waterman as he cross'd the Thames, and seiz'd in a House at Lambeth. Col. Middleton, who was a Prisoner at Newcastle, ran away to Scotland, and being requir'd to return, answer'd Cavalierment, my Life is dearer to me than my Honour. Sir Marmaduke Langdale made also his Escape, for they could not stand the Terrors of the High Court of Justice, which humbled Judge Jenkins and Sir John Starvel, who, says Ludlow, had carry'd themselves very insolently, but now finding the Parliament to be in earnest began to come to a better Temper. Mr. Holder, the Prince of Wales's Agent, a Prisoner in Whitehall, got out as Sir Lewis Dives had done, and it was the Escape of these Persons that put the House on a Debate to bring Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, the Earl of Norwich, the Lord Capel, Langborn, Poyer and Powell, to a speedy Trial; in order to which they pass'd an Act for Constituting a new Court of Justice, who chose John Bradshaw, Esq; to be President of it, and the Officers to be the same as in the first High Court.

On the 1st of February the Parliament pass'd Members an Act, That such Members as had voted 5th of disqualification last, that the late King's Concessions to these Propositions were a sufficient Ground for Settling a Peace in this Nation, should not be re-admitted to sit as Members of this Parliament. And, That such Members as were then in the House, and gave their Votes in the Negative, should enter their Dissent to the said Vote, and such as were absent should declare their disapproving thereof before they be admitted as Members. This Step was taken to embark all the Members on the same Bottom, and found their new State on Agreement and Union. Several Members obey'd this Order, and had Admittance, as John Lenthall, Esq; the Speaker's Son, Sir John Trevor, Sir Henry Hayman, Philip Herbert, Esq; William Herbert, Esq; two Sons of the Earl of Pembroke; Henry Darley, Esq; — Andrews, Esq; Mr. Francis Pierrepont, Col. Russel, Mr. Edwards, Mr. Fr. Gourdon, Mr. Hodges, Mr. Ellis.

It is very apparent, that as resolute as the Lords appear'd in rejecting the Bill to attain the

A. D. late King, they were, now he was dead, willing enough to come in for a Share of the Government, and would have agreed to have made it Republican. On the 1st of February they sent a Message to the House of Commons, That a Committee of 9 Lords and 18 Commoners might be named to consider of a Way to settle the Nation. The House adjourned the Consideration of the Message to the next Day, and it was then debated, Whether any Notice at all should be taken of their Message; Lieutenant General Cromwell was for the Affirmative, and it was even then suspected that he appear'd for the Lords, in an Opinion that they were more Monarchical than the Commons, and would be more ready to join in with a single Person, if an Attempt for such a Government should ever be made. The Lords adjourning themselves after they had order'd this Message, and not meeting again at the Time to which they had adjourn'd, much facilitated their Removal. On the 5th of February this Message was warmly debated, and the Republicans carrying the Point, it was resolv'd, That the House of Peers in Parliament is useless and dangerous, and ought to be abolish'd, and an Act was order'd to be brought in by Mr. Whitlocke accordingly, which pass'd without much Opposition. After this the Earl of Pembroke sat in the House of Commons, as Knight of the Shire for Berkshire, that Privilege being allow'd the Peers if they were elected Knights, Citizens, or Burgeses. The Lord Howard of Essex was chosen Citizen for Carlisle, and the Earl of Salisbury sat also in the House of Commons as Burgeses for Lynne.

The next Day the Debate concerning kingly Government ended in this Resolution upon the Question, That it hath been found by Experience, and this House doth declare, That the Office of a King in this Nation, and to have the Power thereof in any single Person is unnecessary, burthensome and dangerous to the Liberty, Safety, and publick Interest of the People of this Nation, and therefore ought to be abolish'd, and that an Act be brought in to that Purpose, which was not long passing.

On the 9th of February the Parliament pass'd an Act, appointing Bulstrode Whitlocke, Esq; Richard Keeble, Esq; and John Lisle, Esq; Commissioners of the Great Seal. The former Seal, and all other publick Seals which had the Image of King Charles on them, were order'd to be defac'd, and a new Great Seal to be made, with the Stamp of the House of Commons on one Side, accompany'd with this Inscription, the Great Seal of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England; and on the other Side was engraven the Cross and the Harp, being the Arms of England and Ireland, with this Inscription, God with us. The Judges made some Difficulty of Acting on Account of the Alteration in their Oath, and the Test of the Writs, which were not to run in the King's Name, but in the Name of the Keepers of the Liberties of England. Bacon, Brown, Bedingfield, Trevor and Atkins, Judges, laid down their Commissions upon it. But the following six old, and six new, discharg'd that Duty. King's Bench, Lord Chief Justice, Rolls, Jermin, Nicholas and Ask; Common Pleas, Lord Chief Justice, St. John Pheasant, Puleston and Warburton; Exchequer, Lord Chief Baron Wylde, Yates, Thorp, Rigby; and instead of the old Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, a new Engagement was appointed to be taken by all in Office or Benefice, to be true and faithful to the Government establish'd without King or House of Peers.

The new Republic had not this Establishment without Opposition and great Murmurs; Sir Abraham Reynardson, the Lord Mayor of London, and Major General Browne, one of the Sheriffs, kept up a Party against them in the City. The Lord Mayor refus'd to proclaim the Act for abolishing kingly Government, for which he was fin'd 2000 Pounds, and committed to the Tower for two Months; 500 Pounds of that 2000 Pounds was given to the Poor of the City, 500 Pounds to Westminster, 500 Pounds to Southwark, and 500 Pounds to the Poor of the Tower Hamlets. Reynardson pleaded Scruple of Conscience at the Bar of the House, by his Oath taken in the Exchequer, and that he conceiv'd it was the Sheriffs Business; and one Andrews, says Richard, was made Mayor, as it was his Turn to be, he having serv'd Sheriff but two Years after Reynardson. The Lord Mayor, Andrews, assisted by Alderman Pennington, Sir John Wollaston, Alderman Atkins, Alderman Viner, Alderman Foulke, Alderman Edmonds, Alderman Pack, Alderman Byde, Alderman Avery, Alderman Wilson, Alderman Detbick, Alderman Bateman, Alderman Foot, and other principal Citizens proclaim'd the Act in several Parts of the City. The Parliament order'd the late King's Effigies at the Royal Exchange to be remov'd, and this Inscription put up in its Place.

But this did not hinder several Persons from proclaiming King Charles the Second in several Places, though it was generally done on a suddain, and in the dark. The Parliament took no Notice of these tumultuary Proclamations, and where they were affix'd to Posts or Doors, the Magistrates order'd them to be taken down.

Four Days after the King's Death the new Commonwealth wrote Letters of Notification, that they had assum'd the Government to foreign Potentates and Powers, and order'd their Secretaries to notify to the foreign Ministers in England, the Death of the King, and the Establishment of the Republick, which those Ministers knew not how to take. They had been Witnesses of King Charles's Death, and were sensible that there was no other Government but that of the Parliament; yet they were imbaras'd, whether to receive these Notifications in good or ill Part; if the latter, they might offend the Commonwealth, if the former, their Masters; so they generally reply'd, They must wait for Orders.

For the executive Part of the Government, the Parliament appointed a Council of State, who were nominated by a Committee, Mr. Lisle, Mr. Holland, Mr. Ludlow, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Scot, who named 35, and the Parliament added those 5 and confirm'd the others.

They kept their Office at Whitehall, and those Members who desir'd it had Lodgings there. They were by their Commission to dispose of the Militia of England and Ireland, of the Fleet, Magazines, and Stores for one Year only. The Committee of Five, who nominated the Council of State, were empower'd also to see that all re-admitted Members comply'd with the Order about the Vote of the 5th of December.

Admiralty. As for the Navy they appointed Edward Popham, Esq; Robert Blake, Esq; and Richard Dean, Esq; joint Admirals, and Sir Henry Vane, Treasurer of the Navy; a Place of so very great Profit, that Sir Henry Vane thought it rather burdensome than useful to the Commonwealth, and would accept only of 1000 Pounds per Annum, for his Clerks and the Expence of his Office. The Admirals had no more than three Pounds a Day.

The new High Court of Justice being establish'd, their Session was like that of the First in Westminster Hall, and the Prisoners were brought before them.

It is necessary here to remind the Reader, that the two Parties, King and Parliament had suspended the regular Course of the Law, and made their Appeal to the Sword: That in this Appeal the Controversy was decided on the Side of the Parliament, the Consequence of which was, that they must either abandon at once all their Conquests, and throw themselves on the Mercy of their most cruel and implacable Enemies, or support themselves by good Armies and good Laws, which go always with the Powers, for their Preservation. That those Laws were well known to those who broke them, as also the Penalties of breaking them; and nothing could be more impertinent and ridiculous, than to talk of old Laws, old known Laws, in the Time of a Monarchy, which was first interrupted, and then dissolv'd, to a State governing by Laws of their own making, and by a Power able to support them. Yet thus it is throughout the History of the Rebellion; I need not add Echard's History, because it is only a poor Copy of the other, which indeed has Poverty enough in it, when it is stripp'd of the Embroidery: I shall therefore lay them both aside now I am come to this Court of Justice, they having left me no sure footing, either in Fact or Character. I shall follow Whitlocke, and I am then safe, and so is the Reader.

High Court of Justice. On the 10th of February the High Court of Justice sat in Westminster Hall; about fifty of the Members, all new ones, Present. Duke Hamilton, as Earl of Cambridge, the Lord Goring, created Earl of Norwich four Years before the Lord Capel and Sir John Owen were brought before them, and Sergeant Bradshaw, the President, made a Speech to them of the Occasion of their coming thither, to be try'd for High Treason and other Crimes, after which they were all commanded to withdraw, except the Earl of Cambridge.

Duke Hamilton or Earl of Cambridge his Trial. Then Mr. Steel, Attorney General for the Commonwealth, set forth the Notoriousness of the Facts of the Prisoner at the Bar, by his invading the Kingdom, committing many Murders and Rapines, and all under Pretence of the Covenant. That as the War was call'd Hypocritarium Bellum, so he might be call'd Hypocritarium Princeps. He desir'd the Charge might be read, and that the Earl might make Answer to it. After the Charge, the Earl of Cambridge pleaded, He was of another Nation, and what

The Court order'd the Act to be read for Naturalization of his Father, and consequently of him, being his Heir. He was then remanded to Prison till the next Day, when being brought to the Bar, the Attorney General, Mr. Steel, mov'd that he might answer the Charge; which the President requir'd him to do. The Earl desir'd Time that he might put Things in Order, and send to Major General Lambert, by whom he had Articles given him. The Court gave him two Days to answer; and upon his Motion for Counsel, he had Liberty to name them, which he said he could not do, not knowing any one Counsellor in England; though he had liv'd above twenty Years in the Kingdom. However, at the two Days End, when he was again brought to the Bar, he thank'd the Court for the Time they had given him; but he said it was so short that he could not be provided; and upon his Desire, Mr. Chute, Mr. Hale, and Dr. Parsons, were assign'd him for Council. The Earl desir'd Leave to send to Scotland; it was answer'd, That it was for Prisoners to prepare their Proofs against the Trial, he having been in Prison so long. He reply'd, That during his six Months Imprisonment, he never sent about any private Business, but only to get Monies to maintain him: He pray'd the Mercy of the Court, that if they would spare him he might be useful. The Court gave him two Days Time longer to prepare, and the Counsel refusing to plead for him, others were assign'd. Two Days after, the 17th of February, he was again brought to the Bar, and urg'd that the last Counsel were not ready for want of Time, and held it not proper for them to plead in Matter of Law till the Fact was first prov'd.

The Court declar'd he had been often mov'd to make his Defence, and it was insist'd upon, that he should then do it: So he produc'd his Commissions from the Parliament of Scotland, to command all their Forces, and the Order of the Committee of Estates there for him to advance into England, as also the large Declaration from Scotland. He pleaded, That the Ends thereof were for his Majesty's Honour, and the Settling of Religion and the Covenant. He then urg'd the Articles agreed unto by General Lambert, when he yielded himself Prisoner, by which he was assur'd of Quarter and Life, to prove it he produc'd the Lord Grey of Groby, Col. Lilburn, and Mr. Peters.

Concerning the Point of Naturalization: He pleaded, That his Father being naturaliz'd, could not make him a Subject of England, no more than the Son of an Englishman, born in any foreign Parts, was intitled thereby to any Inheritance here. That he had a Petition and Bill prepared for his Naturalization, but it pass'd not.

The Proof against this was, "That he was call'd by the late King's Writ to sit in Parliament in the Lords House, by the Name of Earl of Cambridge, and appear'd as Earl of Cambridge, and acted as a Peer of England sitting in the Lords House, and in divers Committees. That as a Peer of England he took the National Covenant, and subscribed to it Cambridge in the House of Peers, and took the Negative Oath before the Commissioners of the Great Seal, as a Peer of England." As to his surrendering to Lambert upon Articles, it was prov'd, that he was a Prisoner to the Lord Grey of Groby before Ma-

Major General Lambert could come up to conclude any Articles with him, which was prov'd by Col. Wayte; and a very furious Cavalier Writer owns this Plea was but a pretended one. Letters under his own Hand to Sir Marmaduke Langdale were produc'd, touching the carrying on of the Design in England, and Passages concerning his Friends in Colchester.

Col. Whichcot Governor, and the Marshal of Windsor Castle, prov'd the Earl's Escape, after he had pass'd his Word to the Governor to be a true Prisoner. The Earl earnestly deny'd this, and offer'd upon it a Challenge to the Governor, were he not in his present Capacity; but it was left to the Judgment of the Court.

The Witnesses against the Earl having been heard, he produc'd the Witnesses for him, some of whom were disallow'd, being Officers under him, and so Participes Criminis. He pleaded, That he had not broken the Negative Oath, for he had not engag'd against the Parliament, but for the Ends in the Scots Declaration.

His Council mov'd, that they might, with the Council of the Commonwealth, state the Case of the Earl; but this was deny'd, being a Case of High Treason, and the Earl's Council could only declare their Opinions in Point of Law.

The Trial had lasted on and off 16 Days, when the Earl of Cambridge's Council were heard by the Court, and pleaded, That the Earl was no free Denizon; and tho' his Father was naturaliz'd, and his Heirs, yet he not being born in the Kingdom, could receive no Benefit thereof: That if he had been a free Denizon, yet it was not prejudicial to him, because he acted by Command and Authority of the Parliament of another Nation, (and not of himself) who was govern'd by another distinct Law.

The Earl pleaded again the Articles given him by Major General Lambert, who had Power to do it, and who secur'd him by a Party of his Forces; as also, that he was order'd to be banish'd by Parliament, paying One Hundred Thousand Pounds.

He was not brought again before the Court till five Days after, March the 3d, when he made an additional Defence, not much varying from what he had said before. He did the same when he was two Days after ask'd what he had further to say, upon which the Court proceeded to Conviction and Sentence. The Cavalier Author above cited affirms, that Hamilton not only offer'd the 100000 Pounds before mention'd, but to join with the Marquis of Argyle in Scotland to serve the Parliament's Friends there. Notwithstanding this fair and reasonable Trial, on a Supposition that the Powers in being can try Persons for Treason against them, the Earl of Clarendon affirms as positively as a Man can affirm any thing, he was not liable to Trial, being a Prisoner of War; which is not only contrary to all Accounts of his surrendering himself, but to Col. Wayte's positive Affirmation before the House of Commons, when he acquainted them with Hamilton's being taken, That he yielded at Discretion, and Lambert was not then near him, and to his Oath before the high Court of Justice.

The Trials of the other Lords continu'd at the same Time, and we shall take them in the Order we find them in Whitlocke.

The next who was brought to the Bar was the Lord Goring, Earl of Norwich, who pleaded Not guilty, and was dismiss'd for that Time, behaving himself with great Respect to the Court, in which he behav'd like a wise Man, who knew that Rudeness and Scorn are seldom successful in Prosperity, and much more in such Adversity as his was, the Peril of his Life. The same Wisdom would have produc'd the same Effects in Lord Capel.

Six Days after, February the 16th, he was brought again to the Bar, and Mr. Cook, Solicitor General, set forth the Heinousness of his Crimes at Colchester, in Kent, Essex, &c. He said, He could not deny the Matter of Fact, but should clear himself of some Particulars.

Several Witnesses were produc'd vivâ voce, who prov'd the Death of divers of the Parliament Party. The shooting of poyson'd Bullets boiled in Copperas from the Town, the cruel Usage of the Prisoners in Colchester, the Lord Goring's reviling them, calling them Rebellious Rogues, the burning of 600 Houses in that Town, and many other Particulars.

The Lord Goring, by Way of Defence, made a Narrative of his Proceedings since his last coming into England, acknowledg'd his receiving a Commission from the Prince, and his giving Commissions to others: That what he did was out of a good Intention for Peace: That Treason not being in the Intention, he could not be guilty of it: That he intended not to raise Forces against the Parliament. He pleaded his Peerage, and the Articles of Colchester, by which Quarter was given him.

To this the Council for the Commonwealth reply'd, That a Man's Actions did best expound his Intentions: That the Lord Goring's Actions spake him guilty of Murder, Treason, &c. That as to his Peerage, the Power by which the Court sat was an Answer: That for the Articles of Colchester, though he had at first wav'd them, yet he should have as full a Benefit of them as the Lord Capel, who had largely pleaded for them.

The next that was brought to the Bar, and on Lord Capel's Trial, the same Day with Hamilton and Goring, was the Lord Capel, who pleaded, He was a Prisoner to the Lord General, and had Conditions given him, and his Life promis'd him; and if all the Magistrates in Christendom were combin'd together, they could not call him in Question. Mr. Whitlocke tells us, He never minded nor look'd upon the Court, but upon the People on all Sides, and with an austere Countenance. This is the Majesty that is boasted of, and so much extoll'd, that one would take the Lord Capel rather to be a General at the Head of an Army than a Prisoner at the Bar. If Sullenness and Austerity could have serv'd him or his Cause, there had been Heroism in it; but as it was of no other Use than to hasten the Execution of an ugly Sentence, which the Lord Goring by his wiser Conduct escap'd, it will never meet with Applause in sober History.

The Lord Capel was required the next Day to plead in Chief. He again insist'd on the Colchester Articles, saying, He had fair Quarter given him, and all the Gowns in the World had nothing to do with him. It is great Pity that Dr. Morley, who assisted him in his Devotions, did not or could not bring his Mind into better Temper, even when Death star'd him in the Face. Punctilio's of Honour are not at such an Hour the Sentiments of Minds truly great, but Calmness, Serenity, and the sweet Workings of Moderation and Charity.

He was the next Day again brought to the Bar, and the Attorney General mov'd, That the Prisoner might make good his Plea. Upon which the President told him, That he had put in a Plea concerning Articles, for Proof whereof the Lord General was by Order of the Court there present; That he had Liberty to ask any thing of him: If not, then the Council of the Commonwealth his Trial,

A. D. 1649. wealth were to offer what they could in Proof of it. So the Attorney General went on and produc'd the General's Letter to the Parliament, upon the Rendition of Colchester, and the Articles and the Explanation of them, whereby, and upon the Testimony of the Lord General and General Ireton, Col. Whaley and Col. Barkstead, all present by Order of Court, it appear'd, says Whitlocke, That the Lord Capel was to have fair Quarter for his Life, which was explain'd to be, a Freedom from any Execution of the Sword, but not any Protection from the Judicial Proceedings of a Civil Court; and Mercy was explain'd to be only from the promiscuous Execution of the Sword, but that he might be tried by a Council of War. "It was clearly prov'd, adds Mr. Whitlocke, that the Articles were only to free him from the present Power of the Sword to take away his Life; and Col. Barkstead swore, That he told him the Day after the Articles, that he believ'd the Parliament would proceed against them that were taken at Colchester as Traytors.

As often as I have charg'd the Author or Authors of the History of the Rebellion with Falsification and Misrepresentation, if my Patience would have held out, I could have done it twenty Times as often; and I beg the Reader to mind how it is insinuated, that the Court order'd the General to be present against their Will, and out of meer Shame. They knew not how to deny it, as if they were afraid of his Evidence. But what follows is false to a Degree that admits of no Epithet; and the Author who was capable of such a Falsity, is not to be nam'd by Persons who make any Conscience of Truth and Sincerity.

Hist. Reb. p. 267. Whether the Question was well stated to Fairfax, or what was else said to him to dissuade him from owning his Declaration and Promise, he boggled so much in his Answer, that they would be of Opinion, that he had not made such direct and positive Promise, and that the same was never transmitted to Parliament. Whereas he never did promise him his Life, otherwise than to exempt him from present military Execution, as we can prove from the Lord Fairfax's own Words.

Short Memorial, p. 123.

"After our Entrance into Colchester, a Council of War was call'd, and those before-nam'd Persons were sentenc'd to die, the rest to be acquitted. This being so resolv'd, I thought fit notwithstanding to transmit the Lord Capel, &c. over to the Parliament, being the Civil Judicature of the Kingdom, &c." What need was there of his boggling then? Which he did not do; he had before referr'd him to the Parliament to do Justice on him; and his huffing the Court in such Circumstances, made him indeed a fit Subject for the Earl of Clarendon's Eulogy, but will not heighten his Character with Men who think reasonably.

The Council for the Commonwealth mov'd for Judgment against the Lord Capel, That he should be hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd, at which he seem'd to startle, and after a short Speech to the Court, he concluded, That however he was dealt with here, he hop'd for a better Resurrection hereafter.

The next Time he was brought before the Court, their Order was read to him, That they would hear what he had to say that Day, and then proceed to Judgment.

He said, He was to be comprehended wholly in the Martial Law, and urg'd the Articles again, which excepted Trial after by Parliament; That divers who were in Colchester in his Condition had compounded; That breaking Prison for Treason by Common Law was but Felony; and if he must be judg'd by the Common Law, he hop'd he might have the full Benefit of it. He urg'd for it the late Act, which says, I though King and Lords be laid aside, yet the fundamental Laws shall be in Force. He recommended Magna Charta to the Court, and the Petition of Right, and press'd the Consideration of the Act made in Favour of those who assisted King Henry VII. and the Exception in the Acts touching the Lord Strafford and Canterbury. He desired to see his Jury, and that they might see him, and to be try'd by his Peers, saying, He believ'd a Precedent could not be given of a Subject try'd for Life, but either by Bill in Parliament, or by a Jury. This was a new Government, who were to make Precedents, and not to follow those that were made, unless they were agreeable to the Constitution. All he said about Peers and Jury could be of no Help to him, and Magna Charta was not to be plead against an Act of Parliament, which was the Authority this Court pretended to.

At the last Hearing, he briefly repeated what he had said formerly, and further observ'd an Ordinance of Parliament, That Quarter for Life should not be given to Irish REBELS; which imply'd, That Quarter for Life given to others should be inviolable. But he had had no such Quarter given him, otherwise than to exempt him from immediate military Execution.

Sir John Owen was brought to the Bar at the same Time with the Lords Hamilton, Norwich, Owen's and Capel. He pleaded Not guilty. But the Trial. Witnesses prov'd against him, that he had not only rais'd Forces against the Parliament, but had kill'd the High Sheriff of Carnarvonshire. The Lord Clarendon assures us he said, He had always been taught to obey the King. Whitlocke, that he alledg'd what he did was to free himself from Plunder. As to the killing the High Sheriff, the Lord Clarendon makes the Welch Knight so foolish as to say, If the Sheriff had not been there he had not been kill'd; but what he adds is still more ridiculous, He concluded like a Man who did not much care what they resolv'd concerning him, but would not let us know that this bold Brison, as loyal as he was, had taken the Covenant and Negative Oath, and was guilty of Perjury in the very Act for which his Lordship or the Doctors of Christ Church give him such extravagant Praise. Owen pleaded Quarter as well as the rest, and with the same Reason and the same Success. If the Soldiers had knock'd them on the Head when they took them, it had been no more than they deserv'd with Respect to the Parliament, who having them in their Power, might proceed against them as they pleas'd, for they had not parted with their Power over them when they sent their General to reduce them. General Ludlow observes very justly, "If there had been any Promise made to any of them, either implicitly or by Word of Mouth, it could only extend to protect them from the Military, not the Civil Sword."

The Earl of Holland was sick in Warwick Castle when the other Prisoners were first brought to the Bar, as he was himself 17 Days after, February the 17th, when the Charge of High Treason was read against him, and aggravated by the Solicitor General; That the Earl was an eminent Courtier, and probably did ill Offices, and perswaded the King to go from the Parliament, and went afterwards himself to Oxford; That he return'd from thence, had his Sequestration taken off; That he publish'd a Declaration, promising, in the Word of a Gentleman and a Christian, that he would stand by the Parliament; That

A. D. 1649.

A. D. 1649. That he had taken the Negative Oath, and the Covenant; yet the last Year he engag'd in, and probably contriv'd the Insurrection wherein the Duke of Bucks, and his Brother and others were drawn in, and he boasted he should shortly be 12000 strong, and master the Parliament and restore the King.

The Earl pleaded, That his Fact was not Capital but Criminal: That he had Quarter given him when he was taken at St. Neots; and that both Houses had past an Order since for his Banishment, which excus'd the Aggravations, especially in his last Action. He desir'd Council, but it was deny'd him.

On the 6th of March, Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, the Earl of Norwich, the Lord Capel, and Sir John Owen, were brought to the Bar of the High Court of Justice, where Serjeant Bradshaw, the President, sat in his Scarlet Robes; and having ask'd them what further they had to say, why Sentence should not be pronounc'd against them? They all spoke to the same Effect as formerly; only the Earls of Holland and Norwich extenuated their Offences as well as they could, as being rash, not much hurtful, &c. Then the President made a Speech of some Hours in Length, in Answer to the several Pleas of the Prisoners, and at last Sentence was given against them all; That their Heads should be sever'd from their Bodies; yet with Relation to the Mercy of the Parliament.

The next Day the Earl of Warwick and the Countess of Holland presented a Petition for the Life of the Earl of Holland: The Earl of Denbigh solicited for Duke Hamilton; and others for the Earl of Norwich and the Lord Capel. After some Hours Debate upon these Petitions, it was resolv'd upon the Question, not to proceed any further upon these Petitions; but to leave the Prisoners to the Justice of the Court that sentenc'd them.

Several Ladies petition'd that Court for them, but only got the Execution to be put off two Days.

The condemn'd Lords petition'd the House again; and the General wrote a Letter concerning the Articles, much to the same Purpose as he said before; and after a long Debate, the Question was put of them severally, and voted,

That the Lord Capel should not be repriev'd.

Which Vote past the more easily on Account of his indecent Behaviour before the Court.

The Earl of Norwich's Reprieve was carry'd by one Vote, which was the Speaker's, they being equally divided, 24 and 24 of each Part. The Speaker said he did it because he had formerly receiv'd some Civilities from the Lord Goring.

The House was also divided upon the Question, Whether the Earl of Holland should be repriev'd or not; and the Speaker gave his Voice against him.

The Resolution touching Duke Hamilton's Reprieve past in the Negative, and for Sir John Owen in the Affirmative, by Means of Commissary General Ireton, who observing there had been no Application made, nor a Word said in Behalf of Owen, spoke for him thus, as the Lord Clarendon confesses, "There have been great Endeavours and Sollicitations us'd to save all those Lords; but there's a Commoner, another condemn'd Person, for whom no Man has said a Word, nor has he himself so much as Petition'd; therefore I desire that Sir John Owen may be preserv'd by the meer Motive and Goodness of the House;" which was assented to. This very generous, human Act came from the same Man of whom Warwick, and after him as judicious an Historian, Echard, says that on A. D. his Death Bed, and even in the Agony, he cry'd out, Blood, Blood, Blood. 1649.

On the 9th of March, Duke Hamilton was brought to the Scaffold, erected before Sir Robert Cotton's House in Palace Yard, Westminster; and after some Discourse with Dr. Sibbalds, a Minister, who came with him, he turn'd to the People, and seeing them so great a Multitude, he said, his Voice would not serve for them to hear him, and therefore he directed his Speech to those upon the Scaffold.

He confess'd his Religion to be according to that of the Kirk of Scotland; and therefore the very impartial Clarendon says not one Word of it. That he had ever been loyal to the late King, and wish'd well to his Posterity, and that none more desir'd the Peace and Happiness of this and the other Kingdoms than himself. That his coming into England with the late Army, was out of no treasonable ill Intent, but for the Ends contain'd in the Scots Declaration, and what he did was as a Servant to that Parliament and Kingdom: That in that Imployment next to settling of Religion, the establishing of the King was his greatest Aim: And he wish'd his Blood, in Order to the Kingdom's Settlement, might be the last that should be spilt.

Having said this, he made a short Prayer, Dr. Sibbalds kneeling with him, and being risen, he cast off his Cloak and Doublet, put on a little white Sattin Cap, forgave the Executioner, and gave him ten Pounds. A little after he spoke a while in private to his Servants, and again made a short Prayer.

His Countenance was chearful, and all the Time of his being on the Scaffold, there appear'd in him no Fear, Disorder, Change of Look, or Discomposure. He took his Leave of Dr. Sibbalds, embracing him, and of his Servants, whom he commended, particularly Mr. Lewis his Secretary.

He laid down his Head upon the Block, and after a short Prayer gave the Signal by stretching out his Hand; and the Executioner struck off his Head at one Blow, which was wrapp'd in a red Sarcenet Scarfe, and with his Body put into a Coffin and carry'd away.

The Lord Clarendon's Characters have so surfeited me with every Thing of that Kind, that I should never succeed in it if I attempted it; I shall therefore proceed in this tragical Part of my History.

The Earl of Holland came next upon the Scaffold, accompany'd by Mr. Hodges and Mr. Bol-Holland, two Presbyterian Ministers, six of his Servants and other Gentlemen. What follows is Mr. Hodges's own Relation.

"Between the Time of his Sentence and Execution, I only lay in the Earl's Bed-chamber to discourse with him, and to comfort him, being admitted and desir'd by him to that Freedom, when he would not see his Lady nor any of his Children, which, he said, would add too much to his Sorrow, and discompose his Thoughts, which were now to be set only upon another World: For some Time after his Sentence he was in great Perplexity and Agonies, saying, He had no Assurance of Pardon of his Sins, and of the Love of God to him: That he was not prepar'd to die; That Christ would be no Advantage to him. I endeavour'd to allay these Doubts, and to comfort the Earl with declaring to him the Infiniteness of God's Mercies, and his Willingness to pardon all poor Sinners that come to him through Christ: That never any who sought the Love of God in Christ, with a true Faith

A D. in Christ, did ever fail to obtain the Assurance of it to his distressed Soul.

"The Earl desir'd me to pray with him, to seek God for his Mercy, which I did, and upon this Subject, with as earnest a seeking the Lord for it, as I could express; and the Earl himself frequently pray'd to the same Effect, and with wonderful Fervency of Expression; yet he still continu'd in a desponding Condition till the Day before his suffering, when immediately after Prayer, he said to me, rejoicing, God has heard our Prayers, and his Spirit is come in to comfort me; I have prevail'd thro' the Strength of Christ over Satan and all my spiritual Enemies, and all Temptations. The Lord has given into me an Assurance of his Love in Christ, and I am now both ready and willing to die.

"I was much joy'd at this, and we went to Prayer together to bless God for this great Mercy, and to beg the Continuance of this Frame of Spirit to the last, and God heard us in this also.

"The Earl, who had not slept several Nights before, nor eat his Meat, now supp'd and went to Bed with no more Disturbance in his Spirits than in his best Health, and slept for found all Night, and the Morning when he was to suffer, that we were much troubled to awaken him.

"He went to the Scaffold without being any whit daunted, and after some Discourse to the Gentlemen, he shew'd himself to the People, who were generally mov'd with Sorrow for the Suffering of so gallant a Person, whose Mien and Comeliness could not but excite Compassion.

"He directed his Speech to the Multitude at the Front of the Scaffold, towards Westminster-Hall, made a large Profession of his Religion as a Protestant, mention'd his Birth and Education, excus'd his going to the King from the Parliament, and Return to the Parliament, and extenuated his late Insurrection.

"After he had ended his Speech, he turned to the other Side of the Scaffold, and kneel'd down to his private Prayers, after which he had Conference with Mr. Bolton and me.

"Then he pull'd off his Gown and Doublet, having on him a white Sattin Waistcoat, and put on a white Sattin Cap, and prepar'd himself for the Block, took his Leave and embrac'd with much Affection Mr. Bolton and me, his Servants and others, forgave the Executioner, and gave him ten Pounds.

"He then laid himself down on the Block, pray'd a while, and gave the Sign by stretching forth his Arms; upon which the Executioner sever'd his Head from his Shoulders at one Blow, which with his Body was put into a Coffin and carry'd away.

We shall see the Difference between Mr. Hodges's holy Conferences with his devout Penitent, and Dr. Morley's with the Lord Capel. There is a Coldness in the latter which deadens even our Compassion for the Sufferer. The Conversation between them in the Tower, is, as Echard says, worthy Remembrance.

Lord Capel. I have chosen you to be my Confessor, I have strictly recollected the whole Course of my Life, to the best of my Remembrance, and am resolv'd to confess all the Misdoings of it, in order to receive Absolution, if you think me worthy of it; and then he made his Confession.

Dr. Morley: "I cannot give you Absolution, because you have omitted one Sin greater than all you have confess'd."

Lord Capel. (Clapping his Hand on his Breast in a Surprize) What Sin is that?

Dr. Morley. "The Blood of the Earl of Strafford lies upon your Head, of which you were highly guilty with his other Enemies."

Lord Capel. I beg God's and your Pardon for omitting this great Sin, for which I have often ask'd Forgiveness of God, as a Man guilty of innocent Blood; but my Mind was so intent upon my private Sins, that I forgot mentioning of this, and I will do any thing you will have me to receive Absolution from it.

Good God! Are these the Sighings of a pious Soul! These the Words of a dying Man to a Divine, who has nothing to say to him almost in the last Agony, but the Death of the Earl of Strafford. There is still more of it.

Dr. Morley. "My Lord, Your private Confession of this heinous Sin is not sufficient for Absolution, nor ought I to give it you, unless your Lordship will promise me to make your Confession as publick as your Crime."

Lord Capel. I will do it with all my Heart, if you will tell me how.

Dr. Morley. "There is but one Way, and that is to confess it in your last Speech at the Place of Execution; and then your Repentance will be as publick as your Sin."

Lord Capel. (Embracing him after so much Edification) I heartily thank you, Doctor, and I do promise you I will do it; and I would not for all the World have dy'd without a publick Confession of this Sin, and making the best Satisfaction I can to the Memory of my Lord Strafford, before God and Men, for having my Hands dip'd in his Blood.

Echard says, Dr. Morley gave the Lord Capel special Assistance in his last Extremity, and then he instances it in this divine Dialogue. I heartily thank him for giving me an Opportunity to preserve it in my History, that the Reader, by comparing Dr. Morley's Conversation with Mr. Hodges's, may form a just Idea of the Religion of the one and the other, and which of them it is that's most likely to make Martyrs. The Lord Capel being thus prepar'd for Death, was brought to the Scaffold, much after the manner of a stout Roman, according to Whitlocke. "He had no Minister with him, nor shew'd any Sense of Death approaching, but carried himself all the Time he was on the Scaffold with that Boldness and Resolution, as was to be admired. He wore a sad-colour'd Suit, his Hat cock'd up, and his Cloak under one Arm." Are these the Emblems of Christian Humility and Charity! "He look'd towards the People at his first coming up, and put off his Hat in manner of a Salute. He had a little Discourse with some Gentlemen upon the Scaffold, but had no Minister with him, and pass'd up and down in a careless Posture. He went to the Front of the Scaffold, and leaning over, made a Speech to the People, I die a Protestant according to the Religion profess'd in the 39 Articles, the best I know of. I was condemn'd for keeping the Fifth Commandment, written by God's own Finger, which commands to obey Magistrates, and I die for obeying my King, the most religious of all Princes, and his Son Prince Charles, who is King, and the rest of the King's Children, Heirs to the Crown. He concluded with a Desire to the People to pray for him. When he had done his Speech, he call'd the Executioner to him, gave him five Pounds, pray'd him not to strip his Body, but to let his Servants have it, and his Cloaths, for which he order'd them to pay him. He then kneel'd down and made a short Prayer, and his Servants throwing themselves shot.

Major General Langhorn, Col. Powell, and Col. Poyer, were order'd to be try'd by a Court Martial, by whom they were condemn'd to cast Lots for their Lives, and he on whom the fatal Lot fell was to be shot to Death, as was Colonel Poyer in Covent-Garden, as also one Mr. Munday an Irish Rebel.

We have mention'd the Murder of Col. Rainsborough by certain Ruffians who were sent by Morrice, Governor of Pomfret Castle, which he had surpriz'd by Treachery, to assassinate Rainsborough at Doncaster. The Parliament order'd Lieutenant General Cromwel to inquire into that execrable Act, and give Directions to Major General Lambert, who besieg'd Pomfret, to take Vengeance on those Assassins, in whose Praise the Author of Hist. Reb. is lavish of all the Powers of his Eloquence. Lambert block'd up Pomfret Castle so close, that those within it had no Hopes of Relief, and offer'd to surrender on honourable Terms; but Lambert would have Morrice and the Murderers of Rainsborough deliver'd up to him. Echard tells us a romantick Story of the Escape of Morrice and his Ruffians. Whitlocke says three only of them escap'd. Morrice was re-taken, and try'd by Judge Thorp and Judge Puleston at York Assizes, for Levying War against the Parliament. This Assassin had not so much as a Commission from the King, but urg'd that he had one from the Prince of Wales. The Judges told him the Prince was a Subject as well as himself, and if he were present, must be try'd as he was. Morrice desir'd his Trial might be by a Council of War, and Col. Bethel, after he was condemn'd, wrote to General Fairfax and his Council of War for a Reprieve; but as he had been guilty of so barbarous a Murder, as well as of levying War, 'twas not thought proper to spare so notorious a Criminal.

Mr. Cawton the
try'd.

Mr. Thomas Cawton, Minister of St. Bartholomew's behind the Royal Exchange, in his Prayer before the Lord Mayor, having pray'd for K. Charles II. as lawful King, the Attorney and Solicitor General, Mr. Steel and Mr. Cook, were order'd to prosecute him for High Treason. He was a Presbyterian, and how King Charles II. rewarded the Presbyterians for their Loyalty and Services, we shall see hereafter. This bold Offence, and many others of the like Nature, oblig'd the Commonwealth, for their own Security, to hearken to the Advice of Mynheer Paw, one of the Dutch Ambassadors, and make a Law as was in Holland, To forbid all Ministers meddling with State-Affairs in the Pulpit. They order'd Mr. Whitlocke to draw up a Declaration to justify their Proceedings, and it was publish'd in English, Latin, French, and Dutch; and about the same Time, March the 20th, the Acts for abolishing Kingly Government and the House of Peers pass'd in Form.

The Countess of Carlisle, as famous for Intrigues of State as those of Amour, having been in the Secret of the last Summer's Insurrections, was examin'd by the Council of State several Times, and giving them but little Satisfaction, they committed her to the Tower, as they did also Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, who had too much encourag'd the Party of the Levellers, and been too busy with his Tongue and his Pen. The Room he was confin'd in being over against that of the Countess's Confinement, Sir Henry Mildmay, who had observ'd it, made a Motion in the House, that it was dangerous, and they might have unjustifiable Correspondence by Signs, in which he was thought more cautious than wise, and the House hearken'd to him accordingly.

A seditious Libel, entitul'd England's New England's Chains, made a great Noise at this Time. The New Parliament voted, That it was false, scandalous, mutinous, tending to raise a new War; That the Authors and Publishers of it were guilty of High Treason, and refer'd it to the Council to find them out. This Book is mightily cry'd up by the Author of the History of Independency, who has endeavour'd to abuse Milton in the same Treatise, where he furnishes the Earl of Charendon and Mr. Echard with much Matter to set off their Heroes. The Reader will not be displeas'd to see the Manner of Writing in Use among the Parliament's Enemies, which has since been improv'd by L'Estrange, Leslie, Sacheverel, Swift, Trapp, Hickes, Hill, Oldsworth, &c. The Author is speaking of an Independent Minister; He is Chaplain in Ordinary to the Devil and Oliver Cromwel; he keeps the Keys of our Hell and our Grandees Consciences; he is Confessor to Tyburn, and hath a great Power over damn'd Spirits; so prostituted a Villain, that he practises Impudence amongst common Whores, and his Pulpit is more shameful than another Man's Pillory, &c. This Stile is happily imitated in the Oxford Address, and other Pieces coin'd in the same Mint.

The Commonwealth having settled their Government at home as well as the Circumstances they were in would admit, sent Ministers abroad to take Care of their Affairs, and be their Agents, in several Parts of Europe, as Dr. Dorislaus, a Civilian, Judge Advocate, and one of the Council to the Republick, was appointed their Resident in Holland, Richard Bradshaw, Esq; their Agent at Hamburgh, Mr. Vane was dispatch'd to Portugal, and Mr. Ascham to Spain, with the Character of Envoys. The Letter they wrote the King of Portugal runs thus:

Serenissimo Principi JOANNI Quarto Lusitanæ Regi, Senatus Populusq; Anglicanus salutem: To the most serene JOHN the Fourth King of Portugal, the Senate and People of England send Greeting.

The Subject of it is to desire the King of Portugal not to shelter the Fugitives, Pirates, and revolted Ships in his Ports and Dominions, nor receive any Ambassador from Charles Stuart, since the Parliament, in whose Hands is the whole Power of the State, has only Right to send Ambassadors.

They wrote to the Archduke, Governor of the Netherlands:

LEOPOLDO AUSTRIÆ Archduci Provin- To the Archduke in Belgio sub Philippo Rege Presidi Salutem, Parliamentum Reipub. Angliæ: To Leopold. LEOPOLD Archduke of Austria, Governor of the Belgian Provinces under King Philip, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England send Greeting.

This Letter was to demand the Delivery of one Walsh, who had run away with Mrs. Puckering, a young Lady of a great Fortune, and kept her by Force in Flanders.

They

A. D. 1649. They address'd their Letter to the City of Hamburg thus: AMPLISSIMO Civitatis Hamburgensis Senatui, Senarus Populusq; Anglicanus: To the MAGNIFICENT Senate of the City of Hamburg, the Senate and People of England send Greeting.

They say among other Things: " They have receiv'd Information, that since the Arrival of one Cockran, Ambassador, as he gives out, from Charles, Son of the late King of England, the English Merchants in their City are terribly disquieted, their Lives are in Danger, they are often exposed to the Fury of Assassins, and there's no Justice for them: They desire that the Faith of former Treaties may be preserv'd; that, pursuant thereto, they will protect the Merchants of England, and see that Justice be done them. They require that Cockran be forbidden the City, and the Territory of the Senate, and exhort them not to prefer the Friendship of banish'd Tarquins to that of the People of England.

They had good Reason to complain of Ruffians and Assassins. The scatter'd Remains of such Armies as Goring's, Greenville's, and Montrose's, must fill Europe with them, and the first Exploit was the Murder of Dr. Dorislaus at the Hague, where he arriv'd in good Equipage about the latter End of April, King Charles II. being there in his Exile; and he had not been there many Days before twelve of those fugitive Ruffians came to his Lodgings disguis'd, and finding him at Supper, stabb'd him in several Places, cut his Throat, and a Cavalier Colonel, one Walter Whitford, Son of a Scots Episcopal Clergyman, clove his Head asunder with a Broad Sword, saying, Thus dies one of the King's Judges. The Lord Clarendon complements these Assassins with the Title of a dozen Gentlemen who boasted of what they had done, and believ'd it an heroic Act: They put up their Swords, walk'd leisurely away, and went quietly out of the Town, as if no Harm had been done.

A. Wood calls it a generous Action, and such are the Heroes of their Histories. Some Falsities there must be in every Incident to make it all of a Piece. Instead of twelve Men, another Cavalier Writer affirms there were eighteen Scotsmen: Instead of being Friends to Montrose, as Clarendon says, that other Historian assures us they were Friends to Hamilton; and instead of murdering Dorislaus to revenge the King's Death, the latter Historian writes, They expostulated with the Doctor concerning the unjust Condemnation and Execution of the Duke. A. Wood the Oxonian, who has hardly one Page without a dozen Falsities, informs us, the Parliament, as soon as they heard of the Murder of Dorislaus, resolv'd to sacrifice a certain Royalist, Sir Lewis Dives, then in their Custody, had he not made a timely Escape two Months before thro' a House of Office in Whitehall.

The Earl of Clarendon and Mr. E. chard would make us believe that the States of Holland and the Dutch were at no Pains to hinder the Ruffians walking off leisurely, and running away quietly, as if they at the bottom approv'd of so generous an Act. The contrary is the Truth. The States were in a terrible Panick, and immediately order'd Notice to be given King Charles, that his Abode in their Territories was not convenient for them, and that they desir'd him to remove, and take his Followers with him. They made earnest Inquisition after the Murderers, promis'd a thousand Guilders to him that brought any one of them, and made it Death by Proclamation to harbour them. The Author of Hist. Reb. to be as far from Truth as may be, says, Whitlocke's earnest Inquisition was a slow Inquisition. One Col. Bard, a Baronet, was apprehended by Order of the States, and Montrose himself and the Lord Hopron question'd for the Murder of Dorislaus. They presently dispatch'd Adrian Paer, who had been their Minister at the Treaty of Westphalia, to England, to satisfy the Parliament and Council of the State of their Proceedings upon it, and the former declar'd their Sense of the Care of the States of Holland to find out the Authors of the horrid Murder of Dr. Dorislaus, and hop'd the States would be careful of their Agent Mr. Strickland, now there. They further declar'd, That the Lives of those Persons of the King's Party who were excepted from Pardon, should answer for the Life of Dr. Dorislaus.

Having mention'd the Treaty of Westphalia, it is fit to take Notice, that what neither King Westphalia nor King Charles could effect in behalf of the Queen of Bohemia and her Children, was by that Treaty effected in Part, and the Prince Elector restor'd to the Palatinate, but not to latine re: the Electorate, nor to those Territories given the Elector of Bavaria, with the Electoral Dignity held by the Palatine of the Rhine, who was made an Elector, and the last in Place. On that Score, his Highness wrote a Letter to the Parliament, notifying his Return to his own Country, giving them humble Thanks for their Favour, and desiring the Continuance of his Stipend and the Payment of his Arrears, which was order'd, as also a Pass for himself and his Attendants 40 Horse, but none other to go over with him.

On the 23d of March, the Parliament resolv'd on an Act for an Assessment of 90000 Pounds a Month to maintain the Army and Fleet. The Commissioners for this Act were the Justices of Peace in the several Counties, and the Lord Mayor Andrews, Alderman Wollaston, Alderman Detbick, and Mr. Francis Allen, were appointed Treasurers for this Assessment. The House took into serious Consideration the Relief of Ireland, which, after some Hesitation, Lieut. Gen. Cromwel undertook in Person, and eight Days after the House voted, That they approve of Lieutenant General Cromwel to be Commander in Chief of all the Forces sent into Ireland; and to take off any Reflection upon the General, or Dislike by him, they also voted, That the Lord Fairfax be General of all the Forces in England and Ireland.

In the mean Time, a mutinous Spirit was working in the Army, and the Disaffected, who express'd their ill Humour in Libels, such as rag'd. Lilburn and Wakwyn, Prince and Overton, were so strongly abetted, that a Petition was presented to the Parliament from divers Citizens of London and Westminster, in behalf of those Offenders, then in Prison.

On the 12th, the Lord General Fairfax, Lieutenant General Cromwel, Bulstrode Whitlocke, Esq; John Lisle, Esq; Sir Henry Vane, jun. Lord Chief Justice Rolfs, Lord Chief Baron Wild, Alderman Wilson, and many Members of Parliament, went to the Common Council of London to borrow 120000 Pounds for the Use of the Army intended for Ireland, and it was lent according to their Desire.

The House made an excellent Order, That Justices of the Commissioners of the Great Seal and the Judges, shall receive Complaints against any disaffected Justices of the Peace, and upon Proof of the Charges against them, shall remove them, and put other well affected Persons into Commission. They also agreed on the Form of the new Coin to be thus: On the one Side to be Levellers.

The Levellers were privately encourag'd by the Royalists, tho' their Principles, if they were real in their Professions, were the very Antipodes of Tyranny and Superstition. This Faction grew out of that of the Agitators, and were made use of by Cromwel to bring about the Death of the King, which he had no sooner accomplish'd than he would fain have rid himself of the Levellers. But the latter were aware of his Design, and being afraid of his Power, they flew out into Rebellion against him and his Masters, provok'd to it especially by the Death of one Lockyer a Trooper, who, with five more Mutineers, was sentenc'd by the Council of War to be shot for Mutiny. The five found Mercy, but the Sentence was executed on Lockyer; and the Multitude, to shew that the Fire was not quench'd by it, attended him to his Grave with as much Pomp as a Multitude could think of. They were led by 100 Troopers, five and six in a File preceding the Corpse, before which march'd six Trumpeters founding a Soldier's Knell; then came Lockyer the Trooper's Horse cloath'd all over in Mourning, and led by a Footman. The Corpse was adorn'd with Bundles of Rosemary, one half stain'd with Blood, and the Sword of the Deceas'd with them. After these march'd some Thousands in Ranks and Files. All had Seagreen and Black Ribbons ty'd in their Hats, and to their Breasts, and the Women brought up the Rear. At the new Church-yard in Westminster some Thousands more of the better Sort met them, but these thought not fit to go thorough with the Procession, and march through the City.

Whitlocke observes that this was look'd upon as an Affront to the Parliament and Army, and it was owing chiefly to the Ferment which the Cavaliers, who could do nothing else, kept up with great Industry in the Minds of the Malecontents, who by their Leaders Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, Mr. William Wakwyn, Mr. Thomas Prince, and Mr. Richard Overton, form'd a new Model of Government, and publish'd a Draught of it, consisting of Thirty Articles, for which, notwithstanding various Petitions in their Favour, these Mutineers were order'd to be prosecuted capitally. The Royalists were extremely delighted with these Disturbances, and one of their chief Historians terms this factious Crew the Honest Levellers; and Lilburn, whom Laud caus'd to be so bloodily dealt with during his Tyranny, the honest Lieutenant Colonel, so courteous are they now he is in Danger of being hang'd for them by his Frenzy or Folly. The Levellers about a Fortnight after Lockyer was shot broke out into open Rebellion under one William Thompson, who having been condemn'd to be shot, was pardon'd, and now appointed a Rendezvous for all their Party near Banbury in Oxfordshire, where he publish'd his Declaration, inviting People to join with him to establish the above-mention'd Form of Government, and to demand Justice for the Death of Mr. Arnold, an Agitator formerly shot at Ware, and for the Blood of Mr. Robert Lockyer, murdered at London by Martial Law. Into this Party fell all Officers and Soldiers who thought themselves disoblig'd by the Parliament or Council of State. There had been several Regiments order'd for Ireland, and to prevent any Disgust, those Regiments were drawn by Lots.

The Troopers of Col. Scrope's Regiment quarter'd in and about Salisbury, declar'd against this Service, and having corrupted some of Ireton's and other Soldiers, twelve Troops left their Officers, and endeavour'd to join the Mutineers under Thompson, but were intercepted near Abingdon by the Generals Fairfax and Cromwel, to whom they submitted, and the Generals detach'd Col. Reynolds to pursue Thompson, who fled at his Approach into the Town of Banbury; but finding he could not defend it, he order'd a Party to make a Stand at a Lane's End while the rest drew off towards Burford. Col. Reynolds met them at Nenebridge, which he made good against them while the Generals advanc'd with a Body of the Army. The Mutineers forded the River and got into Burford. General Fairfax came up with them the 14th of May, about Twelve at Night, having sent a Forlorn under Capt. Okey to assist Reynolds. Okey met Thompson's Scouts, drove them into the Town, which the General's Regiment of Horse and other Forces enter'd. The Mutineers made some Resistance by firing out at the Windows; but the General, to prevent their Destruction, and that of the Town, offering them Quarter, they yielded. There were taken in the Place 900 Horse and Arms, 400 Prisoners, and 12 Colours. The Prisoners were most of them Troopers, seduc'd into this Mutiny, many of the Multitude ran away at Banbury, and not above 40 that were in Burford escap'd, among them was Thompson, who being join'd by other Desperadoes, possess'd himself of Northampton, of the Ordnance, Ammunition, Provisions and Money there. From thence he went to Wellingborough, and was pursu'd by Capt. Butler with a Party of Horse, who fell into his Quarters, took most of his Men, and Thompson made his Escape into a Wood, which Butler beset, and found him there. He was well mounted, and tho' alone, rode desperately up to Butler's Party, shot a Cornet, wounded another, and retreated to a Bush, having himself receiv'd two Wounds. As Butler's Men approach'd near him, he charg'd again with his Pistol, receiv'd another Shot, and retreated again. He came up a third Time, crying, I scorn to take Quarter, and then a Corporal with a Carabine loaden with seven Bullets shot him dead, and with him dy'd a wretched Cause, in which the Royalists had founded all their Hopes. His Brother, one Cornet Deane, and some other Ringleaders were try'd by a Council of War, condemn'd, and shot to Death.

Routed,

and kill'd.

These Mutinies caus'd the passing of an Act to declare Treasons, and to serve in the same Cases as the Statute of 25 Edw. III. To affirm that the present Government was tyrannical, usurp'd or unlawful, or that the Commons in Parliament are not the supreme Authority, or to endeavour to alter the present Government, was declar'd High Treason; the like to affirm the same of the Council of State; the like to contrive the Death of the General or Lieutenant General of the Army. To raise Mutinies amongst the Soldiers, to join with those that invade England or Ireland, to levy War against the Parliament, to counterfeit the Great Seal, to kill any Member of Parliament, Judge, or Minister of Justice

A. D. in that Duty. This Act, and all Acts of the Commonwealth pass'd in Parliament, were proclaim'd by the Sheriffs and Magistrates all over England.

The Generals Fairfax and Cromwell at Oxford. After the General and Lieutenant General had suppress'd the Mutineers in Oxfordshire, they both went to Oxford, attended with several Officers of the Army; the University having sent a Deputation to invite them to that City, Colonel Zanby being then one of the Proctors, as Fellow of All-Souls College. Having been nobly entertain'd, they were created Doctors of the Civil Law, and the following made Masters of Art; Sir Hardress Waller, Major General Harrison, Col. Richard Ingoldsby, Col. John Hewson, Col. John Okey, Major Blackmore, John Rushworth, Esq; Edmund Scrope, Esq; George Sedaine, Esq; Adjutant General, Col. Edward Grosvenour, Col. William Goffe, Col. Owen Roe, Francis Buller, Esq; Major Browne, Col. Cobbet, &c.

Whitlocke, a much better Scholar than the Oxonians have to produce against him, informs us, divers learned and congratulatory Speeches were made to the Generals by the Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Reynolds, afterwards Bishop of Norwich, the Proctors, and other Heads and Officers of the University. From Oxford the Lord General went to the Isle of Wight to view the Ports there; thence to Southampton, Portsmouth, and as he drew near London he had a Rendezvous of the Army. The next Day, May the 31st, he arriv'd at London, as did also Lieutenant General Cromwell, and both having made Report of their suppressing the Mutineers, and quieting the Army and Country, they had the solemn Thanks of the House, and a Day of Thanksgiving being appointed for it, some of the Common-Council of London brought a Message to the Parliament, to invite them to dine that Day with the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, at Grocers Hall, and to desire that they might have the Favour to solemnize that Day with the House at what Church they pleas'd. The House voted Christ-Church should be the Place, and return'd the City their hearty Thanks for their Invitation, as did also the General and the Officers of the Army, who were also invited. The Council of State took the Ceremonial of this Feast into Consideration, and having made their Report to the Parliament, it was order'd, That when the Speaker with the House came into the City, the Lord-Mayor should deliver up to him the Sword, as he us'd to do to the King, and that at the Feast the Speaker should sit above the Lord-Mayor. On the 7th of June the Speaker, with the House of Commons, the Lord General, with the Officers of the Army, the Lord President, with the Council of State, after having heard two Sermons preach'd by Mr. Goodwin and Dr. Owen, went to Grocers Hall to Dinner. The Speaker sat first, next to him the Lord-Mayor, then the Lord General: Then the Earl of Pembroke call'd to the Lord Commissioner Whitlocke to sit down, as the eldest Commissioner of the Great Seal; Whitlocke excus'd it, desiring the Earl to sit down first; but he spoke aloud, What do you think I will sit down before you? I have given Place heretofore to Bishop Williams, to my Lord Coventry, and to my Lord Littleton, and you have the same Place they had, and as much Honour belongs to the Place under a Commonwealth as under a King, and you are a Gentleman as well born and bred as any of them. The Earl oblig'd Mr. Whitlocke to take Precedence of him, sitting down himself next to him: Then the Lord President of the Council, and the other Commissioners of the Great Seal, then the Earl of Salisbury and the Lord Howard, then Lieutenant General Cromwell, and other Members of Parliament, and of the Council of State. At two Tables on each Side of the Hall sat other Members, and at a Table in the Middle of the Hall sat Major General Lambert, and other Officers of the Army. The Judges sat in a Room over the Parlour, which was very large; the Aldermen and some Common Council Men at another Table in the same Room. The Musick was only Drums and Trumpets. The Feast was very sumptuous. No Healths were drunk, nor any Incivility pass'd. Besides the Overplus of the Meats left at Dinner, 400*l.* was given to the Poor of London.

The next Day some Members of the House and of the City were order'd to return the Parliament's hearty Thanks to the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen and Common Council, for their great Love and Civilities Yesterday express'd to the Parliament and Army; and a Committee having consider'd what Mark of Honour and Favour should be bestow'd upon the City for their real Affection to the Commonwealth, 'twas reported, and resolv'd, That New Park near Richmond, and all the Deer in it, should be given them; and the City presented the Lord General with a large and weighty Basin and Ewer of beaten Gold, and Lieutenant General Cromwell with 300 Pounds in Plate and 200 Pieces of Gold; but Echard, after such another History Writer, affirms, the City Cooks were forc'd to take an Oath that they would not poison the Lord Mayor's Guests. I wonder he left out what the same Historian said after, The Saints were too full of the Creature, Anglice, drunk. I have sometimes made use of this Author my self, but it was not out of choice, or for his Excellence, but when I thought his Authority would be prefer'd to Whitlocke or Rushworth, as it is by all the Admirers of the Lord Clarendon, and Mr. Echard's Sincerity and Impartiality for this Historian does certainly as well deserve to be admir'd as they do.

The Commonwealth being pretty well settled at home, they took into Consideration the State of their Affairs abroad. Prince Rupert had got together almost twenty Sail of Ships, with which he made some Attempts against the Parliament's Friends on the Coast of Ireland. Admiral Blake and Admiral Dean, with a Squadron of Men of War, were order'd for that Coast to watch his Motions, and Admiral Popham to cruize off Portugal, and hinder his sheltering in any of the Ports of that Kingdom. Blake and Dean having block'd up Prince Rupert in Kinsale, the latter was order'd to lie with his Squadron off Ireland, between that and England; and Admiral Popham, when he return'd from the Coast of Portugal, where he intercepted Part of the Brazil Fleet, which he sent home to England, had Orders to guard the Coast between the Downs and Portsmouth, Sir George Ayscue lay in Dublin Road. Thus was England secur'd against any Enemy from without, and had none to fear from within but a restless Party, who were instigating the Scots to raise new Troubles, tho' they had paid so dearly for the like Enterprizes the last Year, and are like to pay as dearly again the next.

The Affairs of Ireland were almost at the Extremity when the Parliament proceeded against the late King in the manner we have related. The Earl of Inchiquin, disgusted at some Sights which he thought the Lord Lisle, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, had put upon him, and at the Parliament's taking no more Notice of him, which was occasion'd in a great measure by their

Parliament and Generals feasted by the City.

A. D. 1649. Divisions in England, resolv'd to be reveng'd, and sacrifice his Country and Religion to his Resentment; and tho' Col. Temple had oblig'd him against his Will to fall upon the Irish, whom the English had taken at a Disadvantage, and routed them, with the Slaughter of some Thousands, yet he soon after declar'd against the Parliament, and join'd with the Irish Rebels, with whom Ormond, return'd to Ireland from France, join'd again; and they altogether would have utterly destroy'd the English Interest in that Kingdom, had not the Discontent of one of the most inveterate of those Rebels, Owen Roe O'Neal, their General in Ulster, hinder'd their accomplishing their Design before the Army arriv'd from England, and put an End to them all by Conquest and Chastisement. Not only the Earl of Inchiquin had deserted the Parliament's Service, the Lord Broghill, who had serv'd them very faithfully and successfully, had form'd the same Design; and having procur'd a Pass, by Means of the Earl of Warwick, under Pretence of going to Aix la Chapelle to drink the Waters, he came privately to London, intending to wait upon the King in France. He was no sooner arriv'd at London, but there came to him a Gentleman from Oliver, lately made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to acquaint him that the Lord General Cromwell would pay him a Visit if he knew when he would be at Leisure to receive him, which very much surpriz'd Broghill, who had never had any Acquaintance with him; wherefore he told the Gentleman he suppos'd he was mistaken in the Person to whom he was sent; which the Messenger convincing him that he was not, the Lord Broghill own'd who he was, and said he would not give his Excellency the Trouble, but would wait upon him. The Gentleman had not been long gone before Cromwell came himself, and after the first Salutations, desir'd to speak with his Lordship in private, when he told him he had a great Respect for him, and was therefore come to acquaint him with something that very nearly concern'd him, and to give him Advice upon it. He then let him know that the Council of State had Information of his Design in crossing the Water, which the Lord Broghill had communicated to two or three trusty Friends only, that instead of going to the Spaw he intended to go to the King, and take a Commission from him to act against the Parliament in Ireland: That the Council had good Proof of what he said, and could produce Copies of his Letters to that Purpose, upon which it was resolv'd to send him Prisoner to the Tower, which had been done if himself had not prevented it, and obtain'd Time for him to confer with his Lordship, to see whether he might not be prevail'd with to alter his Purpose. The Lord Broghill, seeing it would signify nothing to evade the Matter, begg'd Cromwell's Pardon, thank'd him for his good Offices, and desir'd him to advise him. Cromwell return'd his Compliment, and said, the Council of State and he were no Strangers to his Actions in Ireland, and the subduing of the Rebels being committed to him, he was empower'd by the Council to offer him a General Command if he would serve in that War. This Offer was made so frankly, and the Necessity of that Service so well explain'd, that Broghill accepted it, and gave his Word and Honour that he would be faithful to the Parliament. Cromwell was very well pleas'd with having engag'd him in their Interest; and the Lord Broghill having receiv'd a Commission to be Master of the Ordnance, and to command in Munster, repair'd to Bristol, where he embark'd for Ireland, and was no sooner arriv'd in that Kingdom, than several Gentlemen who had serv'd under him in those Wars, join'd him, with whom and their Followers he form'd a Troop of Horse, and in a little Time rais'd a Regiment of 1500 Foot, which were in a Readiness to join Cromwell at his Landing. Till then he was forc'd to stand on the Defensive, and indeed he would not have been able to have made his Levies, if Ormond and Inchiquin, with their Irish Rebels, Papists and Cavaliers, had not been employ'd in the Siege of Dublin, which they had much streighten'd. Col. Monk had deliver'd up Dundalk to Inchiquin, and Tredah was surrender'd to Ormond and the Irish Rebels. Monk pretended the Scots had deserted him, and going over to England, he was question'd for corresponding with O'Neal. Ormond's Forces took Rathfarnham near Dublin, and 1500 of them were sent to fortify Bagginath. In order to hinder the English Army from landing at Ringsend, Bagginath had a Rampart of Earth about it, and the Enemy had wrought upon it a whole Night to augment its Strength. The next Morning Col. Jones, Governor of Dublin, perceiving their Design, thought it absolutely necessary to remove them from thence before their Work was finish'd. To that End he drew all his Forces, both Horse and Foot, to the Works that fac'd the Enemy, and leaving a sufficient Body of Men in the Town to defend it, he sall'y'd out, August the 2d, with about 1200 Horse and 4000 Foot, who soon enter'd the Enemy's new Works, and slew most of the 1500 Men who were employ'd in it, their Horse deserting them at the first Charge. Sir William Vaughan, who commanded them, was kill'd. Those that escap'd fled to their Main Body, and brought News of their Defeat to Ormond, who was at Cards, and cry'd, I wish the Rebels would come, that we may have some Sport with them. But the Words were hardly out of his Mouth before the English were come indeed, and falling into his Camp, upon which he flung down his Cards and got two or three Regiments to engage, but they were soon routed, and himself, with the Remnants of his Royal Army, as 'twas call'd, fled in great Confusion to Rathmims. Col. Jones follow'd him closely, finding little Opposition except from a Party of Inchiquin's Horse that had formerly serv'd the Parliament, who defended a Pass for some Time, Ormond and whom having defeated and dispers'd, he march'd with all Diligence up to the Walls of Rathmims, which the Irish Rebels expected he would storm, and threw down their Arms, Ormond not staying there for his coming. The Popish and Cavalier Army were 19000, and Col. Jones's not much above 5000; yet they slew 4000, took almost 3000 Prisoners, besides 2000 that surrender'd in a Body, voluntarily offering to serve the Parliament, of whose Forces not above twenty were missing, but many wounded. This glorious Action would scarce be credible, if it was not confirm'd even by the Report of the Royalists, and it is a particular Happiness their Historians have to pass off their Generals as Heroes even in the Midst of the most shameful Rout and utter Ruin. Ormond's Brother was taken by Col. Reynolds, who threaten'd to pistol him unless he shew'd which way his Brother fled. The Colonel pursu'd him, and came so near as to take one of his Company. But Ormond himself was too nimble for all Pursuit, tho' he hang'd a great Number for flying. The Plunder of the Field was very great, 4000 Pounds in Cash was found in Rathfarnham. The Papists and Royalists abandon'd all their little Garrisons near Dublin, and a Week after they rais'd the Siege of Londonderry, which had been gallantly

A. D. 1649. lantly defended by Sir Charles Coote. Thus were the Affairs of Ireland in a very promising Condition, when Lieutenant General Cromwel arriv'd there about the 20th of August, with an Army of 12000 Horse and Foot, which with the Forces in and about Dublin made 16 or 17000 Men. As his Departure from London was with Princely Pomp, so was his Reception at Dublin, where he made a smooth Speech to the Officers, Civil and Military, and others who waited to receive him at his Landing. Ormond soon after sent Trumpets to Col. Jones on several Errands, but Cromwel would give them no Hearing, saying, All Addresses must be made to himself, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He staid not many Days at Dublin, but took the Field; and Ormond shutting up his Men in garrison'd Towns, Cromwel besieg'd Drogheda, where were between 3 and 4000 Men under Sir Arthur Aston, the Popish Governor of Reading. The English, after they had batter'd the Town a while, enter'd at a Breach, and were forc'd out again, but at the second Attack they drove the Papists and Cavaliers into the Upper Town, which they enter'd with them, and put all they met in Arms to the Sword. Sir Arthur Aston the Governor, and some of the chief Officers, as Col. Walton a Papist, Col. Castles, and Col. Symonds, got into the Mill-mount, a strong Fort in the Town, but Cromwel's Men storm'd it, master'd it, and slew them all. 140 of these Desperadoes got into a Tower, and being summon'd, would not yield, but kill'd and wounded some of the Protestant Soldiers, till seeing the English about to enter, they flung down their Arms. The Officers were knock'd on the Head, the Men decimated, and the rest ship'd for Barbadoes. The Author of the History of the Rebellion here is very merry: Sir Arthur Aston made no doubt of defending the Place; the Marquis of Ormond made less doubt of relieving it; and then comes a Passage, the Mirth of which is taken off by the Falstity: He put every Man, Governor and Officers, to the Sword; he put all the Citizens who were Irish, Man, Woman and Child, to the Sword; which is so scandalously false, that I ought not to take any Notice of his History, till some of his Adorers and Copiers have given the World Satisfaction in it. Ludlow assures us, Cromwel's Command about Quarter related to the Soldiers only, and Whitlocke, after Cromwel himself, that a Lieutenant of the Garrison of Drogheda carry'd the News of its being taken to Ormond, which shews they were not all kill'd.

And Wexford.

After this Success the Lord Lieutenant march'd to Wexford, from thence Commissioners came to treat; but no Cessation of Arms having been agreed upon, Cromwel's Men batter'd the Castle, made a Breach, enter'd it, and set up their Colours; at Sight of which the Enemy left their Station in all Parts, and the Town was taken without further Opposition. Here the Slaughter was not great, and many more of the Irish Rebels and Cavaliers perish'd by crowding into and oversetting Boats in the Harbour than by the Sword. After these Successes the Army grew sickly, but the Parliament took care to send Recruits in time, which enabled the Lord Lieutenant to reduce Ross and Goran, the latter surrendering at Discretion, and delivering up the Officers, Cromwel order'd them to be shot to Death. Kilkenny made some small Resistance, but yielded on what Terms the Lord Lieutenant thought fit to give them. Youghall, Cork and Kinsale were deliver'd to the Parliament's Forces by the Contrivance and Diligence of some Officers, and well affected Persons in those Places. The Lord Broghill came to the General at Wexford with 200 Horse and about 2000 Foot, to which were join'd a Body of the English Army, and his Lordship was order'd to watch the Motions of Inchiquin, while the Lord Lieutenant laid Siege to Clonmel; in his March thither he was met by the Corporation of Feather with a Tender of their Submission, which he accepted, left his sick Men there, and then sat down before Clonmel, the Garrison of which Town, with their Governor Colonel Hugh O Neale, an Irish Massacrer at their Head, march'd out in the Night, after Commissioners, whom they had sent to treat had sign'd an Agreement to surrender the Town the next Day. Dungarvon and Carrick were next reduc'd, and then the Lord Lieutenant march'd to Waterford, having sent Orders to the Forces about Dublin, which were in better Health to join his Army. The latter, 1500 Foot and 500 Horse were attack'd by the Lord Inchiquin between Ardo and Wexford, who had some Advantage at the first Charge, but Cromwel's Men, though miserably afflicted with the Flux, rally'd very resolutely, attack'd and broke a Body of Inchiquin's Horse, upon which the rest drew off, and permitted Cromwel's Soldiers to continue their March. Inchiquin's Men had serv'd under him, when he was in the Parliament's Service, and General Ludlow reflects upon it thus, By which it eminently appear'd of what Importance it is towards Success to fight in the Cause of our Country, for these very Men, as long as they were engag'd with us perform'd Wonders against the Rebels, and now being engag'd with them were almost as easily overcome, as they had beaten the Irish before. In Clarendon and Echard we are fed with Hopes and Expectations of Miracles to be done by Ormond and Inchiquin, whose Achievements are not worth remembrance, since they leagu'd with the Irish Massacrers. The latter had a mean Opinion of them, and their Performances witness what one of their Leaders, the Lord of Glenmaleiro, said at a Consultation how to destroy the English Army; some advis'd to draw all their Forces together to give Battle, others to betake themselves to the Woods and Bogs, and from thence break Cromwel's Forces by Parties, but that Lord assur'd them of a Way, which if taken would certainly effect it, and that is, said he, Induce them to make Peace with us, for they are a successful Army, and our Men are dispirited, and not likely to get any Thing by fighting with them, and to weary them out by our Surprises and Depredations, is impossible, as long as the Way from England is open for their Supplies. But the other Way I propose will infallibly ruin them. For did not our Ancestors by the same Means render the Conquests of Queen Elizabeth fruitless to the English, and have we not thereby ruined the Earl of Ormond and Inchiquin already, who having been always successful when against us, have been famous for nothing since their Conjunction with us, but the Losses and Repulses which they have sustain'd. Yet the Earl of Clarendon leads this same Ormond through his History, driving his Enemies every where before him, and makes his very Name to be as terrible to the Roundheads as Cromwel's was to the Irish Rebels, and their Confederates the Royalists.

While Cromwel was preparing for the Siege of Waterford, he received a Letter from the Parliament of England, requiring his Attendance there, to concert with him the Management of their intended War with the Scots, who had invited King Charles the Second to take Possession of that Kingdom, which was to help him to recover

England;

A. D. 1649. England; and how they help'd him, and how they paid for it, will be seen in the following Pages. But we must first inquire into the Fortune of Prince Rupert, who was in Ireland with a Squadron of Ships to assist Ormond and the Irish Rebels as far as he himself had Assistance.

Prince Rupert. The Winter approaching, General Blake was oblig'd to enter into Harbour, by which Means Prince Rupert with the Ships then in Irish Ports, had an Opportunity to escape and sail to Lisbon, where they were relieved and protected. General Popham follow'd him, and was order'd to declare War with that King, if he did not forbid the English revolted Ships his Ports, which he refusing to do, the Parliament order'd their Admirals to take all Portugal Ships that came in their Way. The English Admiral kept Prince Rupert in the River of Lisbon as long as his Provisions lasted, but being obliged to remove for Supplies, the Prince made his Escape, and sail'd to Malaga, but his Fleet were separated in a Storm. The Parliament's Ships observ'd and pursu'd the Prince very narrowly. The latter lost all his Ships but two, which his Pursuers looking upon as inconsiderable, and not worth their Time and Pains to hunt after them, return'd and left him Sea-Room to come with them into France.

King Charles II. It is Time to take some Notice of the Proceedings of the young King Charles II. who was at the Hague when his Father was beheaded, and in a very poor Condition, insomuch that his Credit would not pass for 200 Pounds, as appears by the following Note of his Hand to Mr. L'Empereur, a Banker at the Hague, which I transcrib'd from the Original.

The Hage, 4th Dec. 1648.

Charles P.

Received of Mr. Emperor for my Service the Sum of two hundred Pounds, which I oblige my self to see repay'd within three Months after the Date hereof. And I assure you it is a Kindness I am very sensible of, and in return of it I shall be ready to appear,

Your affectionate,

C. P.

Mr. L'Empereur refus'd to lend this Money, though the Duke of York did some Time after offer to be bound for it, as by this Letter. I give the original Spelling, to shew what Scribes their Royal Highnesses, or their Secretaries were,

Mr. Emperore,

My Brother hath desired you to lend 200 Pounds, and it is my Desire also that you would lend it him, which if you, or any of your Friends do I shall take it as a great Kindness, and I promise to see it payed in 6 Months. I rest,

Your Friend,

Yorke.

But lest both these Letters and Securities should not succeed, the Duke of York writes to Mr. ——— a Servant of his, to try what he could do on his own Credit.

I Used all my Power to procure two Hundred Pounds, but I cannot yet compass it, els truly you should have had it payed you. I have sent a Blank with my Hand to it, pray they if any Body will be so much my Friend as to lend it, and assure them, upon the Word of a Prince, I will most faithfully repay it. Methinks you should find some Body so kind to me as to trust me for such a Sum as two Hundred Pounds. A. D. 1649. I am sure I have never broke my Word with any Body yet, nor never will, and whoever doth me this Kindness I shall always remember as my Friend; and if ever it lieth in my Power he shall find how kindly I take it. I am always, Your affectionate, Yorke.

Neither of these Letters had any Success with L'Empereur, but the Gentleman to whom they were address'd joining his own Security with theirs, in about 8 Month's Time got another Banker, one Boyer, to advance the Money. One may easily conceive to what Want and Misery these two unhappy Princes were reduc'd, by the numerous Crowd of Fugitives who hung upon them for Bread, and the small Supplies the ruin'd Cavaliers could furnish them with. The Gentleman to whom these Letters were address'd, was sent to Venice to try what the Senate would do for the late King in his Life-time, but he had cold Entertainment there. The Lord Crofts and Sir John Denham had the Character of Ambassadors to the King of Poland, and they borrow'd of the English Merchants in his Dominions 10000 Pounds, which had but small neat Produce after the Charge of the Embassy was deducted. The Czar of Muscovy sent no Money, but to oblige King Charles the Second he drove all the English Traders out of his Country. And though the Queen very much magnify'd the Assistance King Charles might expect from France, yet she her self found so little when she retir'd thither for Subsistence, that she was allow'd but 12000 Crowns a Year, and 6 Months after the King her Husband's Death that Pension was reduc'd to 7000 Crowns a Year, and so far was she from being in any Condition to support her Sons, that she could not maintain her self and her Daughter the Princess Henrietta Maria in the Plight of a rich Citizen's Wife. Cardinal Retz speaks of it thus in his Memoirs. "A few Days before the King left Paris I visited the Queen of England, whom I found in the Apartment of her Daughter, since Madam D'Orleans, You see Sir, said the Queen, I come to keep Henrietta Company. The poor Child has lain in Bed all Day for want of a Fire. The Truth is, Cardinal Mazarine having stopp'd the Queen's Pension 6 Months, Tradersmen were unwilling to give her Credit, and there was not a Chip of Wood in the House. You may be sure I took Care that a Princess of Great Britain should not be confin'd to her Bed next Day for want of a Faggot. And a few Days after I exaggerated the Scandal of this Neglect, and the Parliament sent the Queen a Present of 40000 Livres. Posterity will hardly believe, that the Queen of England's Daughter, and the Grand-daughter to Henry the Great, wanted a Faggot to get out of Bed in the Month of January in the Lowre, and at the Court of France." De Retz adds, Her Condition made little Impression on the Minds of the People at that Time. For though the Earl of Clarendon would fain have you believe that the King and his Followers were received by Foreigners as if they had not been Exiles, but were travelling for their Glory or Pleasure, yet it is most certain, they were no where Welcome, and where-ever they were suffer'd 'twas out of Decency more than Choice, unless any foreign Power took Occasion to quarrel with England, and then the Exiles were caref'd, and flatter'd with golden Hopes, till a Peace was made again, which never fail'd to banish them out of the Territories they had shelter'd in.

The

1649.

The Earl of Clarendon gives us a very splendid and wordy Account of his and the Lord Cottington's Embassy to the Court of Spain, from whence they brought not a Penny of Money for their Master, and where they often wanted a Penny for themselves. When these Lords Ambassadors arriv'd in Spain, they inform'd the Catholick King and his Ministers, That the Parliament of England had been in Arms against their Master's Father, had prevail'd against him, and caus'd him to be put to Death, which was stale News to them; their Minister in England, Don Cardenas, a Grandee of Spain, having been one of the first who congratulated the Commonwealth, who accepted not of his Compliment at first, on Account of some Failure in the Address, which the Don soon mended, and the Earl of Clarendon knew this. He knew that the Spaniards courted the Friendship of the Parliament more than that of any Monarch, Prince or State in the World; yet his Brother Cottington and he were at the Pains to cross the Country from Brussels to Madrid to tell the King of Spain, That their Master, Son and Heir to the late King, was kept out of his Kingdom by the aforesaid Parliament, which indeed was very true, but so well known that it was hardly worth telling; and that he desir'd the King of Spain's neighbourly Assistance to establish him into his Rights and Dignities: A hopeful Errand these Lord Ambassadors, for so Sir Edward Hyde always calls himself and his Brother Cottington, went upon, and they had as hopeful an Answer. The King of Spain was sorry for his Father's ill Success, wishing he had been more Prosperous: That he condol'd with him for his Father's Death, and was much affected with Sorrow at the Manner of it: That concerning the Difference between him and the Parliament, and the Rights on the one or the other Side, they being Matters out of his Territories and Jurisdictions, he could not take Cognizance of them, nor should he meddle therein: Such was the Success of the Lord Ambassador Hyde's Magnificent Embassy, the Pumps and Vanities of which, whoever has a Mind to see, will find abundant Satisfaction in his Detail of the Embassy in near 100 Pages of the History of the Rebellion; only Sir Edward Hyde had the Misfortune to drop his Brother Ambassador, who staid behind him in Spain, and openly profess'd the Popish Religion, which his Places would not let him do in England.

An Accident happen'd while these Ambassadors were in Spain, which might have prov'd fatal to them, had the Friendship between England and Spain been better fix'd, and that was the before mention'd Murder of Mr. Ascham the English Minister at Madrid, who arriv'd there with Credentials from the Parliament, after which no Body could think the two other Ambassadors would have any Notice taken of them. One of the Assassins who murder'd the Envoy Mr. Ascham and his Interpreter Ripa, a Spanish Priest, was Progers, a Servant of the Lord Ambassador Hyde's, whose Account of the Murder represents it as a gallant Action, which a little Discretion would have hinder'd, for it was neither discreet nor decent to talk libellously of an Assassination, which rid him of a Rival he was in no Capacity to cope with in Show, Expence or Interest. Twice does the well bred Historian call Mr. Ascham, this Fellow, out of burning Envy, at the Magnificence of his Appearance, and the Largeness of his Appointments, a French Author says, On assignat a Ascham deplus gages qu' aux autres afin qu' il put faire un depense qui repondit au faste de la Cour d'

Espagne, le Ministre fit a Madrid une des entrees les plus superbes qu' on eut jamais veu faire ades Ambassadeurs de tetes Couronnees. "He had a greater Salary than ordinary, that his Expence might be answerable to the Splendor of the Court of Spain. He made one of the most pompous Entries into Madrid that Ambassadors of crown'd Heads had ever been seen to make." The King of Spain sent an Agent express to give an Account to the Parliament of England of the great Industry of his Ministers to discover the Murderers, whom the Earl of Clarendon stiles the poor Gentlemen. The Council of State was for resenting the Murder, as became the Dignity of so potent a Republick, and for making Representations accordingly to the Parliament; but Oliver hinder'd it, saying, All in good Time; and the Commonwealth had not yet determin'd which Scale to put their Weight into, that of France or Spain: However he spoke to the Spanish Ambassador Cardenas, in a Tone that gave him Reason to fear the Consequences, if Satisfaction was not given the Parliament, who wrote to the Catholick King; thus,

The Parliament of the Commonwealth of England to the most serene and most potent Prince, Philip IV. King of Spain.

"HAving to our great Grief, been inform'd of the Murder of our Minister, Mr. Ascham, in your capital City, by an infamous Parricide, we earnestly entreat your Majesty to punish those Assassins as they deserve, &c.

They all made their Escape but one, and he was hang'd, to the great Mortification of the Lord Ambassadors, Hyde and Cottington.

The King was at the Hague, when his Ambassadors set out for Spain; but the Assassination of Doristlaus made that Place uneasy to him; so he remov'd to Breda, leaving his Train to come after him; thence he went to Antwerp; thence to Brussels; and thence to St. Germain's in France, where his Mother resided, and where there was some Difference among his Followers, concerning Col. Windham, Governor of Bridgewater, when Fairfax took it, whom the King had a great Mind to make Secretary, for which, as little Business as there was for one, Sir Edward Hyde assures us he was not at all fit, and it is one of the truest Characters in the History. From St. Germain's, the King went to Jersey, from whence he intended to go to Ireland, but was prevented by the Rapidity of Cromwel's Conquests there: To Jersey came Commissioners from the Parliament of Scotland to invite him to that Kingdom, and how that Affair succeeded will be told in the next Year's Transactions: In the mean Time he was proclaim'd King in Jersey, and about 300 Royalists came with, and repair'd to him there, but brought small Effects with them; and one may see how unmercifully the banish'd Cavaliers plunder'd this unfortunate Prince; for Whitlocke informs us Mazarine sent him 100000 Crowns, when he was going to Jersey; and Richard says, he had but 300 Pounds when he landed on that Island.

I have before me a Letter written by the Duke of York, to the Envoy at Venice, who was also commission'd to go to Savoy, and several Princes of Italy, but had no better Success than what we read in it.

I Have receiv'd both your Letters, and am very glad you have done so well in Council of the Army.

Besides, the Council of State, whose Powers we have already mention'd, there was a Council of the Army, of whom we shall have too much Occasion to speak in the Sequel of this History. They were now a little too assuming, but as yet they kept within Bounds; though they presented a Petition to the Parliament, which was sign'd by the Lord General Fairfax, and the Council of Officers, That all Laws which restrain'd Liberty of Conscience should be remov'd, especially those that enjoyn'd Popery, Prelacy, and the Common Prayer Book: They also desir'd new Laws against Profaneness, Drunkenness, Swearing, Uncleaness; That the Course of the Law may be made more easy and less expensive, &c. Col. Goffe, and Col. Pride, who presented this Petition, were call'd into the House, and had their Thanks for it. Cromwel also wrote to them for Liberty of Conscience to all but Papists and Prelatists, which was intended in Favour of Independents and Baptists, who had the greatest Interest in the Soldiery; but the Government, if the Army had not interpos'd, inclin'd rather to Presbyterian Discipline.

Sir Kennelm Dig-
by.

Sir Kenelm Digby, and Mr. Walter Montagu lurking about London, the Parliament order'd them to depart the Commonwealth within 40 Days upon Pain of Death and Confiscation of their Estates; and if any one harbour'd either of them afterwards, his Estate was to be sequestred. Sir John Winter, another busy Papist, having staid beyond the Time formerly granted him, the Council of State were directed to take Care for the apprehending of him; upon which he surrender'd himself, disclaim'd the Pope, and all foreign Power, and put himself upon the Mercy of the Parliament.

Endeavours were us'd to bring over the restless Party of Levellers, who though humbled were not suppress'd; and to please them, Walwyn, Prince, and Overton, who had been closely confin'd, had the Liberty of the Tower given them. Some of the Grandees had also a Meeting with some of the principal Levellers, to confer about a good Understanding and Agreement between all Interests. For the Cavaliers continu'd their Intrigues to raise Disturbances under the Name of that Party; intercept Letters address'd to the Lord Cottington, advis'd the King to comply with the Levellers; and that the best Service his Friends could do him, was to set them on against the Parliament; accordingly some Soldiers of that Faction seiz'd their Officers at Oxford, fortify'd New College, from whence those Officers made their Escape to Col. Ingoldsby the Governor; who going out into the Town with a few Officers only, and commanding the mutinous Soldiers to march, pass'd on to New College, the Gates of which were open'd to him, and the Chief of the Mutineers were apprehended; the Soldiers differing among themselves, and as many being for yielding as for fighting: The Mutiny had no other ill Effects than the Death of one Centinel, shot by a Levelling Trooper, and the Punishment of the Mutineers, who had now declar'd openly that Prince Charles should be brought in; and it is strange what a Spirit there was in some Men who had been embark'd in that Cause: For Whitlocke tells, one Captain Reynolds, a Cavalier, being together with 17 more Robbers, Burglars and Murderers hang'd at Tyburn, as he was going to be turn'd off the Ladder with the Rope about his Neck, cry'd out twice, God bless the King, & Vive le Roy. The Levellers were so numerous in the City, that Lieutenant Colonel Lilburne was chosen a Common Council Man, as was also Colonel Pride; but the House vacated the Election of Lilburne, as against the disabling Act, upon which Lilburne took the Engagement as that Act directed, but with a Declaration of his own Sense upon it. Mr. Cherwyn, who procur'd his Election to be a Common Council-Man, was upon some Complaint made against him, imprison'd, and afterwards by Order of Parliament committed to Warwick Castle, and discharg'd from being a Freeman of London, by a particular Act of Parliament. Some Votes pass'd against other Citizens upon the same Business. It is no hard Matter to trace the Practices of the Disaffected in our Times from the Example of the Royalists in the Time of the Republick. They both use the same Artifices to alienate the Peoples Minds from the Government; Complaints of Taxes, of Standing Forces, of Sectaries, of cruel Prosecutions, and Injustice to the right Heir, who has in Store for them the Blessings of the golden Age; but when the People after various Changes and Revolutions, made Experiment of that Age of Gold, it was just such another Present as Jupiter sent to Epimetheus by the Lady Pandora.

We left the young King at Fersey, flatter'd with Hopes of making his Way to England through Scotland, where the bigotted Kirkmen were so out of Humour with the new Commonwealth of England, for the Scorn they put upon their Covenant, that they then prefer'd Subjection to the Son of a King whom they had dethron'd, to the Friendship of a State who would not subject their Consciences and Interests to the Biggotry and Enthusiasm of Scotts Ecclesiasticks. There were three Parties in that Kingdom, who all seem'd to be reconcil'd in the Establishing King Charles the Second on the Throne of Scotland.

One Party was that of Argyle, consisting of the most zealous of the Kirk Assembly who abhor'd Popery, Prelacy, and Independency, and had no Objection to the Commonwealth of England; but as they were afraid of its Power and its Favour to the Independents.

The other Party was that of Hamilton, who hated Popery and Prelacy, but had rather be Prelatists than Independents, and as Presbyterians were fond of Monarchical Government.

The third Party was that of Montrose, and consisted of the rank Papists and rigid Episcopalians, who matter'd not how Absolute and Arbitrary the King was over his Kingdom, if they might be Arbitrary and Absolute under him, and who were eager to venture their desperate Lives and little Fortunes in the King's Cause, only in hopes of being Masters of the Lives and Fortunes of others.

It was plain Argyle and Montrose's Parties could come no nearer one another than the two Poles; and that Hamilton's and Argyle's could only be reconcil'd while the Affair of the King's Establishment was transacting in the Manner Argyle's Party would have it.

Hamilton's and Montrose's Parties were not much nearer one another; for the Papists in Mon-

Parties in Scotland.

A. D. 1650. Montrose's Party could never come to a hearty Agreement with the Presbyterians in Hamilton's; and 'twas obvious they must fall to Pieces when they were at Leisure to think of their separate Interests, which were now precariously jumbled together; both of them in Appearance submitting to Argyle's Party as having the Kirk on their Side, though they both heartily hated them.

After this fair, though general Representation of the State of Scotland, how vain, how visionary will all the Lord Clarendon's Refinements of the King's Council appear to be, when nothing can be plainer, than that he had no Place to go to with his Train but Scotland, and that he must go thither on what Terms the Scots of Argyle's Party please to send him, which no doubt will be drawn up with little Regard to his Majesty or Honour. Those of his Counsellors who advis'd him to adhere steadily to his Father's Maxims, could not tell him where to get Money for his and their Subsistence, but being Delinquents, and liable to publick Justice at home, they valu'd not what their Master suffer'd abroad, if their Persons were by that Means kept any how out of Danger. The Scots having caus'd their King to be proclaim'd, they sent Sir George Windram, Laird of Libberton, though not very fond of the Errand, to him in Jersey with their Propositions, Scots Propositions.

1. To sign and ratify the Covenant. 2. To pass an Act disclaiming Duke Hamilton's Enterprize in England. 3. To take away the King's negative Voice in Parliament. 4. To forbid Montrose's levying any Forces. 5. To put away all Papists, and appoint Commissioners to treat with Commissioners from Scotland about a Settlement of that Kingdom. Which the King consented to, and appointed the Hague for the Place of Treaty, in which 'tis suppos'd the Counsel he had from his Mother prevail'd more than that of his Counsellors. Windram return'd to Edinburgh with this Answer, and Sir William Fleming accompany'd him, to reside there as the King's Agent, who was instructed to demand on his Master's Part, that all should be exempted from the Benefit of their Agreement, as should be found to have had a Hand in the Death of his Father, without mentioning whom, which rais'd a Jealousy that it might reach to all who concerted to the giving up the King at Newcastle, and for that Reason it was not approv'd of. The King would have had the Marquis of Argyle to come and treat with him in Person, but the Kirk would not trust that Lord in the Company that was about him. However, the Scots supply'd their King with Money to carry him from Jersey to Holland, where soon after the Commissioners from Scotland arriv'd, all Friends to the Lord Argyle.

For the States,

Their Commissioners to treat with the King.

The Earl of Cassels, the Earl of Lothian, the Lord Burley, Sir George Windram, Sir John Smith, Mr. Jefferies.

For the Kirk.

Mr. Broady, Mr. Leviston, Mr. Wood.

The King goes to Scotland.

The Treaty, as Bishop Burnet observes, was quickly concluded. The King was in no Condition to struggle, but yielded to all their Demands, of taking the Covenant himself, and suffering others to take it. "All excommunicated Persons were to be forbidden his Court; Presbytery, the Directory of Worship, and the Assembly's Confession of Faith and Catechism, to be by Law establish'd and us'd in his own Family, &c." These Conditions being solemnly sign'd, the King and his Train embark'd for Scotland on board some Ships furnish'd him by the Prince of Orange, who not being in a Condition to do it, without at least the Privy of the States, the latter were next Year brought to a Reckoning for it.

A. D. 1650.

In the mean Time the Marquis of Montrose had pick'd up between 2 and 3000 Men in Denmark and Holstein, with Intention to prepare the Way for the King's safe Reception in Scotland. Part of those Troops landed first in Orkney, and the rest at Cathness. With him came the Lord Frendrick, Sir John Hurrey, a Defecer from the Parliament to the King, Col. Johnston, Col. Gray, Sir Francis Hay, Col. James Hay, and Mr. Drummond. When all Montrose's Forces were join'd they made a Body of 2 or 3000 Men, against whom the States order'd David Lesley to march, but before he could come up Lieutenant Col. Straughan fell upon Montrose's Danes, Holsteiners, and Highlanders, and entirely defeated them, after a very warm Engagement slew 300 of them, and took 500 Prisoners; among whom were Hurrey, Frendrick, Napier, and other Persons of Note. Montrose threw himself upon the Lord Aston, but he would not protect him; on the contrary, he sent him under a strong Guard to David Lesley, who sent him to the Parliament at Edinburgh, where he was condemn'd to be hang'd on a Gibbet 30 Foot high, to be drawn and quarter'd, which Sentence was executed upon him the 21st of May; Sir John Hurrey, Col. Spotwood, Sir Francis Hay, and other of his Accomplices, were also hang'd, the Lord Frenderick starv'd himself to Death, and the Earl of Kinnoul was starv'd.

On the 16th of June the King landed in Scotland, but so privately, that it was not known till the 24th. The Beginning of his Reign, if it may be call'd a Reign, was very promising, he not only took the Solemn League and Covenant three Times, but sign'd this Declaration; He thank'd God for perswading him of the Justice of the Covenant which he had taken and subscrib'd; and resolv'd to maintain. He desir'd to be deeply humbled for his Father's bloody Actions and his Mother's Idolatry. He acknowledg'd all his own Sins, and the Sins of his Father's House; and would look upon them as Enemies who oppos'd the Covenant, which he took without any sinister End; and abhor'd all Popery, Superstition, Idolatry and Prelacy, declaring his Sorrow for his sinfulness in making Peace with the Irish REBELS. This, and a great deal more did the King set his Hand to, and the Archdeacon repeats it gravely, as if there had been nothing at all in it, though he was solemnly sworn to every Word of the Covenant, and not a Word of it was kept by him. Such plain Dealing and Sincerity cannot but recommend this Prince to two such Historians as the Author of the History of the Rebellion and Echar'd. Argyle behav'd towards the King with great Respect, and so did all his Party in Appearance, but they govern'd all without his Participation. The Chief of them were, the Marquis of Argyle, the Earl of Cassels, the Earl of Buccleugh, the Earl of Weymis, Sir Archibald Johnston, and Sir John Cheesley. Duke Hamilton, the Earl of Calendar, and the Earl of Lauderdale, were not suffer'd to come to Court, nor hardly any English Man who attended the King from Holland, except the Duke of Buckingham. An Army of 16000 Foot and 6000 Horse was rais'd to invade England, where they flatter'd themselves they should find the whole Nation ready to receive their King and them with open Arms, and it was given out in Scotland, that Cromwel would destroy the Kingdom with Fire and Sword, to incense the Scots against the False News was one of the main Supports of the Cavalier Cause when it was in contest, as false History has been since the Dispute was over. I have seen a Letter from the Duke of York to a Servant of his dated in Jersey the 14th of August, a Fortnight before the Scots were routed at Dunbar, wherein he says,

The King is in Scotland in a good Condition, their being a great Army upon their Borders to meet with Cromwel, who is now very near them. We expect every Day to hear some good Newse from thence, and there is some good Newse come hither by several Ways, that Cromwel hath received some considerable Loss. To Morrow I go hence for Holland.

Your very affectionate Friend, James.

Whitlocke As soon as the Parliament of England had received certain Intelligence of the Scots Agreement with the King, and of their raising Forces to augment their Army, and support that Agreement, a Committee was appointed to confer with the Lord General Fairfax on that Matter, and represent to his Excellency how requisite it would be to send an Army into Scotland to divert the War from England. But they found his Lordship averse to it, influenced, as was suppos'd, by his Lady, a rigid Presbyterian, and more a Friend to the Scots than they wish'd, wherefore they thought this a fit Time to recal the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, which was done by a Letter from the Speaker in January.

On the 12th of February the House nam'd these Persons to be of the Council of State for the Year following,

Council of State. Earl of Denbigh, Lord Chief Justice St. John, President Bradshaw, Lord Commissioner Whitlocke, Lord Chief Justice Rolles, Lord Chief Baron Wylde, Lord General Fairfax, Lord Commissioner Lisle, Lieutenant General Cromwel, Major General Skippon, Lord Grey of Groby, Earl of Salisbury, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Henry Marten, Esq; Col. Puresfoy, Col. Hutchinson, Sir William Masham, Sir James Harrington, Sir Arthur Haslerigge, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir Henry Vane, jun. Sir William Armyne, Sir Henry Mildmay, Sir William Constable, Alexander Popham, Esq; Robert Wallop, Esq; William Heveningham, Esq; Alderman Pennington, Sheriff Wilson, Cornelius Holland, Esq; Thomas Scot, Esq; Luke Robinson, Esq; John Jones, Esq; Mr. Wanton.

Prince Rupert. We have mention'd Prince Rupert's having got a Squadron of Ships to Sea again, and we find him again at Lisbon in April, pursu'd thither by General Blake, who sent to the King of Portugal for leave to fall upon him, and coming near with his Ships the Governor of the Castle fir'd at him. Blake requir'd to know the Reason, and the Governor said, He had no Order from the King to let him pass. However, the King sent one of the greatest Lords of his Court to congratulate the English Admiral's Arrival on that Coast, and to desire him not to come into the River unless the Weather prov'd bad, and he cou'd not ride where he was, his Portuguese Majesty being afraid Prince Rupert and he might fight in his Harbour. The Weather beginning to grow foul Blake put into the Bay of Wiers, in the River of Lisbon, two Miles from Prince Rupert, whose Men came daily over to him, and the Swallow, one of his Ships, was running away, but the Boatswain, who had plotted the bringing her off, was discover'd, and the Plot prevented. Blake took five of the Brasil Fleet, and sent the King of Portugal Word, that if he did not command Prince Rupert from his River he would endeavour to seize all the rest of that Fleet, he also desir'd Justice for the Damages the English Merchants had suffer'd by the Prince's being shelter'd in his Harbour. The Parliament in their Letter to the King of Portugal desires the King to arm against Rupert, by Sea and Land, to treat him and those Wretches with him not as Enemies, but as Pyrates, not as Merchants, but as the Pests of Commerce, and to punish them as Thieves and Rebels. This is the Fleet of which the Earl of Clarendon speaks as the Terror of Spain.

On the first of June, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland having left his Son in Law, returning to Eng- Commissary General Ireton, Lord Deputy in that Kingdom, arriv'd at London, attended from Hounslow Heath to the City by many Members of Parliament and Officers of the Army, and receiv'd there with very great Ceremony and Appearance of Joy. Three Days after he took his Seat in Parliament, and had the hearty Thanks of the House for his great and faithful Services in Ireland. Two or three Days after it was resolv'd, That having a form'd Army well provided and experienc'd, they would march it forthwith into Scotland, to prevent the Scots marching into England, and the Miseries accompanying their Forces to our Countrymen. General Fairfax approv'd of it at first, but afterwards fell off, as has been hinted by the Perswasion of his Wife, and declaring himself unsatisfy'd to invade Scotland; he declar'd also he would engage against the Scots, if they invaded England. Upon this the Council of State appointed Lieutenant General Cromwel, Major General Lambert, Major General Harrison, Lord Chief Justice St. John, Lord Commissary Whitlocke, to confer with him; and the Conference which is at large in Whitlocke was very long. It is plain, that Oliver at that Time earnestly entreated the Lord General to continue his Command, which if he had continu'd, all his ambitious Schemes had been frustrated; wherefore I see no Reason to think he then thought of setting up himself above the Parliament, though some half witted Politicians pretend he got Fairfax to be set aside on purpose to make Room for himself.

The Lord Fairfax, says Ludlow, was unwilling to alter his Resolution, in Consideration of any Thing that had been said: Upon this, Lieutenant General Cromwel press'd, that notwithstanding this Unwillingness of his, he might be still Generalissimo of the Army, professing for himself he would rather chuse to serve under him in his Post than to command the greatest Army in Europe: But the Council of State not approving that Advice, reported the ill Success of the Conference with the Lord General to the Parliament, who would doubtless have pass'd a Vote for his delivering up his Commission, to prevent which, the Lord General sent his Secretary with it to them; and some of his Friends informing the House that the Secretary was at the Door, he was call'd in, and he deliver'd the Commission, which the House receiv'd; and having voted him a Revenue of 5000 Pounds per Ann. they resolv'd, That Oliver Cromwel, Cromwel Esq; should be Captain General of all their made Cap-Land Forces, and an Act pass'd accordingly, about a Week after King Charles arriv'd in Scotland; a very sure Presage that his Stay there would not be

A. D. 1650. be long. In the mean Time the Forces march'd Northwards, and when they rendezvous'd were 20000 Horse and Foot, which threw the Scots Nation into a terrible Consternation, though they had a gallant Army ready to oppose them, much superior in Number to the English, who enter'd Scotland at the latter End of July. In this Army

Monk.

Monk had a Regiment made up of six Companies out of Sir Arthur Haslerigg's, and six out of Col. Fenwick's. He had given himself intirely to Cromwel, whose Fortune he saw was the surest Way to make his own; and Oliver finding him a Person that would make a fit Tool for him, one who would be resolute in Action and docible in Council, from this Time admitted him into his Favour, which the other slavishly courted. The Scots fir'd their Beacons upon the Entrance of the English Army, which advanc'd without Opposition as far as in Sight of Edinburgh: The Country all along as they march'd was deserted, and the People fled to the Capital, which Major General Lambert fac'd with 1500 Horse. The Scots would not hazard all by a decisive Battle, hoping to tire out Cromwel's Men with frequent Skirmishes, and harraing them, and relying much on the Climates disagreeing with English Constitutions, in which they were not mistaken, as appear'd by the Sicknels that carry'd off many of his Army, insomuch that for want of Health and Provision, the Scots having intercepted all Supplies from England nearer than Dunbar, 20 Miles from Edinburg, he was forc'd to retreat thither. The Enemy follow'd them close, attack'd the English Rear Guard of Horse in the Night, and put them to some Disorder. But Major General Lambert and Col. Whaley coming to their Relief, beat back the Scots to their Trenches, and by the Help of a Mist the next Day, the English got safe to Dunbar, where they intended to ship their Sick and heavy Baggage, and return into England: But the Scots, on Confidence of Success by the Advantage of their Numbers, near three to one of the English, advanc'd still, and possess'd themselves of all the Passes, leaving Cromwel's Men no Way to clear themselves but by fighting on those unequal Terms. In this Extremity a Council of War was call'd, and after some Dispute, it was agreed to fall upon the Enemy next Morning, September the Third, about an Hour before Day; and accordingly the several Regiments were order'd to their respective Posts: Upon the first Shock Cromwel's Forlorn of Horse was somewhat disorder'd by their Lancers; but two of his Regiments of Foot that were in the Van, behav'd so well that they not only sustain'd the Charge of the Scots Horse, but beat them back upon their own Foot, and following them close, forc'd both Horse and Foot to retreat up the Hill, from whence they had descended to attack them. The Body of the Enemy's Army finding their Van Guard, which consisted chiefly of their choicest Men, thus driven back upon them, began to shift for themselves, which they did with such Precipitation and Disorder, that few of them ventur'd to look behind them till they arriv'd at Edinburgh, taking no Care of their King, who, says Ludlow, made Use of the same Means to secure himself as his new Subjects had done. One Party of the Scots Horse made a Stand till the English came up to them, and then ran away after the rest of their Companions. The English had the Pursuit of them beyond Haddington; they kill'd 4000 and took 10000 Prisoners, which were half of their Army; among the latter were the Laird of Liberton, Lieutenant General, Sir John Lunston, Col.

Sir William Douglas, the Lord Grandison, Sir John Brown, Col. Gourdon, &c. Of the Parliament Army not above 40 private Men were kill'd, and only Major Rooksby mortally wound-ed. The General sent 5000 of the Prisoners who were wounded home on their Paroles, and 5000 more to Berwick. Cromwel after this Victory march'd to Edinburgh; the Gates of the City were open'd, but the Castle stood out two or three Months.

Great was the Joy in England on News of Oliver's Success in Scotland, which was brought by Sir John Hipsley. The Parliament order'd the Scots Colours, taken in Lancashire and Dunbar, to be hung up in Westminster-Hall; and that Medals of Gold and Silver should be given to the Soldiery. I have seen the Print of a Medal of Oliver struck on this Occasion by some of his Flatterers. On one Side was the Impression of his Buste, with the English and Scots Armies at a Distance, and round it the Word at the Battle of Dunbar, the LORD OF HOSTS; September 3, 1650. On the Reverse, a Representation of the Parliament. It is said, that when this Medal was presented to Cromwel, he flung it away, saying, The Title of Lord of Hosts belongs to God only.

The Remains of the Scots Army retreated with their King to Sterling. The Lord Clarendon tells us, the King got a great Advantage by being routed at Dunbar, and took Heart so much that he left his Court and Courtiers, and went to the Highlands, without communicating his Design to the Marquis of Argyle, nor even to the Duke of Buckingham, in hopes that the Highlanders joining with Hamilton's Party, would let him enjoy his Kingship a little more than Argyle did: And this he informs us was call'd the Start; for they have a Language peculiar to themselves, and could do nothing without it; as for Instance, take away from them Rebels, Rebellion, Seditious, Sedition, Schism, Schismatics, and their Opposites, you leave their Cause and their History as naked as a Skeleton. The Difference here between his History and Whitlocke's, is chiefly in the Lord Clarendon's averring the King did not let the Duke of Bucks know any Thing of that Start, and Whitlocke affirms he took the Duke of Bucks with him. He adds, He was soon brought back again, and the Scots to please him and his Followers, order'd Preparations to be made for crowning him at Scone, and another Army to be rais'd to come to the same End as those at Preston and Dunbar.

P. 455.

We cannot close this Year without looking a little into the Affairs of Ireland, where we left the Lord Broughill, Commander of a separate Body employ'd to watch Inchiquin; and he suppress'd an Insurrection of the Irish, intended to cut off Provisions from Cromwel's Army, then before Waterford, and the great Interest he had in Ireland, created a Jealousy of him in Cromwel, that he might be an Obstacle to him. His Friends perceiving it, perswaded the Lord Broughill to keep at a Distance, and act always with a separate Army; but the Service would not admit of it, and rather than obstruct it he clos'd heartily with Cromwel, whom he join'd in his Camp, before Waterford; in which was a Water-Garrison of 4000 Foot and 1000 Horse: But the Parliament being Masters of the Sea, and their Ships having free Entrance into the Harbour, plentifully supply'd the English Army. The Place was not reduc'd when Cromwel return'd to England; and the Author of the Memoirs of the Lord Broughill relates the taking of it in a Manner different from all other Authors. There was in that that Lord's Regiment a Lieutenant nam'd Crocker, who with his Brother, Serjeant Crocker, and about 30 Musketeers, were order'd to fire the Suburbs, that the Besiegers might be enabled the better to push on their Attacks. The two Crockers and their Party fir'd all the Houses and Stacks of Corn near the City, the Smoke of which was by a Westerly Wind spread all over it, to the great Terror of the Besieg'd, who thought the English were enter'd, and had set Fire to the Town, and in this Fright they ran out at the Eastern Gate, and under Covert of the Smoke got out of the Besiegers Reach, who little dreamt of what had happen'd. This shameful Flight was occasion'd by a desperate Attempt of the two Crockers and their Party; one of whom while the Suburbs were a Fire, spy'd two Ladders near the Town Wall, and Lieutenant Crocker being shewn the Ladders, said, 'Twould be a brave Thing if they mounted the Walls and enter'd the Town, which they all agreed to, thinking they might do it unperceiv'd by Help of the Smoke. They got upon the Walls, slew the Centinel that was posted there, and hearing a great Noise and Uproar in the Town, they resolv'd to take Advantage of the Disorder and Darkeness, and march'd forward to the main Guard, killing all they met. The Irish could not see what their Number was, and concluding the English Army were enter'd, they immediately fled. So Lieutenant Crocker siezing their Guns at the Guard, and turning them against them, if they should rally, march'd to the West Gate, and open'd it, which a Centinel perceiving ran to the Lord Broghill, whose Regiment was posted on that Side, and told him of it. His Lordship rode towards the Gate and saw Crocker coming out, brandishing his Sword, and crying, The Town is ours, The Town is ours, as it prov'd to be when the English enter'd and found no Enemy to oppose them. The Castle held out some Days, but yielded upon Articles.

Cromwel's Discourse with Lord Broghill
about the King's Death.

My Author informs us, that the Lord Broghill being about this Time in Discourse with Cromwel and Ireton, fell upon the Subject of the King's Death. Oliver said, If he had follow'd his own Mind, and had had trusty Servants about him, he had fool'd them all. He added, We had once an Inclination to have come to Terms with him, but something that happen'd drew us off from it. The Lord Broghill finding they were both in a good Humour, ask'd them, Why, if they were inclin'd to close with him, they had not done it? Cromwel reply'd frankly, The Reason of our Inclination to come to Terms with him was, We found the Scots and Presbyterians began to be more powerful than we, and were strenuously endeavouring to strike up an Agreement with the King, and leave us in the Lurch; wherefore we thought to prevent them by offering more reasonable Conditions; but while we were busy'd with these Thoughts, there came a Letter to us from one of our Spies, who was of the King's Bed-Chamber, acquainting us, that our final Doom was decreed that Day: What it was he could not tell; but a Letter was gone to the Queen with the Contents of it, which Letter was sown up in the Skirt of a Saddle, and the Bearer of it would come with the Saddle upon his Head about Ten a Clock the following Night to the Blue Boar Inn in Holborn, where he was to take Horse for Dover. The Messenger knew nothing of the Letter in the Saddle, but some one in Dover did. We were then at Windsor, and immediately upon Receipt of the Letter from our Spy, Ireton and I resolv'd to take a trusty Fellow with us, and in Troopers Habits to go to the Inn, which accordingly we did, and set our Man at the Gate of the Inn to watch. The Gate was shut, but the Wicket open, and our Man stay'd to give us Notice when any one came with a Saddle upon his Head. Ireton and I sate in a Box near the Wicket, and call'd for a Can of Beer, and then another, drinking in that Disguise till Ten a Clock, when our Centinel gave us Notice that the Man with the Saddle was come, upon which we immediately rose; and when the Man was leading out his Horse saddled, we came up to him with our Swords drawn, and told him we were to search all who went in and out there; but as he look'd like an honest Fellow, we would only search his Saddle, which we did, and found the Letter we look'd for, and opening it, read the Contents, in which the King acquainted the Queen. "He was now courted by both the Factions, the Scots Presbyterians and the Army; that which of them bid fairest for him should have him; that he thought he should close sooner with the Scots than the other:" Upon which we speeded to Windsor, and finding we were not likely to have any tolerable Terms from the King, we immediately resolv'd to ruin him.

The brave Colonel Jones, who routed the Marquis of Ormond, and drove him from before Dublin, being disgusted at some Proceedings of Cromwel's, or probably jealous of his Successes, desir'd the Lord Broghill to have a Conference with him as he lay at Dungarvon. Broghill, who knew of Jones's Disguise or Jealousy, and that both of them were suspected by Cromwel and Ireton, communicated to them that Col. Jones desir'd to speak with him, which he was not willing to do till he had consulted them who were his General Officers. They both readily consented to it, but would needs have that Lord to take a Captain with him to wait upon him, under Pretence of doing him Honour, but indeed to be a Spy upon him. When he came to Jones he found him very ill, and very much exasperated against Cromwel and Ireton. He told the Captain he had something to say to my Lord which related to himself, and desir'd him to withdraw, which the Captain could not refuse. He then fell into Invectives against the two Generals, and would have engag'd Broghill to join Forces with him, and they would drive them both out of Ireland, and take the Command of that Kingdom and Army on themselves. This Scheme was the Effect of a sick Frenzy, and the Lord Broghill look'd upon it as such, representing to him, that the dividing the Forces before the Irish Rebels were entirely subdu'd, would endanger the Ruin of all. As to himself, he thought his Illness to be too great to admit of any Perturbation of Mind, and desiring him to repose himself, he took his Leave, being told by a Physician that Col. Jones could not live two Days, having all the Symptoms of the Plague, of which the next Day he dy'd. Cromwel having left Ireton to command in Ireland, the latter, assisted by the Lord Broghill, besieg'd and took the strong City of Limerick, where he dy'd of the Plague. It has been mention'd that Monk had surrender'd Dundalk, and was gr'e for England. He pretended his Men would not stand by him, and they gave a good Reason why, for that he had confederated with Owen Roe O'Neal, Head of the Irish REBELS, of which the Council of State having Notice, they disapprov'd of it, and Monk was examin'd at the Bar of the House, who receiv'd so little Satisfaction by his Examination, that they voted, To disapprove of what Major General Monk had done, in concluding a Peace with the grand and bloody Irish

A. D. 1650. Irish Rebel Owen Roe O'Neal, and that they did abhor to have any thing to do with him therein; which Vote was order'd to be printed. In the Debate of it, several Reflections pass'd on his Honour and Fidelity; and Whitlocke observes, "It was the Opinion of divers, either not at all to have question'd this Business, or having once question'd it, not to have employ'd him any more in their Service;" which was very good Reasoning, and probably it was owing chiefly to Cromwell that he was afterwards trusted.

The Parliament pass'd an Act for a new High Court of Justice for the Trial of Sir John Stawel, David Jenkins, Walter Slingsby, Browne Busbel, William Davenant, C. Garrard, Euseby Andrews, and others; the latter was a Lawyer, but had serv'd in the King's Army as a Lieutenant Colonel, and having offend'd against the Act which the Parliament had pass'd, declaring Treasons, he was found guilty, condemn'd to be beheaded, and executed on Tower-Hill, where he dy'd very resolutely. This Court were impower'd to hear and determine of any Misprision or Concealment of Treason. Capt. Ashley was sentenc'd to be beheaded, and one Benson to be hang'd, for conspiring against the Commonwealth in the treasonable Engagement of Colonel Andrews. Benson was executed at Tyburn, but Ashley found Mercy from the Parliament.

About this Time dy'd the Princess Elizabeth in the Isle of Wight. 'Tis suppos'd that she took very much to Heart the Loss of her Brother's Company, the Duke of Gloucester, for whose Liberty the Emperor and the King of Denmark having earnestly sollicit'd the Parliament, they permitted his being convey'd to Holland, from whence he went to his Mother in France.

In the mean Time, Admiral Blake and Admiral Popham watch'd Prince Rupert's Fleet in Lisbon River, and having intercepted the Portugul Fleet from Brazil, took eleven of them, with 8000 Hogsheds of Sugar, and other rich Goods; which so frighten'd the King of Portugal, that he came down in Person, and caus'd Prince Rupert and his Fleet, 18 in all, to leave the River, which he did; and the Parliament's Ships being in Pursuit of the scatter'd Fleet from Brazil, gave him an Opportunity to get out in September. After this the King of Portugal admitted him no more into his Harbours, but sent an Ambassador to make his Peace with the Commonwealth of England, who about the latter End of October pass'd an Act for turning the Law-Books and the Procefs and Proceedings in the Courts of Justice into English; as also an Act for an Assessment of 120000 Pounds per Menssem for maintaining their Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland, they having now above 60000 Soldiers in Pay, besides Seamen.

A. D. 1651. We cannot open the following Year with a more remarkable Incident than that of the Coronation of King Charles II. at Scone in Scotland, which was perform'd with as much Ceremony and Splendor as the Times and Treasure would permit, on the First of January. The Coronation Sermon was preach'd by Mr. Robert Douglas, who, addressing himself to the King, said, "The chief Cause of the Judgment upon his House, had been his Grandfather's Breach of Covenant with God, and his Father's following his Steps, in opposing the Work of God and his Kirk, within these Kingdoms; he therefore admonish'd him to adhere to the Covenant; and let him know, that he was oblig'd not only to maintain Religion as it is esta-blish'd in Scotland, but, if it should please God to restore him, likewise to endeavour the same Reformation in his other Kingdoms, and not to tolerate any false Religion within his Dominions." Sermon done, the National Covenant of Scotland, and the Solemn League and Covenant were distinctly read, and an Oath administer'd to the King in these Words: I Charles King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, do assure and declare by my solemn Oath, in the Presence of Almighty God, the Searcher of all Hearts, my Allowance and Approbation of the National Covenant, and of the Solemn League and Covenant, and faithfully oblige my self to prosecute the Ends thereof in my Station and Calling; and that I my self, and Successors, do and shall consent and agree to all Acts of Parliament enjoining the National Covenant, and the Solemn League and Covenant, and fully establish Presbyterian Government, the Directory of Worship, Confession of Faith, and Catechisms in the Kingdom of Scotland, as they are approv'd of by the General Assembly of this Kirk, and Parliament of this Kingdom; and that I will give my Royal Assent to Acts and Ordinances of this Parliament, pass'd or to be pass'd, enjoining the same in my other Dominions; and that I shall observe these in mine own Practice and Family, and shall never make Opposition to any any of these, or endeavour any Change thereof. This done, the National Covenant, the Solemn League and Covenant, and the King's Oath subjoin'd to both, being drawn up in a fair Parchment, the King, in the Presence of all, subscrib'd the same. Which is fit to be remember'd, when we find him ten Years hence abjuring these Covenants, and passing Acts to persecute and ruin all those that adher'd to them. If such Practices are consistent, I will not say with the Christian Religion, but with the Principles of any Religion that ever was taught Mankind, I shall on the Proof of it readily subscribe to all the Lord Clarendon's Panegyrics on this King of the Covenant. The Form of his taking the Coronation Oath was this, By the Eternal and Almighty God, who liveth and reigneth for ever, I shall observe and keep all that is contained in this Oath. When the Marquis of Argyle put the Crown, which was Silver double gilt, on his Head, the Minister pray'd, That the Lord would purge the Crown from the Sins of them that reign'd before him. After the King was crown'd the Hamiltonian Party got Ground daily, and making an odious Mixture with that of Montrose and the Highland Papists, gave great Discontent to the Marquis of Argyle and his Friends, who grew soon weary of their present Work, but could not help the Scots Parliament voting Duke Hamilton to command the Army under the King, David Lesley to be Lieutenant General, Middleton to be Major General of the Horse, and Massey General of the English. Cromwell march'd his Army towards Sterling, near which Place the King's Forces, almost double his Number, were encamp'd. He order'd Colonel Overton, with 1600 Foot and 300 Horse, to pass in flat-bottom'd Boats over to North Ferry in Fife, which was done in Spight of all Opposition, Cromwell keeping still close to the Scots Army to fall on their Rear in Case they mov'd to disturb his Enterprize. However, Major General Holburn and Sir John Brown were dispatch'd with 4000 Men to drive the English out of Fife, but before they could come up, Major General Lambert and Col. Okey got over the Forth and join'd Overton with 1500 Foot and 800 Horse. The English fell upon Brown and Holburn,

A. D. 1651.

A. D. 1651. Holburn, entirely defeated them, kill'd 2000 on the Spot, and took 1200 Prisoners, among whom was Brown, who dy'd soon after. This Defeat was about the latter End of July, and it was follow'd by the Surrender of almost all the Garrisons on both Sides of the Forth. Brunt Island, and the Innesgarry Fort, were reduc'd by Lambert, and Cromwel took in St. Johnston. On this ill Success the King, for several political Reasons, enlarg'd upon by the Earl of Clarendon, resolv'd to enter England; but Bishop Burnet gives one short Reason for it much better than all of them, He took a desperate Resolution to march into England, there being nothing else to be done. Most of the Lord Clarendon's Reasons are liable to the like Explanation. This had been long the Design of the Scots, encourag'd to it by fair but false Representations from the English Presbyterians, who were now very busy in Projects and Cabals for restoring that very Prince, who when he was restor'd, deliver'd them up, without Mercy, to a revengeful implacable Enemy.

The Parliament pass'd an Act on the 11th of February, by Balloting, for the following Persons to be the Council of State for the Year ensuing.

Council of State.

Lord General Cromwel, Lord President Bradshaw, Lord Chief Justice Rolles, Lord Commissioner Whitlocke, Lord Commissioner Lisle, Lord Chief Justice St. John, Major General Skippon, Sir Arthur Haslerigge, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir Henry Vane, jun. Sir William Masham, Sir William Armyne, Sir Henry Mildmay, Sir James Harrington, Lord Grey of Groby, Col. Purefoy, Thomas Scot, Esq; James Chalkoner, Esq; Valentine Walton, Esq; Humphry Salway, Esq;

New Members.

Sir Thomas Widdrington, Edmund Prideaux, Esq; Major General Harrison, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Walter Strickland, Esq; Sir John Trevor, Sir William Brereton, Sir John Bouchier, John Carew, Esq; Nicholas Love, Esq; Francis Allen, Esq; — Lister, Esq; — Thomson, Esq; — Felder, Esq; Henry Darley, Esq; William Say, Esq; William Caveley, Esq; — Goodwyn, Esq; — Lemman, Esq; Dennis Bond, Esq; John Gourdon, Esq;

They order'd the King's Arms to be every where taken down, and the Arms of the Commonwealth set up in their Room. A Court of Justice was erected in Norfolk for trying some People that had appear'd there in Arms for the King: But Col. Rich's Regiment soon dispers'd them, and the Prisoners taken by them were try'd by that Court, of which the Lord Commissioner Keeble, whom Coke calls an ignorant pettifogging Lawyer, was President, and they condemn'd 24, of whom 20 were executed at Norwich and other Places. One of their Chiefs, Mr. Hobart, nearly related to Sir John Hobart, was pardon'd, and he afterwards marry'd Cromwel's Niece, Widow of Col. Hammond.

General Blake.

General Blake continuing to observe the Motions of Prince Rupert's Fleet, pursu'd him to Malaga, where that Prince, with a true Cavalier Spirit, sunk several English Merchant Ships, and demanded the Master of a Londoner, who had sign'd the Petition against a Personal Treaty, saying he would boil him in Pitch; but the Governor refus'd to deliver him, and we shall soon see an End put to the Exploits of this Royal Rover; for a Day or two after General Blake came up with him, fell upon him in the Road of Malaga, sunk three of his Ships, and drove all the rest ashore except two, in one of which was Prince Maurice, who made Sail towards the West Indies, but was never heard of more. Prince Rupert escap'd in the other. General Blake in his Passage to Malaga met with a French Man of War, and having commanded the Captain on board, ask'd him, If he was willing to deliver up his Sword? The Frenchman boldly said, No. Then Blake bid him return to his Ship and fight it out as long as he was able, which he did; and after two Hours Fight, struck and submitted; and coming on board the General's Ship, kiss'd his Sword and deliver'd it to Blake, who sent him and his Ship, with 3 other French Prizes, to England, whether he soon after return'd himself, having clear'd the Mediterranean and British Seas of all publick Enemies to the Commonwealth, secur'd the Navigation, and vindicated the Honour of England beyond whatever was known of its naval Glory. The Parliament order'd him Thanks for his great and faithful Service, which was all this great Man desir'd. He contended for nothing but the good of his Country: He trod all other Interests under Foot when that was in Question. He despis'd the Dignities and Treasures to which we have known the Commonwealth to be often sacrific'd; and though he did more than all those who have done most in our Times, he got not a tenth Part of what some Sea-Officers under a Flag, have heap'd up in a Summer's Cruise, not to go higher, and lose our selves in a Comparison which would be as glorious for Admiral Blake's Memory, as it would reflect on the Reputation of others. I write this very near the House where that renown'd General was born, and the Reader will excuse the Digression.

The Presbyterians in England were in strong Expectation of the King, and the Scots Army's entering England, and making Preparations to join them. The Cavaliers were a broken, ruin'd Party, so impotent and contemptible, that the Republick was in no more Concern about them, than to see that they paid their Compositions and Sequestrations; and though hardly one of them durst lift up his Hand, and much less his Arm, against the Parliament, and the King had not a Hope but in the Presbyterians, yet after the Restoration the Royalists din'd his Ears eternally with their Services and Merits, and rav'd against, and preach'd against the Presbyterians, as King-Killers and Republicans. The King indeed did not always give Ear to the Pretensions of the Cavaliers, who starv'd as much after the Restoration as before it, excepting a few Instances, but he did what he could to please them in oppressing the Presbyterians, who are now running all Hazards to serve him. The Vigilance of the Government in the Time of the Republick was such, that no Conspiracy could escape it, and that now form'd in London by the Chief of the Presbytery for the King's Restoration was discover'd, perhaps while it was in Embrio only, though the Parliament suffer'd it to encrease almost to a Birth.

The following Ministers were engag'd in this Conspiracy.

Mr. Arthur Jackson of St. Michaels, Woodstreet. Dr. Roger Drake of St. Peter's, Cheap. Mr. Thomas Watson of St. Stephens, Walbroke. Mr. Christopher Love of St. Anns, Aldersgate. Mr. Ralph Robinson of St. Mary Wolnot. Mr. James Nalton of St. Leonards, Foster-lane. Mr. Thomas Caroton of St. Bartholomew, Exchange. Mr. Thomas Case of St. Margaret's, Milk-street. Mr. William Jenkin of Christ-Church, and Lecturer of St. Anns, Black-fryers. Mr. Richard Heyrick. Mr. Matthew Haviland, of Trinity College. Mr. Drake, and others, as Col. Sor- ton,

A. D. 1651. ton, Col. Vaughan, Col. Barton, Major Huntington, Captain Massey, Major Adams, Captain Farr, Captain Potter, Mr. Gibbons, Mr. Sterkes, Mr. Jaquel, Lieutenant Colonel Jackson, who were very zealous for carrying on the Cause, made Treason by an Act of this Parliament. Dr. Drake, Mr. Love, &c. were order'd to be prosecuted in the High Court of Justice. Mr. Nalton and Mr. Carleton fled to Holland, and were made Pastors of the English Church at Rotterdam. I should be more concern'd, while I am telling this Story, for the Sufferings of these Ministers, and their Adherents, if their Folly had not been equal with their Zeal, to venture their Lives for a Party who never once show'd they were sensible of any other Sentiments of Honour and Gratitude, than what bound them down to a slavish Subjection to the Power that favour'd or fed them.

The Earl of Clarendon speaking of Mr. Love, calls him that Fellow, though he is about to lose his Head for the same Cause which made a Lord of the Historian. The Decency and good Manners of that Expression is indeed another Proof that it was inserted at Christ Church. A Gentleman could hardly have thought of it when he was speaking of a dying Minister. Eckard mimicks those Christ Church Men, or that Historian, and calls him the Incendiary, the poor Man, the Traytor, the Rebel, though the Rebellion and Treason for which he was about to suffer was against the Rebels and Traytors, as they term them, to restore the King. Mr. Love being brought before the High Court of Justice, Edmund Prideaux, Esq; Solicitor for the Commonwealth, charg'd him with holding Correspondence with the King and his Party, and supplying them with Arms and Money, contrary to the abovemention'd Act. Mr. Jackson was tamper'd with to be Evidence against him, but he refus'd it, for which he was fin'd 500 Pounds, and committed to the Fleet, where he continu'd about 17 Weeks. Mr. Love disputed the Authority of the Court, which none could think would be of any Service to him. The Trial began the 21st of June, and many Witnesses were produced to prove the Charge against him. At the next Hearing, July the 2d, Mr. Matthew Hale was assign'd him for Counsel, but the Fact being prov'd, Counsel signify'd no more than his frivolous Pleas, That he did not do it himself. That he did not personally act, and the like. Two Days after he was sentenc'd to be beheaded. On the 15th of July Mr. Love petition'd the Parliament, and several other Petitions were presented on his Behalf for Pardon of his Life, but after much Debate upon the Question it pass'd in the Negative. On the Day appointed for his Execution divers Ministers in and about London presented a Petition to the House, earnestly, and in the Bowels of Jesus Christ, who when we were Sinners died for us, if not totally to spare the Life of our dear Brother, that yet you would say of him, as Solomon of Abiather, At this Time he shall not be put to Death. Upon this Petition the Parliament respited the Execution a Month, and on the 22d of August he was beheaded on Tower Hill. He dy'd raving, says Eckard, he has no Conscience in his Expression. He dy'd with a fearless Quietness, as if he had been going to Bed. It is not to be doubted, but the chief Reason for his falsifying the Fact to abuse this Minister of the Gospel in the last Moments of his Life, was for his then bearing Testimony against Episcopacy. But what Religion are these Men of, who, when natural Compassion melts the Mind towards a dying Christian, are so far from pitying, that they insult him. It is no Excuse, that this Insolence and Falshood are copy'd after the History of the Rebellion, for if he had not been enamour'd with those Falsities in it, he would have been asham'd of them, and have avoided them, as well as I have done. At the same Time, and for the same Crime, was executed Mr. Gibbons, who had been a Servant to Denzil Hollis, Esq; He agreed with the Keeper for 200 l. to let him escape, of which 100 Pounds was paid, and a Bond given for the other 100 l. but that Wretch, and what better can be expected from such infamous Wretches, betray'd this worthy Gentleman, took his Money, and discover'd the Bargain.

'Tis fit to say something of Mr. William Jenkins, another Minister and Conspirator, not only for what he suffer'd for the King, but for his Sufferings after the Restoration for his Religion, the latter being the only Reward he had for the former. He was imprison'd for this Conspiracy, and thought to be in as great Danger as Mr. Love, he having lost his Benefices in the City for refusing to observe the Parliament's Day of Thanksgiving. His Friends, Dr. Seaman, Dr. Arthur, and others, earnestly perswaded him to petition the Parliament, and Dr. Arthur drew up a Petition for him, wherein he acknowledg'd them under all their Titles. Mr. Jenkins, tho' his Life lay at stake, made great Difficulty of signing it, and indeed of accepting a Pardon, if Mr. Love was not also pardon'd, which being refus'd, he was at last prevail'd with to sign the Petition, and the Parliament were so well satisfy'd with his Submission to them, that they voted him a Pardon, and an immediate Discharge from Prison and Sequestrations. After he had done and suffer'd all this, and contributed more than any one of the Laudean Clergy to the King's Restoration, he was one of the first Ministers who was persecuted for scruple of Conscience, and at last thrown into Newgate for no other Crime than spending some Hours in Prayer with three other Ministers, Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Flavel, and Mr. Keeling, where he lay so long that he was kill'd with the noxious Air of the Goal, as appears by this Inscription on his Monument:

IN DOM. GUIL. JENKIN. M.D.V. LOND. CUIUS GRAA INTER GRAVES Ecclesie Procellas Novo pylo i. e. Newgate, Incarceratus, Martyr obiit.

Dr. Roger Drake, another of these Conspirators, was turn'd out of his Parish of St. Peter Cheap, as soon as the King's Crown was settled on his Head in England. Another of them, Mr. Thomas Watson, had his Church of St. Stephen Walbroke taken from him, and himself was sent to seek his Bread where he could get it. Mr. Arthur Jackson was turn'd out of his Parish of St. Faiths. Mr. James Nalton, another of these Conspirators, who had been an Exile in Holland for his Endeavours to serve the King, had his Benefice of St. Leonard's Foster-lane taken from him as soon as the King had leisure, from the Triumphs of his Restoration, to think of persecuting his Restorers. Mr. Thomas Case, another Conspirator, was driven out of his Parish of St. Giles's, which he held at the Restoration, to which he had very much contributed. So generous, and so grateful was this King to those conscientious Persons, who had ventur'd their Lives and Fortunes to restore him to that Power which enabled him to ruin them, and their Religion, as far as Truth is to be ruin'd by Power.

The Discovery of this and other Plots was a great Disheartning to the Scots, who expected great Matters from the Promises of their Friends in England, but Desperation and Fear, as Oli-

A. D. 1651. ver says, drove them out of their own Kingdom to try their Fortune in this. The Lord General Cromwel being taken ill in Scotland, the Parliament order'd Dr. Wright and Dr. Bates to go and attend him, they being his Physicians, and well esteem'd by him, says Whitlocke. For which the latter, in his dull, dry History, intitled Elenchus, &c. calls him Traytor, Tyrant, Fanatick, Hypocrite, and whatever coarse Names he could think of, to please his Patron the Earl of Clarendon. The Scots Enterprize, at a Time when the Commonwealth was become terrible to all Nations that were not in Friendship with her, could not, according to the least Degree of humane Reason, have any other End than it had, Disgrace and Destruction. The Council of State had almost hourly Messengers going to, and returning from the several Bodies of Forces in England and Scotland, carrying Advice and Directions to them, and bringing Informations from them. No Affair of this Nature could be manag'd with more Diligence, Courage and Prudence, than this was, nor perhaps was there ever so great a Body of Men so well arm'd and provided got together in so short a Time, as were now rais'd, and sent away under Major General Harrison, Col. Rich, and other gallant Officers, to join with the rest of the Forces attending the King, who has Cromwel and Lambert behind him, Harrison, Rich, and one may say, the Militia of England before him, yet the Lord Clarendon and the Archdeacon march along with his Army as if there had been a Chance for avoiding the Misery they met with.

The Dutch offend the English.

The Commonwealth of England had for some Time, and with good Reason conceiv'd a Jealousy of her Sister the Republick of Holland, who 'twas evident had shelter'd the Princes of England, and conniv'd at the Assistance the Prince of Orange had given the King. The Death of Dorislaus had not been sufficiently inquir'd into, and now another Incident happens to give new Provocation. The Parliament had sent the Lord Chief Justice St. John to the Hague, to join with the Minister Resident, Mr. Strickland, in a Negotiation for a Coalition between the two Republicks, where he had not been arriv'd above a Fortnight before he was insulted by Prince Edward, Brother to the Elector Palatine, Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice. Gregorio Leti mistakes the Person, and tells us, it was the Duke of York who affronted the Lord Ambassador St. John, or rather Saint John who affronted the Duke of York; but tho' he mistakes the Person, he is probably right in some Circumstances of the Thing. "The Duke of York being at the Vorhout taking the Air in "the Shade of a Summer's Evening, St. John "resolv'd to do the like. The Walks there are "all rail'd in, with Turnpikes to admit the "Company at certain Places and keep out "Coaches and Horses. The Ambassador so "contriv'd it, that as the Duke was about to "pass one of those Turnpikes he endeavour'd to "do the same, and the Passage being thus "stopp'd they look'd on each other very sternly "a Moment or two, at last the Duke of York "losing all Patience, thrust the Turnpike "round, pull'd off St. John's Hat, flung it at "his Feet, and said, Learn, Traytor, to respect the Brother of the King, thy Lord. " St. John reply'd with an Air of Contempt and "Anger, I regard neither thee nor the Person thou speak'st of, but as a Race Fugitive and Vagabond." Upon which the Duke put his Hand to his Sword and prepar'd to draw; the Ambassador was as ready as he, and they would have fought had not the Company hinder'd them.

Life of Cromwel, p. 247.

Duke of York and Lord Ambassador St. John quarrel.

As soon as the States heard of it, they sent to the Duke, desiring he would absent himself and retire to Hounsleydyke, a Palace of the Prince of Orange's, and sent Deputies to the Lord Ambassador to acquaint him with it; but the latter demanded, That they should either cause the Duke to be seiz'd and imprison'd, as one attainted and condemn'd to Death by the Republick of England, or that he should be banish'd out of all the Territories within their Jurisdiction. Whitlocke, who assures us it was Prince Edward who affronted the Lord Ambassador, adds, he was summon'd to appear at the Hague, to answer his Misdemeanor against the Lord St. John, and that the States sent to the Princess of Orange, to the Duke of York, and to the Queen of Bohemia, to desire that none of their Trains might be suffer'd to offer any Affront to the English Ambassadors or their Attendants, whom the States had taken into their Protection, and would not regard any great Person who should affront them. They all promis'd to conform to the States Desire, and the latter caus'd a Court of Guard to be built at the Door of the Ambassadors. It is not to be question'd that the Hollanders would have given the Parliament whatever Satisfaction they requir'd, without any Regard to the Duke of York or his Family, if the latter would have admitted them to a Coalition on easier Terms, than a Disunion from their other Allies for a Union with England, but those of the Parliament who were for humbling the Dutch, and resenting past Slights and Offences, of whom St. John himself was one, would hear of no other Agreement than what the Ambassador offer'd, and aggravating very much the Affront the Ambassador either gave or receiv'd, the Dutch found there would be no Accommodation without Submission, and the English Ambassadors were recall'd, but follow'd immediately by Ambassadors from Holland to endeavour to prevent a Rupture, which they were more afraid of than they had been careful to prevent.

A. D. 1651.

We have mention'd the Death of Lieutenant Ireland, General Ireton of the Plague at Limerick, and shall take a cursory View of the Affairs of that Kingdom in this Year. Col. Ludlow was appointed to command there as General of the Horse, and General Cromwel, Major General Ireton, not then dead, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Col. John Jones, and Miles Corbet, Esq; were appointed Commissioners for the Civil Government, who appointed Commissioners under them for levying the extraordinary Taxes, Excise and Customs.

For Dublin, Col. Hewetson, Governor. For Ulster, Sir Charles Coote and Col. Venables. For Kilkenny, Col. Daniel Axtell. For Clonmel, Col. Zancky. For Cork, Col. Phaier. For Waterford, Col. Laurence.

To whom were added other Commissioners in their several Precincts, and Col. Thomas Herbert, and Col. Markham, were made Inspectors over the rest. Other Commissioners were appointed for Distribution of Justice in these Precincts.

While the Army lay before Limerick, the Lord Broghill was order'd to prevent the Lord Muskerry's joining the Forces that were preparing to march to its Relief under the Pope's Nuncio, who had already got above 8000 Men together. The Lord Broghill had but 600 Foot and 400 Horse, and Muskerry 1000 Horse and Dragoons, and near 2000 Foot. The Charge was very desperate on both Sides, the Lord Broghill had 120 Horsemen shot, and 30 kill'd, but notwithstanding

A.D. 1651. standing the Irish were three to one, the English routed them and slew 600. The Enemy had in this Engagement surrounded the English, and the Lord Broughill himself was in so great Danger that the Irish offer'd him Quarter, which he refusing, they cry'd, Kill the Fellow in the Gold Lace Coat, which in all probability had been done, if a Reformato Lieutenant of his Troop had not come in to his Rescue, whose Horse was kill'd under him, and himself twice shot. The Manuscript Memoirs of the Lord Broughill mentions an Archbishop who was taken in the Rout and hang'd, but I suppose he means the Bishop of Rosse, whom this Lord had taken in a former Engagement, and order'd him to be executed, or mistakes this Archbishop for that of Tuam, slain at Sligo. Another Prelate, Bishop of Emmene was shot to Death after the taking of Limerick. Another, the Bishop of Clogher, was, as has been hinted, serv'd by Sir Charles Coote, who with Col. Venables, had reduc'd all Ulster by the Time that Limerick was taken. The Irish Generals, Ormond, Inchiquin, Preston, and others, had shipp'd themselves for foreign Parts. Gallogway, and a few petty Garrisons that held out, despair'd of Relief, and surrender'd one after another, as the Generals thought fit to attack them. Lieutenant General Ludlow commanded the Army in chief, which consisted of between 7 and 8000 Horse and Dragoons, and above 22000 Foot.

Great Army in Ireland.

Cromwel by possessing himself of Fife in Scotland, and cutting off the Communication between the Royal Army, as it is call'd, and the Country beyond the Forth, had put a Force upon the King to break up his Camp, and begin a hasty March for England. The Lord Clarendon applauds this Step as the Effect of his Courage and admirable Conduct. The Northern Parts of England had given him Cause to believe they were well affected to his Service. His Army was numerous enough, and might thereby be encircled. Cromwel could not comprehend the Meaning of his Councils. It was no small Surprise to him, and he knew not what to do, and so forth. All which is a Dream of the Historians, for Cromwel knew full well what he had to do, and so early as April, Whitlocke observes, that the Royal Army intended to give the Parliament's the Slip, and get into England. Warwick owns the King's March was upon Necessity not Choice, and Argyle was so ashamed of the Madness of such Councils, that he left the Army, retir'd to his House, and acted no more with such rash and inconsiderate Counsellors. Lord Clarendon, or the Oxford Doctors, oblige one to offend often against the Decorum of History, by giving the Air of Wisdom to Actions which are the pure Effect of Weakness or Despair. Among Duke Hamilton's Papers, after the Rout at Worcester, was found the following Letter, which turns all the Reasonings in the History of the Rebellion into Ridicule. 'Twas address'd to Mr. William Crofts a Retainer of the Courts.

King's March into England.

Duke Hamilton's Letter about it.

WE are laughing at the Ridiculousness of our Condition, who having quit Scotland, being scarce able to maintain it; yet we grasp at all, and nothing but all will satisfy us, or to lose all. I confess I cannot tell, whether our Hopes or Fears are greatest, but we have one stout Argument, and that is Despair, for we must now either shortly fight or die. All the Rogues have left us, I will not say whether for Fear or Disloyalty, but all now with his Majesty are such as will not dispute his Commands.

Brit. Triump. p. 119.

This is the Story which the Lord Clarendon treats of as gravely, with as many sage Remarks and political Reflections as if it had not been what the same Author from whom I took the Letter says; so that you see this Undertaking was not the Product of a mature and deliberate Counsel, but of Necessity and Desperation. On the 6th of August the King pass'd the Tweed, near Carlisle, with an Army of about 16000 Horse and Foot; and Cromwel, who had caus'd Instructions to be sent to Major General Lambert, to advance towards their Van, order'd Major General Harrison, with 3000 Horse and Dragoons to keep as close to their Rear as he could conveniently; himself having left 7000 Horse and Foot with Lieutenant General Monk, in Scotland, and given him Directions how to behave in his Absence, follow'd the King with the rest of the English Army.

A.D. 1651.

The Earl of Derby had kept himself on the Defensive in the Ile of Man ever since the End of the former War, and pursuant to the Commands he receiv'd from the King, he now landed at Wyewater in Lancashire, with about 300 Gentlemen and others, with Intention to raise the Country, tho' he could not get above 1500 Horse and Foot together. Major General Harrison, with about 4000 Horse and Foot, somewhat obstructed the March of the Scots, tho' he was not considerable enough to fight them, and being join'd by Major General Lambert, they observ'd the Enemy so closely as to keep them from Excursions, and prevent others from joining them. The Scots, who were in great Expectation of Assistance from Wales, and relied much upon Col. Massey's Interest in Gloucestershire, advanced that Way. Few of the Country came in to them, but on the other Side, so affectionate were the People to the Commonwealth, that they brought in Horse and Foot from all Parts to assist the Parliament. The Regiments of London, Surrey, Berkshire, and Oxfordshire Militia, the Militia of Shropshire and Cheshire, march'd to the Rendezvous against the Scots Army; nay the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, and the Heads Whitt of the Colleges rais'd 120 Horse and a Regiment of Foot for the same Service. The Lord Fairfax, and some even of the excluded Members, appear'd in Arms on this Occasion, for the Republick was now so potent and renown'd, that all Opposition to it was imputed to Frenzy or Desperation; and till they were betray'd by their Servant Cromwel, and till his Son was betray'd by his Relations, the Fifth Monarchy was more likely to take Place than that of King Charles II. Col. Lilburn was left with 1000 Horse in Lancashire to hinder the Earl of Derby's raising Forces there, or joining the King with what he had rais'd, and the Lord General kept always within two or three Days March of the King, who sent to Sir Thomas Middleton, a Parliamentarian Colonel, to raise the Welshmen, and to Col. Mackworth to do the same for him in Shropshire and Shrewsbury, but neither of them took any Notice of his Letters. He was proclaim'd King in all Places where he came, as Echard remembers with great Satisfaction, tho', as my Author says, It was a Blast of Honour which, like Jonah's Gourd, quickly vanish'd; for, alas, by this Project of the Scots they ran themselves into inevitable Danger, as the Poet has it,

Decidit in Syllam, qui vult vitare Charybdim,

Who scapes Charybdis into Sylla falls, being environ'd on all Sides with the Militia Forces of the several Counties of the Nation; which

A. D. 1651. which Ludlow tells us were thought sufficient to have cut the King's Army to Pieces, without the Help of a Regiment of the Parliament's regular Troops. But Mr. Archdeacon assures us, that after Cromwel, Lambert, Harrison, and 50000 of the Militia of England, were join'd, Oliver was so afraid of his Majesty, that he desir'd a Meeting with the Devil in a Wood near Worcester, and sold his Soul to him for the Bargain of beating the King, who had scarce one Man to his four, and whose Men were fatigu'd by a March of 22 Days from Sterling in Scotland to the City of Worcester in England. Echard, after Warwick, blames the King for taking to that City: They would have had him to have taken London, where his Letter had been burnt by the common Hangman; for, according to Warwick, his Army could but have been knock'd on the Head there if the worst happen'd, and if the best, then they had done the Business. But these excellent Politicians never observ'd that the King was driven to Worcester as into a Net, and that the Parliament's Forces had not left him at Liberty to march where it pleas'd him. Before the Devil and Cromwel had the Conference, Mr. Echard has so finely describ'd in the Wood near Worcester, one of Oliver's Colonels had made the Bargain much the better for him by beating the Earl of Derby's Party at Wigan in Lancashire. The latter was superior in Number to Col. Litburn's, who however attack'd them with such Vigour, that after a warm Dispute of an Hour's Length, the Lord Derby's Men were totally routed. The Lord Widdrington, Sir Thomas Tildesley, Col. Trollop, all three Papists, were slain. 'Tis the same Work still, and the same Workmen. There were slain also Col. Boynston, Sir William Throgmorton, Sir Francis Gamul, many inferior Officers and Soldiers. Among the Prisoners, 500 in Number, were Sir Timorhy Fetherstonhaugh, Col. Legg, Col. Robinson, Col. Bayns, Col. Gerard, Col. Ratcliff, all their Baggage, Sumpters, Arms and Ammunition, were taken, as were the Earl of Derby's George and Garter, himself much wounded, and about 30 more got to Worcester, at the Sight of whom the Citizens heartily repented they had open'd their Gates to the King, who had promis'd them an Army under this defeated Lord. The King seeing his Hopes lost in the Lord Derby's Defeat, would have march'd off with his Horse, upon which his Foot were ready to mutiny, saying, We will both endure the same Fortune, and the King and his Officers had much ado by fair Words to appease them, and satisfy them that they would not leave them.

Battle of Worcester. The Scots finding they were like to be shut up with their King and starv'd in Worcester, thought it their best Way to attempt to force a Passage before Cromwel's Forces were all come up, tho' he had more than enough to encompass the City. They were posted on each Side of the Severne, ready to receive the Enemy, if in their desperate Condition they should attempt to escape by Sallies. Their first Attack was made upon Lieutenant General Fleetwood's Quarters at Upton, who, with some Forces of the Army and some Militia Regiments, made a vigorous Resistance; but the Cavaliers pressing these Troops very hard, the General dispatch'd some Troops to his Assistance by a Bridge laid over the River, commanding Major General Lambert to send another Detachment to the same Purpose; but he desir'd to be excus'd, alledging, that if the Enemy should alter their Course, and fall upon those on this Side the Severne, they might probably cut off all that remain'd; which was not unlikely, for soon after most of the Enemy's Strength fell upon that Part of the Army where the General and Major General Lambert were. The Battle was fought with various Success on both Sides for a considerable Time, tho' still hopeful on that of the Parliament; but at length the Scots Army was broken, and quitting their Ground, retreated in great Disorder to the Town, where they endeavour'd to defend themselves. But Major General Harrison and Col. Croston, with the Cheshire Militia, enter'd it at their Heels. Lesley's Brigade was then in the City unbroken. The King, who had seen the Beginning of the Fight from the Top of the Cathedral Tower, and had afterwards charg'd the Parliamentarians in Person, earnestly begg'd those Scots and the flying Soldiers to make one Charge more, and rather kill him on the Place, than expose him to the Calamity and Misery that must attend the Loss of that Day. But nothing could bring them on again, and Lesley's Brigade running with the rest, Cromwel's Men soon became Masters of the City: Upon which there was a doleful Cry among the Citizens, O save the King, Save the King, who however had not much consider'd their Safety, by imposing himself upon them, and exposing them to the Resentment and Chastisement of a victorious Republick. The King fled with the first, which the Earl of Clarendon expresses so much like a Cavalier, that one can hardly read it without a Horse-laugh; His Majesty was perswaded to withdraw himself. A Writer of the same Kidney tells us frankly, The King seeing how the Case stood, presently fled out of the Town; and Whitlocke, They rode away Post in great Confusion, their King being the foremost; and sure there needed not much Perswasion to run out of the Danger he was in, when Cromwel's Men had Possession of Part of the City, and in a few Minutes must have the whole. There fled with him the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Sherwobury, the Earl of Cleveland, the Earl of Derby, the Earl of Lauderdale, the Lord Wilmot, the Lord Wentworth, and about eighty Gentlemen of Distinction, whom we must leave for a while shifting for themselves as well as they could.

Of the King's Army near 4000 were kill'd, Brit. Tri- and near 10000 taken Prisoners. Among the umph. Slain were General Forbes and Duke Hamilton, tho' he dy'd not till next Day, and the Lord General sent his own Surgeons to see if his Wounds were curable, and to do their utmost for him; but all their Care and Skill were in vain. Among the Prisoners were, tho' not taken all at one Place or Time, the Earl of Derby, the Earl of Cleveland, the Earl of Sherwobury, the Earl of Carnwarth, the Earl of Lauderdale, the Earl of Kelly, the Earl of Rothes, the Lord Grandison, the Lord St. Claire, the Lord Spine, the Lord Kenmure, General David Lesley, Lieutenant General Middleton, Major General Piscotty, Col. Graves, Sir John Packington, Sir Ralph Clare, Sir Charles Cunningham, Sir Richard Fanshawe, Secretary, Col. Blague, and a great Number of Colonels, Lieutenants, Majors, and Subalterns, with Standards, Colours, Baggage, the Standard Royal, the King's Coach, his Col-ler of SS, Bag and Baggage, Arms, Ammunition, and all the Trophies of a most glorious Victory: And it is to be observ'd, that whatever Advantages the Parliament and their Friends got, it was always by Arms, and with Glory, agreeable to the Dignity of the Cause for which they fought, Religion and Liberty; and that whatever Advantages their beaten and baffled Enemies got afterwards, were owing to Perfidy and Perjury, and to a Baseness which is scandalous

A. D. 1651. Iouis to human Nature. According to the Goodness of the Cause was the Success and the generous Use the Parliamentarians made of it; for even the Lord Clarendon is oblig'd to acknowledge that they treated their vanquish'd Enemies after this Victory with Humanity: There was not much Cruelty us'd to the Prisoners. Towards the King's Servants there was nothing of Severity, they were in a few Days all discharged. But after, by the Perjury and Perfidy of those the Parliament employ'd, the Cavaliers, without striking a Blow, nay, without creeping out of the Holes and Corners in which they had hid themselves, had got the Parliament's Friends in their Power, what Havock was made of them by Executions and Persecutions, will be seen when we come to that Period in which the Author of the History of the Rebellion was Prime Minister, and laid about him with the Civil Sword as much as he has done with his Pen, and it is an eternal Truth, that the Effects will always smell of the Cause.

On the Side of the Parliament 100 Soldiers were slain, 300 wounded. Quarter-Master General Moseley and Capt. Jones were the only Officers of Note who were kill'd, and only Capt. Howard wounded.

Whitlocke takes Notice, that Sir Richard Onslow, with the Surrey Regiment, march'd hard to come up to the Engagement, so did Capt. Walter St. John with the Surrey Troop. I mention the latter, to be Matter of Comfort to him whom I take to be his Grandson, and whose Attainder for Treason was lately forgiven him, that he may with Pleasure look back on the worthy Behaviour of his Ancestor, in asserting the Liberty of his Country, whose Glory and Interest himself so basely betray'd by his dark Cabals and ruinous Negotiations, when he thrust himself into the Management at the latter End of Queen Anne's Reign, when he labour'd to break the grand Confederacy to restore France to the exorbitant Power the Confederates had ravish'd from her, and the Enemies of England to a Capacity of giving her all the Trouble and Disturbance she has since met with. It must, one would think, be some Comfort to him, amidst so much Guilt and Disgrace, to read that the Cause of Liberty always found Assertors in his Family, till he endeavour'd to throw down all its Defences, and that their Merit will, with generous Minds, be some Atonement for his Offences, especially if he offends no more, but behaves with the Duty and Gratitude which are due from one who owes his Life to the Clemency of his King and Country.

I should not have written this History, had it not been to have made such Reflections, when they were naturally produc'd by the Subject.

Whitl. p. 484. About 3000 of the King's Horse got out of Worcester, the greatest Body was under David Lesley, whom Col. Lilburn intercepted, and took 1000 of them, with their General, passing thro' Sanebarch in Cheeshire on a Fair-Day. The Townsmen and Countrymen fell upon them with Clubs and Staves, and with the Poles of their Stalls as they pass'd by knock'd them down, and took about 100 of them. Col. Barton's Regiment pick'd up the rest. Massey had been wounded at the taking a Pass near Upton before the Fight, and could get no farther than Leicestershire, where he surrender'd himself to the Countess of Stamford, who caus'd his Wounds to be well look'd after, and gave the Parliament Notice of it. He was soon after sent to the Tower, as were most of the Scots Prisoners of Quality. This famous Battle was fought on the 3d of September, just a Twelvemonth after that at Dun- bar. Cromwel's Word was the same, The Lord of Hosts; and in his Letter to the Parliament he styles it a Crowning Mercy, not in the Construction which weak Authors ridiculously put upon it, as if it should intimate to the Parliament that it prepar'd the Way for his turning them off and taking the Crown, but in the common Sense, that by ending their Wars it crown'd all their other Victories.

The Earl of Derby fell again into the Hands of Col. Lilburn; as did the Earl of Lauderdale, and the former had been so inveterate and dangerous an Enemy to the Commonwealth, that he could expect no Mercy; but though Cromwel wrote in his Letter to the House, that some of the Prisoners would be fit Subjects of their Justice, I find few that suffer'd. The Parliament order'd the 3d of September to be kept yearly in all the three Kingdoms; and Cromwel returning to London was receiv'd with as much Magnificence and Ceremony as a General could expect, who in the Opinion of the People was the Deliverer of his Country; but it was observ'd that after this Action, so shining and so important, he took upon him a more stately Behaviour, and chose new Friends. Neither must it be omitted, that instead of acknowledging the Services of those who came from all Parts to assist him against the common Enemy, though he knew they had deserv'd as much Honour as himself and the standing Army, he frown'd upon them, and the very next Day after the Fight dismiss'd them and sent them home, well knowing that a useful experienc'd Militia was more likely to obstruct than to second him in his ambitious Designs, which the Parliament did not seem to be at all apprehensive of at that Time. They caress'd him in an extraordinary Manner, and deputed the Lord Chief Justice Saint John, and three other of their Members to attend him on the Road from Worcester; as did great Numbers, not only of Members but of Persons of Quality and Citizens, some Miles before he arriv'd at London, which was nine Days after the Fight, and there he was splendidly treated by the City. Every Body paid their Court to him as the Head of the Commonwealth; and it is doubtless from this Time that he thought of making himself in Fact what he was now in Appearance.

This great News from Worcester was accompany'd with very good from Scotland, where Lieutenant General Monk, about a Fortnight after Cromwel left him, took Stirling Castle, one of the strongest in Scotland, of which King James boasted that it had never been taken in the Reigns of 106 Kings, as by this Inscription which Monk defac'd;

— Nobis hæc invicta dedere
Centum sex Proavi. —

It was surrender'd upon Articles; and besides Scotland, 40 Pieces of Cannon, 5000 Arms, Ammunition, &c. there were found Money, Jewels, the Records of Scotland, the Chair and Cloth of State, the Royal Sword, the Earl of Mar's Coronet, Parliament Robes, and other rich Goods. Cromwel's Absence so encourag'd the Scots, that the Earl of Leven and other Lords set about raising another Army in Perthshire; for which Purpose they had a Meeting at Eller, seven Miles from Dundee; and Monk hearing of it, sent Col. Morgan and Col. Alured, to surprize them, which they effected, and seiz'd old General Lesly, Earl of Leven, the Earl Marshall, the Earl of Crawford, the Lord Keith, the Lord Ogilvy, the Lord Burgenny, the Lord Huntley, the

A. D. 1651. the Lord Lee, with about 300 Knights, Gentlemen, and Ministers. This Assembly met with Intention to levy what Forces they could, and attempt the Relief of Dundee, besieged by Monk, who having summoned the Cavaliers, they with their wonted Modesty and Discretion sent Answer; That whoever of the Parliament Army would lay down their Arms, and come in to them, should have Mercy; but as stout as their Answer was, they stood not the Storm above a Quarter of an Hour: Monk's Soldiers entered the Place, and put all the King's Men to the Sword; nay, Ludlow assures us he commanded the Governor, Lieutenant General Lumsdaine, with several others to be killed in cold Blood. This is the Man of whom the Earl of Clarendon says he pleased himself with an Opinion that he was not serving against the King, while he commanded for the Parliament, which is some of the best Reasoning in his Characteristicks. In Dundee were taken 50 Sail of Ships, and Plunder to an incredible Value, which so enriched the Parliament's Soldiers, that as Whitlocke writes, a Centinel could hardly be known from an Officer. Aberdeen sent her Keys to Monk, Dunbarton, Dunotter Castles, and Abernethy surrendered at Summons; thus in about a Month's Time after the King entered England, was all Scotland, except two or three Fastnesses in the Highlands, reduced with little or no Difficulty. Monk had a very easy Task to finish the Work, which Oliver found so difficult in the Beginning; and if the Task had not been so easy, it is very likely that Lambert, or some other General than Monk, would have been left in Scotland to go through with it.

The King's Flight.

We are now to wander with the King in his Flight after the Rout at Worcester; but there's no need of circumstantiating the Story as the Lord Clarendon and the Archdeacon do; for with them King Charles the Second in the Oak, near Boscobel, makes as heroical a Figure as in any Part of his Reign, which I have no Mind to dispute with them. We have observed that his Majesty made very great Dispatch in his Journeys after Worcester Fight; but neither Horse or Men could keep travelling without Refreshment and Rest: Wherefore the King, by Advice of the Earl of Derby who had hid there after his Rout at Wiggan, made towards Boscobel in Staffordshire, belonging to one Pendrel a Papist, where he hoped to hide till the Search for him was over. His Company had all left him but the Lord Wilmot, who kept near him, one Mr. Giffard a Papist and his Servant Francis Yates, another Papist, both whom had served in Worcester, under a Popish Colonel, one Careless, whom according to Lord Clarendon, they found on an Oak in a Wood, not far from Boscobel; and the Colonel coming down, his Majesty got up and hid in it as Careless had done. The King was conducted to White Ladies, in the Parish of Tong in Shropshire, where one of the Pendrels dwelt, and there he stripped himself of his own Cloaths, put on the Garb of a Peasant, and rounded his Hair à la mode de Roundhead. He lay in the Oak by Day, and in the House by Night; from thence they went to Boscobel, and thence to Mr. Whitegrove's of Mosely, where they found the Lord Wilmot, the King travelling like a Woodman with a Bill in his Hand. In these Travels he was much helped by Huddleston a Benedictine Monk; and from his Departure from Worcester to his coming to Mr. Lane's in Staffordshire, he had trusted himself with none but Papists; tho' there is a very particular Account of his Majesty's being made Welcome by every one of these Papists, and his Concealment of 5 or 6 Days in the Hollow of a Tree, the Hay-mow, the Barn, which takes up four or five Pages; yet the Lord Clarendon introduces it thus, It is great Pity that there was never a Journal made of that miraculous Concealment; in which there might be seen so many visible Impressions of the immediate Hand of God. I cannot make Reflections on such Passages without treading too closely on the Heels of Establishments, into which some have endeavour'd to weave the Cause they engag'd in. From Mr. Lane's House the King disguis'd like a Servant rode before Mrs. Lane, his Daughter, to Leigh in Somersetshire, five Miles from Bristol, which was then the Seat of Mr. Norton, who had marry'd her Sister, and is now the Seat of Mrs. Trenchard, Widow to the famous Mr. Trenchard, better known by the feign'd Name of Cato, which he put to some of his Writings. Here he left Mrs. Lane, whose decent Behaviour is highly commended by the Earl of Clarendon; and from thence went to Col. Francis Windham's at Trent, not far from Shirburn, intending to take Shipping for France at Lyme; but being balk'd there, he rode before another young Gentlewoman from Trent to Salisbury Plain, where he was met by Dr. Henchman, afterwards Bishop, and by him conducted to Heal, belonging to Serjeant Hyde, afterwards Lord Chief Justice, three Miles from Salisbury; and the Earl of Clarendon, who was of the same Family, does it Honour on this Occasion, which to shew my Impartiality I shall not forget: This Seat, says he, always belong'd to Malignants. From Heal he was conducted by Mrs. Hyde to Stonehenge, where he met Dr. Henchman again, who the next Day deliver'd him to the Lord Wilmot, who conducted him to Sussex, where Col. Gunter had provided a Vessel at Brightbolmsted, to transport him to Normandy, where he landed in November. The Court of France was not at all pleas'd with his coming into that Kingdom; from Normandy the King went to Paris, where the Marquis of Ormond came to him about Christmas; and the Lord Clarendon informs us there was a Friendship between him and the Marquis, with which he concludes the Transactions of this Year, except the Quarrel amongst the King's Ministers about the Mastership of the Wards in England, which would not be worth a Penny to either of them, fell out within this Year.

In the mean Time a Court Marshal sat at Earl of Chester, where were present Major General Derby, Mitton, Col. Mackworth, and 20 Officers, Colonels, Lieutenant Colonels and Captains, who chose Col. Mackworth President, and the Earl of Derby and Sir Timothy Featherstonhaugh, were brought before them. The Earl being charg'd with conspiring a general Rising for the King in Lancashire, confess'd there was such a Plot; but it was disappointed by the apprehending of Mr. Birkenhead. That Major Asburst and Major Gen. Masse were principal Actors in this Conspiracy. He submitted himself to the Mercy of the Parliament, but alledg'd he had Quarters given him, and therefore was not to be try'd by a Court Martial for Life. He pleaded Ignorance of the Acts of Treason set forth by the Parliament: But he was over-ruled, and the Court sentenc'd him to be beheaded for his Treasons at Bolton, where Whitlocke tells us, he had kill'd a Man in cold Blood, and that he seem'd very desirous of Life, of which there is not a Syllable in the Earl or Archdeacon's History. Sir Timothy Featherstonhaugh had the same Sentence pass'd upon him, and Capt. Benbow was shot to Death, which was the greatest Part of the

Com. War. P. 127.

A. D. 1651. the Executions for this new War against the Commonwealth.

The Islands of Scilly, Guernsey, and Jersey, held out for the King, after the Parliament had reduc'd all England and Wales, and all Scotland and Ireland, except a few Castles in the most remote Parts of it.

Sir John Greenville was Governor of Scilly Islands; and though the Men he had with him did little good to themselves, yet acting like a Nest of Pirates they did a great deal of Mischief to others by their Piracies. The Navigation was interrupted, and many Merchant Ships made Prize by the Pirates of Scilly, and the other Islands. The Parliament order'd Sir George Ayscue to reduce Scilly, who came on that Coast in April, and summon'd the Governor, who immediately desir'd a Treaty; but it took no Effect, and General Blake order'd the Troops to land, and they soon drove all that oppos'd them into St. Mary's Castle, upon which the Men of War play'd their Cannon; and Sir John Greenville surrender'd it a Month after, on Condition that he and his Garrison should be Prisoners of War: Some of his Soldiers were ship'd for Ireland; and some sent to Scotland. He had 800 Men, and St. Mary's was very strong; but it is said he wanted Water; though if he had as much Water as runs in the New River he must have done what he did. Sir George Ayscue carry'd him and Part of his Garrison Prisoners to Plymouth, and then proceeded to Barbadoes. The Parliament made Col. Hunkin Governor of Scilly Islands.

From Scilly, General Blake sail'd to the Isle of Jersey, of which Sir George Carteret was Governor, and had with him 3 or 4000 Men. Blake took on Board Col. Haynes's Regiment, and two other Regiments of Foot, and 4 Troops of Horse. He came to an Anchor under the Island about the latter End of October: The General landed his Men in Boats, and then ran the Boats a Ground, the Soldiers leaping into the Sea Neck high. They were at their Landing desperately charg'd by a Body of Horse for about half an Hour, and then the Enemy fled: The Parliament's Forces pursu'd them a Mile into the Island, and the next Morning march'd to several Forts, and found in them Guns and Colours, but no Men. The next Day Col. Haynes drew up his Men on a Hill in Sight of Elizabeth Castle. The Enemy had a Fort under the Hill, which they quitted, and another Fort nearer to Elizabeth Castle. Thus in three Days was all the Island reduc'd except Orgeuil and Elizabeth Castles: Of this says the Author of the History of the Rebellion, Sir George Carteret having well defend'd Jersey as long as he could, and being so over-power'd that he could no longer defend the Island, he retir'd into Elizabeth Castle, which he had fortify'd and provided with all Things necessary for a Siege, presuming that by the Care and Diligence of the Lord Jermyn, who was Governor of the Castle, he should receive Supplies of Men and Provision, as he might easily have done, in spite of any Power of the Parliament by Sea or Land; which is every Word false in Fact and Politicks. "But it had been the principal Reason that Cromwel had hitherto kept the better Quarter with the Cardinal, lest the Bait of these two Islands, which the King could have put into his Hands when he would, should tempt him to give his Majesty any Assistance; but the King was so strict and punctual in his Care of the Interest of England, when he seem'd to be abandon'd by it, that he chose rather to suffer those Places of great Importance to fall into Cromwel's Power, than to deposit them upon any Conditions into the French Hands. When the Castle had been besieg'd three Months, and the Enemy could not approach nearer to plant their Ordnance than at least half an English Mile, the Sea encompassing it round more than so far from any Land, and it not being possible for any of their Ships to come within such a Distance; they brought notwithstanding Mortar Pieces of such incredible Greatness, and such as had never been before seen in this Part of the World, that from the highest Point of the Hill near St. Hilary, they shot Granados of a vast Bigness into the Castle, and beat down many Houses, and at last blow'd up a great Magazine, where most of the Provisions of Victuals lay, and kill'd many Men. Upon which Sir George Carteret sent an Express to give the King an Account of the Condition he was in, who desir'd a Supply of Men and Provisions, which it being impossible for his Majesty to procure, he sent him Orders to make the best Conditions he could." Such from one end to the other is that History; if it is not worse in many Places.

Whitlocke informs us that Col. Haynes lost but Whitt: four Men in taking this Island; and that as soon as Sir George Carteret was got into Elizabeth Castle, General Blake block'd it up on all Sides; yet the Lord Clarendon asserts it might have been reliev'd in spite of all the Power of the Parliament by Sea and Land. General Blake and Colonel Haynes laid Siege to it about the Beginning of November; and before the 15th the Governor desir'd a Treaty, which did not then take Effect. Orgeuil Castle surrender'd in 10 or 12 Days, and in it were found 20 Brass and Iron Guns, and 20 Barrels of Powder, 1000 Arms, and two Months Provisions for 70 Men. As soon as Monk, who was in Scotland, heard of the taking of this Castle, he wrote a Congratulatory Letter to the Parliament, of such Importance did he think it; and so much did he rejoice at any Losses and Disgraces which befel the King and his Adherents. The House order'd Thanks to General Blake and Colonel Haynes for their good Service in the Reduction of Jersey. The third Shot at Elizabeth Castle fell upon the old Church, kill'd and wounded 30 Persons, and indanger'd the Governor and his Lady, which so frighten'd the latter, that she embark'd the next Night for France, with other Ladies, and some few Gentlemen. Upon this also several of the Garrison made their Escape; and others who attempted, and were taken, were hang'd up immediately. Sir George Carteret made a gallant Defence till about the middle of December, when he surrender'd: So that the Siege held fifty Days, which the Earl of Clarendon calls three Months. In it were,

17 Pieces of Brass Cannon, 36 Iron, 450 Muskets, 64 Barrels of Powder, 5000 Pounds Weight of Match, 1000 great Shot, 100 Weight of Muskets Shot, 4 Ton of Lead, 2 Ton of Iron, 60 Hogheads of Biskets, 48 Bushels of Wheat, 32 Bushels of Barley, 160 Bushels of Malt, 36 Bushels of Pease, 50 Sides of Pork, 60000 Weight of Poor John, 3 Hogheads of French Brandy, 4 Pipes of Spanish Wine, 10 Hogheads of French Wine, 16 Hogheads of Beer, 60 Quarter of Salt, 6 Hogheads of Beef; with great Store of other Provisions for a Garrison of 380 Men, to which Number they were reduc'd. And it appears by this Account in Whitlocke, that the Castle might have held out longer, if holding out at all had not been downright Madness; for what Relief could

A. D. 1651. could be expected from a Prince, who when he landed in France had not Money enough to carry him to Paris, and as to Cromwell's keeping the better Quarter with Mazarine, lest the Bait of Guernsey and Jersey should have tempted him to give Charles II. Assistance, 'tis like the rest of the Chimera's in the History of the Rebellion, for besides that the intestine Broils then in France, took Mazarine's Thoughts entirely off from foreign Affairs. The Cardinal was so afraid of Cromwell, that he would not have accepted of those two Islands from King Charles, lest he should have drawn upon him the whole Power of the Commonwealth of England, which

Guernsey would soon have recover'd them. There is, I think, not many more Faults as to Fact in this Scrap of that History, but it is one, where the Author says Corner Castle in Guernsey was taken in the Beginning of September, whereas it was not surrender'd till a little before or a little after Elizabeth Castle. I should not have made so petty a Remark as this, but that there are some ignorant People who take this most inaccurate and irregular History to be the most exact and complete. Col. Philip Carteret, Governor of Mount Orgueil, stipulated, when he surrender'd that Castle, that he and his Officers should have an Act of Oblivion, and the Parliament pass'd such an Act in their Favour. Sir George Carteret and his Officers were transported to St. Maloes in France, where, according to Whitlocke, they had coarse Entertainment, only himself and 9 more being suffer'd to come into the Town. During these Transactions Orders were sent to Col. Duckenfield and Col. Bird, to reduce the Isle of Man, which had been a Place of Refuge for those of the King's Party, who supported themselves by Piracy, and were very welcome to the Earl of Derby, the Lord of it; and his Countess, after the Earl left the Island, stood out with as good Reason, and as great Courage, as any of those who held Places for the King, after he had himself no Place to go to which he could depend upon for his Abode there. Duckenfield took with him General Cromwell's Regiment, commanded by Lieutenant Col. Worseley, Major General Dean's, commanded by Lieutenant Col. Mitchel, and his own Regiment, with two Troops of Horse. He sail'd from Chester the 18th of October, but was driven back to Beaumaris in Anglesey, and came not to Man till the 25th, when Capt. Young, Commander of the President Frigate, was sent with a Summons to the Countess of Derby, then in Rushen Castle, who return'd Answer, That she was to keep it by her Lord's Command, and without his Order she would not deliver it up. The next Day, October the 26th, a Deputy came from the Island to assure the Parliament's Officers, that they should meet with no Opposition, and might safely come under Derby Fort, Douglas Fort, and any Fort in the Island, except Rushen and Peele Fort; but having nothing in Writing to vouch for him, Major Fox was sent back with him to inquire into the Truth of his Report, which was confirm'd to him by the Islanders, and Commissioners came aboard the Fleet, to desire that only one Regiment might land, and they would supply them, as also the Forces on board, with Provisions at the Market Price, which Col. Duckenfield consented to. The Islanders deliver'd up one Barlet, a notorious Pirate, and did every Thing they promis'd. The Countess of Derby finding her self deserted by the Islanders, and the Parliament's Soldiers in Possession of all the Forts, except Rushen and Peele Castles, she surrender'd them, and the Parliament order'd the Council of State to consider of preserving that Island for the Benefit of the Commonwealth. A. D. 1651. The Histories of those Times speak of these Islands as Nests of Pirates, but the Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Echard represent them as the Retreats of Heroes, who disdain'd to submit to that Power which made all Europe tremble. James Hind the Highwayman deserves also a Place in the same Records, for being examin'd by the Council of State, Whitlocke tells us, he confess'd he had been employ'd by the King in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and when afterwards he was hang'd for his Robberies, the Cavaliers pretended he was as much murder'd as Mr. Love or Mr. Gibbons.

Hind the Robber.

The Island of Barbadoes, in America, was seiz'd by the Lord Willoughby of Parham in the Name of the King. Several Royalists had secur'd themselves and their Effects there, particularly Col. Walrond and Col. Colliton, but not with any Design to throw off their Dependance upon England, or to involve themselves in new Troubles and Dangers to shelter such as had no where else to go to. But the Lord Willoughby having the King's Commission they submitted to it, and the other Islanders did not think fit or safe to make Opposition by Arms. Willoughby the Governor, Col. Walrond, Col. Codrington, and Col. Muddiford, had a Design to banish the Parliament's Friends out of the Island, but it being discover'd by Codrington when he was tipsy, Col. Drax and Col. Allen made such a Party against it, that the Governor let it drop, and as soon as Sir George Ayscue arriv'd with his Squadron of Men of War, and his Guns began to play upon the chief Fort at Bridge Town, the chief Islanders shew'd a good Disposition to return to their Obedience to the Government of England. Sir George sent a Summons to the Lord Willoughby, and a Declaration to the Inhabitants, inviting them to submit to the Parliament. Willoughby, who was himself a Defserter from the Parliament, answer'd, He would keep the Place for the King. Upon which Sir George form'd a Regiment of 600 Men out of the Ships Crews, to assist the Friends to the Commonwealth, and putting them ashore under Captain Morrice, they were charg'd by 9 Companies of Foot and 3 Troops of Horse, but it being in the Night, and the Islanders not knowing the Number of the Enemy, were discourag'd by the repeated Shouts of the Sailors, which made them seem to be more than they were, and they ran away in a Sort of Amazement, and quitted a Fort in which were 4 Guns. Lieutenant Col. Allen, a Planter of Barbadoes, who had got Aboard the Fleet, and seven Men were all the Loss on the Parliament's Side. On Willoughby's, 100 Men were kill'd, and 80 taken. But as Whitlocke observes, this Success was nothing towards the gaining of the whole Island, the Enemy having about 5000 Horse and Foot in Arms. Sir George Ayscue made particular Application to Col. Muddiford of Barbadoes, whom he understood to be a Man of the best Interest in the Island, and by offering him and his Friends honourable Conditions, he prevail'd with him to join him, which increas'd his Forces to 2000 Foot and 100 Horse. He also sent the Lord Willoughby a Letter from his Lady, advising him to surrender, for that the King was utterly routed at Worcester; the contrary of which he had reported to his Party in that Island, and hop'd, if not believ'd himself. This Lord hearing of Muddiford's Junction with Ayscue, march'd up to them with all the Force he could make, but in the Night retreated 2 Miles. Sir George intended to attack him the next Day, and he had done it if extraordinary Rains had not fallen. Willoughby much disturb'd sturb'd by his Lady's Letter sent to him for a Treaty, in regard his Strength was much the greater, and to prevent the Destruction of that goodly Island, which was already wasted. Sir George Ayscue consented to it, and appointed Commissioners to treat with such as he should appoint. For Ayscue were, Col. Colliton and Col. Muddiford, Mr. Seark and Captain Pack. For the Lord Willoughby were Sir Richard Meriel, Mr. Charles Pym, Col. Ellis, and Major Byam. And they soon agreed upon Articles, for the Lord Willoughby knew his Men would not stand by him. His Lordship, Col. Walround, and all those Royalists who had Estates in England were to enjoy them. The Islanders were to have Protection for their Persons, Houses and Goods, and on these Terms were Barbadoes, and all the other Islands, deliver'd up to the Commonwealth.

A. D.

Virginia
surrender'd

After this Sir George sail'd to Virginia, having on Board Col. Poyntz Governor of St. Christophers, where the Inhabitants were ready to receive them, so far is it from being true, that the Virginians would have had the King come amongst them, as the Lord Clarendon affirms, and that Sir William Berkley the Governor could defend it against any Attempt, which is no more true, than that they had once any Thoughts of resisting the Commonwealth when a Force came to support them in their Submission to it, for Mr. George Ludlow, a Relation of General Ludlow's, had a Party ready to declare for the Parliament, and join their Forces with those that came to their Assistance against Berkley, who was in no Condition to oppose them. But the Earl of Clarendon can't help it. The Inhabitants of all the Plantations in America depended upon Trade, which is as inconsistent with arbitrary Power and Bigotry as Honesty with Injustice. Poyntz was made Governor in the Room of Berkley, and the Name of Poyntz shows how groundless as well as vain is that Reproach of the Lord Clarendon's, that the Parliament made Tradesmen Governors instead of Gentlemen.

Dutch.

The Commonwealth of England having now reduc'd the whole British Empire to her Obedience, except a few Banditti in Ireland, not of so much Consequence as the Thieves that generally infest the Roads, cast their Eyes abroad, and the first Object which requir'd their Consideration, was the Republick of the United Provinces, whose Conduct, since the Establishment of the Republick of England, had been very impolitick and unjustifiable. In Effect, the true Interests of the two States were inseparable, as they were a Free and a Protestant People; and it was very unworthy the Character of the Dutch Nation, for Wisdom and Wariness, to give the Parliament so many just Occasions of Offence: 'Twas no Excuse, that the Princess of Orange, their Stadtholder's Consort, was a Princess of England, and on her Account they were obliged to suffer the Residence of her Brothers, and their desperate Attendants at the Hague, after the Ministers of England had been murder'd and insulted there. The States General had no Relation to her, and if Princes have no Concern for Kindred when Interest is in Question, much less should Republicks have. The Assistance they had given the King in many Cases was well known to the Commonwealth of England, and Power crown'd with Victory is not wont to put up such Affronts. Add to this, that the Encroachments of the Dutch in Commerce were not likely to be past over by a wise and potent Republick, great in Counsels and in Arms, tho' the Business of the two former Reigns ran so much in favour of Spiritual Courts, as would not admit of any Interruption by Trade, Interest, or Glory.

1651.

The Lord Ambassador St. John being recall'd, and return'd from Holland, got himself to be nam'd one of the four Commissioners who were appointed by Parliament to attend the Lord General in his Way from Worcester to London, and it was observ'd that St. John had long and private Conferences with Cromwel on the Road, in which he probably confirm'd Oliver in his Resolution to break with the Dutch. Cromwel's Quarrel was their Regard for the House of Stuart, whom he mortally hated as Impediments to his own ambitious Views, and the Jealousy the States General had conceiv'd of the Growth of the Maritime Power of England, made them too careless and dilatory in giving the Parliament the Satisfaction they demanded; and the Commonwealth of England taking into Consideration the great Advantages the Hollanders made of their Navigation, by being the common Carriers, thought it convenient to take off the English Branch from them, by passing the famous Act of Navigation, which was not repeal'd after the Restoration, as it might have been, for the same Reason as Dunkirk was sold, it passing in the Times of Usurpation, the best Argument they had for any Thing of that Kind. By this Act, the most advantageous one to England that ever pass'd in Parliament, No Commodity whatsoever, of the Growth or Manufacture of Asia, Africa, or America, as well of the English Plantations as others, shall be imported into England, Ireland, or any the Territories thereof, in any Ships or Vessels, but in such as do truly belong to this Commonwealth, or the Plantations thereof, under Penalty of the Forfeiture of Goods and Vessels. And of Europe the like, That no Commodities whatsoever of foreign Growth or Manufacture, which are to be brought into this Commonwealth in Ships belonging to the People thereof, shall be by them shipp'd from any Places, but only from those of the said Growth, Production or Manufacture, or from those Parts where the said Commodities can only be, or usually have been shipp'd for Transportation. Instead of such useful Laws as this, by which England has got, and sav'd more Money than all the Charge of her Wars from 1640 to 1660 amounted to, we shall see what rare Acts pass'd after the Restoration of the King and the Earl of Clarendon. The Act of Navigation being a terrible Blow to the Dutch Traffick, they were not so forward in concluding the Treaty they desir'd, as they had been to desire it, however, as it did but too plainly preface an approaching Rupture, they dispatch'd away three or four of the most Noble of their Deputies as Ambassadors to the Parliament, Mynheer Scappe, Mynheer Parre, Mynheer Catz, the latter a Poet, which is an extraordinary Thing in Holland, who arriv'd at Gravesend in December, and were brought to London by the Master of the Ceremonies, in the States Coaches, and three Days after had their Audience in Parliament, introduc'd by the Earl of Salisbury, Sir John Danvers, and Sir Henry Mildmay: The Audience past in the Ceremonials, and then the Lord Commissioner Whitlocke, and other Members, were nominated to confer with their Excellencies on the Subject of their Embassy, which was to give Satisfaction to the Commonwealth of England, with reference to their Assisting the King, the Right of fishing on the British Coast, and the Sovereignty of the Seas. The two last Heads were asserted and explain'd with great Strength of Reasoning by Whitlocke, insomuch that the Ambassadors were

Act of Navigation.

A. D. 1651. more irritated than convinc'd; but as the Success of their Embassy was not determin'd in this Year, we shall refer it to the next. In the mean time, an English Man of War meeting with some Dutch Fishermen on the British Coast, demanded the tenth Herring as an Acknowledgment of the Sovereignty of the Seas, which the Parliament was resolv'd to assert in another manner than had hitherto been done. The Dutch denying it, they fell from Words to Blows, and the Dutchman shooting first at the English, the English Man of War sunk one of the Dutch Ships, which perish'd with all her Crew. This was in December, and added to the Reckoning which the Hollanders were to make up.

Scotland. We left Major General Monk in Scotland, where he had little Work upon his Hands. The Parliament nam'd Commissioners for the Civil Government of that Kingdom; Lord Chief Justice St. John, Sir Henry Vane, jun. Col. Fenwick, ——— Titchburn, Esq; Humphrey Sawney, Esq; Major General Lambert, Major General Monk, Major General Dean; by whom the Affairs of that Nation were very well settled, and a Way prepared for uniting it with England.

Ireland. In Ireland the Earl of Clanrickard, who with the pompous Title of Lord Lieutenant govern'd those Irish that had not laid down Arms, but kept them rather to rob than fight, apply'd to the Duke of Lorraine, who being driven out of his own Country, liv'd upon a little mercenary Army which he lent to the Spaniards in the Netherlands, and now pretended to assist the Irish with it. Another fine Scheme of the depending Cavaliers, to negotiate with a Prince for Assistance, who could or would not stir a Step without Money, and they had none to give him.

As to the Civil Government this Year, the Parliament had a Project to reduce the Receipts of the Publick Money into one Office, for the Cheapness of Collection. They also nam'd a Committee to consider what Inconveniences there are in the Law, how the Mischiefs which grow from Delays, the Chargeableness and Irregularities in the Proceedings of the Law may be prevented. This Committee were Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Sir William Roberts, Matthew Hale, Esq; Mr. Steel, Mr. Cook, Mr. Maneby, Mr. Sadler, Sir Henry Blunt, Mr. Berners, John Rusworth, Esq; Dr. Turner, Major General Desborough, Col. Thomlinson, Col. Blunt, Sergeant Fountain, Alderman Fowke, Mr. Moyer, Major Packer, Mr. Meltwolde, Mr. Mansell, Mr. Sparrow, Dr. Walker. This Committee met several Times, and desir'd the Judges in the several Courts to return to them a List of the Officers in their Courts, and what Fees they receive; and what Work they do for them. A Project of excellent Use, and fit for the Wisdom of the Nation to bring to Perfection. The Parliament also put down the Marshals Court, which has ever since it was restor'd been an intolerable Grievance to the People in and about London. And the State being now pretty well fix'd, it was thought proper to strengthen its Foundation by a new Representative of the People, which were to be still the Commonwealth of England. A grand Committee sat on this grand Affair in October, and so several Times after, to make Provision for a Succession of Members of the same Principles, as well as human Prudence could provide for it. They pass'd the Act for the Increase of Shipping, and Encouragement of Navigation, before-mention'd, and another appointing Dr. Clarke, Dr. Eston, and Dr. Stevens, to be Judges of the Admiralty; but the great Business was debated in a Cabal by Cromwel's Appointment, at which assisted Oliver Cromwel, Esq; Captain General, William Lenthall, Esq; Speaker, Sir Thomas Widdrington, Lord Chief Justice St. John, Lord Commissioner Whitlocke, Major General Harrison, Col. Whaley, Colonel Desborough, Col. Fleetwood.

Oliver open'd the Conference with a Proposal, That the old King being dead, and his Son defeated, he held it necessary to come to a Settlement of the Nation. Here he discover'd himself. The Nation was settled in a Commonwealth, if he alter'd the Government, it would doubtless be for Monarchy, and who then would be the Monarch was easy to be understood. The Speakers were in the following Order.

William Lenthall, Esq; "My Lord, this Company are very ready to attend your Excellency, and the Business you are pleas'd to propound to us is very necessary to be consider'd. God hath given marvellous Success to our Forces under your Command, and if we do not improve these Mercies to some Settlement, such as may be to God's Honour, we shall be very blame-worthy.

By Settlement Lenthall means his Excellency, and Cromwel is sure of him when he thinks fit to make use of him.

M. G. Harrison. "I think that which my Lord General hath propounded, is to advise to a Settlement both of our civil and spiritual Liberties, and so that the Mercies which the Lord hath given in to us may not be cast away. How this may be done is the great Question.

Harrison is not entirely at Cromwel's Devotion, and shew'd by his future Conduct that he was Republican, or rather Enthusiastical.

Whitlocke. "It is a great Question indeed, and not suddenly to be resolv'd, yet it were Pity that a Meeting of so many able and worthy Persons should be fruitless. I should humbly offer, in the first Place, whether it be not requisite to be understood in what Way this Settlement is desired, whether of any absolute Republick, or with any Mixture of Monarchy.

Whitlocke gives the first Hint of Cromwel's Protectorship, and Oliver takes hold of the Opportunity to introduce it.

Cromwel. "My Lord Commissioner Whitlocke hath put us upon the right Point; and indeed it is my Meaning we should consider whether a Republick, or a mix'd monarchical Government, will be best to be settled; and if any thing monarchical, then in whom that Power shall be plac'd.

There he comes to the Point indeed, and there can be no Answer to that Question but himself.

Sir T. Widdrington. "I think a mix'd monarchical Government will be most suitable to the Laws and People of this Nation; and if any monarchical, I suppose we shall hold it most just to place that Power in one of the Sons of the late King.

Col. Fleetwood. "I think that the Question, Whether an absolute Republick, or a mix'd Monarchy, be best to be settled in this Nation? will not be very easy to be determin'd.

Lord Chief Justice St. John. "It will be found that the Government of this Nation, without something of monarchical Power, will be very difficult to be so settled, as not to shake the Foundation of the Laws, and the Liberties of the People.

William

A. D. 1651. William Lenthall, Esq; "It will breed a strange Confusion to settle a Government of this Nation, without something of Monarchy. Col. Desborough. "I beseech you, my Lord, why may not this, as well as other Nations, be govern'd by Way of a Republick.

Whitlocke. "The Laws of England are so interwoven with the Power and Practice of Monarchy, that to settle a Government without something of Monarchy, would make so great an Alteration in the Proceedings of our Law, that you have scarce Time to rectify, nor can we well foresee the Inconveniencies which will arise thereby.

Col. Whaley. "I do not well understand Matters of Law, but it seems to me to be the best Way not to have any thing of monarchical Power in the Settlement of our Government; and if we should resolve upon any, whom have we to pitch upon? The King's eldest Son hath been in Arms against us, and his second Son is likewise our Enemy.

Sir Thomas Widdrington. "But the late King's third Son, the Duke of Gloucester, is still amongst us, and too young to have been in Arms against us, or infected with the Principles of our Enemies.

Whitlocke. "There may be a Day given for the King's eldest Son, or for the Duke of York his Brother, to come in to the Parliament, and upon such Terms as shall be thought fit and agreeable both to our civil and spiritual Liberties: A Settlement may be made with them.

Cromwel. "That will be a Business of more than ordinary Difficulty; but really I think, if it may be done with Safety and Preservation of our Rights, both as Englishmen and as Christians, that a Settlement with somewhat of monarchical Power in it would be very effectual.

The mentioning of any of the late King's Children is the Farce that's play'd here, for not one of the Cabal had any such Desire. The Lawyers St. John, Lenthall, Whitlocke, Widdrington, who were for monarchical Government, were all Creatures of Cromwel's, and meant the Power not the Person.

The Republick was now courted by all Nations. Besides Ambassadors from Spain and Portugal, there were others from Sweden, from Denmark, from the Hanse Towns, from Venice, from Florence, and other Princes and States. The Council of State sometimes wrote Letters in the Name of the Commonwealth, as this to the Doge of Venice, Serenissimo Principi Venetiarum Duci; Senatuique Celsissimo Consilium Status, Parliamenti Reipublice Angliæ, Auctoritate constitutum. Salutem ex mandato Parliamenti. Serenissime Princeps, Celsissime Senatus Amici Charissimi. The Council of State, establish'd by the Authority of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, to the most serene Prince the Doge and the most high Senate of Venice. By Command of the Parliament. Most serene Prince, most high Senate, our most dear Friends, &c. This Letter recommended to them James Dickons and Job Throgmorton, who had met with some Injustice in the Courts of that Republick. Leti informs us, that about the latter End of this Year the following Bishops

P. 234.

Meeting of Bishops. had a private Meeting at London; Dr. William Pierce Bishop of Bath and Wells, Dr. Henry King Bishop of Chichester, Dr. Roger Maynwaring Bishop of St. David's, Dr. Matthew Wren Bishop of Ely, Dr. Ralph Brownrigg Bishop of Exeter, Dr. George Cook Bishop of Hereford, Dr. Morgan Owen Bishop of Landaff, Dr. Thomas Wyniffe Bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Joseph Hall Bishop of Norwich, Dr. Robert Skinner Bishop of Oxford, Dr. John Warner Bishop of Rochester, Dr. Brian Duppa Bishop of Salisbury, Dr. Walter Curt Bishop of Winchester, Dr. John Prideaux Bishop of Worcester, Dr. Barnaby Potter Bishop of Carlisle, Dr. Richard Parry Bishop of Man. Dr. William Fuxon Bishop of London refus'd to be at their Meeting, either believing it would signify nothing, or fearing to give Offence to the then Government, as my Author says; and that the Prelates thought it too much to lose all at once, their Flocks, their Dignities, their Churches, their Revenues, which, continues he, tho' a Papist, netoient pas peuteestre l'Article que leur tenoit le moins au cœur, were not perhaps the Article they had least at Heart. The Pretence for their assembling was to use all their Interest by their Friends in and out of Parliament, to get Part of their Lands reserv'd for their Subsistence as long as they liv'd. Harrison discover'd this Meeting, and inform'd Cromwel of it, and he the Council of State. One of the Members mov'd immediately, that they should be all seiz'd, imprison'd, and punish'd as Disturbers of the Publick Peace; but Cromwel, who wanted Tools among all Parties, and affected great Moderation to get in with the Royalists, was contented with breaking up the Assembly, and letting them know, That they must disperse at the Instant, and quit London in eight and forty Hours, and if ever they took upon them the Function of Bishops, the Title or Office, they should be proceeded against as Traytors; which was enough to send them down into the Country again faster than they came up. Such is the Story in Gregorio Leti, but what Foundation he had for it we know not, and do very much suspect his Authority.

We left the King at Paris just arriv'd there after the Rout at Worcester, and in so miserable a Condition, that he had hardly Necessaries for his Subsistence as a Gentleman, much less a Prince. His Credit was so low, that the Earl of Clarendon owns he could not raise 20 Pistoles upon it. The Cardinal de Retz, in his Memoirs, makes it still worse. The Lord Taaf, Envoy from the Irish Rebels to the Duke of Lorraine, was his Great Chamberlain, Valet de Chambre, Clerk of the Kitchen, Cup-bearer and all, an Equipage answerable to his Court, for his Majesty had not chang'd his Shirt all the Way from England. Indeed upon his Arrival at Paris he had one lent him by the Lord Jermyn, but the Queen his Mother had not Money to buy him another for the next Day. The Duke of Orleans paid him a Complement upon his Arrival, but Mons. de Retz tells us he could not prevail with the Duke to give his Nephew one Penny: A little, he said, would not be worth his Acceptance, and a great deal would engage him to do as much more. De Retz propos'd to his Royal Highness to lend the King of England 1000 Pistoles, and was asham'd that he could not persuade him to do it, so he himself borrow'd 1500 of Monsieur Morangis and carry'd them to the Lord Taaf. The Cardinal adds, "Tis remarkable that the same Night, as I was going home, I met one Tilney an Englishman, whom I had formerly known at Rome, who told me that Vere, a great Parliamentarian, and a Favourite of Cromwel, was arriv'd at Paris, and had Orders to see me. I was a little perplex'd, however I thought it would be improper to refuse him an Interview. He gave me a Letter from Cromwel in the Nature of Credentials, importing, That the Sentiments I had discover'd in the Defence of Pub-

A. D. 1652. "lick Liberty added to my Reputation, and had induc'd him to enter into the strictest Friendship with me. It was a most civil complaint Letter, and I answer'd it with a great deal of Respect, but in such a Manner as became a true Catholick and an honest French Man." Verè appear'd to be a Man of surprising Abilities; and the Truth is, neither Oliver nor the Commonwealth employ'd Fools, but Mazarine and the most able Politicians in France, had a very mean Opinion of the Counsellors whom King Charles had about him, notwithstanding the Earl of Clarendon was chief of them. It is the Fate of this Prince, said the Cardinal, that he neither knows how to chuse for himself, nor has any one near him that is able to advise him. For by all this King's Father's Actions, and by all his own, one may see that such Heads were never put upon the Shoulders of Men who were fit to make Ministers and Counsellors. He never had the least Prospect of recovering his Dominions but by the Assistance of the Presbyterians. Those who took Arms for him in Scotland, and who join'd his Scots Army in England, were Presbyterians. The Queen, his Mother, though a bigotted Papist, was so sensible of it, that she would fain have had him to have gone to the Presbyterian Meeting at Charenton near Paris; and the Lord Clarendon makes it his Boast, that he was the Person who dissuaded the King from going to the Protestant Church there, for which, and other the like Reasons, Cardinal Mazarine might well pass that homely Compliment on his Majesty's Counsellors, who now also advis'd him to offer his Service to the Dutch, about to have War with England, and that he would go aboard their Fleet; to stir up the People to an Insurrection against that Commonwealth; a Project that a less Degree of Genius than Machiavel's was, would never have mention'd to the States, whatever Subject it might have made for Discourse in the King's Cabinet. Could any Thing be more obvious than that their entering into such a League with him must necessarily engage them in his Quarrel, which they by no Means intended? His Condition could hardly be made worse by any Change, and theirs might one Time or other be much mended by a Peace with England on reasonable Terms, and they could expect none when they had taken him into their Protection. The Court of France was then at Variance with the Princes, and the Parliament of Paris, about the removing Mazarine from the prime or indeed the sole Ministry. The Prince of Conde had sent for the Spaniards and the Duke of Lorraine to assist the Princes, and there were two foreign Armies in the Neighbourhood of Paris, ready to join them. Upon which King Charles was prevail'd with to try what he could do with the Duke of Lorraine by Persuasion, and whether it was that the latter was doubtful of the Issue of a War with France, or had received some Promises from that Court by King Charles, which render'd his Retreat more advantageous than he could expect his Stay would be; the Duke of Lorraine, after a Conference with the King of England, broke up, and left the Princes to end the Matter as well as they could. This Mediation is much talk'd of, but it had so ill an Effect on the Minds of the Citizens of Paris, who were in the Interests of the Princes, that the King, Queen-Mother of England, and Duke of York, were not safe in the Louvre. The Prince of Conde got them a Guard out of it to a certain Distance, where a Party of the King's Troops receiv'd them, and convey'd them to St. Germain's. The King of England's Pension from his Uncle Lewis the Thirteenth was about 6000 Pounds a Year, as we read in the Lord Clarendon's History, and the Greediness of his Followers to divide that small Pittance amongst them, and their Quarrels about Honours and Places in England, being exactly the Bargain of the Bearskin, are other Proofs of the Truth of Cardinal Mazarine's Saying of them.

We have hinted the Beginning of the Rupture between the two Republicks, England and the United Provinces. Warwick says it was the first Com. War, War the Parliament made with their elder Brother Commonwealth, that of Holland, but that is not the worst Example of his Skill in Elocution. A poorer Author still than he knew better than that, they resolv'd to quarrel with their Sister Commonwealth. The Dutch stomaching the Navigation Act, which began to pinch them, and frighten'd at the Demand for Damages suffer'd by the English at Amboynes in the East Indies, for which neither King James nor King Charles I. could procure any Satisfaction, and for other Damages during their Reigns, and since that, saw a War would be inevitable unless they would comply with the Demand, and accordingly they prepar'd for it. The Right of the Flag was not disputed, because the English Ships were not the King's, as the Earl of Clarendon pretends; but because there were other very important Articles to be settled for concluding a Peace, and they were not willing to allow that unless all the rest were agreed upon, for striking the Flag would not then have put off the Conclusion of that Treaty a Minute. The Parliament had Notice from Time to Time of great Preparations making in Holland towards equipping a Fleet, and in May their Admiral Van Tromp, with about 42 Sail of Men of War was discover'd on the Back of the Goodwin Sands by Major Bourne, who commanded a Squadron of 8 English Ships. The Dutch bore towards Dover Road, upon which the Greyhound Frigate was commanded to make Sail and speak with them, which she did, and then they struck their Topsail. The Capt. of the Greyhound demanded to know, why they came in such a Fleet on our Coasts in Time of Treaty. Two or Three of the Dutch Commanders came aboard the Greyhound, and said, they had a Message from Admiral Tromp to the Commander in chief of the English Fleet. That the northerly Winds having blown hard several Days they were forc'd further Southward than they intended, and having rode for some Days off Dunkirk, they had lost divers Cables and Anchors, professing they meant no Injury to the English Nation. As yet there has been no other Act of Hostility than that of the English Men of War examining the Dutch about their Fishing on the British Coast, which Debate might have been ended by Treaty, and Ambassadors were come from the States General to the Parliament for that purpose, but before Matters were settled here is a great Fleet of Dutch Men of War almost at the Mouth of the River of Thames, defying the Maritime Power of England, and provoking the English to War. General Blake, with the rest of the Fleet, was to the Westward when Major Bourne spy'd the Dutch on the Back of the Goodwin Sands; the latter immediately sent him Advice of it, and Blake made what haste he could to ply towards them.

On the 19th of May in the Morning he saw them at Anchor about Dover Road, and being within 3 Leagues of them they weigh'd and stood to the Eastward, where an Advice Boat from Holland came up with them, and soon after Admiral Van Tromp made all the Sail he could

A. D. 1652. could towards General Blake, and bore down directly upon our Fleet, Van Tromp being the Headmost. Upon which Blake shot a first, second and third Gun at Tromp without a Ball, a Signal for him to strike; to which the Dutch Admiral answer'd with a Gun from his Poop, and hung out a red Flag, the Signal for his whole Fleet: Blake took it right, and singled out Tromp to treat with him about his refusing the Point of Honour to the English, and prevent, if possible, the Effusion of Blood: But when he drew near the Dutch Ships, they fir'd many hundred Shot at him, contrary, says Whitlocke, to the Law of Nations. Blake's Ship being the Headmost also of his Fleet, was by this Means for some Time engag'd singly with the Dutch, who had above two Ships to his one when they were all join'd: However the English maintain'd the Fight with the Dutch Fleet four Hours, till Nine at Night, when they were oblig'd by the Darkeness to give over; and the Dutch made over to the French Coasts. Blake's Ship receiv'd 1000 Shot in her Hull: All her Rigging was torn to pieces, and she had several Shot also between Wind and Water. The English took one Dutch Man of War, and sunk another. The Dutch Prisoners confess'd that Tromp's hanging out the red Flag was a Signal for them to fall upon the English. Upon News of this Engagement, the Parliament order'd a Guard to be set on the Dutch Ambassadors House at Chelsey, to defend them from the Assaults of the enrag'd Multitude; and General Cromwel, and Mr. Dennis Bond went down to the Fleet to assure General Blake of all possible Assistance from the Republick; he wanted no Exhortation. His whole Soul was engag'd in the Cause of his Country; and as to his Courage and Conduct, they were never once objected against in the whole Course of his Service, which lasted sixteen or seventeen Years. He had a Contempt for Riches, which was the more glorious; for that he acquir'd more Riches for the Commonwealth than all other Admirals whom I ever heard of; and as to Honour he had no Relish of any that center'd not in serving the Publick. Blake detach'd Capt. Peacock and Capt. Taylor to look out the Dutch Fleet, which had been refitted with great Diligence and Dispatch, as was his own also. These two Captains met with two Dutch Men of War on the Coasts of Flanders, who again refusing to strike to them, another Engagement commenc'd and prov'd a very sharp one. The English boarded one of the Dutch Men of War, and took all her Officers and Seamen, but the Ship was so shatter'd she could not swim. The other Ship ran herself upon the Sands to avoid being taken. The next Day, June the 13th, the Parliament receiv'd Letters from General Blake, that he having Intimation of a Fleet of Hollanders near the Dorset, making towards the North, sent out a Squadron to discover them, and they brought in 26 Sail of Merchant Ships laden, with three Men of War, their Convoy. The General, for so is Blake term'd in History, and so were the other Admirals in the Time of the Republick, sail'd to the West; and having scower'd the Channel, came again to Dover Road, where he was join'd by Sir George Ayscue. His Fleet now consisted of about 100 Men of War, and there were two Regiments put on Board them. The States General could not but expect the Effects of their intended Rupture after the Orders they had given their Admirals not to strike; but the ill Success of Van Tromp, when he had above 40 Men of War, and Blake no more than 21, terribly allarm'd them, and they immediately dispatch'd the Lord Paw to join with their other Ambassadors in England, and procure a Continuation of the Treaty, and a Discharge of the Prisoners, pretending that the Quarrel was begun by General Blake, or that at least what Tromp did, was not by their Orders. The Lord Paw was receiv'd with all usual Demonstrations of Honour; and being admitted to Audience, press'd for an Accommodation of all Differences, and a Cessation of all Acts of Hostility between the two Nations, assuring the Parliament, his Masters had given Orders to their Ships to strike to the English Flag in the same Manner as had been practis'd in former Times. But being demanded to shew his Powers, he produc'd only Letters of Credence and Passports, referring himself to the other Ambassadors in that Point, with whom he made some general Propositions to the Parliament, and desir'd them to declare their Demands. The House perceiving by these Proceedings of the Dutch, that the Differences were not likely to be accommodated by Treaty, contented themselves with requiring Satisfaction for the Injuries receiv'd, and Assurance that nothing of that Nature should be attempted for the future, which if the Ambassadors would consent to, they declar'd themselves ready to proceed in the Treaty, and grant a Cessation of Arms. But so little were the Dutch dispos'd to Dutch give the Satisfaction demanded, that they made no farther Mention of the Cessation, which they had so earnestly press'd; and having taken a hasty Audience of Leave, broke off the Treaty abruptly, and return'd home.

In the mean Time General Blake was very watchful in forwarding the Work he was employ'd about, and leaving Sir George Ayscue with the Fleet on the Coast of England, himself with about 40 Men of War sail'd Northward, as far as the Dutch Fishery, off the Coast of Scotland. There were about 600 Herring Busses under Blake's Convoy of 12 Men of War, which were attack'd by the English of Blake's Fleet, three of them sunk and nine taken. Blake took all the Fish and let the Dutch carry off their Busses, which he had not Hands to Man himself; and though Ludlow thinks the Busses should have been kept to have set up an English Fishery; yet the many Projects of that Kind since, which have all miscarry'd, shew that no such Use could have then been made of them, though probably more might have been done under this Government than those that came after it. The Dutch thinking to make an Advantage of the Division of the English Fleet, watch'd the Motions of Sir George Ayscue, who having taken ten Flemish Ships, between Dover and Calais, and ran twenty a Shore, sail'd Westward to seek out the Dutch Fleet, which he had no certain Intelligence of, or he would not have sought them, they having sixty Sail and he but thirty eight, with which he stood after them over to the Coast of France, where he met them on the 16th of August, under the Command of the renown'd De Ruyter. Sir George, notwithstanding the Inequality of the Numbers, began the Fight about Four in the Afternoon, and his Ship with six other Men of War, charg'd through the whole Body of the Enemy's Fleet, receiving much Damage in their Hulls, Masts, Sails, and Rigging; yet did they tack about, weather them, and charge them again, continuing thus engag'd in the Body of the Enemy's Fleet till it was dark Night; and had the rest of the English Captains perform'd their Parts as well as Sir George Ayscue, this great Dutch Fleet had in all likelihood been totally routed. Ayscue lost but one Ship, a Fire-ship, which set her self on Fire, being ready to sink.

A. D. 1652. De Ruyter lost two Ships, the one sunk and the other burnt: His whole Fleet was so damag'd that he thought not fit to engage again the next Day, but made home as fast as he could. In this Engagement Capt. Pack's Leg was shot off, and he died soon after; Capt. Iisle and Capt. Witberedge were wounded. Both Sides had many Men kill'd and wounded, and this Fight was the smartest that had been then known in our Seas. A few Days after Capt. Pen met with a Dutch Man of War, and six Merchant Men richly laden, who yielded without striking a Stroke; whether it was that Van Tromp did not like this Beginning of the War, or that the States did not like him, as being a Creature of the late Prince of Orange, he desir'd to lay down his Commission, and an Enemy of the House of Orange, De Wit, was put in his Place.

Blake takes a French Fleet.

In the Beginning of September, the English Fleet, under General Blake, riding in the Downs, the General receiv'd Intelligence of a French Fleet on the Coasts of France; upon which he weigh'd Anchor and stood over: He spy'd them in Calais Road, and they spying him, weigh'd and sail'd towards Dunkirk; Blake pursu'd them as far as he could for the Sands, and took most of them, among the rest,

The Triton, 32 Guns, commanded by the Chevalier de Verdiel, in which was Monsieur Bimulet, Admiral of this Fleet.

The Shepherd, 30 Guns; commanded by the Chevalier Boismerant.

The Gift of God, 30 Guns, commanded by the Chevalier de la Charte.

The Dutchess, 32 Guns, commanded by Monsieur de la Roch.

The Crescent, 26 Guns, commanded by Monsieur De la Vel Dean.

The Hunter, 22 Guns, commanded by Monsieur De la Gicleek.

The St. Lewis, 28 Guns, commanded by Monsieur De la Gory.

The ——— 8 Guns.

Six Fire Ships, and several Transports.

This Fleet was order'd to take in Warlike Stores and Provisions at Calais, for the Relief of Dunkirk; but being thus intercepted by the English, the Dunkirkers despairing of being reliev'd, surrender'd the Town to the Spaniards, and the like did the Garrison of Graveline. And now the French Court began to be truly sensible of their Weakness in harbouring the Princes of England, and their Retainers, which, and some Insults at Sea had drawn upon them the Resentments of the Parliament of England, who suffer'd no Power to protect their Enemies, without Chastisement, and made those that presum'd to do it repent severely of their Folly.

France out of Complacency to the Daughter of Henry IV. now Queen Mother of England, had avoided sending an Ambassador to the Commonwealth; but presently upon this Blow she dispatch'd one of her most able Ministers to give Satisfaction, and to make her Peace with the Republick; after which we shall soon see that the Princes of England, the Lord High Chancellor of England, and Sir Edward Hyde, Chancellor of the Exchequer, &c. will be perswaded to withdraw themselves from that Court, though as yet there is no other prepar'd to receive them.

English fugitives mischievous abroad.

Before we proceed in this Story, let us reflect a little on the Mischiefs the Princes of England and their fugitive Train have brought upon the Nations, whom they deluded with false Representations of their Party and Interest in England, of which many Instances are to be given. Prince Rupert first impos'd himself on the Spaniards and then on the Portuguese. How the latter paid for it, out of their Brasile Fleets, and how the former have and will pay for it, and for their entertaining those Princes and their Followers, has been and will still be seen in this History. These Nations were fed with Hopes that the banish'd Heroes who could not keep an Inch of Ground in Great Britain; with the Help of numerous Armies, who were all beaten and suppress'd, would conquer their Conquerors without Men, Arms, Ships, Money, or any Thing to help them. France has paid part of her Reckoning for sheltering them; and Holland's being a longer Account will be longer a clearing. England was to rise for them as soon as ever they could throw a Cable a-shore; and though the Nations had this fair Example to shun the like Deception hereafter; yet how have the false Reports of the Successors of those Fugitives, following the Fortunes of one of those Princes, the abdicated King, impos'd on France, to the Expence of above 100 Millions Sterling, and on Spain to an Expence and Loss which she does not yet know the End of, and can hope for no End to it but by entirely renouncing all League with such Vagabonds, and entering heartily into Friendship with England.

The Dutch depended much on the Disturbances and Perplexities the Royalists would raise in England. We have seen that they set out in this War with unexpected Gallantry, and before Van Tromp defy'd the English Admiral, they held their Heads very high in Holland. Soon after they publish'd their Declaration of War, a Medal was struck; on one Side was represented a Female Warrior, by which was understood that Republick's having on her Spear the Cap, which is the Emblem of Liberty, surrounded with seven Escutcheons, with the Arms of the seven Provinces. On the Reverse was a Rock in the Middle of the Sea beaten by the Waves, the Winds blowing a Tempest upon it from every Quarter, and round it this Latin Verse,

Ut Rupes Immota, Mari stant sedere Juncti:

United like a Rock amidst the Sea
She stands, unmov'd by furious Waves and Winds.

The Dutch were extremely pleas'd with this Medal, but that Pleasure lasted no longer than till the News arriv'd of their first Defeat.

On the 27th of September General Blake discover'd the Dutch Fleet again off the Goodwyn Sands. He was just return'd from the West, where he had taken five Dutch West India and six Straits Ships, valued at 200000 Pounds. He divided his Fleet into three Squadrons, one commanded by himself, another by Vice-Admiral Pen, and the third by Rear-Admiral Bourn. Next Day General Blake bore down upon them till he came within three Fathom Water on the Kentish Knock. The Sovereign, in which was the General, the Resolution, and the St. Andrew, First Rates, were aground on the Knock, but got off presently without any Harm, and fell in among the Enemy, whom they fought with Advantage till Night parted them. The Dutch staid to Leeward of the English, as if they intended another Engagement. Next Morning at Day-break they were seen about two Leagues to the North-East of the English, who, tho' the Wind was but little and shifting, bore after them all the Forenoon, till the Wind coming to North and by West, hinder'd their getting up with the Enemy. Upon which the General order'd

The Frigates got up with the Dutch Men of War, and the latter fearing the rest of the Fleet would do the same, set up their Main Sails, and ran for it. Ten Frigates of General Blake's Fleet pursuing them, and a fresh Gale springing up next Day, September the 30th, the whole Fleet pursu'd them in Sight of West Gabel in Zealand, and saw them run into the Goree. The English Fleet could follow them no further for the Shal-loves. The Number of Ships on each Side was about 60. Three of the Dutch were wholly disabled at the first Brunt, and another, the Rear-Admiral, was taken by Capt. Mildmay in the Nonsuch as she was towing off. She sunk soon after, and the Officers and Sailors were put aboard English Ships. About 40 Englishmen were kill'd and as many wounded, which was the most of their Loss.

Capt. Bodilo fights the Dutch in the Streights. During these Transactions, the Squadron under Command of Capt. Bodilo in the Mediterranean, consisting of the Paragon, the Phoenix, the Constant Warwick, and the Elizabeth, having under Convoy three English Turkey Ships, met with eleven Sail of Dutch Men of War, near the Island of Corfica, under Admiral Van Galen, who presently came up with the English, and began an Engagement, but Night coming on, parted them. Next Morning the Dutch renew'd the Fight, and were as warmly receiv'd as the Day before, and as can be imagin'd from so small a Number. One of the Dutch Ships took Fire, the Main-top Masts of two others were shot down. The Phoenix, of 44 Guns, was clap'd on board by a heavy Dutch Ship full of Men, who overpower'd the English and took her. This Prize was the Subject of much Boast in Holland, tho' there was no great Need of it. The Dutch paid for it dearly, their Admiral Van Galen being kill'd, and got it by their Numbers, the English not giving out so long as they had Men and Ammunition. The Paragon had 27 kill'd and 60 wounded, the Elizabeth had but two Barrels of Powder, the Constant Warwick was in no better Condition, yet they got safely with their Merchant Ships into Porto Longone. Nor did the Dutch keep their Prize long, for the Dutch Fleet putting afterwards into Leghorn, Captain Cox, who commanded an English Man of War, mann'd out two Boats of brave Britons, boarded the Phoenix, and brought her off. The Officers, among whom was young Van Tromp, afterwards so famous, making their Escapes out of the Cabbin Windows.

The Dane. The Parliament sent Capt. Ball, with a Squadron of Men of War, to Elfsinore, to demand of the King of Denmark Restitution of several English Merchant-Ships detain'd in his Ports, which being loaden with Naval Stores, were very much wanted to carry on this Naval War; but the King of Denmark being then privately treating with the Dutch to join in a League against the Commonwealth, refus'd to restore them, and sold the Ships Cargoes, tho' he had promis'd Capt. Ball to secure them for the Proprietors. The English in their Return home took a Dutch Man of War and 20 Buffes. Denmark would not join with the Dutch, but on Condition Van Tromp was restor'd to the Command of their Fleet, which was done, and the Dane sent 20 Men of War to the Assistance of the Hollanders, who were to pay him one Million of Guilders.

In November the Dutch Admiral Van Tromp, with 110 Men of War, besides Fireships, being join'd by 17 Men of War from Zealand, sail'd from the Goree, with Orders to convoy out of the Channel near 500 Merchant Ships, bound for France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Barbary, and the Levant, and to take all Advantages he could of the English. Most of the Dutch Merchant Ships were by Strefs of Weather and contrary Winds driven back to their Harbours, but their Men of War kept out at Sea; and Van Tromp having receiv'd Advice that General Blake had sent 20 of his Ships to convoy a Fleet of laden Colliers from Newcastle, 12 towards Plymouth, and 15 up the River to refit, came into the Doruns with 80 Men of War, Blake having with him but 37: Notwithstanding, which Disparity of Number, Blake, with the Approbation of a Council of War, resolv'd to fight the Dutch Fleet. Accordingly he engag'd them about Noon, November the 29th, and the Fight continu'd till it was dark. In this Fight, half of the English Fleet, as small as it was, came not up, pretending Want of Men, inso much that a few Ships bore the Brunt of the Battle with the whole Dutch Fleet. The Vanguard and the Victory engag'd 20 of them from the first of the Fight to the last, and yet got clear of them all. In the Evening the Garland, a 40 Gun Ship, was boarded by two Dutch Flags, and after she had blown up her Decks, for want of Men, was taken. The Bonadventure, a Merchant Man, attempting to relieve the Garland, was boarded, yet clear'd her Decks several Times, but the Captain being kill'd, she was also taken. General Blake going in the Triumph to relieve the Garland, had his Fore-top Mast shot by the Board, was twice boarded, and yet got off, as did all the rest except the Bonadventure and Garland. Two other Ships, both Merchant Men, fell into the Enemy's Hand. General Blake retreated to Lee Road to be recruited with Ships and Men. One of the Dutch Flags was blown up, and both Van Tromp and De Ruyter's Ships were very much damag'd. However, the former was so elated with this little Success, owing entirely to the Superiority of Number, that he order'd a Broom to be fix'd to his Main-top, saying, He would sweep the British Seas of all English Men of War; but he was himself swept out of the World in the next Battle, and full Vengeance taken for the small Affront which General Blake receiv'd in this.

The Parliament having receiv'd Information of the Misbehaviour of some Officers in the late Engagement, appointed a Committee, of which Sir Henry Vane, jun. John Carew, Esq; and Major Salway, were the principal, to examine into their Conduct, empowering them to place and displace Officers, and regulate all Matters relating to the Marine. These Commissioners us'd such Care and Diligence in Discharge of their Trust, that the Face of Affairs soon became much alter'd for the better, a considerable Fleet put to Sea well officer'd and well mann'd. The Magazines were plentifully provided, and thirty Ships put upon the Stocks; and, to strengthen themselves against the Dane, the Parliament sent the Lord Commissioner Whitlocke on an extraordinary Embassy to the Court of Sweden, where he was receiv'd with all the Honours due to his Character.

Monk was recall'd from Scotland about the latter End of the Year to assist General Blake aboard the Fleet, there being nothing of Consequence left for him to do in that Kingdom, where the Commissioners had treated with the Marquis of Argyle and others, about a Union of the two Kingdoms, pursuant to an Act of Parliament for the Incorporation of England and Scotland into one

Brit. Triumph.

They summon'd the Counties, Cities and Burroughs, to agree to the Incorporation, of which 18 of 31 Counties, and 24 of 56 Cities and Burghs consented to send their Deputies to the Parliament of England. Judges were sent to Scotland for the Administration of Justice, which they perform'd to the great Satisfaction of the People. The Lord Argyle made many Difficulties of coming to a Conclusion with the English Commissioners; and at last, when he clos'd with them, his Son, the Lord Lorn, went off to the Earl of Glencairn; the Earl of Balcarras, and others who defended themselves among the Fastnesses in the Highlands, from whence they durst not make any Attempt on the Low Countries. Glencairn quarrelling with Lorn, the latter made his Escape or he had been clap'd up. These Gentlemen had only the Honour to starve there in the King's Name, from whom they expected more Assistance than he could expect from them: They sent one Drummond to Paris at the Instance of Col. Middleton, so often mention'd, who was come to them from France, to invite the King to come amongst them. Drummond was admitted to Audience by the little Council the King had about him; and when he had deliver'd his Message Chancellor Hyde ask'd him, how the King would be accommodated if he came among them. Drummond reply'd, Not so well as was fitting, but they would take Care of him to furnish him with every Thing that was necessary. Bishop Burnet tells us, "Mr. Drummond wonder'd the King did not check Hyde in his Demand; For, said he, it look'd strange, that when they were hazarding their Lives to help him to a Crown, he should be concern'd for Accommodation." But as I have observ'd again and again, this President of his Majesty's little Council was guilty of very strange Things in his Ministry, as well as his Memoirs. The Marquis of Argyle having agreed to the Union, the English Commissioners almost perfected that Work: And in August, Whitlocke informs us, the Commissioners of the Shires chose 21 Men, 14 to represent the Counties, and 7 the Boroughs; but that Model was alter'd afterwards by Cromwel.

The Scots in the Low Lands being entirely reduc'd, it was resolv'd to erect 4 Forts to curb those that might form Designs against the English, one at Inverness, another at Leith, a Third at Ayre, and a Fourth at St. Johnstoun, and in Pursuit of those in the Mountains to divide the Forces into three Parties: The first consisted of Col. Overton's Regiment of Foot, and a Regiment of Horse, commanded by Major Blackmore; the second of Col. Hacker's Regiment of Horse, and one of Foot, commanded by Col. Lilburn; the third was compos'd of Major General Dean's Regiment of Horse, and Monk's Regiment of Foot, each Party having some Troops of Dragoons to attend them; and these were not long driving the Highlanders out of their Fastnesses.

Ireland.

Cromwel's Plot for his own Grandeur now thicken'd apace; the Parliament voted Major General Lambert to be Deputy to the Lord General Cromwel, but he could not trust him with so important a Command, and therefore got himself to be continu'd by a new Vote, Captain General of the Forces, rais'd and to be rais'd in Ireland, as well as England, and his Son-in-law Fleetwood, to be Commander in Chief there under him. Lambert would not go over unless he had the Character of Deputy, which the Parliament would not confer on him, resolving that there should be no more Lieutenants of Ireland, now Oliver's Commission was expir'd, but to keep the Civil Government in their own Hands, to be executed by Commissioners.

Galway was for some Time block'd up by Sir Charles Coote, and the Irish Garrison under the Marquis of Clanrickard was very desirous to capitulate, before the Season came for the Army to take the Field, and besiege it in Form. Clanrickard sent a Letter to General Ludlow, which for the Temper and Judgment of it deserves to be remembred.

Sir,

"MANY of the Nobility, Clergy, and other Persons of Quality, Subjects of this Kingdom, with the Corporation of Galway, having consider'd the present State of Affairs, and the ruinous Effects which this long War hath produc'd, have solicited me to desire of you a Conference for the Establishment of the Repose of this Nation, and to obtain a safe Conduct for the Commissioners whom by their Advice I shall judge capable to be sent to you for that End. It is this which hath oblig'd me to send you an Express, with this Protestation, that I shall not abandon them till I see such Conditions granted them as they may with Honour accept; for want of which, I am resolv'd to continue the Authority and Protection of his Majesty over them, even to Extremity, not doubting but by divine Assistance, with the Forces we already have, and the Succours which shall be sent us by his Majesty and Allies, we shall be found in a Condition to change the present State of Affairs, or at least to render your former Conquests of little Advantage, and in the End to sell our Lives at a dear Rate, if we shall be forc'd thereto, the which leaving to your Consideration, and expecting your certain Answer and Resolution, I remain,

Mar. 24,
1652.Sir, Your Servant,
CLANRICKARD.

General Ludlow answer'd him like a Man who laid no Weight on the Succours he expected from the King; and indeed that was one of the weakest Passages in his Letter.

My Lord,

"IN Answer to yours of the 24th of March, by which you propose a Treaty for the Settlement of this Country, and desire a safe Conduct for the Commissioners you shall think fit to employ in the Management of that Affair; I think fit in pursuance of the Advice of the Commissioners of the Parliament of England, and of many Officers of the English Army, to advertise you, as hath been already answer'd to those who have sent Propositions of the like Nature, that the Settlement of this Nation doth of Right belong to the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, to whom we are oblig'd in Duty to leave it, being assur'd that they will not capitulate with those who ought to submit to them, and yet oppose themselves to their Authority, and upon vain and frivolous Hopes have refus'd such Offers of Favour as they would gladly accept at present: So that I fear they will be constrain'd to proceed against them with the highest Severity; which that you may prevent by your timely Submission is the Desire of,

My Lord,

Your humble Servant,
Edmund Ludlow.
1652.

A. D. 1652. The Marquis's Letter not succeeding with Ludlow, he apply'd to Sir Charles Coote, who concluded a Treaty with him on much easier Terms than the Parliament's Commissioners would have granted; but the latter did not think convenient to disannul the Treaty entirely, and before their Alterations came to Coote, he had so fully agreed, that he could not or would not go back, only promis'd to endeavour to perswade Clanrickard to accept of those Alterations, which he took no Notice of, and as soon as he got out of Galway, join'd with Sir Phelin O Neale, chief of the Rebels in Connaught and Ulster. They made together a Body of 15000 Men, with which they took Bally Shannon Fort: But Sir Charles Coote and Col. Venables, who commanded in those Parts, came upon them so suddenly that for Safety they retreated to the Bogs, leaving a small Garrison in Bally Shannon. Being pursu'd by the English who kill'd and wounded 300 of them, and took from them 7000 Cows, upon whose Milk they chiefly subsisted, 1200 of them came in and laid down their Arms; upon which their Garrison in Bally Shannon surrender'd.

Before Fleetwood came over the greatest Part of the Irish Army had laid down their Arms on Condition of being transported into foreign Service. However, small Bodies of them continu'd to make Incursions into the English Quarters; Sir Walter Dungan Commissary General of the Enemies Horse, and Capt. Scurlock, a famous Tory, enter'd Wexford with 500 Foot and 250 Horse, and were met by Lieutenant Colonel Throgmorton, with 400 Foot and 120 Horse, who after some Dispute routed Dungan and the Tory Scurlock, kill'd 200 of their Men, and took near 300 Prisoners. About this Time the Earl of Westmeath, who commanded the Irish in Leinster, sent to the Parliament's Commissioners to desire a safe Conduct for Persons to come and treat with such as they should appoint, which being granted there, met at Kilkenny.

For the Parliament, Commissioners.

Commissary General Reynolds, Col. Hereson, Col. Laurence, Col. Axtell, Adjutant General Allen, Major Henry Owen, Mr. James Standish, Deputy Treasurer.

For the Irish.

Sir Walter Dungan, Lewis Lord Viscount Glanmalier, Sir Robert Talbot, Sir Richard Barnwel, Col. Walter Bagnal, Col. Lewis Moor, Col. Thomas Tyrrel;

Who agreed on the same Conditions granted to Col. Odouyer, who was Commander in Chief of the Irish in the Counties of Waterford and Tipperary, which Conditions were concluded with him by Col. Zanchy, That all the Arms of the Irish be deliver'd up at a certain Price; he and his Party to enjoy their Personal Estates, and such a Proportion of their Real, as others under their Qualification shall be permitted to do: These Articles not to extend to such as had murder'd the English, or to those that were engag'd in the Rebellion during the first Year, or to Romish Priests, or to those that had kill'd any English after Quarter, or to Deserters; all others to have Liberty to live in English Quarters, or transport themselves into the Service of any foreign State, in Friendship with the Commonwealth of England.

Col. Fitz-Patrick made his Submission before Col. Odouyer, on Condition to be transported with his Regiment to Spain; for which the Popish Clergy excommunicated him. The Lord Muskerry, and Major General Taaf, with other Commanders of the Rebels in Munster, Connaught and Ulster, were left at Liberty to accept of the same Conditions within a limited Time. Most of the Irish that were not excepted for Murder, deliver'd up their Arms and Horses to Commissioners appointed by Lieutenant General Ludlow to receive them. Above 3000 accepted of the Earl of Westmeath's Articles. The Lord Muskerry sent Col. Poor to Kilkenny to acquaint the Lieutenant General that he design'd to accept them; but it was found by some intercepted Letters that his Design was to amuse them: So Preparations were made to reduce him and his Party. General Ludlow, the Lord Broghill and Sir Hardress Waller march'd with 4000 Foot and 2000 Horse, towards Ross in Kerry, where the Lord Muskerry had his principal Rendezvous, and oblig'd him to submit to the same Articles as were granted to the Earl of Westmeath, in Consequence of which 5000 Horse and Foot laid down their Arms and surrender'd their Horses. Col. Grace standing out still, pass'd the Shannon; and being join'd by the Irish of Connaught and Galway, made a Body of 3000 Men, who were attack'd and routed by Col. Ingoldsby, near Limerick. After which Defeat Grace submitted, but had not so good Terms as the Articles of Kilkenny; for Ingoldsby caus'd a Captain, a Lieutenant, and other Officers to be shot according to the Liberty he reserv'd in the Capitulation, they having revolted to the Enemy at Carrick, into which Isle the Marquis of Clanrickard withdrew himself, with what Forces he had left. Col. Theophilus Jones, who commanded a Party in the North of Ireland, defeated 1600 Foot and 300 Horse, the Remains of the Irish Army, and kill'd 300 of them. The Lord Clanrickard finding himself encompass'd on all Sides, made his Submission, and obtain'd Liberty to transport himself with 3000 Men, to any foreign Country in Friendship with the Commonwealth, within the Space of three Months. The Lord Clarendon tells us, "He sent to Ludlow for a Pass to go to England, and surrender himself to the Parliament." "Thus, says Ludlow, our military Service in Ireland, drew to a Conclusion, most of the Irish Forces having submitted, and laid down their Arms. "No Garrison of any Strength holding out against us, and many Thousands of the Enemy being sent into foreign Service," as 2000 of Col. Fitz-Patrick's Men, 1000 of Col. Odouyer's and 4000 more were ready for Transportation as soon as Ships could be provided.

The Military Affairs of the Commonwealth had every where Success, and the Civil were manag'd with exemplary Policy and Prudence.

The Committee of Law presented to the Parliament Draughts of Acts, Committee of Law,

For taking away Fines upon Bills, Declarations and original Writs.

Against customary Oaths of Fealty and Homage to Lords of Manors.

For taking away common Recoveries, and the unnecessary Charge of Fines, and to pass and charge Lands intail'd as Lands in Fee Simple.

For ascertaining arbitrary Fines upon Descent, and Alienation of Copy-holds of Inheritance.

For the more speedy Recovery of Rents.

Touching Pleaders and their Fees.

For the more speedy Regulating and easy Discovery of Debts and Damages not exceeding 4*l.* and under.

The very Titles of these Acts shew how worthy they were of the Wisdom of the Nation; and it is astonishing that the same Art which obstructed the Reform of the Practice of the Law, almost fourscore Years ago, should have still succeeded in the like Obstruction from that Time to this. It does by no Means do Honour to the Profession,

A. D. 1652. sion, which is charg'd with it. "The Reformation of the Law went on but slowly in Parliament, says Ludlow, it being the Interest of Lawyers to preserve the Lives, Liberties and Estates of the whole Nation in their Hands: "So that upon the Debate of Registering Deeds in each County, for want of which within a certain Time fix'd after the Sale such Sales should be void; and being so registred, that Land should not be subject to any Incumbrance: This Word Incumbrance was so manag'd by the Lawyers that it took up three Months Time before it could be ascertain'd by the Committee of Parliament:" Which shews how much a little paltry, private Interest prevails over that of the Publick, in Minds blind-ed by Avarice, and debas'd by Lucre.

But in the midst of this Blaze of Glory and Happiness, the Commonwealth saw a Cloud rising, which though like a Speck at its first Appearance, soon spread a dreadful Darkness, and ended in a Tempest, in which it was overwhelm'd. Cromwel, who was all this while sapping and mining its Foundation, began now to let some of his Work appear, and the Officers of the Army presented a Petition to the Parliament in August, about Ministers, regulating the Law, Abuses in collecting Excise and other publick Monies, stating the Soldiers Accounts, unnecessary Offices and Salaries, providing for the Poor, Qualifications of such as shall sit in future Parliaments: Many were disgusted at this Petition, as improper if not arrogant; for the Officers of the Army to dictate to their Masters the Parliament. Cromwel was advis'd to stop this Way of Petitioning with Sword in Hand, least in Time it might come home to himself. But he seem'd to slight it, or rather to have some Design, which the Officers were to prepare the Way for, by this Petition. The House temporiz'd with them, and return'd them hearty Thanks for their great Care and Love to the Publick; but their delaying to take their Petition into particular Consideration, gave them a Pretence to murmur. Oliver did not stick to

Cromwel and Whitlocke about his Kingship. open himself to some of his Friends, particularly the Lord Commissioner Whitlocke, to whom, in a private Conference he propos'd his taking upon himself the Authority and Title of King. Cromwel began it with Profession of his Confidence in Whitlocke, who endeavour'd to confirm him in his good Opinion of him. Then they both spoke of their Engagements in the Cause of the Commonwealth; and Oliver bemoan'd the Hazard they ran by private Janglings among themselves after their Enemies were vanquish'd. Whitlocke artfully turn'd those Janglings on the Army, the Emulation of Officers, and their thinking their Services never enough rewarded, taking no Notice of the Parliament. Cromwel said he had us'd his utmost Endeavour to keep them in Obedience; upon which Whitlocke complimented him: But then Oliver offer'd Excuses for them and their Dissatisfaction with the Parliament, blaming the Pride of the latter; their Self-seeking, ingrossing of Places, breaking into Parties and Factions, delaying Business, meddling in private Matters, their Partiality, and the scandalous Lives of some of them, &c. at the End of which, he comes to the Point in Hand, and proposes the setting up some Power so full and so high, as to restrain and keep Things in better Order. Whitlocke reply'd, "That his Excellency's Power as General, could restrain the Soldiery; for the Lord Commissioner would not drop them, and as to the Parliament, there was great Difficulty in restraining them, his own Commission being from them, who were A. D. 1652. "acknowledg'd the supream Power of the Nation, subject to no Controul." He urg'd the Honour and Wisdom of the major Part of them, to extenuate the ill Conduct of a few. Oliver shortning the Debate, said there is no Hopes of them, they will bring all Things to Confusion if they are suffer'd to go on; and therefore some Course must be thought on to curb them. Whitlocke, "We our selves have acknowledged them the supreme Power, and taken our Commission and Authority in the highest Concernments from them, and how to restrain them after this will be hard to find out a Way. Oliver cut him short, What if a Man should take upon him to be King! Whitlocke. I think that Remedy would be worse than the Disease. Cromwel. Why do you think so? Whitlocke told him it would be no Advantage to him, because he had the kingly Power concerning the Militia, as General; and as to nominating Officers and passing of Laws, what he dislike'd would not easily pass. He might now dispose of the Taxes as he pleas'd; and as to Foreigners, if Application was made to the Parliament, foreign Ministers knew nothing would come of it, without applying to him. Thus with less Danger he might do more Good than would be if he assum'd the Title of King. Cromwel objected, that the Lawyers alledg'd, all Acts under a King, tho' de Facto, were lawful, and would be safer. Whitlocke said, he doubted whether the Act of Henry VII. to which his Excellency refer'd, would be regarded if their Enemies prevail'd. Cromwel demanded to know what Danger there was in it. Whitlocke reply'd, "The main Controversy betwixt us and our Adversaries, is whether the Government of this Nation shall be in a King or a Commonwealth. Most of our Friends engage with us for the latter. Now if your Excellency take upon you the Title of King, the Monarchy will be establish'd in your Person, and the Question will be no more whether a King or a Free State, but whether Cromwel or Stuart shall be our King, by which you will lose all the Commonwealth Party." Oliver confess'd it was Reason, and bad him propound some other Way, which after great Preparation for it Whitlocke did, and propos'd his making his own Terms with the King of the Scots, which he supported with very strong Arguments; to which Cromwel answer'd, I think you have much Reason in what you propound; but it is a Matter of so high Importance and Difficulty that it deserves more Time of Consideration and Debate, than is at present allow'd us. So he broke off Discourse, and seem'd by his Countenance and Carriage, to be displeas'd with what had been said; yet he never objected it against Whitlocke, in any publick Meeting afterwards, though he advis'd with him no more so frequently and intimately, as he had been wont to do.

The Parliament applying themselves industriously to the Prosecution of the War with Holland, pass'd several Votes for the Encouragement of Seamen. As, for every Prize taken 40 s. a Ton, and 6 l. for every Cannon, to be equally distributed among the Officers and Mariners, according to their Qualifications, 10 l. for every Cannon on board any Ship sunk or burnt by them, a Month's Pay to all who enter'd themselves aboard Men of War within 40 Days. They order'd Hospitals to be erected at Dover, Deal and Sandwich, for sick and wounded Sailors; and though the Hollanders had declar'd all naval Stores to England to be Contraband Goods, yet the Council of State had provided a gallant Fleet with all

Necess-

A. D. 1653. Necessaries for an Engagement, which happen'd on the 18th of February. The Dutch Fleet, in Number about 80, with 150 Merchant Men from Bourdeaux, Nantz, and Roan, were discover'd between the Isle of Wight and Portland, by the Headmost of the English Fleet, then commanded by General Blake, Dean, and Monk. About 8 a Clock the Triumph, in which were Blake and Dean, and 3 or 4 Ships more, began the Fight, the rest being to the Leeward, by which means a very small Part of the English Fleet were engag'd with the whole Dutch Navy for some Time, and when more English Ships came up they were not above half of the Fleet which fought the Enemy till Night parted them. The Triumph lost 100 Men, received 700 Shot in her Hull, and in the Extremity of Distress was bravely relieved by Capt. Lawson, Capt. of the Fairfax. The Sampson, Capt. Button, a Dutch Prize, mann'd with English Seamen, fought a Man of War and sunk her, but was so torn her self that she could not swim, and Capt. Button, his Officers and Seamen, were taken aboard other Ships. The next Day Blake pursu'd the Dutch, came up with, and engag'd them, and so the Day following. Admiral Tromp, who commanded the Hollanders, put his Merchant Men before him, and fought retreating towards the Coast of Bologne, but in his Way thither the English Frigates at large took many of his Merchant Men, and Lawson boarded and took a Man of War. The Wind proving cross the Dutch got to Calais Sands, and the English gave over the Pursuit. The Enemy lost eleven Men of War, and 50 Merchant Ships; 1500 Dutch Prisoners were sent to London. General Blake, and several other Officers, were wounded, but the English lost one Ship only, the Sampson before mention'd. This Victory was the more surprizing to the Hollanders, for that they expected Tromp should have block'd up the River of Thames, and have obliged the English to seek for a Peace. But the Success proving to the contrary, the common People in the United Provinces were all in Mutiny, upon which the Province of Holland, without the Consent of the other Provinces, did privately employ Col. Doleman and others, who gain'd Hugh Peters, to try the Inclinations of the Parliament, who would hearken to nothing before Holland made the first Overture in writing, upon which the States, by their Secretary Van Beaumont, wrote a canting, equivocal Letter to them, setting forth the Danger of the Protestant Religion by this Rupture, without offering any reasonable Satisfaction to the Demands of the Commonwealth of England. The Parliament, however, return'd a very mild Answer, offering to treat when Preliminaries were agreed upon. Doleman and Peters in the Name of the Dutch apply'd very submissively to the Council of State, confessing they were not able to contest with the Puissance of England. They offer'd to acknowledge the Sovereignty of the Seas, as the Parliament demanded, and to pay 300000 Pounds for Damages. But this Offer, and the Treaty which probably might have ensu'd, was interrupted by one of the most infamous Acts of Violence and Treason that ever Man was guilty of.

The Glory of the Commonwealth. By what we have said it is obvious to all Readers, that the Power of the Commonwealth of England, could have received no Diminution by the Opposition of any other Power, and she must have increas'd daily in Strength and Glory, that she was so well establish'd as to fear no Enemy, and to have what Choice she pleas'd of Friends. That she had rais'd the Reputation of England from the lowest Depth of Disgrace and Shame, to the highest Degree of Honour and Renown. That the Princes of England and their Followers were so far from having any Weight in the Balance of her Affairs, that they were look'd upon by her either as so many Non-Entities, or if as Beings to be such as her Breath would blow off whenever she thought convenient. But this dazzling Brightness, so amiable to her Friends, so dreadful to her Enemies, was eclips'd at once by the intervening of a Comet, whose Blaze had all her Terrors without any of her Charms. When I say so much of this triumphant Republick, it is not but I am as sensible as any one of the Irregularity of her acquiring Dominion, that the Foundations of it were laid in the Blood of her Sovereign: That she had no Right to it, but the worst in the World, that of Conquest, which is the Right of a Robber. I say only what she did when she had acquir'd the Power, by which it appears that this Senate, the Majesty of whose Presence would have been Death to the Earl of Clarendon, who in his History treats them as an abject, dastardly Crew, has no Equal since that of Rome was made a Slave to Tyranny, and that all Attempts against her immortal Fame, in the Exercise of her ill gotten Power, are equally base and vain. If we should run back to the Origine of the Power of all the most famous Republicks and Empires, shall we not find it as criminal as that of the Commonwealth of England. Rome, the Mistress of the World, ow'd her very Being to Violence and Rapine; and when by her Arms she had extended her Empire from the Orcades to India, what boot'd it to say, Her Founder was a Robber.

The Parliament saw what Cromwell was driving at, and endeavour'd to prevent his Usurpation, which they had certainly succeeded in, if Oliver, who saw that also, had not precipitated the Execution of his ambitious Designs, and hurry'd that on by Violence which he was in Hopes to have accomplish'd by Craft and Dissimulation. The Parliament employ'd Monk Aboard the Fleet, purely to take off the Support he expected from the Army in Scotland; and to lessen that in England, several Regiments were order'd for the Navy, which Oliver had nothing to do with. This alarm'd him so much, that he resolv'd to execute his Purpose immediately.

The first Step he took towards his Usurpation was to gain the Royalists, by pressing on the Act of Oblivion, and enlarging the Bounds of it. These he was sure to engage against the Parliament. He caref'd Major General Harrison, Col. Rich, and those Officers of the Army who gave into Enthusiasm, and were call'd Fifth Monarchists, from their setting up a spiritual Government, or a Sort of Theocracy, and having Christ for their King, and the Gospel for their Law. He promis'd them Liberty of Conscience at least. He got over the Clergy and Lawyers by their Inclinations to kingly Government. The Independents were his own, the Presbyterians divided; and though he was himself the main Wheel that set all the others in Motion, yet he so manag'd Matters, that he himself seem'd to be mov'd by the Desires and Endeavours of others. He complain'd to Quarter-Master-General Vernon, That he was push'd on by two Parties to do that, the Consideration of the Issue whereof made his Hair to stand an end. One of them is headed by Major Gen. Lambert, who in Revenge of that Injury the Parliament did him, in not permitting him to go to Ireland with the Character of Deputy, will be contented with nothing less than the Dissolution of the Parliament. Of the other, Major General Harrison is chief, who is an honest Man, and aims at good Things, yet from the Impatience of his Spirit will not wait

A. D. 1653.

A. D. 1653. the Lord's Leisure, but pushes me on to that which he and all honest Men will have cause to repent. To Col. Okey and other Officers who were disgusted about the Delays their Petition met with in the House, he rail'd against several Members of Parliament, affirming, that little good could be expected from that Body where such Men had so great Influence. At the same Time he made the most solemn Professions of Fidelity to the Parliament, assuring them, That if they would command the Army to break their Swords over their Heads, and to throw them into the Sea, he would undertake they should do it. Nay, he went so far, as to send Col. Desborough to the Council of Officers, who were debating the Parliament's fixing on a Time to put a Period to their Session, with Instructions to tell them, The Parliament were more ready to do any Good than they to desire it; that they ought to rely on their Promise to dissolve themselves by the Time prefix'd, November, 1654. and to petition them to put that Vote into an Act, would manifest a Diffidence of them, and lessen their Authority. Oliver came to the Council himself, while Desborough was thus speaking, and seconded what he had said, at which the Officers were perfectly stunn'd, the Act having been forwarded by Cromwel and Desborough more than any other Members of the Council. Oliver knew very well that the Commonwealth would daily acquire Strength, Interest and Reputation, at Home and Abroad. Ludlow tells us, He was sensible of their great Skill and Experience in the Management of publick Affairs, of the good Esteem they were in amongst the most discerning Part of the Nation, and therefore were very desirous to lay them aside with as little Noise as might be. If General Ludlow speaks Truth, the Lord Clarendon does not, for he all along avers, that the Royalists were the more discerning Part of the Nation, and does not stick at intimating, that himself was of that Part the most discerning. Cromwel having put a Stop to the Parliament's passing their Dissolving Vote into an Act, for that would have continu'd them so long still as he might not then be able to hinder the Choice of such a new Representative as would be an eternal Bar to his Usurpation, he therefore caball'd with several Members of Parliament to assume the Supreme Authority themselves, by putting a Period to the present Parliament; and if he could have made one part of the House Tools to turn out the other, the Remainder would have been entirely at his beck, either be or not be according to his Pleasure. Thus would he have assum'd the Sovereignty, as doing a good Office to the Publick, and others would have born the Blame of the Necessity to which the State was reduc'd. to put the Government into his Hands. But this Project did not take, the Members of Parliament saw through his disguis'd Design, and Major Sallaway at one of their Meetings, demanding, If the present Authority was taken away, what better would they put in its Room. One of Cromwel's Party cry'd, We must pull down this Government, and it will be Time enough then to consider what shall be put in its Room. The Parliament perceiving to what kind of Excesses the Madnefs of the Army was like to carry them, resolv'd April the 20th, to pass the Dissolution Act, in which the Choice of a new Representative was settled in such a Manner as to preserve the Commonwealth, the Council of State in the Intervals of Parliament being invested with the Supreme Authority by that Act, which continu'd the present Parliament a Year and half longer. To prevent this Law General Cromwel beckon'd to Major General Harrison, who was on the other Side of the House, to come to him, and said, I judge the Parliament ripe for a Dissolution, and this to be the Time for doing it. Harrison reply'd, Sir, the Work is very great and dangerous, therefore I desire you seriously to consider of it. Oliver answer'd, You say well, and sat still a quarter of an Hour, and then the Question for passing the Dissolution Act being put, he said to Harrison, This is the Time, I must do it, and he was prepar'd for it, having plac'd a Party of Soldiers, to the Number of 300, in the Hall at the Door of the House, and in the Lobby, so starting up he call'd for a File of Musketeers, who enter'd the House, he bad the Speaker come down out of the Chair; and told the House, "They had sat long enough unless they had done more good; that some of them were Whoremasters, looking towards Henry Martin, and Sir Peter Wentworth; that others of them were Drunkards, and some corrupt and unjust Men, scandalous to the Profession of the Gospel, and that it was not fit they should sit any longer, therefore he desir'd them to be gone, the Lord having chosen other Instruments for the carrying on his Work who were more worthy." He spoke with so much Passion and Discomposure of Mind as if he had been out of his Wits. Sir Peter Wentworth stood up to answer him, and said, This is the first Time I ever heard such unbecoming Language given to the Parliament, and it is the more horrid in that it comes from your Servant, and your Servant whom you have so highly trusted and oblig'd. Cromwel stepp'd into the midst of the House as Sir Peter was speaking, and continuing in his mad Fit, cry'd, I will put an end to your Prating. Then walking up and down he kick'd the Ground with his Feet, and said, You are no Parliament; I say, you are no Parliament, I will put an end to your Sitting. Call them in, Call them in. Then the Sergeant attending the House open'd the Doors, and Lieutenant Col. Worseley led in some more Musketeers, which Sir Henry Vane observing, in his Place said aloud, This is not honest; it is against Morality and common Honesty. Upon which Oliver fell a railing at him, crying with a loud Voice, O Sir Henry Vane, Sir Henry Vane, the Lord deliver me from Sir Henry Vane! Take away that Barble, speaking to one of the Soldiers, who seiz'd the Mace; and Major General Harrison went to the Speaker as he sat in the Chair, and told him, That seeing Things were reduc'd to this pass it would not be convenient for him to remain there. The Speaker answer'd, I will not come down unless I am forc'd to it. The Major General said, I will lend you my Hand. And so putting his Hand within his the Speaker came down, upon which Cromwel apply'd himself to the Members of the House, about 100 in Number, It is you have forced me to this, for I have sought the Lord Night and Day, that he would rather slay me than put me upon the doing of this Work. Horrid Diffimulation! Alderman Allen said, It is not yet gone so far but all Things may be restor'd again. If the Soldiers were commanded out of the House, and the Mace return'd, the publick Affairs might go on in their former Course. But Oliver rejecting his Advice, charg'd him with an Account of some hundred Thousand Pounds, for which he threaten'd to question him, he having been long Treasurer to the Army. Alderman Allen said, It is well known it has not been my fault that my Account was not made up long since, I have often tender'd it to the House, and I ask no Favour from any Man

A. D. 1653. in that Matter. Cromwel having acted this treacherous and impious Part, order'd the Soldiers to see the House clear'd of all Members, and then seized upon the Records that were there, and at Mr. Scobell the Clerk's House, he snatch'd the Act of Dissolution off the Table, put it under his Cloak, commanded the Doors to be lock'd up, and went his Way to Whitehall.

Thus ended the Commonwealth of England, after it had continu'd four Years, two Months, and twenty Days.

"Thus was this great Parliament, says Whitlocke, which had done so great Things, wholly routed by those they had set up, most ungratefully, disingenuously, rashly, and imprudently, dissolved an Assembly, famous through all the World for its Undertakings, Actings and Successes.

Thus fell the victorious Parliament, says Coke, whose mighty Actions will scarcely find belief in future Generations; and to say the Truth, they were a Race of Men most indefatigable and industrious in Business, always seeking for Men fit for it, and never preferring any for Favour, or by Importunity. You hardly ever heard of any Revolt from them. No Murmur or Complaint of Seamen or Soldiers. No Soldiers or Seamen ever press'd. As they excell'd thus in Civil Affairs, so it must be own'd they exercis'd in Matters Ecclesiastick no such Severities as others before them did, upon such as dissented from them.

A. D. 1653.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND, During the PROTECTORATE of OLIVER CROMWEL.

HE villainous Attempt of Cromwel, according to Ludlow, was much encourag'd by Nieuport, and the other Dutch Ambassadors, lately arriv'd from Holland to conclude a Peace, "Who finding, continues my Author, the Parliament supported by the Affections of the People, Clarendon and Echard tell us every where they were hated, because acting for their Interest, and therefore not to be forced, much less cheated into an unjust and disadvantageous Agreement, instigated Cromwel to take the Power into his Hands, well understanding that he would soon be necessitated to make Peace with them upon what Terms they should think fit."

Oliver being return'd to Whitehall found the Council of Officers in Debate concerning this weighty Affair, and told them, He had done it, and they needed not trouble themselves any further about it. Col. Okey, and some other Officers, who were not for pushing Things so far, desir'd to be satisfy'd in that Proceeding, which they conceiv'd tended to Ruin and Confusion. Cromwel said, I am resolv'd to do much more Good, and with more Expedition than could be expected from the Parliament. These being general Terms, Col. Okey apply'd to Desborough to know why Oliver had so highly commended the Parliament, when he endeavour'd to dissuade the Officers from petitioning for a Dissolution, and yet in so short Time to reject them. Desborough reply'd, If ever he drov'd in his Life he drov'd then. In the Afternoon Cromwel went to the Council of State, accompany'd with Major General Lambert and Harrison, and told them at his Entrance; Gentlemen, If you Dissolve are met here as private Persons you shall not be them, disturb'd, but if as a Council of State, this is no Place for you; and since you can't but know what was done in the House in the Morning, so take Notice, that the Parliament is dissolv'd. To this Sergeant Bradshaw reply'd, Sir, We have heard what you did at the House in the Morning, and before many Hours all England will hear it. But, Sir, You are mistaken to think that the Parliament is dissolv'd, for no Power under Heaven can dissolve them but themselves; therefore take you Notice of that. Something more was said to the same Purpose by Sir Arthur Haslerigge, Mr. Love, and Mr. Scott. And then the Council of State perceiving themselves to be under the same Violence, broke up. Oliver soon after sent for Major Salloway, and Mr. John Carew, to whom he complain'd "of the great Weight of Affairs that by this Undertaking was fallen upon him, affirming, That the Thoughts of the Consequences thereof made him to tremble, and therefore desir'd them to free him from the Temptations that might be laid before him, and to that End to go immediately to the Chief Justice St. John, Mr. Selden, and some others, and endeavour to persuade them to draw up some Instrument of Government that might put the Power out of his Hands." Major Salloway made Answer, The Way, Sir, to free you from this Temptation, is for you not to look upon your self to be under it, but to rest persuaded that the Power of the

A. D. 1653. the Nation is in the good People of England, as formerly it was. Cromwel perceiving by this Answer, that he was better understood than he could have wish'd, fell upon another Expedient before he would openly discover himself, appointing a Meeting of the chief Officers of the Army to be at Whitehall, in order to consider what was fit to be done in this Exigency.

He and his Council set forth a Declaration of the Grounds and Reasons for their Dissolving the late Parliament, and that civil Officers do proceed as formerly in the Execution of their Office, and all Persons to give Obedience to them. He wrote to the Admirals at Sea, and to the Commissioners and Commanders in chief in Scotland and Ireland, who all return'd Answers of Submission to his Orders, and an Address was sent up from Durham to stand by Cromwel and his Council of Officers, which led the Way to Cart-loads of Addresses from all Parts to Oliver, his Son Richard, King Charles II. &c. The first Act of Civil Government which Cromwel and his Council exercis'd, was their examining the Grievances and Oppressions committed by Sir John Lenthall, in managing the Prison of the Upper, or King's Bench, both as to Debtors and Creditors; there were then 399 Prisoners who ow'd above 900000 Pounds. And to give a little Form to this Embrio of Usurpation, he appointed a new Council of State, himself the first of them.

Council of State.

Oliver Cromwel, Esq; Capt. General, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Major General Lambert, Lord Commissioner Lisle, Major General Harrison, Col. Desborough, Col. Hewson, Col. Montague, Col. Tomlinson, Col. Jones, Col. Sydenham, Col. Laurence, Anthony Stapley, Esq; Alderman Fiebburne, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Charles Howard, Esq; Sir Charles Wolfeley, John Carew, Esq; Walter Strickland, Esq; Mr. Hope, Mr. Norton, Mr. Benet, Mr. Broughton, Mr. Hollister, Richard Mayor, Esq; Mr. Courthey, Mr. St. Nicholas, Mr. Meyer, Mr. Williams.

All entirely devoted to him. The new Council ordered new Treasurers for the Excise, and a Committee to consider how all the Treasuries of the Commonwealth may be best manag'd. He gave them Power to raise Money, and they levy'd the monthly Assessment with considerable Abatement, which made the Payment of it the more Popular.

The Cavaliers rejoic'd much at the Dissolution of the Commonwealth Parliament, and made great Applications and Congratulations to Cromwel. Some Independent Clergy, Creatures of Oliver, cry'd it up in their Pulpits. The Officers of the Army and Soldiers were generally pleas'd with it. But the sober and discerning Part of the People abhor'd the Change, and the Usurper's Insolence and Ingratitude, foreseeing that it would make Way for further Invasions of the Liberties of the People, and at last introduce the old Government; for which they had then an Abhorrence.

On the 27th of May, Cromwel and his Council of Officers, who assum'd the supreme Authority, resolv'd to summon select Persons to be nominated by themselves out of every County, who should be as a Representative of the whole Nation. Major General Lambert mov'd, that a few Persons, not exceeding the Number of ten or twelve might be intrusted with the sovereign Power. Major General Harrison was for a greater Number, inclining most to that of 70, for no other Reason than that it was the Number of the Jewish Sanhedrim; but after A. D. 1653. some Debate it was agreed that a certain Number of Persons as near as might be proportionable to their Payments toward the publick Charge, should be nam'd by the Council to meet at Westminster on a certain Day, when all the Power of the Nation should be deliver'd into their Hands by an Instrument, sign'd and seal'd by the General and the Officers, obliging themselves to yield Obedience to their Orders. The Proclamation for summoning them was dated the 8th of June, and ran in the Name of Oliver Cromwel, Captain General, &c. The Persons summon'd were to meet at the Council Chamber at Whitehall, the 4th of July; and they met accordingly, about 120 in Number; and being set round the Table, Cromwel and the Officers of the Army standing about the Middle, the former made a Speech to them, shewing the Cause of their Summons, and that they had a clear Call to take upon them the supreme Authority of the Commonwealth; and he urg'd several Texts of Scripture to admonish and encourage them to do their Duties. He then produc'd an Instrument in Writing, sign'd and seal'd by himself, whereby he did, with the Advice of his Officers, devolve and intrust the supreme Authority and Government of the Commonwealth into the Hands of the Persons then met; and that they or any forty of them are to be held, and acknowledg'd the supreme Authority of the Nation, to which all Persons within the same are to yield Obedience and Subjection. They were to sit no longer than the third of November, 1654. and 3 Months before their Dissolution to make Choice of other Persons to succeed them, who were not to sit longer than a Year; and it was left to them to take Care for a Succession in Government. Then Cromwel and his Officers withdrew, and the Persons there met adjourn'd themselves to the next Day in the Parliament House. Wittlocke says, many of them were Persons of Fortune and Knowledge. Ludlow, The Assembly was compos'd of honest well meaning Persons. Eckard, with his usual Modesty, affirms they were illiterate, weak, obscure Persons. The compleat Historian, that they were a Pack of weak, senseless, obscure Fellows. The Lord Clarendon, inferior Persons of no Name or Quality. Warwick, A House of Commons of Saints. And Bates, that they were Proletarios, Zelotas, Catabaptistas, Christocraticos, Democraticos, Fanaticos, & ex omni Secta nequissimos. Such are the History Writers who support the pious Cause which produc'd so many Martyrs about the Middle of the last Century. These are the countly Persons, the Quality, and their good Language and good Manners are the only Proofs of it. Praise-God Barebone, a Member of this Convention, gave his Name to it on Account of his frequent Speeching in it: He is rally'd by those polite Authors for his Christian Name, Praise-God, and for his Trade, being a Leatherfeller, as if it was not as creditable as Brewers, Scrivners, Grocers, and other bright Ornaments, of both Church and Parliament, in Sacheverel's Time. 'Tis remarkable that Praise-God Barebone brought a Bill into this Assembly, against Building, unless upon old Foundations, within 10 Miles of London, as if he foresaw that his Son, the famous Builder, Dr. Barebone, would ruin himself and hundreds of Families by it. Being assembled the next Day in the House of Commons, they chose Francis Rous, Esq; Provost of Eaton College their Speaker, and order'd Mr. Birckhead, the Sergeant at Arms to attend him with the Mace as usual. They also voted that the Lord General Cromwel, Major General

A.D. 1653. General Lambert, Major General Harrison, Col. Desborough, and Col. Franklin should sit in the House as Members; they then made several Committees; 1. To consider Matters touching the Law. 2. Touching Prisoners and Prisons. 3. For Inspection into Treasuries. 4. For Ireland. 5. For Scotland. 6. For the Army. 7. For Petitions. 8. To consider what shall be offer'd about publick Debts, publick Fraud and Breaches of Trust. 9. For regulating Commissifious of the Peace, and for making Provisions for the Poor. 10. For Advance of Trade. 11. For Advance of Learning. Does not this shew them to be very illiterate and weak? They pass'd an Act concerning Marriages, which enjoin'd all Marriages to be made before Justices of the Peace. This Act has occasion'd a great deal of Mirth, and as much Wit as the Men were capable of; as if a legal Compact before a Magistrate would not be as valid, if so made by Law, as the Performances of a Curate. The Persons to be marry'd were to come before some Justice of the Peace, the Man and Woman pronounc'd the Words before him; and the Justice pronounc'd them lawfully marry'd. The Learned and Reverend Mr. Tallents, who publish'd the excellent Chronological Tables, was marry'd after this Manner; the Justice saying no more than he declar'd the Marriage valid. Sometimes the Persons to be married would bring a Minister with them before the Justice, as if his Presence consecrated the Ceremony; and we are told that Lady Mary Falconbridge's Minister was Dr. Hervey, afterwards executed for a Plot.

The Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council of London presented a Petition for a settled Maintenance for Ministers; and that the Universities may be zealously countenanc'd and encourag'd: Yet if you will believe the History of the Rebellion, and its Copy, Archdeacon Echar'd's, these were the very Days of Cimmerian Darkness; when Learning was look'd on as an Abomination, and all Science reduc'd to that of seeking God, a Term which they use as ludicrously as if they knew not what it meant, which is very likely. This Assembly pass'd a Vote for the Lord Commissioner Whitlocke to go Ambassador to the Queen of Sweden, which was thought to be procur'd by Cromwel to send him out of the Way. They pass'd an Act for settling the Trusts of Ideots and Lunatics, and another for settling the Lands in Ireland upon the Adventurers. They issu'd forth Orders for regulating the Excise and Customs, and enlarg'd the Power of the Committee establish'd for Trade: They made all necessary Preparations for carrying on the War by Sea, and declar'd General Robert Blake, General George Monk, Major General Desborough, and Vice Admiral Lawson to be the four Generals of the Fleet of the Commonwealth, empowering them with some others to manage the Affairs of the Admiralty. They order'd an Act to be brought in to erect a High Court of Justice for proceeding against such as should surprize or betray any of the Ports, Magazines or Ships of the Commonwealth, and also against those who should, contrary to the Laws already made, proclaim any to be King of England or Ireland, by which 'tis manifest, they suspected the Design on Foot to advance Cromwel to the supreme Power, and their Suspicion hasten'd the Execution of it: The following Falsities are crowd'd into the History of the Rebellion, concerning this Assembly; They were Artificers of the meanest Trades; they never enter'd into any grave Debate; they resolv'd to destroy all Learning; they hated all who call'd themselves Ministers; they look'd upon the pastoral Function as Antichristian; they condemn'd Tythes as Judaism; they propos'd to sell the Lands of the two Universities and all Colleges; they tir'd and perplex'd themselves with Debates, and upon the first Motion that was made for them to deliver back their Power to Cromwel, they presently consented to it, and went to Whitehall, acknowledg'd their own Impotency, and besought him to take Care of the Commonwealth; not one Syllable of which is true, at least as the Author tells it. Ludlow relates it thus after those who were present. "One Difficulty yet remain'd to obstruct Cromwel's Design, and that was the Convention which he had assembled and invested with Power, as well as earnestly sollicit'd to reform the Law, and reduce the Clergy to a more evangelical Constitution; and having sufficiently alarm'd these Interests, and shewn them their Danger from the Convention; he informs them further, that they cannot be ignorant of the Confusion that all Things are brought into by the immoderate Zeal of those in Authority, and to what Extremities Matters might be reduc'd, if permitted to go on, possibly he said to the utter Extirpation of Law and Gospel from amongst us, and therefore advis'd that they would join their Interests to his, in order to prevent this Inundation. His Proposition was readily embrac'd by the corrupt Part of the Lawyers and Clergy, and so he became their Protector, and they the humble Supporters of his Tyranny. But that his Usurpation might seem less horrid, he so contriv'd it by his Instruments, that some of that Convention should declare their Disapprobation of their own Proceedings, and, under divers specious Pretences, put a Period to their sitting. To this End it was agreed by Mr. Rous, Chairman to that Assembly, and the rest of Cromwel's Junto, to meet earlier in the House than was usual, which was done accordingly on the 12th of December, hoping by Surprize to obtain a Vote for their Dissolution." Thus we see again that this Convention were not Oliver's Tools, but zealous against his usurping the Government. Being met, Col. Sydenham, Sir Charles Wolseley, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Sir Gilbert Pickering, and others, some of the obscure, weak, senseless Fellows, who were of Oliver's Junto, according to their Instructions, bitterly inveigh'd against the Transactions of the Assembly, particularly the Pound-Tax for the Payment of the Army, which would be too long a coming in, some Articles relating to the Clergy and the Law, and their not relieving Sir John Starwell. Thus, says Ludlow, they cajol'd the Clergy, Lawyers, Cavaliers, and all Interests, except that which they should have had most regard to. The House had some Intimation of the Plot, and there were Members enough to answer all such Objections with sound Reason and a gallant Spirit; and the Debate lasting some Time, more Members came to fill up the Convention: Upon which Cromwel's Party, finding they could not carry their Point, said, It is not a Time to debate, but to do something that may prevent the Inconveniences that threaten us. Then Mr. Rous, who was in the Secret, left the Speaker's Chair, went out of the House, and with the rest of the Cabal repair'd to Whitehall, where they, by much the smaller Number of the Convention, sign'd a Writing, importing a Confession of their own Inability, and a Resignation of their Power to Cromwel; from whom they receiv'd it. The other, and the major Part of the Assembly, kept their Places in the House, and would not quit quit them, till they were remov'd by a Guard of Soldiers, sent by Cromwel for that Purpose. The Lieutenant General observes, that tho' this Convention had not a clear Authority to convene, yet they behav'd so well, that many being convinc'd of the Rectitude of their Intentions, were brought over daily to approve their Actions.

In the mean time the War continu'd with Holland, and the Commissioners of the Admiralty had a good Fleet ready to meet the Enemy by the latter End of May, commanded by Blake, Monk, and Dean. General Blake was to the Northward with a Squadron, when Van Tromp appear'd off the Coast of Flanders with the Dutch Navy, having to assist him Admiral Evertsen, de Wit, and de Ruyter. Vice-Admiral Lawson, who commanded the Blue Squadron, charg'd thro' the Dutch Fleet with 40 Ships, which Storm falling principally on de Ruyter's Squadron, Van Tromp bore up to his Assistance, which when our Admirals Blake and Dean, who were both in the same Ship, perceiv'd, they engag'd Tromp with the Body of the Fleet, and the Fight continu'd till Three in the Afternoon, June the 2d, at which Time the Wind blowing fresh in the Teeth of the English, the Dutch fled, and were pursu'd by the lightest of the English Frigates. The next Morning the two Fleets found themselves near one another, but for Wind could not come to an Engagement till about Noon, at which Time the Dispute began, and continued very hot on both Sides till Ten at Night. The English Fleet charg'd the Dutch with so much Resolution, and put them into so great Disorder, that tho' their Admiral fir'd on them to rally them, yet he could not procure more than 20 Ships of his whole Fleet to stand by him, the rest making all the Sail they could to the Eastward. But the Wind springing up a brisk Gale from West, the English pursu'd the Enemy so effectually, that they sunk six of their best Ships, took eleven of their biggest, and two others, with 1300 Prisoners, among whom were Admiral Evertsen, and six of their chief Captains; and had not the rest of their Fleet shelter'd themselves between Dunkirk and Calais, where it was unsafe to expose great Ships, by Reason of the Sands, the English had probably taken or destroy'd most of them. The Hollanders were much superior to them in Number of Ships; but, such was the Courage and Conduct of the Parliament's Officers and Soldiers, that they lost but one Ship in the Fight, had but one Captain kill'd, except General Dean, and about 160 private Men kill'd and wounded. Having put their Prisoners ashore, and left some of their Ships to be refitted, they return'd to the Coast of Holland, where they took many Prizes. General Blake join'd the Fleet with 16 Sail of stout Men of War. The whole Fleet lay before the Texel, and so incommoded the Dutch Navigation, that the People of Holland forc'd the Magistrates, by their Clamours, to sue for Peace. Accordingly they sent Mynheers Beverning, Nieuport, Vanderpar, and Jonstal, to Cromwel and his new Council of State, to pray that the Memory of past Actions may be obliterated, and a perfect Amity and more entire Correspondence than ever establish'd by an indissoluble Union. The Council return'd a peremptory Answer, That without Satisfaction for what had been acted against England, and sufficient Security that no such thing should be attempted again, they could not proceed to any League or Alliance.

In the mean while the Populace in Holland could not bear to see their Men of War in their Harbours, and the English on their Coasts making Prize of their Trade, which is the Soul of that Nation; and the States were oblig'd to order Van Tromp out again, furnishing him with a Fleet of 140 Sail. The English, who were commanded by Monk, Lawson, and Pen, were but 90 Sail; however, they resolv'd to engage the Enemy, and accordingly detaching their light Frigates, assisted by some greater Ships, they fell in among them the 29th of July, and fought till they were separated by the Night. The next Day little was done, and tho' many of the English Seamen were sick of the Scurvy, and the Dutch had Fireships and the English none, the Wind also entirely favouring the Enemy, yet did the Battle continue in equal Ballance till Three in the Afternoon, about which Time their Admiral Van Tromp was kill'd with a Musket Ball, as he walk'd on the Deck with his Sword drawn. This so discourag'd the Dutch, that they fled in Confusion, and being pursu'd by the English, their Admiral Evertsen's Ship was sunk, and about 30 more were taken and sunk, 8 of which were Flags. The Garland, mention'd to be taken by them last Year, was boarded and burnt by the Worcester Frigate. 'Twas reported that the Dutch had 6000 kill'd and 1000 taken Prisoners. The English had one Ship only burnt, the Oak, none sunk or taken, but 250 Men were kill'd, and 700 wounded. Several brave Officers fell, as Capt. Peacock, Capt. Taylor, Capt. Graves, Capt. Crisp, Capt. Newman, Capt. Cox, Capt. Owen, Capt. Chapman. Among the Wounded were Capt. Seaman, Capt. Stokes, Capt. Rous, Capt. Holland, Capt. Cubitt. The Dutch got into the Texel, and the English could not follow them. Tromp's Flag was shot down in the Beginning of the Fight, and the Victory was so entire, that the Dutch were confounded, threw up the Contest, and made Peace on the Conqueror's Terms. The Convention then sitting order'd Chains of Gold to be given to Blake, Monk, Pen, Lawson, and Gratuities to all the Officers according to their Ranks. When Monk came to London, Oliver himself put the Chain about his Neck, to which hung a Medal representing a Sea Fight, and having invited him to Dinner, made him wear the Medal and Chain all the while. The English in all this War had no other Disgrace than when Blake fought 90 Dutch Men of War with 38 English, and Bodilo's two Miscarriages in the Streights. The last was in the Beginning of this Year, when Capt. Applenton, with about 5 Men of War, was attack'd near Leghorn, and Bodilo, who had 8 or 9 Ships with him in those Seas, would not or could not come to his Assistance. The Leopard, a Ship of 40 Guns, was taken; the Bonadventure was blown up, the Peregrine was taken, so was the Levant Merchant, and the Sampson boarded by young Tromp on one Side, and by a Fireship on the other was blown up. Bodilo, says my Author, was branded with the infamous Terms of Cowardise, Bribery, and Treachery.

Four Days after the Convention was broken Cromwel up, an extraordinary Council of Officers was made Lord held, to whom Major General Lambert reported Protector. the several Steps and Degrees by which Things had been brought to the present State wherein they were, and press'd the Necessity incumbent upon the Army to provide something in the Room of what was lately taken away; in order to which, he presented them a Paper, entituled, An Instrument of Government, which he read in his Place. Some of the Officers being convinc'd that the Contents of this Instrument tended to the sacrificing all their Labours to the Lust and Ambition of a single Person, began to declare their Unwillingness to concur in it; but they were were interrupted by the Major General, and inform'd it was not now to be disputed whether this should be the Form of Government or not, for that was already resolv'd, it having been under Consideration for two Months past; neither was it brought before them with any other Intention than to give them Permission to offer any Amendment they might think fit, with a Promise that it should be consider'd. The Council of Officers perceiving to what Terms they were restrain'd, propos'd that it might be declar'd in this Instrument, That the General of the Army should, after this first Time, be held incapable of being Protector, for that was the Title given by this Instrument to the chief Magistrate, tho' some mov'd that it might be King; That none of the Relations of the last Protector should be chosen at the next succeeding Election; and, That a General Council of all the Commission Officers, who were about the Town, should be summon'd to consider of it. The first Article was put into the Instrument, the others neglected, and they were no more consulted about it, Lambert telling them at their next Meeting, The Lord General would take Care of managing the Civil Government, and so dismiss'd them.

The Heads of the Instrument were,

Oliver made Protector.

By the 33d Article of the Instrument of Government, Oliver Cromwel, Captain General, &c. was declar'd Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging, for his Life.

By another Article, the Manner of electing Members of Parliament was alter'd, the small Burroughs left out, and the major Part was chosen for the County. Cornwall was to choose but 12, London and Middlesex 12; and among all the Sarcafms that those excellent Wits the Cavaliers have ridicul'd these Changes with, I have not met with one upon this but what has been more miserable than one would think Stupidity and Folly could make it. The whole Number was to be 400 for England and Wales, 30 for Scotland, 30 for Ireland. All who had advis'd or abetted the War against the Parliament, or the Rebellion in Ireland, were disqualify'd. No Man to vote for a Representative, unless he was worth 200 Pounds. By the 27th Article, Provision was made for maintaining 10000 Horse and Dragoons, and 20000 Foot. Also 200000 Pounds a Year was appropriated for the Protector's Civil List. The Chancellor, Keeper, or Commissioner of the Great Seal, the Treasurer, Admiral, chief Governor of Scotland and Ireland, to be chosen by the Approbation of Parliament.

The following Gentlemen were appointed to be his Council by the Instrument:

Philip Lord Viscount Lisle, Sir Anthony Ash-The Protolay Cooper, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir Charles Hor's Wolfeley, Walter Strickland, Esq; Major General Council, Lambert, Major General Skippon, Colonel Desborough, Colonel Sydenham, Colonel Jones, Colonel Montagu, Henry Lawrence, Esq; Richard Mayor, Esq; Francis Rous, Esq;

His Commissioners of the Treasury were,

Col. Desborough, Col. Montagu, Col. Sydenham, William Masbam, Esq;

All Things being prepar'd, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London were requir'd to attend at Whitehall, the 16th of December, in their Scarlet Gowns, whither when they came the Design was imparted to them, and they being under the Power of an Army, were forc'd to contribute to the Protector's Pageantry, by accompanying him to Westminster-Hall. The Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal and the Judges march'd first, then the Council of the Commonwealth, then the Lord Mayor of London, Sheriffs, and Aldermen, in their Robes. After them came the Lord General, with a great Number of the Officers of the Army, Major General Lambert carrying the Sword before him into the Court of Chancery, where, after the Lord General had heard the Instrument read, and taken the Oath to observe all the Articles, as directed in the Close of it, Major General Lambert kneeling, presented him with a Sword in the Scabbard, representing the Civil Sword; which Cromwel accepting, put off his own, intimating thereby, that he would no longer rule by the Military Sword. The Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal deliver'd it to him, and the Lord Mayor of London the City Sword. All which he restor'd again, with an Exhortation to use them well; and having assur'd them that he would not have undertaken the Charge, but to make use of it for the Good of the Publick, he return'd to Whitehall in the same Manner and Order as he came, and leaving his Lodgings at the Cockpit, took up the Royal Apartments at the Court. Ludlow tells us, His Wife seem'd at first unwilling to remove thither, tho' afterwards she became better satisfy'd with her Grandeur. His Council having taken their Places, issu'd out Orders to all Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, for proclaim'd claiming Oliver Cromwel Lord Protector of all over the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and Care was taken to alter all Writs and Proceses, from the Title of the Keepers of the Liberties of England, to that of Protector.

Thus did this mighty Man, by an unnatural and monstrous Mixture of glorious and infamous Acts, by Victory and Treason, by Dissimulation and Power, by breaking of Parliaments, by making them and breaking them again, by subjecting all Opposition from without or within, from Enemies or Conscience, possess himself of a Dominion, above all other Dominions then in Europe; and in his future Government, he shew'd that his Genius was equal to his Empire. The Figure he made in Europe was so shining, that the two Reigns before him, and the two Reigns after him, are so many Blots in the History of England, which his Protectorate would render illu-

A. D. 1653. illustrious, had he acquir'd it as honourably as he maintain'd it.

I have not enter'd into Biography, nor trac'd him from his Origin, which the Cavaliers, with their wonted Ingenuity, have endeavour'd to debase, tho' it was as good as a Descent from the Sister of Thomas Cromwel Earl of Essex, and the Family of Sir Richard Williams, one of the ancientest of the ancient Britons could make it. That Williams took the Name of Cromwel in Henry VIII's Reign, and Sir Oliver Cromwel, the Lord Protector's Father's elder Brother, is known to have had one of the best Gentleman's Estate in England. But had his Parentage been as base as Archbishop Laud's, if it had been honest, and he had advanc'd himself by Virtue as well as Valour, all these mean Reflections would have shewn the Authors of them to have learnt the Language and Manners of the Dregs of the People, if they did not themselves come out of them.

Ireland. Ireland being entirely reduc'd, the High Court of Justice in that Kingdom proceeded against those that had been involv'd in the Guilt of the Massacre, as, executed. Mackarty Reagh, the Lord Clanmalier, and the Lord Muskerry, were upon Trial acquitted. Col. Moor and Col. Dempsey were hang'd, the Lord Mayo beheaded, Col. Took and Sir Phe-lin O Neale hang'd, Mrs. Fitzpatrick, Mother to Col. Fitzpatrick, was burnt, Col. Grace was pardon'd by Cromwel, and so was the Lord Fitzwilliams, who had been a Lieutenant General in the Irish Army. Many others of inferior Rank were executed; and their Estates were every where confiscated.

There was a Council of War held, to consider how the Lands of the Rebels should be divided. A Survey of the whole Kingdom was order'd to be made by Mr. William Petty, who got most by it. The Number of Acres and Quality of Ground were to be mark'd in it. The Officers and Soldiers were to bring in their Demands of Arrears to be audited, and when their Account was adjusted, they were to be satisfy'd out of these Lands after the Adventurers had Satisfaction. Every Man was to take by Lot as many Acres of Ground as answer'd in Value the Amount of his Arrears. The highest was rated at 4 d. a Year an Acre, and some at one Penny, and the Arrears of the Army were clear'd off by this Means. The Irish that had not been ship'd off were transplanted from the South to the North, and from the East to the West, which so broke their Strength, that had they not been again encourag'd by King Charles and King James the Second, they would never again have been in a Capacity to have given the English and the Protestants any Disturbance.

The County of Dublin was estimated at 1500 l. for 1000 Acres.

The County of Wexford at 800 l. for 1000 Acres.

The County of Kilkenny at 1000 l. for 1000 Acres.

Five Thousand Horse and Foot were disbanded. Those in Connaught had their Arrears in Lands about Sligo, those in Munster in the County of Corke; those that had serv'd under the Lord Inchiquin, had their Arrears assign'd about Collen in Kilkenny.

Lieutenant General Ludlow refus'd to sign the Order for proclaiming Cromwel, but Fleetwood got a Majority of Hands, and Ludlow not long after remov'd to England, as did Fleetwood, to make Room for Henry Cromwel, Esq; whom his Father the Lord Protector made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and he gave general Content by his Humanity and Magnificence.

The Lord Glencairne held out still in the Scotland. Highlands of Scotland, and Middleton had been tampering with the Dutch for Assistance; but the Heads of the Hollanders had a little too much Ballance in them to be turn'd with every wild Whim of the Royalists, whose Projects had not more Solidity than other Mens Dreams. The Earls of Arbuthnot and Seaforth very wisely too left their Habitations to share the Honour of the Earl of Glencairne's Highland Knight Errantry, of which the Earl of Clarendon and Edward speak as gravely as if those Knights had not been a Jest to every one out of the Mountains. The Reader will guess at the Intelligence of these Worthies by this Summons, which the Earl of Seaforth sent to a Ship which lay at Anchor at Lewis Island.

Being incited not only by Conscience and Honour, to stand firm to the Principles of Loyalty, but also disdaining even in rational Interest, to stoop to such a wavering and servile Power as now ruleth, I have laid hold on 7 of your Men who came ashore for Provisions, as procuring the same. Wherefore I summon you to deliver your Vessel for his Majesty's Service, and being certainly perswaded that all or most of you are with Grief of Heart employ'd in such Service, I do assure all that will voluntarily shun the unnecessary Effusion of Blood by that Surrender, shall have such fair Quarter as is fitting for me to grant, and your several Conditions do require, and according to your Demands herein, you may expect to find me your Friend accordingly.

SEAFORT.

To the Captain, Soldiers, Masters, and Mariners of the Fortune, These.

The taking of these 7 Seamen, and the Writing of this Letter are two important Actions of those Highland Heroes in War and Politicks. Whitlocke describes them better than I can do. Some ragged Forces were rais'd in the Highlands, the Lord Glencarne to be their General. Yet the Lord Clarendon and Mr. Archdeacon have great Hopes in these ragged Highlanders, and a Committee is appointed in France, consisting of that Lord, the Marquis of Ormond, and the Lord Newburgh, to consult about the Affairs of the Highlands, and the Lord Chancellor Hyde was to make out all the Dispatches pursuant to his Conferences with a Scots Vicar, who had given himself the Trouble to come from the Mountains to Paris, on an Errand of great Consequence, concerning which he had long and frequent Conferences with the Chancellor, who however learn'd not the Truth of the Scots Affairs, for he tells us, Scotland lay under a heavy Yoke. The Yoke was very grievous to the whole Nation. If the King's Nature could have been delighted to behold the Oppression the Scots endure'd, he might have had abundant Comfort. They were rul'd by a Rod of Iron, and all their Subjection supported at their own Charge. After so many Falsities which I have produc'd out of the History of the Rebellion, the Reader will expect

A. D. 1653. expect all these Assertions to be as false as the rest, but let him not take my Word, let him see what the Bishop of Salisbury, a Scots Man, and living in those Times, says, There was good Justice done, and Vice was suppress'd and punish'd, so that we always reckon those eight Years of Usurpation a Time of great Peace and Prosperity. Eobard, who steals from, and mimicks the Lord Clarendon as much as his Genius would permit, affirms, The common Sense of the Slavery in Scotland tempted the King to go amongst them and head his Armies. He means the Gentry in the Mountains, where we must leave them in a Condition which would deserve Compassion, if they had themselves had any Pity for their Country.

Lilburne brought to his Trial. In July this Year Lieutenant Col. John Lilburne, who had been banish'd by the Rump Parliament, return'd and threw himself upon Cromwell, who left him to the Law, upon which he was committed to Newgate, and try'd the next Sessions at the Old Bailey, where he refus'd to plead unless he had a Copy of his Indictment, which was at length granted, and then he put off his pleading by several Evasions, till the next Sessions, when his Trial came on, and he was acquitted by the Jury, having render'd himself very popular among the Malecontents of all Parties, by opposing all Governments that were in being in his Time: There is something remarkable in this Man's Story, Oliver seem'd very much offended with him, and very desirous that he might be punish'd, yet privately paid him a Pension equivalent with a Lieutenant Colonel's Pay, and the Malecontents of all Parties opening themselves freely to Lilburne, who was look'd upon as a Confessor for their Cause or Causes, Cromwell found his Account in keeping in with him, though to conceal the Matter the better Lilburne was content to lie some Time in the Tower.

MS. Ponteleon de Sa's Quarrel. In November this Year the Portugal Ambassador's Brother, Don Ponteleon Sa, Knight of Malta, and an Officer of special Note in the Portuguese Army, having accompany'd the Ambassador into England, and walking in the New Exchange with some of his Company, Colonel Gerard, who heard them speaking in French of the Affairs of England, told them in the same Language, They did not represent those Passages right, upon which one of the Portuguese gave him the Lie, and three of them fell upon Col. Gerard, stabbing him in the Shoulder, but one Mr. Anstruther coming to his Assistance they withdrew, and in an Hour's Time return'd with 20 more arm'd with Breast-plates and Head-pieces. They took two or three Turns, and not finding Mr. Anstruther went home. The next Day Don Ponteleon and his Company came again to the New Exchange, and meeting Col. Mayo, whom they suppos'd to be Mr. Anstruther, fir'd a Pistol as a Signal for more Portuguese to enter, which they did, to the Number of 50, with drawn Swords, and leaving some to keep the Stairs, the rest went up with the Ambassador's Brother and fell upon Col. Mayo, who defending himself gallantly, receiving seven dangerous Wounds but not mortal. Then they attack'd Mr. Greenway of Lincolns-Inn, who was walking with his Sister in one Hand, and his Mistress in the other, they shot him in the Head with a Pistol Ball, and he dy'd on the Spot. They brought with them several Jars fill'd with Gunpowder and Matches stopp'd with Wax, intending, as it seem'd, some Mischief to the Exchange, had they not been prevented. The Parliament's Horse at the Mersey, taking the Alarm, apprehended some of the Portuguese, and the rest of them ran to the Ambassador's House, whether Col. Whaley pursu'd them, and beset the House with his Horse, letting the Ambassador know, that his Followers had committed Murder, and he therefore demanded to have them deliver'd up to him. The Ambassador insisted on his Privilege, but Whaley giving him to understand he would take them by Force if they were not surrender'd, the Ambassador gave his Word of Honour that they should be forthcoming, after he had made his Applications to the Lord General, who told him, the Business concern'd the Publick, and therefore his Excellency's Address must be to the Parliament and the Council of State, then both in Being. The next Day Don Ponteleon and his Company were carry'd before the Lord Chief Justice Rolles, examin'd, and committed to Newgate, the Populace having surrounded the Ambassador's House, and threaten'd to pull it down, unless he deliver'd them up. The Ambassador's Brother made his Escape out of Newgate, but was soon retaken. His Trial was put off some Time upon a Petition of the Portugal Merchants, as will be seen next Year.

Prince Rupert, who had been adventuring for Prizes at Sea, sometimes with more Ships, sometimes with fewer, as he could get Money to keep them, was now forc'd to give over his Adventures, and go to the French Army at Beffort. The sheltering of him and others of the King's Followers, continu'd the Difference between England and France: The latter found at last that she was not safe while England was not in Friendship with her. Captain Hayton, with a small Squadron of English Men of War, met eight French, which he defeated, took three of the largest, and many rich Prizes, with the Loss but of four Men, which, with several other such Losses, and the Talk of a Peace between England and Holland, determin'd the French Court to conclude a Treaty with the new Protector as soon as they could.

A. D. 1654. Oliver, now Lord Protector, assum'd all the State and Ceremony of a Sovereign, with the Title of Highness. He had his Household Officers, his Guards, and a Court, with as much Splendor, and more Order, than had been known at Whitehall since Queen Elizabeth's Reign. Notice was given to the Dutch Plenipotentiaries by the Master of the Ceremonies, That he expected the same Honours to be paid him as had been paid to the Kings of England, and that they stile him his Highness in their Memorials and Discourses, and not being in the Quality of Ambassadors, but Lords Deputies Plenipotentiaries, must be uncover'd in his Presence. He took the Treaty of Peace out of the Hands of the Council of State, and by his Secretary Thurloe sent the Dutch Ministers a Writing, containing the Conditions to which they were to submit for Peace. The Plenipotentiaries, who expected some Abatements of former Demands from Cromwell, and found that he had abated very little, instead of returning an Answer, demanded Passports to be gone, thinking to frighten Oliver with a Prospect of War in the Beginning of his Protectorate. He sent them Word, If they went without concluding and signing the Treaty as he roughly had drawn it, he would not be oblig'd to it, or to any with the Part of it. Upon which the Plenipotentiaries Dutch, stay'd, and Cromwell insisted on the Seclusion of the Prince of Orange from being Statholder and General, without which there was no Peace to be had. These Ministers having no Instructions about this Article, or rather having Instructions against France courts the Protector.

A. D. 1654. against it, renew'd their Demand for Passports, and Oliver let them go. The Protector was not to be dealt with after the Rate of their Dealing with the Court of England formerly. He had no Passion but that of Power, no Favourite but Glory, no Religion but Empire. He was not to be trifl'd with like James the First in the Business of Amboyna, and all other Business. He told them what he expected, and what they must expect, if it was not comply'd with, so the States of all the Provinces agreed to hasten back their Ambassadors, and notwithstanding Monfieur Chanut, the French Ambassador at the Hague, offer'd that his Master would bear half the Charge, if the States would continue the War, yet they were either so weary of it, or so afraid of Cromwel, that in about 6 Weeks Time the same Ministers return'd with the Character of Ambassadors, and a very gallant Retinue, and on the 4th of March they had Audience of the Lord Protector in the Banqueting House at Whitehall, which was richly hung, and a Chair of State plac'd for the Protector. The Ambassador acquainted his Highness, That all their Provinces had consented to the Articles of Peace, and had empower'd them to ratify the Articles. In the mean Time they desir'd a Cessation of Arms. The Lord Protector appointed six of his Council to confer with the Ambassadors, and sign the Articles of Peace, after they had examin'd the Papers, and compar'd them with the original Draught, which took up some Weeks.

On the 5th of April they were sign'd by the Commissioners and Ambassadors, the chief Articles were, "That the States General should not suffer any of the King's Party, or any Enemy to the Commonwealth of England to reside within their Dominions. That they should deliver up the Island of Poterone in the East Indies, which they had taken from the English in the Reign of King James, into the Hands of the English East India Company, and pay 300000 Pounds for the Damages the English suffer'd at Amboyna, for which, says Echard, the two last Kings could never obtain Satisfaction." "That they should own the Sovereignty of the Sea to be in the Commonwealth of England, and no more dispute the Flag. That they should pay 150000 Pounds for the English Ships stopp'd by the King of Denmark in the Sound. That they should comply with the Act of Navigation; and that they should seclude the Prince of Orange from being Statholder and General." Thus was every Branch of the House of Stuart involv'd in the King's Misfortunes, and it was Ruin to all Potentates and Powers to aid and assist them as long as there was Life in Cromwel. France sent Monfieur Bourdeaux to compliment the Lord Protector on his Accession to the Government before the Conclusion of this Treaty, and after that Step, the King of England and his Followers in that Kingdom had nothing to expect but Sights, if not Affronts. To prevent which, and being forbidden that Court, he retir'd first to the Spaw and then to Cologne, where he liv'd almost three Years at an Expence of about 7 or 8000 Pounds a Year. Echard assures us, He was the best Oeconomist that ever was. These Historians affect to be as opposite to the Truth as can be. King Charles could spend no more than he had, when he had no Credit; but when he had it, after his Restoration, he was such a Manager, that his Revenues and his Debts always increas'd together. And as to the Oeconomy abroad, a French Author tells us, He gave one Lady in France above 50000 Crowns Value in China Ware; and 'twas well known that the Dutchess de Chatillon, a Lady of Intrigue, had more Presents from him than all his Followers. The Duke of Lorrain's Daughter was propos'd to him in Marriage, with a Portion of Four Millions of Livres, which would have done him more good than the other Part of the Proposal, that Duke's Assistance against the Power and Treasure of England, Scotland, and Ireland. We are told the Duke of Tork signaliz'd himself in the French Army under Turenne, who was enamour'd with that Prince for his heroick Qualities, which he brought not with him into England, at least not in so great a Degree as the Lord Clarendon and Mr. Echard represent them to be, while he was abroad. The King left his younger Brother the Duke of Gloucester behind him in France; but, as Echard informs us seriously enough, he sent the brave Marquis of Ormond to get him out of his Mother's Hands, for fear he should turn Papist, to which Religion his Majesty had a mortal Aversion, and the Marquis did it with great Labour and Hazard, and no less Courage and Resolution. The Truth is, Cromwel was beginning to hearken to the Courtship of France, and to incline to treat with her, the sure Consequence of which would have been, forbidding the Duke's Abode in that Kingdom, and it was much more decent to leave it without being forc'd to it. These are obvious Truths, but what is strange to Amazement is, that the Historians are giddy with Vanity, amidst the most extreme Distress and Calamity.

The first foreign State that sent to congratulate the Protector, except such as had Ministers here before, was that of Hamburg, then came an Ambassador from Denmark, and then Monfieur de Bourdeaux from France, and he had his Audience in the Banqueting House in Whitehall, with the same Pomp and Ceremony as the Dutch Ambassadors. He made a flattering Speech to his Highness, to this Effect:

YOUR most serene Highness has already received some principal Assurances of the King my Master, and of his Desire to establish a perfect Correspondence between his Dominions and England. His Majesty, this Day, gives to your Highness some publick Demonstrations of the same, and his sending his Ambassador to your Highness does plainly shew, That the Esteem which his Majesty makes of your Highness, and the Interest of his People, have more Power in his Counsels, than many Considerations that would be of great Concernment to a Prince less affected with the one and the other. This Proceeding, grounded upon such sound Principles, and so different from what is only guided by Ambition, renders the Amity of the King my Master, as considerable for its Firmness as its Utility, for which Reason it is so eminently esteem'd and courted by all the greatest Princes and Potentates of the Earth. But his Majesty communicates none to any with so much Joy, as to those whose virtuous Acts, and extraordinary Merits, render them more conspicuously famous than the Largeness of their Dominions. His Majesty is sensible that all these Advantages do wholly reside in your Highness, and that the Divine Providence, after so many Calamities, could not deal more favourably with these three Nations, nor cause them to forget their past Miseries with greater Satisfaction, than by submitting them to such a just Government. And since it is not sufficient for the

A. D. 1654. the compleating of their Happiness to make them enjoy Peace at home, because it depends no less in good Correspondence with Nations abroad. The King my Master does not doubt but to find also the same Disposition in your Highness which his Majesty here expresses in his Letters. After so many Dispositions express'd by his Majesty and your Highness towards the Accommodation of the two Nations, there is Reason to believe that their Wishes will soon be accomplish'd. As for me, I have none greater than to be able to serve the King my Master with the good Pleasure and Satisfaction of your Highness, and that the Happiness I have to tender to your Highness the first Assurances of his Majesty's Esteem, may give me Occasion, by my Services, to merit the Honour of your gracious Affection.

Sweden. Before the Conclusion of the Peace with Holland, Cromwel's first Parliament understanding there was a League negotiating between the Kings of Spain, Denmark, and the States of Holland, voted the Lord Commissioner Whitlocke to be Ambassador for the Commonwealth of England at the Court of Christina Queen of Sweden, who had shewn great Regard to the Commonwealth, and sent one of the principal Lords of her Kingdom to congratulate them on their assuming the Government. Whitlocke's Instructions were to negotiate a League between England, France and Sweden, in Opposition to the other, but the Queen's abjuring her Religion, and abdicating her Kingdom for Popery, and a Pension from the Pope, put a Stop to that League for a while; though Whitlocke, at length, concluded it, and Oliver wrote a Letter of Congratulation to the new King. Don Lewis de Haro, prime Minister of Spain, press'd his Master to send an extraordinary Ambassador to Oliver on his Accession to the Government, and wrote to the Protector, who said, He had receiv'd no Letter so obliging, and so polite, as Don Lewis's. He seem'd so taken with it, that the French Ambassador grew jealous, especially when he understood that Cromwel had answer'd Don Lewis's Letter in Terms every whit as polite and obliging, yet had Cromwel resolv'd then to break with Spain, and enter into an Alliance with France, a Step for which he has been very much blam'd by those who knew nothing of the Balance of Power at that Juncture, when the House of Austria was very powerful and united, and that of Bourbon divided, and in a Minority. The Judgment Coke and Echard make of it is, as the Turks judge, by Success. It appear'd when King Charles the Second had sold Dunkirk, which Oliver kept as a Security for England, and the French King, with the Connivance of the King of England, had surpriz'd many Cities and Provinces to a vast Extent of Empire; I say it then appear'd, that a Treaty with Spain was more eligible for the Preservation of the Balance of Power. But was it possible for any such Thing as the Sale of Dunkirk to enter into such a Head as Cromwel's? He would as soon have sold Portsmouth; and had Dunkirk always been kept in English Hands, Oliver's French Treaty would never have been complain'd of. Monsieur Wicquefort, who was himself a Minister of State, and being a Foreigner, had nothing to corrupt his Judgment in reflecting on the Affairs of England, speaks thus of the Cromwel's League with France examin'd.

Matter; "The Spanish Ambassador us'd his utmost Endeavours with Cromwel to engage him in the Interest of his Master, even to the offering him an hundred Thousand Crowns a Month, two hundred Thousand Crowns by way of Advance, and twenty Thousand Men to assist the English to re-conquer Catalais." Archdeacon Echard never heard of these Things before. "Oliver," continues Wicquefort, rejected these Offers, and as he fear'd more the Neighbourhood of France than he hop'd from the remote Strength of Spain, he sided with the first, whose Friend he became, by that Means obliging the other to be so to the King of Great Britain."

There was no Power in Europe that was not barbarous, but what made their Court to the Lord Protector, the Pope only excepted; and if Leti was to be believ'd, if the old Pope Innocent X. held not Intelligence with him, Donna Olympia his Cousin, who govern'd all at Rome, sent her Compliments to him by Sir Robert Tambol, probably Talbot, who is not to be found out by his Name, nor by his Office, that Author pretending he was Oliver's private Envoy at the Court of Rome.

The Envoy from the Arch-Duke Leopold, Governor of the Spanish Netherlands, had not been long in London before News came, that the Duke of Lorraine was seiz'd by the Arch-Duke's Order, and all hopes of Assistance from him were seen to be meer Dreams of sick Minds.

We must now look a little into the Transactions at Home, as they relate to the Civil Government; and we may venture to give our Opinion, that Oliver, in almost all the Parts of his Power, uses it as well as he acquir'd it ill.

He and his Council publish'd an Ordinance, declaring what Offences, and no other, shall be adjudg'd Treason. Another to repeal the Oath call'd the Engagement against a single Person, and House of Peers. Another for appointing Persons to be Approvers of Ministers, that such as were not qualify'd for the Ministry by their Piety and Knowledge, or were disqualify'd by Vice and Ignorance, might be kept out of the Pulpit. An Ordinance, which was enough not only to provoke the Raillery, but the Rage of all such as think a Benefice is a sufficient Call, and a Cassock a Qualification. In April two extraordinary Acts were publish'd, one for the Union of England with Scotland, another against Planting of Tobacco in England, which is a Law at this Time.

On the 12th of May the Lord Protector issu'd a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, to try Don Ponteleon de Sa, the Portugal Ambassador's Brother, for the Murder of Mr. Greenway.

The Commissioners were,

Lord Chief Justice Rolles, Mr. Justice Atkins, Sir Henry Blunt, Alderman Tichburn, Mr. Lucy, Sergeant Steel, Dr. Zouch, Dr. Clarke, Dr. Turner.

A. D. 1654. The Jury impannel'd were half English and half Foreigners. The Portugal Ambassador labour'd hard to prevent his Brother's Trial, but the Protector having given him up to the Law, there was no avoiding it. Some Time before this he and his Council had been invited by the Lord Mayor to dine with him at Grocer's Hall, which he did, to shew how well he and the City agreed together. He came from Westminster in a Chariot drawn by six Horses in rich Equipage. Before him rode his Life Guard with 3 or 400 of his chief Officers and some of his Council; after them came two Pages bare-headed, bedeck'd with Lace and Embroidery; then came twelve Lackeys with Velvet Caps and grey Liveries, with silk and silver Fringe; then the Lord Protector, clad in a dark colour'd Suit and Cloak, attended by many of the Nobility in their Coaches and six Horses: At Temple Bar his Highness was met by the Lord Mayor, Thomas Viner, Esq; and the Aldermen, where the Recorder of London saluted him with a florid Speech: Here the Protector came out of his Chariot, put on a riding Coat embroider'd, and mounted on Horseback, two or three of his Horses of State being led by; then the Lord Mayor took the City Sword and carry'd it bareheaded before him from thence to Grocers Hall, changing the Order of the Procession after they came into the City. The several Companies of London in their Liveries were plac'd according to their Superiority, in the Streets, from the lower End of Cheapside to Temple-Bar, within Rails hung with blue Cloth, with the City Banners and Streamers belonging to their respective Companies set before them. The City Marshal went first with some other Officers; then six Trumpets; then the Lord Protector's Life Guard richly cloth'd; after them eight Trumpets more, follow'd by the City Streamers, red and white; then the Aldermen, and after them the two Sheriffs, James Philipps and Walter Bigge, Esqrs. next the Lord Protector's Heralds with rich Coats, adorn'd with the Arms of the Commonwealth; then the Aldermen in Scarlet Gowns with Gold Chains; then the Mace and Cap of Maintenance carry'd before the Lord Mayor, who carry'd the Sword bare-headed, with two Gentlemen Ushers; then his Highness the Lord Protector, with his twelve Footmen in grey Liveries, as is said before; after him rode Major General Skippon, the Protector's Council, and great Officers of the Army, the Lords, Gentlemen and others. At Grocers Hall the Recorder made another Speech, to let his Highness understand how happy the City accounted themselves under his conspicuous Government, and also in the Injoyment of his Presence with them that Day. The Speech over, he Knighted the Lord Mayor, and din'd with as much or rather more Splendor and Magnificence than any Monarch of England had done before him. We are told, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen intended to wait, as was customary when a King din'd with them; but Oliver would not admit of it, protesting he would not eat till they sat down by him; and when it was propos'd to serve him on the Knece, he refus'd it with some Disdain, saying, Such Ceremonies should be only practis'd at Rome, where they are so greedy of Ceremonies, or in Kingdoms govern'd by Tyrants, but should be banish'd out of a Christian and Protestant Com*monwealth, as was that of England.* And A. D. 1654. not long after, he invited the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffs to dine with him at Whitehall; and it was observ'd, that in all his Ceremonials, all his Entertainments, Audiences, &c. he maintain'd the Port of a great Prince in every Part of his Appearance, as much as if he had been so born and so bred; that his Soul extended it self always in Proportion to the Room that was given it; and in whatever Space he stood he always fill'd it. Is this Man, the greatest in the World, a fit Subject for the lewd Invectives of insolent Libellers and witless Declaimers? I speak not of the Means he us'd in acquiring Dominion, but of the Manner of his using it.

Not long after his being declar'd Protector, his Mother dy'd: She had liv'd to a great Age, and very much mistrusted the Issue of Affairs: She was so afraid of some Attempt against his Life, that when she heard the Noise of a Musket, she would start, fearing he was shot, and was exceedingly dissatisfy'd if she did not see him once a Day at least. Oliver was at a vast Expence upon her Funeral; and though she was bury'd by Daylight, caus'd many hundred Flambeaus to be carry'd with the Hearse.

His Zeal for the Protestant Religion appear'd on several Occasions, and particularly in a Letter he wrote to the Prince of Tarente in France, which I insert at Length, his Latin Secretary being the immortal Milton; and if any of our History Writers could have given us Examples of the like Scholarship among their Literati, they would have had more Reason to have boasted of the Learning of their Party.

OLIVERIUS.

Oliver's Letter to the Prince of Tarente. Cromwel in this Letter assures the Prince of Tarente, "That it was with extreme Pleasure he learn'd by the Letter he had receiv'd from him his inviolable Zeal and Attachment for the Reform'd Churches, for which his Praise was the greater, inasmuch as he shew'd that Zeal at a Time, and in a Place where such flattering Hopes were given to Persons of his Rank, if they would forsake the Orthodox Faith, and where those who continue stedfast are on the contrary threaten'd with so many Troubles. He rejoices that his own Conduct with Respect to Religion, was pleasing to him; he calls God to witness he desires nothing so much as an Opportunity to answer the favourable Opinion the Churches have of his Zeal and his Piety, by endeavouring to propagate the true Faith, and procure Rest and Peace for the Church. He exhorts the Prince to hold out firmly to the End in the Orthodox Religion he receiv'd from his Fathers; and adds, that nothing would bring him greater Glory than to protect it as much as lay in his Power.

Enthusiasts.

Are there any such Letters in the History of the House of Stuart for promoting the Protestant Religion, and the Orthodox Faith! But what is the Orthodox Faith in Comparison with Powers, Dignities, Revenues, &c. And the Faith Cromwel recommends to the Protection of the Prince, was then disturb'd in England by certain Priests and others, who were for reducing Religion to Enthusiasm, and Government to Anarchy. The Chief of these among the Laity were Major General Harrison, Mr. John Carew, Colonel Rich; among the Clergy, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Feak, Mr. Symphon; who being Men of turbulent, restless Minds, impatient under all Power, which they had not the Management of, and refusing to give Oliver any Security for their peaceable Behaviour, he thought fit to hinder their giving the Publick Disturbance by confining their Persons; Major General Harrison was sent to Carisbrook Castle, in the Isle of Wight; Mr. Carew to Pendennis, in his own Country; Colonel Rich remain'd in Custody of the Sergeant at Arms, and the three Ministers were shut up in Windsor Castle, till they could bring their Minds into better Temper, and had learn'd that the Laws of God require their Obedience to the Laws of Man, especially when their Consciences are at Liberty, as they were under the Protector.

A Plot.

The inveterate Enemies to that and all Liberty, the Royalists, carry'd their Resentments farther; and as their Successors, the Enemies to the Governments since the Revolution, despairing of doing any Thing by fair War, have always had Recourse to Assassination Plots; so now the Cavaliers, who could neither submit nor starve, thought of getting out of their Misery by murdering the Man whom they took to be the Cause of it. One cannot expect Men of Honour in so infamous a Plot as that of Murder: The chief Plotter in this against Oliver was one Vowell, a Pedagogue, who kept an obscure School in a Country Village, and being a very busy factious prating Fellow, was admitted into the Company of some of those who were the most impatient for the King's Restoration, several of whom were Persons of Quality; as the Earl of Oxford, who was first apprehended, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Colonel Ashburnham, Mr. Jos. Ashburnham, Colonel Gerrard, the same who was attack'd by Don Ponteleon de Sa, in the New Exchange, Mr. Somerset Fox, and several others. The Plot was to assassinate the Lord Protector, to proclaim the King, and offer Pardon to all except three Persons. On the Discovery of this Conspiracy, the Guards which were doubled at the Tower, and a Proclamation issued, requiring a List to be brought to the Council of all Lodgers, and all Inhabitants and suspected Persons in London and Westminster, and the Lines of Communication. A high Court of Justice, the Lord Commissioner Lisle President, was erected for the Trial of the Plotters who were taken, the Attorney General Prideaux, the Solicitor General Ellis, and Serjeant Glyn; the Protector's Council charg'd the Prisoners with conspiring to murder the Protector as he was going to Hampton-Court, to seize the Guards, to master the City, Tower and Magazines. Mr. Somerset Fox confess'd the Charge, Col. Gerrard and Vowell deny'd it, and were try'd. The Proof against them was too plain to leave any Doubt of their Guilt. Several Witnesses were heard, and the Jury bringing them in guilty, the Lord Chief Justice Rolles made a long Speech to Fox, Gerrard, and Vowell, to convince them of the Wickedness of their Design, of which the Conspirators seem'd not to be sensible; and then he pronounc'd Sentence, That upon mature Consideration of the Treasons and Murders plotted and contriv'd by them against his Highness the Lord Protector and the Commonwealth, and raising a bloody War in the same, the Court did adjudge them to be hang'd. Gerrard mov'd that he might be beheaded, or shot to Death like a Soldier, for which favour he petition'd the Protector, and obtain'd it. Vowell was hang'd at Charing-Cross, but Mr. Fox was repriev'd and pardon'd.

About the same Time, July the 5th, Don Ponteleon de Sa, and two other Portuguese, Ponteleon de Sa, and two other Portuguese, Ponteleon de Sa, were try'd before the above-mention'd Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer in the King's Bench. He pleaded, That he was not only the Ambassador's Brother, but had a Commission to himself to be Ambassador, when his Brother should be absent, and that by the Law of Nations he was privileg'd from Trial. He demanded Council. The Point of Ambassadors Privileges by the Civil Law and the Law of Nations, was long debated by the Court, and by the Protector's Council; the Result of which was, That by all those Laws the Proceedings in this Case were justify'd, and that no Council could be allow'd to the Ambassador's Brother in Matter of Fact; but if in the Proceedings of his Trial he should desire Council as to Matter of Law, it should be allow'd him. After much Perswasion, he and the rest pleaded Not guilty, and to be try'd by God and the Country. Don Ponteleon at

A. D. 1654. at his Trial pleaded Ignorance of the Laws of England, and desir'd to have Council assign'd him; but the Court told him, They were of Council equal to him as to the Commonwealth; and upon hearing the Witnesses, the Jury found the Ambassador's Brother and 4 more guilty of Murder and Felony. The Lord Chief Justice Rolles gave Sentence against them to be hang'd. One of the condemn'd Criminals was an English Boy, who was in the Tumult and Murder with the Portuguese, who were all repriev'd but the Ambassador's Brother. On the 10th of July he was carry'd from Newgate to Tower-Hill in a Mourning Coach and Six Horses, attended by divers of his Brother's Retinue. He spoke something on the Scaffold to those who understood him in Excuse of his Crime, laying the Blame of the Quarrel and Murder upon the English. After a few private Words and Passages of Popish Devotion with his Confessor, he gave him his Beads and Crucifix, laid his Head on the Block, and it was chopt off at two Blows; The rest, says Whitlocke, condemn'd for the same Crime, were repriev'd. The Lord Clarendon, quite contrary to Whitlocke and the Fact, says, The rest were hang'd at Tyburn, to make Cromwel as bloody-minded as he could. It is said the Spanish Ambassador forwarded this Execution as much as lay in his Power, saying, Don John of Portugal is an Usurper, and no lawful King, and Don Ponteleon may be executed without violating the Rights and Privileges of Ambassadors. Be that as it will, we are assur'd that the Portugal Ambassador sign'd the Treaty with Cromwel upon the very Day his Brother was beheaded. The Emperor of Germany brought this Prosecution as a Precedent to justify his carrying off the Prince of Furstemberg, Plenipotentiary at the Treaty of Cologne, twenty Years after; and in the Manifesto his Imperial Majesty publish'd, this Piece of Cromwel's Justice, in executing the Portuguese Gentleman, is cited at large, tho' the whole Herd of Writers against him, talk of it as a Breach of the Law of Nations.

Second Parliament. According to the Instrument of Government, Oliver and his Council resolv'd to issue out Writs for the Election of Members of Parliament, with thirty from Scotland and thirty from Ireland, to meet at Westminster, the 3d of September, a favourite Day with Cromwel, on which, tho' a Sunday, they met and attended the Lord Protector in the Painted Chamber, where he made a Speech to them of the Cause of their Summons, and then going to the House, they adjourn'd to the next Day, September the 4th,

When the Lord Protector rode in State from Whitehall to Westminster, some Hundreds of Gentlemen and Officers went before bare with the Life Guard, and next before the Coach, his Pages and Lackeys richly cloath'd. On one Side of his Coach went Strickland, one of his Council, and Captain of his Guard, with the Master of the Ceremonies, both on Foot. On the other Side went Colonel Howard, afterwards Earl of Carlisle, Captain of the Life Guard. In the Coach with him were his Son Henry and Lambert, both bare. After him came Mr. Claypool, Master of the Horse, with a Led Horse in rich Trappings. Next the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, the Lords of the Treasury, the Council in their

Coaches, the Life Guards. When he alighted at the Door of Westminster Abbey, the Officers of the Army went first, then the Gentlemen, then four Maces, the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, Mr. Whitlocke carrying the Purse, then Lieutenant General Lambert, carrying the Sword bare before his Highness, who seated himself over against the Pulpit, the Members of Parliament on both Sides. After a Sermon preach'd by Mr. Thomas Goodwin, the Lord Protector went in the same Equipage to the Painted Chamber, where he took his Seat in a Chair of State set upon Steps, and the Members upon Benches round about fate all bare. Then his Highness put off his Hat, and made a long and artful Speech to them; in which he told them of the Danger of Levelling Principles, and of the Fifth Monarchy Opinions, of the Form of Godliness, and the two abus'd Pretensions of Liberty of Subject, and Liberty of Conscience; two as glorious Things, and as much to be contended for, as any Gift God hath given us. He reminded them of the great Judgments which had fallen upon the Nation by the Civil Wars and the late Foreign Wars; and then he shew'd how a Remedy had been apply'd to those Evils, which he told them in so many Words was his Government. He instanc'd his reforming the Laws, putting good Men into Seats of Justice, regulating the Chancery, setting a Way for the Approbation of able Ministers: His making Peace with Holland, Denmark, Portugal, Sweden, and his being in a Treaty with France. He minded them of the Expence of the Fleet, and of the Abatement of Thirty Thousand Pounds of the three Months Assessment. He exhorted them to be zealous for the Protestant Interest abroad. He added, Though Peace is made, yet it is Interest that keeps Peace, and further than that, Peace is not to be trusted. He clos'd all thus: I shall conclude with my Perswasion to you, to have a sweet, gracious, and holy Understanding one of another, and put you in Mind of the Counsel you have heard this Day in order to it. And I desire you to believe that I speak not to you as one that would be a Lord over you, but as one that is resolv'd to be a Fellow-Servant with you to the Interest of this great Affair. There is more solid Sense, more Truth in this Speech, which is at large in Whitlocke, than in most of the Speeches from the Throne since Queen Elizabeth's Death. There is more true Eloquence in some Parts of it: In such a Heap of Confusion was this poor Nation; and that it might not sink into Ruin, a Remedy must be apply'd. A Remedy has been apply'd, This Government. Read the Earl of Clarendon's, and the Speech-making Speaker Turner's Speeches after the Restoration, and compare them with Cromwel's, notwithstanding it is incumber'd with certain seraphical Expressions, according to the Mode of the Times, and you'll soon distinguish the Truth and Eloquence of Cromwel's, from the Flattery, Affectation, from the Abundance of Words and Deficiency of Sense in those tedious Harangues. Oliver told the Assembly they should repair to their House, and exercise their Liberty in the Choice of a Speaker; which they did, and chose William Lenthall, Esq; who had been so long Speaker of the House

A. D. 1654. House of Commons before and after the Death of the King; Mr. Scobel was appointed to be their Clerk, and Mr. Birkhead their Serjeant.

The next Day the House call'd over their Members, and appointed their Committees. The Lord Broughill was one of the Members for Ireland, the Marquis of Argyle one of them for Scotland; and this Convention was for the most part compos'd of as good Gentlemen as were in England, tho' the Majority were Commonwealth's Men, who did by no Means approve of the Government in a single Person, such as Robert Wallop, Esq; Lord Grey of Groby, Sir Arthur Haslerigg, John Highlord, Esq; John Bradshaw, Esq; Thomas Scot, Esq; John Wildman, Esq; Thomas Honeywood, Esq; Henry Nevil, Esq; Ludlow is very well pleas'd with the Difficulty they made in recognizing the Protectorate, and highly extols their Courage in taking to Pieces the Instrument of Government, in which his Republican Principles prevail'd over his good Sense, for without the Instrument of Government they were no Parliament; and Oliver shew'd his Reason as well as his Power was greater than all theirs, when he told them in another Speech a Week after, The same Government which made them a Parliament made him a Protector; and as they were entrusted with some Things, so was he with others. He then explain'd to them upon what Foundation they stood, and what Business they had to do; after which he appointed a Test of Recognition to be taken before they went any more into the House, which was both just and reasonable for him to do as he was Protector. Could any Man of common Sense imagine the Protector sent for them to dispute the Authority by which they were to sit, or suffer them to spend their Time in angry and insolent Debates with Respect to the Government? The Recognition Test was ingross'd in Parchment, and three hundred Members subscrib'd it. However they voted, That the Recognition did not comprehend, nor should be constr'd to comprehend therein the whole Government, consisting of Forty-two Articles, but that it does only include what concerns the Government of the Commonwealth by a single Person and successive Parliaments. They resolv'd, That all Persons return'd, or who should be return'd to serve in this present Parliament, should, before they be admitted to sit in this House, subscribe the Recognition; That those Subscriptions should be taken in Presence of any two Members, who have subscrib'd it. They voted, That the supreme Legislative Authority shall reside in the Lord Protector and the People assembled in Parliament, and that the present Lord Protector shall continue during Life. By this Vote Oliver's Authority was establish'd, and all Attempts afterwards to encroach upon it were factious and illegal, according to that Constitution, which it became his consummate Wisdom to provide against and suppress. The Parliament enter'd into a Debate on the other Articles of the Instrument of Government, according to the Power they reserv'd to themselves by their Vote. They particularly debated whether the Protector should be elective or hereditary, and it pass'd for Election. They continu'd the standing Army of Ten Thousand

Horse and Twenty Thousand Foot, and gave an Assessment of Sixty Thousand Pounds a Month to maintain them. They voted a Triennial Parliament, the Protector to summon one oftner upon Occasion, and the Commissioners of the Seal to issue Summons by a limited Time, if he did not. They order'd a Bill against Drunkenness and Gaming, another against Heresies, and resolv'd, That the true Reform'd Protestant Christian Religion shall be publickly profess'd and maintain'd, and that the Protector should have no Negative to Bills for suppressing Heresies. They voted Liberty to all scrupulous Consciences that gave no Disturbance to the Publick. They confirm'd the Two Hundred Thousand Pounds a Year Civil List to the Protector, and assign'd Whitehall, St. James's, the Mews, Somerset House, Greenwich, Hampton Court, and Windsor, for his Use. However, the Freedom they took in canvassing the Instrument of Government, which Oliver would have had thought as sacred and inviolable as Magna Charta, and their dwelling so much and so long upon it, gave him so great Offence, that he lost all Patience with them, and on the 22d of January dissolv'd them, having first made a Sermon instead of a Speech full of Upbraidings and Reproaches. He could not but be very much provok'd by the Presumption and Ingratitude of an Assembly, which was a Creature of his own creating, and ow'd to him its very Being. One of the Members, Col. Whet- ham, when it was mention'd to make him King, apply'd to him the Saying of the Prophet to Abab, Hast thou kill'd, and also taken Possession? It is certain the disgusted Members of this Parliament, the Republicans, in an unnatural Mixture with the Cavaliers, had produced a very powerful Party against Oliver, who knew well enough that they were not idle, and his Messengers surpriz'd Major Wildman at Exton, near Marlborough, in his Chamber, dictating to his Amanuensis a Libel against the Protector, with this Title, The Declaration of the free and well-affected People of England, now in Arms against the Tyrant Oliver Cromwel, Esq;. Whitlocke says, "Many who read this Declaration knew there was too much of Truth in it, and had not the Design been nipt in the Bud, and timely discover'd and prevented, it might have caus'd some Disturbance to the Protector, and to the Peace of the new Government; but by the Commitment of the chief Conspirators, their Plot was crush'd, and the Peace not interrupted. Divers wonder'd most that Major Wildman, and others of his Party who had serv'd the Parliament, should now join in this Design with those of the King's Party; but they al- ledg'd it was to strengthen themselves, and they could easily suppress the Ca- valiers afterwards." This was the Opinion all along of those first who oppos'd the Commonwealth, of those afterwards who oppos'd the Protector; in a Word, of all those who oppos'd any of the Governments from the Time of the King's Death to the Restoration. The Royalists were out of the Question, an abandon'd ruin'd People, who were made Tools to every Faction that was set up, to be thrown by when their Point was carry'd. This Declaration was proba- bly to be publish'd when the Insurrection was made: Sir Thomas Harris was to rise

Wales, Sir Henry Slingsby, and Sir Richard Maleverer in Yorkshire, Sir Henry Moore and Sir George Brown in other Places, Sir Joseph Wagstaff and Colonel Penruddock in Wiltshire, Sir Hugh Pollard in Devonshire, Mr. Arundel in Cornwall. London was full of Conspirators, and the Conspiracy was almost general; but such was the Protector's good Intelligence, that he had timely Information of their general and separate Designs, which he suffer'd them to carry on just as far and no farther than he thought fit. Wagstaff fearing a Discovery, precipitated the Business, and with Penruddock, Mr. Grove, Mr. Mompeyson, Mr. Jones, Capt. Wake, Mr. Mason, Mr. Lucas of Hungerford, and others, took Arms. The Lord Wilmot was come over to England to command in Chief those that were to rise in the Northern Counties. The Lord Willoughby of Parham, the Lord Newport, and Col. Birch, were in the Plot; but Wagstaff was the only Man who appear'd at the Head of a Body at Salisbury, and being Assize Time, they got together under Pretence of coming to the Assizes. He had with him Three or Four Hundred Horse, such as they were, and getting together in the Night, they seiz'd the Lord Chief Justice Rolles, Justice Nicholas, Mr. Dove the High Sheriff of the County, who refus'd to proclaim the King, and some Gentlemen whom they suspected to be Enemies to their Design. They took away the Judge's Commission, and some of their Leaders, with a true Cavalier Spirit, were for hanging up the Judges and Sheriff, who were very like to have the hanging of them in a few Days. The Earl of Clarendon blames them very much for not trussing up the Judges and Sheriff: It would have been a seasonable Act of Severity, says he, without considering that it would have provok'd Cromwel to have sacrific'd a Hecatomb of them whom he had in his Power. Wagstaff and Penruddock finding No-body come to them at Salisbury, remov'd to Dogtown, taking Mr. Dove along with them, but they extended their Mercy to the Judges and let them go. From thence they march'd to Blandford in Dorsetshire; Most Men, says Ludlow, looking upon them rather as flying than marching; but the Lord Clarendon and Mr. Echard look'd upon them as so many Heroes, who with the Help of half a Dozen IF's, might have done a great deal more Mischief than they did before they were hang'd. Some Troops of Horse pursu'd them into Devonshire, where Capt. Unton Crook, with two Troops only, fell upon them, routed them, took Colonel Penruddock, Mr. Jones, Capt. Grove, Capt. Wake, and some more of these notable Men, to use the Lord Clarendon's Phrase, which, with the Sense of it, is super-excellent in what follows: The Success and Triumph at Salisbury produc'd such a Consternation throughout the whole Kingdom, as would have endanger'd it, IF there had not happen'd some accidental Confusion among the Undertakers. Monstrum horrendum! A Parcel of Mob, Ludlow tells us they were not above Two Hundred besides their Captains, to throw an Army of Thirty Thousand Veterans, Horse and Foot, under Captains who had ten Years been us'd to Conquest, into Consternation; and as laughable as this is, 'tis one of the most serious Passages in the History of the Rebellion; but this ridiculous Passage must be attended with some Falsities too, to make it of a Piece with the rest.

The History of the Rebellion is made up of the like Paragraphs, and if it was turn'd up and down, it would be as true as it is now. Some of the Prisoners were condemn'd at Salisbury, and some at Exeter, of which Number were Colonel Penruddock and Captain Grove; and in Aggravation of their Crimes, it was urg'd, that this was their second Offence. They were both beheaded at Exeter. Mr. Jones of Newton Tony being ally'd to Oliver, was pardon'd. Captain Crook had Two Hundred Pounds a Year given him of the Estate of Mr. Mompeyson, who with Sir Joseph Wagstaff, Mr. Mason, and others, made their Escape.

by this Rebellion, and resolv'd to shew them some seasonable Severity. He commanded a tenth Part of their Estates to be levy'd, in order, says Ludlow, to maintain those extraordinary Forces, which their turbulent and seditious Practices oblig'd him to keep up. To Oliver put this in Execution, he the next Year plac'd makes Major Generals over all the Counties in England, with much more Power than ever the Lord Lieutenants had; and to ingratiate himself with our two famous Universities, he settled One Hundred Pounds per Annum for a Divinity Reader at Oxford, and gave Money to both of them; which is a severe Rebuke on those History Writers who say he endeavour'd to suppress Learning, and destroy'd all the Publick Libraries he could come at; though the contrary is well known, that he encourag'd Learning,

A. D. 1654. Learning, and patroniz'd Men of Letters; and it was about the End of this Year that Doctor Ralph Barhurst, afterwards Head of Trinity College, Oxford, and Dean of Wells, Physician to the Navy, took his Doctor of Physick's Degree, and produc'd a Certificate from General Blake, and the other Generals at Sea, of his Behaviour to their full Satisfaction.

A. D. 1655. General Blake had been sent to the Streights with a strong Squadron of Men of War, to demand Satisfaction of all Princes and Powers that had injur'd the English in the Time of War and Confusion at home. The General receiv'd great Honours wherever he came, and executed his Commission much to the Advantage and Reputation of his Country.

Being in the Road before Cadiz, a Dutch Admiral then there would not wear his Flag while General Blake was in the Harbour. He enter'd the Streights with thirty Men of War. The Treaty between England and France not being quite concluded, Blake made for the Coast of Naples in Hope to meet with the Duke of Guise's Fleet, which had a Design upon that City, but Guise was gone before the General arriv'd there. From thence he sail'd to Leghorn. The City of Rome and all the Pope's Territories were allarm'd at the Name and Approach of Blake. Several of the principal Citizens retir'd with their Effects to the Mountains, though Sir Richard Tambot, as Leti calls him, assur'd Cardinal Barberino that Cromwel had given no Orders to Blake to insult the Patrimony of St. Peter. However, the Terror of the People was such, that publick Processions were made, and the Host was expos'd forty Hours to avert the Wrath of Heaven, and prevent Blake's attacking the Dominions of the Church. New Works were rais'd all around our Lady of Loretto's Chapel to defend it from Pillage, and all those Precautions taken which would have signify'd nothing if Cromwel had given Orders to Blake to fall upon the Pope's Towns and Countries, which he and his Seamen would very willingly have done had it confist'd with Oliver's good Policy, to have drawn all the Powers of Popery upon him, by assaulting the Papacy. Upon his Arrival in Sight of Leghorn, he dispatch'd his Secretary to demand of the Great Duke sixty Thousand Pounds for Damages sustain'd by the English in his Dutchy, where Prince Rupert had taken so many Ships belonging to the Commonwealth of England, as amount'd to that Value, and having sold them to the Great Duke's Subjects, the Commonwealth requir'd Satisfaction, that Prince having no Right to sell them. The great Duke of Tuscany offer'd to pay Part of the Sum, and desir'd Time to consult the Pope about Payment of the rest. Blake reply'd, That the Pope had nothing to do with it, and he expected the whole Sum, which was paid him, thirty five Thousand Spanish, and twenty five Thousand Italian Pistoles. The Duke pretended, that some of the Ships had been sold to Subjects of the Pope, and therefore the Court of Rome ought to pay Part of the Damage, which Alexander the Seventh, who succeeded Innocent the Tenth, did, and paid him twenty Thousand Pistoles.

From Leghorn General Blake sail'd over to the Barbary Shore, and sent an Officer to the King of Tunis, to demand the Delivery of English Slaves in that Kingdom. The King answer'd, he was very ready to deliver them, provided the Knights of Malta would do the same by the Tuniseens, whom they held in Slavery. Blake reply'd, he should not concern himself about the Knights of Malta, but if the English were not sent him, he would take all the Ships of Tunis which he met. Accordingly he took a Fleet loaden with Provisions for Candia, and having put his Ships in order, he thunder'd with his great Guns upon the Town, while he sent out several long Boats mann'd with stout Mariners, who at the same Time enter'd into their Harbour with undaunted Courage, and set Fire to all the Ships there, being nine Men of War, which were burn'd to Ashes, and this with the Loss only of twenty five English Men. This was one of the most gallant Actions that was ever perform'd at Sea. The King of Tunis immediately sent to the General to beg a Peace, and deliver'd all the Slaves he had belonging to England, about four Hundred in Number. Blake concluded an advantageous Treaty with the Tuniseens, and plac'd there an English Consul.

From Tunis he sail'd to Algiers, where the Dey pay'd him all the Respects due to a General who commanded the Fleet of a Republick that was Mistress of the Sea; he anchor'd in the Mole, and concluded a Treaty with the Dey on what Conditions he thought fit. The chief was, that Satisfaction should be made for all English Ships taken, and all English Prisoners be released. The Algerines were so proud of his Friendship, that whenever they met with any Sally Men of War that had English Men aboard, they took them out and sent them to Blake, who oblig'd the Knights of Malta to make Satisfaction for Piracies committed by their Ships upon English Merchant Men. General Blake sent home sixteen Ships richly loaden with the Effects he had receiv'd for Satisfaction and Damages, and they were order'd to sail up the River of Thames together, to make a grateful Spectacle to the People, who were told that such Ships were coming, and with rich Freight.

One Mr. Gage, who had been a popish Priest, and Missionary in the Spanish West Indies, being return'd home to England, with Intention to renounce the Errors of the Church of Rome, and embrace the Reform'd Religion, gave Cromwel Information of the great Riches in those Parts of the World, and of the Means to come at them. Oliver's Treaty with France being pretty forward, and the Substance of it being for mutual Assistance between England and that Kingdom, 'twas impossible to prevent a Rupture with Spain, which the Protector resolv'd to be provided for betimes; and as Gage had advis'd him, he fitted out a Fleet under the Command of Vice-Admiral Pen, and five or six Thousand Land Forces under Colonel Venables, to attack Hispaniola. Oliver kept the Design very secret, and it was not known to what Part of the World the Fleet was bound, till some Time after it was sail'd

A. D. 1655. fail'd. Spain would never admit of a Peace with England between the Tropicks, so he was in a State of War with them in those Parts, says Bishop Burnet, even before he declar'd War against the Spaniards in Europe. Colonel Stoupe the Swiss, who had been a Minister at the Savoy, was very intimate with Oliver; he had sent him to France, to feel the Pulse of the Protestants, whether they were in any Disposition to join with the Prince of Conde, if Cromwel enter'd into a League with that Prince, then at Brussels, and Spain, against France, which he inclin'd to do. But Stoupe found the Hugonots very much at Ease under Cardinal Mazarine's Administration, who observ'd their Edicts very justly; and that the Prince of Conde's Offers to turn Protestant, to land in Guienne, and to raise the Hugonots in South France, were vain and chimerical, which determin'd the Protector to enter into a Treaty with Mazarine, upon which this Fleet was equipp'd and sent to America. Stoupe conjectur'd whither it was going, by Cromwel's being very curious in Surveying a Map of the Bay of Mexico, and measuring Distances, which he saw him very intent upon in his Closet. Stoupe happening to say as much in Company, Don Alonso de Credenias, the Spanish Ambassador, sent for him very privately, and offer'd him ten Thousand Pounds if he could make any Discovery. The Swiss had a great Mind to take the Money, and thought it fair, since it was only his Conjecture, and nothing had been trusted with him, but he expected to make a Fortune by the Lord Protector's Favour, and said only, that in a Diversity of Conjectures, that seem'd to him more probable than any others. However, Stoupe wrote of it to one about the Prince of Conde, who at first hearing was perswaded it must be so, and immediately acquainted Don John of Austria, Governor of the Netherlands; but he having no Notice of it from Cardenas, slighted the Information, till he had the like Conjecture from others, and then he sent over the Marquis de Leyde, a Grandee of the first Rank, to know what Cause of Complaint the Protector had against the King his Master. Oliver resolving to temporize no longer, declar'd, He expected Liberty to trade to the Spanish West-Indies, and to have the Laws of the Inquisition repeal'd. The Ambassador reply'd, His Master had but two Eyes, and he would have him to put them both out at once.

Lord Clarendon, who would make us believe that every Body thought of King Charles and his Affairs as much as he did, whose Subsistence depended entirely upon them, seem to have been in some Hopes that Pen and Venables would have run away with the Fleet and Army, and have set up the Royal Standard, which is said without the least Foundation in Reason or Fact, and might have been built upon as much from a Dream as from any Authority he had for it.

Pen and Venables fail'd directly to Barbadoes, where they were to open their Commission, and where they publish'd a Proclamation, that all Servants who would list under them, should be made free by that Service.

A. D. 1655. The same was made known in the other Islands, St. Christopher's, Nevis, and above three Thousand Men came in to them from all of them. Thus reforc'd they fail'd to Hispaniola with a Fleet and Army, thirty Men of War, and nine Thousand Men at least at their setting out from Barbadoes, sufficient to have driven the Spaniards from one Sea to the other, had any other two Generals of the Parliament's Forces been appointed to command them. They came within View of Santo Domingo, the chief City and Port of the Island of Hispaniola, about the Middle of April. The first Step they took was an Omen of their ill Success. They broke Cromwel's Orders as to the Landing Place: He had given them Instructions to enter the Port immediately, foreseeing that the Spaniards in the first Surprise and Consternation would expose themselves to be an easy Conquest, if the English behav'd as they had been wont to do. It fell out so with respect to the Spaniards, they abandon'd the City and fled into the Woods. Venables with seven Thousand Men landed about ten Leagues from the Town by mistake. The other Part of the Army, under Colonel Butler, landed near the Town, and those under Venables having a long March, through a desert Country, open to the scorching Heat of the Sun, without Water or Refreshment, were so wasted with Famine, Thirst and Sweat, that they could hardly carry their Arms. In this Condition the Spaniards fall'd upon them from the Woods, not above fifty or sixty at a Time, harass'd them through their whole March, and kill'd no less than six Hundred of them. They hardly made any Resistance, and were the more dispirited, for that they expected Mountains of Gold and Silver, instead of which it was proclaim'd, that no Man should plunder Gold, Silver, Jewels, or any other rich Moveables, or kill any Cattle, on Pain of Death. Add to this their great Want of Provisions, so little Care had they taken to bring Stores with them, that in a few Days they were forc'd to feed upon their Horses. Colonel Haynes making Head against the Spaniards was slain fighting resolutely in the midst of them, and after that the English thought of nothing but retreating to their Ships as fast as they could. Venables and Butler being join'd at the Place appointed, they shipp'd their Men and set Sail for Jamaica the third of May, having been three Weeks in Hispaniola, Pen and leaving that Place more shamefully Venables than ever Place was left by English Men disgrac'd. The Islanders of Jamaica not having heard of the Disgrace of these Invaders, left their Town and Plantations and retir'd to the Mountains, and upon Treaty were permitted to depart the Island, which was possess'd Jamaica by the English in the Name of Oliver taken. Cromwel, Lord Protector of the Commonwealth, and Colonel Fortescue was left Governor there with three Thousand Men, who were afterwards reforc'd with one Thousand Men under Major Sedgwick, and with a Regiment commanded by Colonel Humphreys. Fifteen Hundred Men were sent from Ireland under Colonel Brayne, who with three Hundred Men was cast away in the Voyage. He was follow'd by fifteen Hundred more under Colonel Moor, Captain

A. D. 1655. tain Chester, and other good Officers. And whatever Loss the Nation was at in the Expedition of Pen and Venables, it has since got more by this Acquisition, than the Charge of all the Commonwealth's Wars amounts to, Jamaica being the most flourishing Colony in the New World, and the Inhabitants live with as much Splendor as the most splendid of any City in Europe.

Venables was disabled by Sickness to perform the Functions of his Office, and was permitted by the Council of Officers to return into England. Pen suspecting he would lay the whole Blame of that Affair on him, obtain'd the same Leave also, and being both arriv'd, they were heard at Whitehall one against the other, where the Accusations of both seem'd to be of more Weight than the Defects of either of them; so Pen was committed to the Tower, and Venables confin'd to his Lodging, his Distemper excusing him from a stricter Confinement.

The Protector was extremely mortified at the Misfortune of this Expedition, which had not only alarm'd Spain, but France and Holland, both very well appriz'd of the great Accession of Power which would have redounded to England by his making himself Master of the Riches of New Spain, and judging by his former Successes, what had they not all to fear from such a Fleet and Army? And what Punishment did not Venables and Pen deserve, for bringing so much Shame and Loss on a Government, till then always Triumphant, and a Stranger to Disgraces?

Manning a Traitor to the King.

We have mention'd the Conspiracy against the Protector in England, the full Discovery of which was owing to the Correspondence which Thurloe, Oliver's Secretary, kept with Henry Manning, Son to Colonel Richard Manning, a Papist, kill'd in the late King's Service at the Battle of Alresford. Thurloe, by Cromwel's Order, furnish'd this Mr. Manning with Money, and sent him to the Place King Charles resided at, to be his Spy. He there got into the Confidence of Sir Edward Hyde, Author of the History of the Rebellion, though he flurs over the Matter in that History, and takes upon himself the Credit of discovering the Traitor, at the same Time that he excuses the Treason, there being not a Syllable of Truth in it. He assures us, that Manning bubbled Thurloe, and sent him Lies for Money; and again, not one of the King's Counsels was discover'd; all which is alike true. Manning was sent over to Cologne by Thurloe, on Purpose to get Intelligence for him; when he came thither he told the Exiles, He was sent thither from some Friends in England, who desir'd to have their Names conceal'd. Ludlow informs us, that the Cavaliers made him very welcome for the Sake of Thurloe's Money, of which the King himself had Part; and several lesser Sums were distributed to his necessitous Followers; one of whom was Sir Edward Hyde, with whatever Airs he adorns his History; and it will be prov'd that several of those Followers were Oliver's Pensioners, as by a List extant in the Hand Writing of Colonel Sydenham, one of the then Lords of the Treasury. Thus continues General Ludlow, "Manning was easily admitted amongst them," very easily no doubt, when he had Money in his Pocket. Instead of Chancellor Hyde's finding out the Fraud, it was detected in this Manner, as in the Words of Ludlow, "It happen'd that a Gentleman, Leti says the Duke of Richmond, "who had serv'd the late King, desir'd Leave from Cromwel to travel, which he obtain'd on Condition he should not see the King, which he promis'd; accordingly when he arriv'd at Cologne, he sent a Message to the King, that he might be permitted to wait on him at Night, which was granted, and having discours'd fully concerning the Affairs he came about, he took Leave and receiv'd a Letter, which he sew'd within the Crown of his Hat. Upon his Return to England, he came with Confidence to Cromwel; and being demanded by him if he had punctually perform'd his Promise? He answer'd he had: But said Oliver, Who was it that put out the Candles when you spoke to Charles Stuart. This unexpected Question somewhat startled him: Cromwel proceeding, ask'd what he said to him? To which the Gentleman reply'd, Nothing at all. Says Oliver, Did he not send a Letter by you? The Gentleman denying that also, Cromwel took his Hat, and having found the Letter, sent him immediately to the Tower: From thence he took the first favourable Occasion to acquaint Charles Stuart with all that had happen'd to him relating to this Affair, assuring him that one of the three Persons who were in the Room with him at the Time abovemention'd, must necessarily have betray'd him. Upon this Information, Manning's Study was search'd, and his Correspondence being discover'd, Leave was obtain'd from the Duke of Newburg, to execute him at Duynwoold, within his Territories; and accordingly he was shot to Death: But though Manning's Action was base and perfidious, continues Ludlow, very justly, as proceeding from a domestick Servant; yet by what Law he was executed, I confess my self utterly ignorant." Echard, with his usual Simplicity, tells us all Authors, except the Lord Clarendon himself, have been mistaken in this; for the good Archdeacon knows no better than to believe that the Truth is in the History of the Rebellion. What Advices Manning sent were so far from being Lies, that the Conspiracy was detected and disappointed by means of them, and several of the Chiefs of all Parties seiz'd and imprison'd, and cashier'd:

Of the Fifths Monarchists,

1655.

Major General Overton, Major Bramston, Major Holmes.

The latter liv'd long enough to join with the Duke of Monmouth, and lay down his Life, as he thought, for the Cause which he had so often fought for and conquer'd.

Major Generals.

The turbulent, restless Spirits of all these Malcontents, oblig'd Cromwel, otherwise good natur'd, as Whitlocke tells us, to Acts of Severity, and particularly to establish the Major Generals before spoken of.

For { Norfolk,

For { Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire,
Devonshire,
Cornwal, } Col. Desborough.

For South-Wales, Maj. Gen. Harrison.

These Major Generals were to have the Inspection and Government of a Committee in every County, with Orders to seize the Persons and distrain the Estates of such as should be refractory, and to put in Execution such further Directions as they should receive from the Protector: Those of the ordinary Sort of People who were seditious and turbulent, were threaten'd with Transportation to Jamaica: This Scheme seem'd very extraordinary and extravagant, in a free Republick as this Government was pretended to be, under a Protector; and it is cry'd out against as Tyrannical, more by the Commonwealths Men than the Cavaliers; but neither the one nor the other were sensible of the Necessity of Machia-vel's Rule, That all Governments must support themselves by the Principles on which they were founded. Oliver's Government had no Principle but that of Power; and having been so lately threaten'd with almost a general Insurrection, he had no Way to secure himself but by Rigour, and keeping a strict Hand over the Disaffected.

Among these were several hearty Friends to the Commonwealth, particularly Mr.
George Cony, a Merchant; Echard calls him a great Fanatick; for Railing is not inconsistent with Stupidity. Mr. Cony refusing to pay certain Customs, the Collector took it from him by Violence; and the Merchant brought his Action against the Custom-house Officer. This was a daring Violation of the Instrument of Government, and unbing'd it all at once. Oliver had not a Title to any Thing, but by that Instrument; and if he permitted it to be call'd in Question in the Common Law Courts, there was an End of his Authority, which had no Law to maintain it but the Instrument, and that was of his own making.
However, be it what it will, his Government had no other Pillar to support it; and 'tis very strange to hear People cry out against him for doing what there was a Necessity upon him to do by the grand Law of Self-Preservation. Mr. Cony's Counsel were Sergeant Maynard, Sergeant Twisden, and Mr. Wadham Windham, whom the Protector order'd to be sent to the Tower for Presumption, in offering themselves to be Council in a Case that so nearly touch'd the Fundamentals of his Power. They had not been there above four Days before they acknowledg'd their Fault, and petition'd to be set at Liberty. Judge Rolles declar'd, Something must be allow'd to Cases of Necessity; but however, he did not care to give Judgment in this Case, which he put off till the next Term; and before that came had his Quietus, which made Room for Sergeant Glynne to be Lord Chief Justice.
Cony's Affair was afterwards accommodated, and Sir Peter Wentworth, who had boldly commenc'd such another Action against a Collector, withdrew it after a little Expostula-tion by Cromwel.

About

Cromwel assists the Vandois.

About this Time Christina, Dutchess Regent of Savoy, Sister to King Charles the First's Queen, rais'd a terrible Persecution against the Protestants inhabiting the Valleys of Piedmont, where, Leti assures us, they have dwelt Time out of Mind. No new Sect, as the Lord Clarendon wou'd make us believe the Presbyterians are, but according to that Italian Papist, as old as their oldest History. He adds, that this Aunt of King Charles II. commanded this bloody Massacre of the Vandois, at the Instigation of the Priests, and her chief Minister the Marquis de Pianezza, who march'd into the Valleys in Person with 6000 Men, and cut the Throats of Men, Women and Children. Some of those brave Protestants sold their Lives dearly inso much that Pianezza lost half of his Men. The rest of the Vandois fled to the Mountains, and thence sent their Agents to all Protestant Princes and Powers to implore their Charity and Assistance. The Lord Protector immediately order'd a Day of Humiliation to pray for the Deliverance of those Confessors, as also a Collection to be made all over England for their Relief; and it is said the Contributions were larger than had ever been known before on any Occasion whatsoever. Most of the Lord Protector's Council were of the Committee for the Business of Piedmont; and it is affirm'd that the Contributions

| In England amounted to | — — | 50000 Pounds. |
| In France to           | — — | 50000 Pounds. |
| In Holland to          | — — | 25000 Pounds. |
| In Switzerland to      | — — | 25000 Pounds. |
| In Germany to          | — — | 25000 Pounds. |
| 175000                        |     |               |

Which, and much more from Places not nam'd, was as much as the Valleys were worth. 'Twas remitted to Mr. Stephen Turretin, Receiver for the Vandois. The large Collections made for these Protestants are generally allow'd to be owing to the Lord Protector's powerful Instances with Foreign Princes and States; for besides his Letters to the French King and Cardinal Mazarine in their Favour, he wrote to the Kings of Sweden and Denmark to mediate for them, and sent Mr. Morland and Mr. Crown to Geneva, to see that the Moneys collected were fairly distributed, as intended, among the Protestants of the Valleys, and that the Treaty the Duke of Savoy should grant them be fairly executed. He also gave Morland a Letter to the Duke of Savoy, then near or in his Majority, conceiv'd in Terms, which confirm'd a Report, that Cromwel shou'd have said, My Ships in the Mediterranean shall visit Civita Vecchia, and the Sound of my Cannon be heard in Rome; which sufficiently terrified the Italian Princes. Oliver, in his Letter to Charles Emanuel II. Duke of Savoy, after having represented the Cruelty and Injustice of his Actings against the Protestants, adds, Cum autem non humanitatis modo, sed ejusdem Religionis communiōe adeoq; fraterna peritus necessitudine cum iis conjunctos nos esse fateamur, satis fieri a nobis neque nostro erga Deum officio, neque fraternæ Charitatis neque Religionis ejusdem professioni posse existimavimus, si in hac fratrum nostrorum calamitate ac miseria solo sensu doloris afficeremur, nisi etiam ad subleuanda eorum tot mala inopinata quantum in nobis est situm, omnem operam nostram conferemus. "He is pierced with Grief at the News of the Sufferings of the Vandois, being united to them, not only by the common Ties of Humanity, but by the Profession of the same Faith, which obliges him to regard them as his Brethren; and he shou'd think himself wanting in his Duty to God, to Charity, and Cromwel's Letter to the Duke of Savoy in their Favour.

" to his Religion, if he shou'd be satisfied with pitying them only, whose miserable Condition is enough to raise Pity in the most barbarous Mind, if he did not exert himself to the utmost of his Power to deliver them out of it." Before this Letter arriv'd, the French King and the Cardinal had press'd the Court of Savoy to give Peace to their Protestant Subjects. To which King Charles the Second's Aunt return'd Answer in her Son's Name, That she cou'd not enough admire to see France, and his Eminence in particular, so earnest in behalf of Hereticks, and to endeavour to hinder the Chastisement of the Duke her Son's rebellious Subjects, out of pure Complaisance to Cromwel, while the English Catholics are entirely abandon'd, and languish miserably under the Yoke of that Tyrant. Cardinal Mazarine reply'd, We must leave to God the Care of defending the Cause of the Catholics, it being most just, but that of the Hereticks needs for its Support the Clemency of Princes. The Title of Royal Highness being by Mistake omitted in the Address of Cromwel's Letter to the Duke of Savoy, the major part of the Council of Savoy was for sending it back unopen'd. But the Marquis de Pianezza, who had more Experience than the rest, represented to them, that Cromwel was as Haughty as he was Powerful, and wou'd not let such an Affront go unpunish'd; that he wou'd certainly lay Villa Franca in Ashes, and set the Swiss Protestant Cantons upon Savoy; which, with his shewing that Royal Highness was in the Contents of the Letter, satisfied them all, and Peace was made with the Vandois, who had all their antient Privileges confirm'd to them, and what had been taken from them restor'd.

All the Negotiations of the four Kings, whose Reigns are in this History, amount not in Value and Reputation to this one of Cromwel's. He talk'd en maître, and he prevail'd. But the Credit of England was before and after him in so low a State, that a Recommendation from thence was enough to spoil any Business it was intended to advance. An Italian Popish Author observes, that Oliver did this for the Protestants of Piedmont at the same time that he publish'd the most severe Edicts against the Papists in England, and not a Power in Europe durst intercede for them.

Cromwel and his Council having pass'd an Ordinance for regulating the Court of Chancery, by which the Proceffes there would be alter'd and expedited, Sir Thomas Widdrington, and Bulstrode Whitlock, Esq; Commissioners of the Great Seal, and William Lenthall, Esq; Master of the Rolls, scrupled the obeying it, as being contrary to the Oath of Office which they had taken. The Lord Protector, who wou'd be obey'd in all things, demanded the Seal of Widdrington and Whitlock. Lenthall complied, and was continu'd Master of the Rolls, though he had said, He would be hang'd at the Rolls-Gate before he would execute the Ordinance. Upon this Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes, and John Lisle, Esq; were made Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, — Fell, Esq; Chancellor of the Dutchy, William Lenthall, Esq; Master of the Rolls, John Sadler, Esq; Nathaniel Hobart, Esq; Arthur Barnardiston, Esq; Thomas St. Nicholas, Esq; Robert Aldworth, Esq; Six Clerks in Chancery. But to shew Widdrington and Whitlock he was not angry with them, he made them both Commissioners of the Treasury.

We have spoken of Christina Queen of Sweden's abdicating her Kingdom with an Intention to abdicate her Religion. To this Purpose she resolv'd to go to Rome, and to see as much as she could in her way thither. As she had a kind

Cromwel will not see the Queen of Sweden.

A.D. 1655 of Romantick Genius, the Renown of Cromwel made her very desirous to see a Hero, whose Wisdom and Valour were the Subject of the Discourse of the World. The Lord Clarendon and Mr. Eckard think King Charles II. highly honour'd by a Visit from that Prince in his Exile in the Territory of Mentz: But it seems the Court of the Protector had other Sentiments of that Honour, and would by no means receive her Visit. The Protector was for something solid in every thing that had Shew, and all the Pains she took to see him were lost. It not being customary for Princes to make Visits before they know they shall be welcome, she sent her Secretary Maldejski, an Italian, from Fountainbleau in France to London, to procure an Invitation from Cromwel, who receiv'd Maldejski with particular Marks of Respect and Esteem, which flatter'd the Italian with Hopes that the Protector wou'd invite his Mistress to his Court. He often hinted, that her Majesty wou'd be extremely pleas'd with the Sight of so illustrious a Captain, and was almost always talking of his Highness's heroick Qualities. The Protector gave him the Hearing, but wou'd not understand his Meaning: He return'd Compliment for Compliment; and 'twas not long before Maldejski perceiv'd his Errand wou'd not succeed. Oliver had three Reasons against inviting her: The Expence of her Stay here; His Resentment of her Apostacy, and the ill Example of her Life and Conversation, too gallant and intriguing for a Puritan Court, which was far from being an Objection to that of Charles II. And Christina had two Reasons for coming, the one to satisfy her Curiosity, which was insatiable, the other, at the Instance of Cardinal Mazarine, to propose a Marriage between one of Oliver's Family and his Niece, which at first seems impracticable, and wou'd have been the most chymical Proposition she cou'd have made to the Protector,

Menasses the Jew and Cromwel. Who much about the same time had People come out of the East to be Witnesses of his Glory. Menasses ben Israel was deputed, with other chief Men amongst the Jews, to negotiate a Treaty with Oliver for their living and trading in England. The Protector sent for several Ministers to consult with them about the Lawfulness of admitting them, wherein he seems to be over-scrupulous; for if Religion hinder'd us from trading with none but Christians, we must lose the best part of our Commerce. Eckard assures us, they offer'd Cromwel 200,000*l.* for St. Paul's Church, and that the Offer of so much Money for that Cathedral, and Liberty to trade, tempted him so strongly, that he look'd upon it as the Cause of God. If I, or any other Lay-Historian, had thus profan'd the awful Majesty of Heaven, it wou'd not have been excusable; but for an Archdeacon, who owes his very Subsistence to the Ministry, and is bound by it to teach others not to take the Lord's Name in vain, to be no more sensible of that Sin, is Matter of Astonishment and Lamentation. But it is so with too many Divines of a certain Denomination; they are us'd so much to Form, that they have little Feeling of the Power of Godliness. His Skill in Politicks and Commerce is equal to his other Knowledge. The Merchants foresaw the Jews would soon engross the Trade of the Nation. He makes their Foresight to be no better than his own. The Jews, who have liv'd and traded here above threescore Years, have not engross'd one Trade, instead of which the Nation have been Millions of Money Gainers by them. He then makes some foolish Jest about Oliver's Hopes of converting the Jews; and the People's Fears that the Jews would convert the Christians.

A.D. 1655 But the most ridiculous part of his Story is, that Menasses went to Huntingdon, to enquire at the Brewhouse there, if none of Cromwel's Family came not from some Israelitish Tribe; which, if he had found, the Jews wou'd have acknowledg'd him to be the Messias. I was well pleas'd to find this Passage in the same History with the Account of Oliver's selling his Soul to the Devil, it confirming the Opinion I had conceiv'd of a Writer, whose Judgment and Capacity were capable of such Stuff for History. Oliver gave Menasses 200 Pounds, and permitted the Jews to trade and to reside in England, which they have done ever since, to the great Benefit of our Commerce. His Care of Commerce was exemplary to all future Governments, if they had known what Care was for any thing but their Pleasures and Passions, and those who flatter'd them in them. He and his Council appointed a Committee of Trade, to consider how to improve, order and regulate the Trade and Navigation of the Common-Wealth; upon which Letters were sent to several Persons in this Form,

Sir,

" His Highness, considering of how great Importance it is to this Nation, that the Trade and Commerce thereof be, by all good Ways and Means, advanc'd and duly regulated, hath, by the Advice of his Council, thought fit to appoint a certain Number of Persons (whose Abilities and Experience have qualified them to be serviceable to their Country herein) to be a Committee for Trade; empowering them to take into Consideration the Trade and Navigation of this Common-wealth, and in what Manner, and by what Ways and Means the same may be encourag'd, improv'd, order'd and regulated: And having named you to be one of that Committee, have thought fit to signify the same unto you, to the end you may be present at their first Meeting, which is appointed to be on the 27th of this Instant November, in the Painted Chamber at Westminster, not doubting of your Readiness to join with the rest of the Committee, in contributing your best Assistance to a Work so highly tending to the publick Good.

Whitehall,
2 Nov, 1655.

Sign'd in the Name, and by Order of his Highness and the Council,

Henry Lawrence, President.

Whitlocke informs us, this was a Business of Oliver's much Importance to the Common-wealth, and the Gr. at. nefs. Protector was earnestly set upon it. At the same Time, the Ratification of the Treaty concluded with France, was deliver'd to the Lord Protector by Monsieur de la Bastide, Envoy from the French King. In this Treaty he wou'd not allow the French King to call himself King of France, but of the French: Whereas he took to himself not only the Title of Protector of England, but also of France: And which is yet more surprising, in the Instrument of the Treaty, the Protector's Name was put before the French King's, Lewis the XIVth. By the Articles of this Treaty, Cromwel was to furnish 6000 Land Men, and 50 Men of War to take the Maritime Towns belonging to the King of Spain in Flanders; on Condition that Dunkirk and Mardyke shou'd, when taken, be put into Cromwel's Hands, That Charles Stuart (for they wou'd not allow him the Stile of King) his two Brothers, the Dukes of Tork and Gloucester, and some say, the Queen, their

Colonel William Lockhart, who had marry'd a Niece of Cromwel's, and was reckon'd one of the wisest Ministers of the Age, was sent Ambassador to the French Court, and represented to Cardinal Mazarine, that there cou'd be no solid Peace between England and France, while any one of the House of Stuart was suffer'd to reside there. The King had withdrawn himself in Time; the Duke of Tork was in the French Army; Notice was however given him, that Reasons of State required him to follow the King his Brother, and the Cardinal engag'd Abbot Montagu, the Queen Mother's Almoner, to let her know that Cromwel demanded she shou'd be obliged to leave Paris, and the Court of France. He was order'd to offer her the City of Moulins, and all the Bourbonnois, for her and her Daughter's Residence and Maintenance; but the Queen would not accept of the Offer, tho' prest to do it by the President of the Parliament of Paris, to whom she said, What a Shame is it for the King, my Nephew, to endeavour to drive from his Court a poor afflicted Queen, only to please an Usurper, and a Tyrant? This must needs be reckon'd a glorious Thing among the Catholics for the Cardinal who advises it. The King and his two Brothers being sent away, Cromwel did not think fit to insist on the sending away the Queen and her Daughter. The Duke of Tork serv'd in the Spanish Army against France; and the Duke of Gloucester remain'd with his Brother at Cologne, from whence the two Princes, and their Sister, the Princess of Orange, went to the Fair at Frankfort. 'Twas in this Progress that Queen Christina of Sweden visited them in the Castle of Coningstein.

King Charles and his Brothers.

Monfieur, now Sir Peter Coyet, he being Knighted by Oliver, Ambassador of Sweden, at the Court of the Protector, having concluded a Treaty with his Commissioners, Colonel Fiennes, Bullstrode Whitlock, Esq; Walter Strickland, Esq; and Mr. Thurloe, Secretary of State, gave a noble Entertainment to the Lords of the Court and others, As the Dutch Ambassador, the Portugal Ambassador, the Elector of Brandenburgh's Minister, the Earl of Bedford, the Earl of Devonshire, the Lord Bruce, the Lord Ossory, Son to the Duke of Ormond, the Lord St. John, the Lord Ogylvie, two or three other young Lords, the Lord George Fleetwood, Count Holac, a German, and a great Number of Persons of Quality, which I mention to shew that the English Nation began to have a good Understanding with one another, and a mutual Acquiescence in the present Government.

Ordinances.

The Press, abus'd by all Factions, was restrain'd by an Order of Council, that no Person shou'd presume to publish in print any Matter of publick News or Intelligence without Leave and Approbation of the Secretary of State. Another Order was publish'd against Printing unlicens'd and scandalous Books and Pamphlets, and for regulating the Press.

A Proclamation was issu'd requiring all who had been of the King's Party to depart out of the Lines of Communication. Indeed their frequent Conspiracies, most of them Assassination Plots, oblig'd the Government not only to have a watchful Eye over them, but to raise an additional Force of Horse in every County to observe their Motions, and the Motions of the Disaffected of all Denominations, who had no other Occasion of Disgust against the Management of Affairs, than that they were not the Managers. This Charge was paid by the Tenth of the Royalists Lands. Their Writers call it Decimation, and it was a very tender one, considering the Mischiefs they had been the Authors of since the End of the Civil War. The Protector's Reason for loading them with the Burthen is unanswerable. The Charge shall be laid upon those who have occasion'd it, and not upon the honest Party, who have already been so much Sufferers. The Malecontents knew the Laws in Force, if they disobey'd them, they knew the Penalty; if they put the Government to Charge, shou'd the Innocent defray it? And yet hear how they roar against this reasonable Imposition upon them! One wou'd think they were decimated indeed, as in the History of the Rebellion, and Echard's History, that in the Military Sense of the Word, every tenth Man's Throat was cut.

This Year Cromwel receiv'd a Present of six Oliver fine Coach Horses from the Count of Oldenburg, thrown of the House of Denmark; and being sometimes from a Coach-box. troubled with the Stone, he wou'd drink great Quantities of Diuretick Liquors, as his Physician, Dr. Bates, tells us in his Elenchus. After he had drunk them, his Custom was to use some violent Exercise to quicken their Passage. It was for this Purpose he got into his Coach-Box in Hyde-Park, leaving Thurlo in the Coach, and wou'd needs drive those fiery Oldenburgh Horses, which at the Snap of his Whip ran away, flung the Postilion, and Oliver himself from the Box upon the Pole, from whence falling to the Ground, his Coat was sointangled, that he cou'd not clear himself, but was dragg'd along till his Horse-Guards disengag'd him. A Pistol he had in his Pocket went off, without doing him any hurt. The Author of the Compleat History has a Libel in Rhyme on this Occasion, which does not seem to be any Temptation to Wit and Mirth, if their merry Fellows and Wits could have said any thing that was worth remembering.

In Ireland and Scotland Things are all quiet, except some Hubbub in the Highlands of Scotland, among the Followers of Glencairne, Athol, Seaforth, Middleton, who made some Opposition, but were at last entirely suppress'd.

At the latter End of this Year, the Lord Pro-Durham testor ordered a Scheme to be drawn for erecting College. and endowing a College, in the City of Durham, for the Convenience of the Northern Students. The Reverend and Learned Mr. Richard Frankland, A. M. was Fellow of this College. Among the infinite Number of notorious and absurd Falsities that the King's Party have said and written of Cromwel, nothing is more false and impertinent than that he was an Enemy to Learning, which Bishop Burnet assures us he lov'd and encourag'd.

The Spaniards, upon News of the Loss of Jamaica, seiz'd all the English Effects in Spain, which if considerable was the Fault of the Merchants; for they had Notice, and Time enough to remove them, and the Protector had sent particular Orders to General Blake to secure their Trade, and give them all possible Assistance.

Having mention'd General Blake's Orders to A.D. 1656 cruise upon the Coasts of Spain, and carry on a Maritime War there, we will remember an Action of his, which shew'd his Zeal both for the Religion and Honour of his Country, just before he receiv'd those Orders, and while the Peace subsisted yet between the two Nations of England and Spain.

General Blake being at Malaga, some of his His Zeal for the Religion and Honour of his Country. Seamen going ashore, met the Host carrying about, and not only paid no Respect to it, but laugh'd at those who did. One of the Spanish Priests put the People on resenting this Indignity, and they fell upon them, and beat them severely. When they return'd to their Ships, they complain'd of this Usage; upon which Blake sent

General Blake.

A.D. 1656 sent a Trumpet to the Viceroy to demand the Priest, who was the chief Instrument in that ill Usage. The Viceroy answer'd, he had no Authority over the Priests, and so cou'd not dispose of them. General Blake, upon that, sent him Word, He wou'd not enquire who had the Power to send the Priest to him; but if he were not sent within three Hours, he wou'd burn their Town. The Spaniards hearing this, oblig'd the Viceroy to send the Priest to Blake, and he justified himself upon the petulant Behaviour of the Seamen. Blake answer'd, if he had sent a Complaint to him of it, he wou'd have punish'd them severely, since he wou'd not suffer his Men to affront the establish'd Religion of any Place at which he touch'd, but he took it ill that he set on the Spaniards to do it. For he wou'd have all the World to know, That an English Man was only to be punish'd by an English Man; so he treated the Priest civilly, and sent him back, being satisfied that he had him in his Power. Cromwel was much delighted with this, and read the Letters in Council with great Satisfaction; saying, he hop'd he should make the Name of an English Man as great as ever that of a Roman had been. But alas! all those Hopes vanish'd with him, and twenty Years after his Death, the Name of an English Man was as inglorious as it was twenty Years before his Protectorate; so much is this Nation indebted to the Governments that went before him, and came after him. Cromwel did not heartily affect Blake, who had no other Interest in view, but that of the Publick, and never affected his Government. It was for this Reason that Colonel Montague, afterwards Earl of Sandwich, was sent to command under him in the Streights, to gain Experience in Sea Affairs, and get an Interest in the Seamen: Blake, after War was declar'd, block'd up the Port of Cadiz, whither the Spanish Plate Fleet us'd yearly to come and unlade; hoping to intercept them at their Return. Blake lay before the Harbour almost all the Winter, but cou'd not provoke the Spaniards, who had then there a Squadron of Men of War secur'd by Forts and Castles in the Island. The Spaniards were in Hopes to tire out the English, and that want of Water and Provisions wou'd oblige them to quit their Coasts, but they were plentifully supply'd with both in Wyer's Bay in Portugal. The Admirals Blake and Montague were gone to this Bay, when Captain, afterwards Sir Richard Stayer, who was left with seven Ships at the Mouth of the Harbour, spied the Spanish Plate Fleet making directly for Cadiz. Stayer was somewhat to the Leeward, but he bore up in the Head of them, with all the Sail he cou'd make, and in a few Hours time, himself in the Speaker, the Bridgewater and Plymouth Frigates, got up with the Spaniards. With these three Ships, while the rest were behind, Stayer bravely fought eight Spanish Men of War and Galleons, within four Leagues of Cadiz. The Admiral, Don Marco del Porto, with 600,000 Pieces of Eight aboard, ran his Ship on Shoar. The Vice-Admiral, in which were 1200,000 Pieces of Eight, and another Galleon were fir'd; one designedly by the Spaniards, and another by Accident. In the former the Marquis of Badajoz, Viceroy of Mexico, with his Wife and eldest Daughter, who was to have been married to the Duke de Medina Celi, perished in the Flames. But his other Daughter, his two Sons, and near a Hundred more, were saved by the English. The Rear-Admiral, with 2,000,000 Pieces of Eight aboard, was taken and secured, as also another Ship richly laden with Hides and Cochineal. A Man of War and an Advice Boat got into Gibraltar, and the other two Ships ran ashore and bulg'd.

Blake's Ships take the Spanish Galleons.

Six of these Eight were destroy'd, or made Prize. A.D. 1656 Admiral Montague was order'd home with the Plate Ships, and coming to Portsmouth, the Silver was taken out and carry'd by Land in many Carts to London, and so through the City to the Tower, where it was coin'd. As there never had been any thing like a Prize brought to England in the two former Reigns, or any worth remembering, This Sight occasion'd great Discourse and Joy, and the Protector, whose Glory was so radiant before, receiv'd a new Encrease of it by this Atchievement.

All Europe was so sensible of his Power, that the Oliver relieves the French Protestants. Distress'd in all Parts of it flew to him for Refuge, and found it even when their Case was most desperate, as that of the Protestant Inhabitants of the City of Nismes in France. There arose a Difference between the Burghers, who were mostly Hugonots, the Magistrates, and the Bishop, which growing tumultuary, the Intendant of the Province repair'd thither to prevent an Insurrection. When he came there, the Inhabitants oppos'd him, and Preparations were made to reduce them by Force. The Protestants in France fearing to be involv'd in the Guilt of the Mutiny at Nismes, and these Burghers expecting severe Chastisement, applied to Cromwel to intercede for them. This was done very secretly, and the Protector, with equal Secrecy, assur'd them of his Protection, and immediately dispatch'd a trusty Agent with this Letter to Cardinal Mazarine. Eminentissimo Cardinali Mazarino. Eminentissime Domine Cardinalis, cum nobilem hunc virum cum literis, quarum exemplar hic inclusum est, ad Regem mittere necesse statuissem, tum ei ut Eminentiam vestram meo nomine, saluaret, simul in mandatis dedi, certasque res vobiscum communicandas ejus fidei commissi. Quibus in rebus eminentissimam rogo vestram, uti summam ei fidem habere velit, utpote in quo ego summam fiduciam reposerim. Eminentiae vestrae studiosissimus OLIVERIUS Protector Rep. Angliae Alba Aula 26 Decemb. 1656.

To his Eminence the Lord Cardinal Mazarine.

" Having thought necessary to dispatch this Gentleman to the King, to deliver him the inclosed Letter; I have also recommended to him to Salute your Eminence on my Part, and have charg'd him to communicate to you certain Affairs which I have entrusted him with. I therefore pray your Highness to give Credit to what he shall say, having an entire Confidence in him. Your Eminence's most affectionate, Oliver, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Whitehall, &c. To which he added a Postscript in French of his own Handwriting; Je viens d'apprendre la revolte des habitants de Nismes. Je recommande a votre Eminence les Interets de Reformez. " I have been inform'd of the Tumult at Nismes, I recommend to your Eminence the Interests of the Reformed." He also sent his Instructions to Lockhart to second the Sollicitations of the Agent, and if he prevail'd not, to come away immediately. Mazarine complain'd of this way of Mazarine Proceeding as too imperious, but he fear'd Cromwel too much to quarrel with him; and the Cardinal sent Orders to the Intendant to make up the Matter as well as he cou'd. Wellwood, tells us, Cardinal Mazarine wou'd change Countenance whenever he heard him nam'd, so that it pass'd into a Proverb in France, The Cardinal is not so much afraid of the Devil as of Oliver Cromwel. His Ambassador at Paris, Mr. Lockhart, told Bishop Burnet, that when he was afterwards sent Ambassador by King Charles, he found he had nothing of that Regard that was paid him in

A.D. 1656 in Cromwel's Time. At which I wonder not, nor at the mean, or rather contemptible Figure the English Ambassadors made in all the Courts of Europe, from the Year 1602 to the Year 1642, and from the Year 1660 to the Revolution. For all Europe saw, that Princes, whose Heads were turn'd with Pedantry, Bigottry, Luxury and Superstition, wou'd never vindicate the Honour of the Nation, or regard the Interests of their Subjects: In short, that they wou'd do Foreigners no Hurt, whatever Hurt they did the English. Boreel told King Charles II. as much, as will be seen when we come to that King's second Dutch War.

The Lord Broghill was one of Cromwel's Cabinet Counsellors, and was sent for from Ireland to go to Scotland, and be President of the Council there, where he was soon weary of the Country and Company, or rather of so great Distance from Court, tho' he had a Salary of 2000 Pounds a Year. The Author of his Manuscript Life pretends, that he abhor'd Oliver's Practices, tho' he was a chief Agent under him. But that Author, who turn'd Churchman after the Barkholmew Act, prevaricates in it, or was impos'd upon by the Information his Patron gave him; for no Man had the Confidence of Cromwel more than this Lord Broghill, afterwards Earl of Orrery, till the Protector grew cold in his Behaviour towards him, upon his Uneasiness in the Scotts Service; tho' they were both reconciled again, and the Lord Broghill was the Person who advis'd him to take upon him the Stile and Dignity of King, expressing to him, that it was impossible to govern this Kingdom, that had been so long accusom'd to Monarchy, without Kingly Authority. Cromwel very well relish'd the Motion, tho' his Party, and some even of his Family, did not; and upon their leaving him in that Design, he gave into another, which is hinted at by Bishop Burnet, who had it from the Earl of Orrery himself; and it is thus told by his Chaplain, who had it from him more at large. The Lord Broghill keeping Correspondence with some about the King, put them upon founding his Majesty's Inclinations, as to accommodating Matters with Cromwel, by marrying his youngest Daughter the Lady Frances, and receiving Advice that the King's Inclinations were very favourable, he procured Permission to propose it to the Protector, which he did in this Manner, it being too delicate an Affair to be fallen upon directly. The Lord Broghill first acquainted Cromwel's Wife and Daughter with it, that a Rumour of it might be whisper'd about, and he report it to Oliver as such. So coming one Day out of the City to Court, he had Admittance into Cromwel's Closet, who ask'd him whence he came, and what News he had brought? The Lord Broghill said, He came out of the City, and had heard strange News. Cromwel was impatient to know what it was, and the more for that Broghill seem'd to hesitate, and to be loth to tell him, saying however with a Smile, 'tis strange News. The Protector press'd him so earnestly that there was no avoiding it, had it not been his Intention to tell him. Perhaps, says the Lord Broghill, you will be offended. I will not, reply'd Oliver hastily, be it what it will. Then Broghill in a laughing way said, All the News in the City is, that you are going to restore the King, and marry him to Lady Frances. Cromwel, with a pleasant Countenance, cry'd, And what did the Fools think of it? The Lord Broghill answer'd, They all like it, and think it the wisest thing you can do, if you can accomplish it. Oliver said, looking stedfastly upon him, Do you believe so too? Broghill finding the Proposal was grateful to him, reply'd, I do really believe it is the best thing you can do to secure your self.

Upon which the Protector walk'd up and down the Room with his Hands behind him in a musing Posture, and turning about upon Lord Broghill, cry'd, Why do you believe it? His Lordship then represented to him, "That he cou'd make little Dependance on his own Party, who, upon every slight Occasion, were apt to murmur and grumble; and the very same Persons who were so eager to put him up, were now the most likely to pull him down: That the King was in such great Exigencies, he wou'd be ready enough to hearken unto any Propositions, rather than live always in Exile and Misery: That he might make his own Terms, and retain the same Power, by being General of all the Forces, during his Life: That all the Royalists would join with him in it: That if his Daughter had Children by the King, which was likely enough, he wou'd thereby be endear'd to King and Country, and have such Interest in the Crown, as none wou'd ever attempt any thing against him, having the King his Son in Law, and the Heir apparent to the Crown his Grandson, with all the Power of the Kingdom in his Hands, which wou'd establish his Greatness in his Family after him; whereas, if he neglected the doing this, he cou'd not expect to transmit it to his Posterity, or indeed to preserve it as long as he liv'd."

Cromwel heard him with great Attention, and taking two or three Turns in the Room said, The King will never forgive me the Death of his Father. Sir, says Broghill, you were one of many who were concern'd in it, but you will be alone in the Merit of restoring him; employ some body to sound him upon it, and see how he will take it: I'll do it, if you think fit. The Protector told him No, adding, He will never forgive me his Father's Death; besides, he is so damnablely debauch'd (this is Bishop Burnet's Account) he will undo us all. But as debauch'd as he was, I have heard him a hundred times call'd our most religious and gracious King in very sacred and solemn Places. Here the Discourse dropp'd. Broghill finding he did not fall in with it at once, durst not tell him what Steps he had taken, for fear of giving him Offence. Before he left Whitehall, he saw Madam, the Protector's Consort, and Lady Frances, who were both very earnest for the Business, and as soon as he came to them, ask'd how he had succeeded. He told them what had pass'd between him and Oliver, and that they must use their Interest to bring him to it, or 'twou'd come to nothing. Mrs. Cromwel try'd more than once to persuade him, but his Answer was, The King is not such a Fool as to forgive me the Death of his Father; and they cou'd get nothing else from him.

Monk, Cromwel's main Tool while he was in Scotland, before my Lord Broghill went thither, had shewn all Favour to the Remonstrants (so the Independents in Scotland were call'd) and imprison'd many of the Kirk Ministers, who were generally well inclin'd to the King. Broghill eas'd them of the Difficulties they lay under when Monk was amongst them; for which they deputed Mr. Douglas and Mr. David Dicks to return him Thanks; but Gilespe, Head of the Remonstrants, articul'd against him to Cromwel, who clear'd his Lordship at the first Hearing after his Return to London, when the Protector told him, There's a great Friend of yours in Town. Broghill saying Who? Oliver reply'd, The Lord Ormond: He came to Town such a Day, and is at such a Place, naming it. The Lord Broghill said, I know nothing of it. Cromwel bad him send Ormond Notice that he knew where he was.

A.D. 1656 Broghill went to him himself, and acquainted him with what the Protector had told him; upon which the Marquess hasten'd away: But his Lady's Papers were seiz'd on, she living then in London, and having no Friend to speak for her, apply'd to Lord Broghill, who immediately went to the Protector to interceed for her. Oliver had by those Papers discover'd that she, as well as her Husband, held Intelligence with his Enemies; and as soon as he saw Broghill, he said angrily, You have undertaken indeed for the Quietness of a fine Person! The Lady Ormond is conspiring with her Husband against me, and by your Procurement I have allow'd her 2000 Pounds a Year of the Marquess's Estate, because they are Sufferers in Ireland. She's a wicked Woman, and shall not have a Farthing of it. My Lord Broghill seeing him in a Passion, return'd a soft Answer, which seldom fail'd to mollifie him, I am sorry my Lady Ormond has given Occasion for such Disturbance, I cannot well tell what to think of it, and humbly desire to know what Grounds you have for so severe a Censure? Grounds enough, reply'd Cromwel, There, giving him a Letter, read it, 'tis her own Hand. Lord Broghill looking upon it, said, You are mistaken, it is not Lady Ormond's Hand, but the Lady Isabella Thynn's, between whom and Lord Ormond there has been an Intrigue. How will you prove that, cry'd Cromwel? Easily, reply'd Broghill, for I have some Letters of Lady Isabella's; which he shew'd Oliver, who being satisfy'd of his Mistake, the Storm against the Lady Ormond blew over.

Ld. Broghill's Conference with Cromwel.

The Protector's Intelligence.

We shall have Occasion to speak of the exact Intelligence which the Protector had of Affairs he concern'd himself in: An infallible Proof of the Justness of his Judgment, and the Depth of his Policy. Tho' it did not cost him 200,000 Pounds a Year, as Eckard assures us, it did cost him more Money in one Year than probably the Royal House of Stuart spent on that Article in their four Reigns; for having no Wars, nor no Intention of Wars, I don't see of what Use Intelligence could be to them, or that it would have been Policy in them to pay any thing for knowing what, when known, they intended not to trouble themselves about.

The following Incident is touch'd upon by Bishop Burnet. Lord Broghill once walking in a Chamber with the Protector, saw an ugly, ill-look'd Fellow peeping thro' the Arras Hangings; and spying him before Cromwel did, he immediately drew his Sword and ran at him, supposing him to be some Rogue come to do Mischief. The Protector seeing him draw his Sword with such a Fury, ask'd what he meant? His Lordship answer'd, I saw some body look through the Hangings like a Villain; and going towards the Place, Cromwel follow'd him, saw the Fellow over Lord Broghill's Shoulders, and cry'd, A Friend, my Lord, a Friend, desiring him to walk back again, and he would come to him presently. Broghill left them talking together, and when Oliver return'd, he said, I'll write a Line or two, and be with you immediately, which he did; and then my Lord ask'd him, Whether he might know who that Fellow was? The Protector reply'd, He is one to whom I have given 1000 Pounds for Intelligence: He has now brought me Word of a rich Dutch Ship on our Coasts, which has Spanish Money aboard, and Measures are taken for intercepting it; which was accordingly effected by Captain, afterwards Sir Jeremy Smith, who came up with her as she pass'd by Dover. Smith demanded Leave to search her: The Dutch Captain answer'd, None but his Masters might search his Ship. Smith sent him Word he had set up his Glass, and if he did not submit before it was run out, he would board her. The Dutchman seeing 'twas in vain to resist, suffer'd the English to search her, and they found all the Spanish Money, which was a prodigious Treasure. Bishop Burnet tells us, Oliver knew every thing that pass'd in the King's little Court, and yet not one of his Spies were discover'd but Manning above-mention'd.

It will be Mirth to the Reader, after he has seen what Merit the Lord Clarendon takes to render a himself in detecting that Traitor's Correspondence with Thurloe, and how sharp the King's Counsellors were in detecting Spies, and keeping Counsels, to find that he himself was the very Person by whose Means Cromwel had most of his Intelligence from the King's Court. After this bold Charge, I must produce better Authority than my own, and it is in the Words of the Bishop of Salisbury.

" Oliver understood that one Sir Richard Willis was Chancellor Hyde's chief Confident, to whom he wrote often, and to whom all the Party submitted, looking on him as an able and wise Man, in whom they confided absolutely. So he found a Way to talk with him; he said, He did not intend to hurt any of the Party, his Design was rather to save them from Ruin: They were apt, after their Cups (you see what sort of Men they were) to run into foolish Plots, which signify'd nothing but to ruin those who were engag'd in them: He knew they consulted him in every thing. All he desir'd of him was to know those Plots, that he might so disconcert them that none might suffer for them. If he clapp'd any of them up in Prison, it should be only for a little Time, and they should be interrogated only about some trifling Discourse, but never about the Business they had engag'd in. He offer'd Willis what ever he would accept of, and to give it when, or as he pleas'd." They struck up a Bargain, and none was trusted with this but his Secretary Thurloe, who was a very dextrous Man at getting Intelligence. Thus Cromwel had all the King's Party in a Net, and, by the History of the Rebellion, one would think they had all Cromwel's Party at Mercy, and whenever they had Courage enough to shew themselves, the Cromwellians would fly faster from them than they us'd to run after them.

The Spanish War exhausting the Treasury, notwithstanding the Numbers and Riches of the Prizes that were taken, the Protector thought it necessary to call a Parliament; for which Writs were issu'd, and a Day set for their Meeting, the 17th of September, when they met accordingly at Westminster-Abbey, where they heard a Sermon preach'd by the learned and eminent Dr. Owen, Dean of Christ-church, and Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, who had in him more of the Gentleman and of the Divine, than any of the Doctors who dealt so insolently with him after the Restoration. The Sermon over, the Lord Protector and the Members repair'd to the Painted-Chamber, where, says Eckard, he made a dark Speech to them. Prodigious! that Darkness it self should discover Darkness! But it was not a Discovery of his; the Author of the Compleat History led him into that Term, tho' these illumin'd are eternally groping in the Mazes of false History; they insult all other Historians, as ignorant and blind. He made a short Speech, and directed them to make Choice of a Speaker. Ludlow, who is far from favouring those Times, informs us, That unwarrantable Practices were made use of to get a Court Parliament; but it is very obvious, that the like Means were us'd to get in as many Members as possible who were Enemies to the present Government;

A.D. 1656 Government; and unless the Protector had resolv'd to be felo de se, and murder his own Authority, he must have been a Fool (which the wife Cavaliers have not often call'd him) to have suffer'd them to sit, if he had not been sure of them. Somebody put it into the Head of Monk to tell the Parliament, a Month or two before he brought in the King, No Parliament admits new Members to sit, without a previous Engagement, which is what Oliver insisted upon, and for which his Opponents of all Denominations, say, he was a greater Tyrant than the Greek Agathocles, or the Roman Nero; but they do not seem to have a clear Notion of Tyranny, and till they do, it would be Labour lost to answer them.

As the Members went into the House, they receiv'd Certificates in this Form.

These are to certify, that Bulstrode Whitlock, Esq; of the County of Bucks, is return'd, by Indenture, to be one of the Knights in this present Parliament for the said County, and approv'd by his Highness's Council.

Sept. 17.
1656.

Nath. Taylor, Clerk of the Common-wealth in Chancery.

Third Parliament.

All those who had this Certificate, were such as had subscrib'd the Engagement, to make no Alteration in the Government; and the following are,

Secluded Members.

Those Members who were secluded for not taking that Engagement, and for publishing a Declaration against it. Sir Arthur Haselrigg, Thomas Scot, Esq; Herbert Morley, Esq; John Bulkley, Esq; John Burch, Esq; George Fenwick, Esq; Sir Anthony Irbys, Thomas Lyster, Esq; Thomas Saunders, Esq; Henry Darley, Esq; John Weaver, Esq; John Goodwyn, Esq; Francis Thorpe, Esq; John Southby, Esq; Richard Greenhill, Esq; Richard Browne, Esq; Thomas Adams, Esq; Richard Darley, Esq; Thomas St. Nicholas, Esq; William James, Esq; John Boyse, Esq; Charles Hall, Esq; John Jones, Esq; William Wolley, Esq; Richard Radcliff, Esq; William Saville, Esq; Sir Theophilus Biddulph, Sir Henry Mildmay, William Welby, Esq; Charles Hussey, Esq; Sir Ralph Hare, John Buxton, Esq; Edward Hooper, Esq; William Fisher, Esq; Alexander Popham, Esq; Sir Harbottle Grimston, Sir John Hobart, Edmund Harvey, Esq; Charles Hussey, Esq; John Sicklemore, Esq; William Doyley, Esq; Oliver Raymund, Esq; Jeremy Bentley, Esq; Sir Philip Woodhouse, William Blois, Esq; William Gibbs, Esq; Thomas Southerton, Esq; Thomas Bowes, Esq; Sir Edward Harley, John Hanson, Esq; Clement Throgmorton, Esq; Daniel Wall, Esq; John Buckland, Esq; Robert Long, Esq; Salisbury, Esq; Edward Tooker, Esq; William Morris, Esq; John Hale, Esq; Edward Turner, Esq; Daniel Shatterden, Esq; Thomas Styles, Esq; Richard Beale, Esq; Samuel Moore, Esq; Thomas Minors, Esq; Samuel Jones, Esq; John Aston, Esq; Andrew Lloyd, Esq; Richard Wyren, Esq; Charles Lloyd, Esq; Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Henry Wroth, Esq; Richard Lucy, Esq; John Witwrong, Esq; George Coworthorp, Esq; Samuel Got, Esq; John Northcot, Esq; John Young, Esq; John Dodderidge, Esq; Henry Hungersford, Esq; Challoner Chute, Esq; John Silliard, Esq; Walter Moyle, Esq; Walter Vincent, Esq; John Gell, Esq; Henry Atlington, Esq; Henry Tempest, Esq; James Clavering, Esq; John Stankope, Esq; Peneston Whaley, Esq; Abel Barker, Esq; John Bowyer, Esq; John Fagg, Esq; Rowland Litton, Esq; John Gore, Esq; Thomas Rivers, Esq; John Thurland, Esq; Henry Peckham, Esq; Richard Hinton, Esq; These Gentlemen presented a Petition to the sitting Members, acquainting them, that being chosen by the Country to serve with them, they were ready to discharge their Duty, but were prevented by the Power of the Sword: Upon which a Committee was appointed to inquire of the Protector and his Council, concerning the Reasons of that Proceeding, who gave them for Answer, That if the Persons complaining wou'd address themselves to them, they shou'd be reliev'd, and they were order'd to address to them.

Sir Thomas Widdrington being chosen Speaker, the House appointed their Grand Committees for Elections, Religion, Grievances, Courts of Justice and Trade. A Bill was read, For renouncing and disannulling the pretended Title of Charles Stuart, which Act pass'd in a few Days, and the House

Resolv'd,

That the War against the Spaniard was undertaken upon just and necessary Grounds, and for the Good of the People of this Common-wealth, and the Parliament doth approve thereof, and will, by God's Blessing, assist his Highness therein.

General Montague, afterwards Earl of Sandwich, coming into the House, took his Seat, and had their Thanks for his great and good Services done at Sea.

On the 27th of October, the Lord Protector came to the Painted-Chamber, and sent a Sergeant at Arms to give Notice to the House, that he was come. The Speaker, and the whole House went to the Painted-Chamber, where the Protector, in the Presence of the Lord President Lawrence, the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, Fiennes and Lisle, and the two Lord Chief Justices Glynn and St John, the Master of the Rolls, Lenthall, the Lords of the Treasury, Montague Whitlock Sydenham, and the rest of the Judges, gave his Consent to the following Bills. An Act for renouncing and disannulling the pretended Title of Charles Stuart. An Act for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries. An Act for the Security of his Highness the Lord Protector's Person. An Act for Exportation of several Commodities of the Breed and Growth of this Common-wealth. When the Protector had given his Assent to these Bills, he said, As it has been the Custom of the chief Governor, to acknowledge the Care and Kindness of the Commons, upon such Occasions; so I do very heartily acknowledge your Kindness herein.

The Major Generals in the several Counties, having by themselves, or their Deputies, given great Disgust to the People, were put down by this Parliament, John Claypole, Esq; who had marry'd Oliver's beloved Daughter, Lady Elizabeth, being the first that mov'd for it; by which the Protector's Disposition in that Business was conjectur'd.

The Account that Echard and others give of the Heresies and Blasphemies of James Naylor the Quaker, is deny'd by all that Fraternity, who represent him as a plain Man, of great Zeal, and no great Capacity. Mr. Pen, Mr. Archdæus, Mr. Ellwood, eminent Men among the Quakers, whom I knew intimately, have spoken of him thus to me. Echard and the Ecclesiasticks take infinite Pleasure in telling us he was condemn'd to be whipp'd by the Hang-man, to be pillory'd, to be stigmatiz'd with the Letter B, to have his Tongue bor'd thro', to be carry'd to Bristol, and convey'd thro' the City on a Horse bare back'd, his Face to the Tail, and his Body to be there whipp'd.

The Ecclesiasticks, instead of melting with Compassion at this lavish and barbarous Sentence, say with Echard, 'twas with some Reproach to humane Nature, that his Followers admir'd him; as if all humane Nature was not liable to Frailty, and Fools were not apt to admire a Fool. If this Maxim had not been true, there are several Histories which wou'd have been waste Paper, almost as soon as printed. Mr. Whitlock, with the Sentiments of a Layman, a Lawyer, and an English Man, observes, It was thought by many, he was too fiercely prosecuted. A Word like this, is not in the Compleat History, or in the Arch-deacon's; which shews us what Spirit these Men are of. Had they order'd Shaving, Bleeding, Physick, Fasting, and some hard Labour, it wou'd have done every whit as well, and sav'd the Scourging and Mangling, which is indeed a Reproach to humane Nature as it is, that there shou'd be those, whose Calling is to teach Charity and Love, that are not sensible of it.

In the Beginning of the Year ensuing, a Plot was discover'd, which, like all the Cavalier Plots, was to terminate in Murder. For tho' they durst no more think of fair Means, and of meeting the Protector in the Field, they had Rage enough to thirst after his Blood, and more than once conspir'd to assassinate him.

Syndercomb's Plot.

Miles Syndercomb and one Cecil, tamper'd with Troop, a Soldier of Oliver's Life-Guard, to kill the Lord Protector, and burn Whitehall. Troop seem'd to joyn with them in the Plot, but discover'd it in the Beginning; so Cromwel had Notice of the Conspirators Contrivances, till he thought it time to seize and punish them. The burning Whitehall was laid aside, and 'twas resolv'd to shoot him as he pass'd to Hampton Court, near the very Place where the Successors to those Cavaliers conspir'd to shoot King William; a narrow Pass beyond Turnham-Green. The Conspirators had provided a Blunderbuss, loaden with twelve Bullets, which was to be fir'd out of an Arbor near the Road. Troop told all, Syndercomb was apprehended; the Parliament appointing a Day of Thanksgiving for the Discovery of the Plot, resolv'd to wait on the Protector to congratulate the Mercy and Deliverance. On the 9th of February, the Assassin Syndercomb was try'd before the Lord Chief Justice Glynne, who declar'd, that by the Common Law, to compass or imagine the Death of the chief Magistrate, by what Name soever he was call'd, whether Lord Protector, or otherwise, is High Treason, and that the Stat. 25. Edward III. was only declaratory of the Common Law; which is said to be a very unjust Interpretation of that Statute, tho' it is so agreeable to common Sense, that the Intention of the Law was the Preservation of the chief Magistrate, whatever Name he went by. The Reader is doubtless satisfy'd, that I cite nothing out of the Lord Clarendon's History, to prove it false only, for that wou'd be citing the whole Book, but to shew where it is improbable, incredible, and sometimes impertinent, as in this Passage. Syndercomb being condemn'd to be hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, Oliver caus'd him to be poison'd, as not daring to bring him to Justice. It is below Reflection. The Assassin's Sister was with him the Night before he was to be executed; and it is thought, brought him Poison, for he was found dead in his Bed the next Morning, drawn naked at a Horse's Tail, to the Gallows where he shou'd have been hang'd, and his Body bury'd under it, with a Stake driven thro' it. Among other Characters in the History of the Rebellion, is this of Mr. Syndercomb. He was a very stout Man, his Behaviour was so resolute at his Examination and Trial, as if he thought he should still be able to murder the Usurper. His Carriage and Words were such, as if he knew well how to avoid the Judgment. It is glorious for those Heroes who have a Place in this Historian's Panegyricks that the Memory of Mr. Syndercomb has also a Share of that Glory.

The Speaker, Sir Thomas Widdrington, being indispos'd, Bulstrode Whitlocke, Esq; was appointed Speaker during his Indisposition, and led to the Chair by Colonel Sydenham, and Major General Howard. About a Week after, Feb. 6, there was a great Meeting of learned Men at his House at Chelsea, pursuant to this Order of Parliament.

Ordered, "That it be referr'd to a Committee to send for and advise with Dr. Walton, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Castle, Mr. Clerk, Mr. Poulk, Dr. Cudworth, and such others as they shall think fit, and to consider of the Translations and Impressions of the Bible, and to offer their Opinions therein." About a Week after, Dr. Walton publish'd the Polyglot Bible; which, with several other Encouragements given to Learning at this Time, proves the Falseness and Ingratitude of those who represent it as immers'd in Illiterature and Ignorance, tho' in Reality, the most Learned and Polite were Friends to the Common-wealth; as Selden, Wilkins, Milton, Bathurst, Wallis, Clarkson, Waller, Pool, and the Scholarship of their Adversaries was as contemptible to Men of Genius and Taste, as their Courage was to Men of true Gallantry, as is easy enough to be prov'd, were this a Place for Particulars.

Polyglot Bible.

On the 23d of February, the Parliament took into Consideration the Settlement of the Nation, and in the Course of this Debate, Colonel Jephson, one of the Members who serv'd for Ireland, mov'd that Cromwel might be made King, but Matters were not thoroughly concert'd, and Cromwel having Notice of the Motion, as he had of every thing that pass'd, reprov'd the Colonel gently at Table, saying, I wonder what you cou'd mean by such a Proposition! To which Jephson reply'd, While I am permitted the Honour of sitting in that House, I must desire the Liberty to discharge my Conscience, tho' my Opinion shou'd happen to displease. Oliver clapp'd him on the Shoulder and said, Get thee gone for a mad Fellow, as thou art. A Farce on both Sides: For soon after, Cromwel gave his Son, then a Scholar at Oxford, a Company of Foot, himself a Troop of Horse, and sent him Agent to the Court of Sweden. In the Conclusion of the Debates about the Settlement of the Nation, the House agreed upon a new Instrument, entitl'd, The humble Petition and Advice of the Parliament of England, Scotland and Ireland, to his Highness. The main Business of it was, for the Protector to have the Title of King. This Petition being presented by the Parliament to the Lord Protector, he desir'd a Committee might be appointed to confer with him about it, which was nam'd accordingly; and Whitlock was made Chairman. This Committee attending his Highness, Whitlock spoke to him upon the Point of the Title of King, giving Reasons why he shou'd accept of it. The Protector urg'd his Reasons against it, and Whitlock reply'd. Bishop Burnet tells us, "All the Lawyers, Glyn, Maynard, Fountain, St John, were vehemently for it: They said, no new Government cou'd be settled legally, but by a King, who shou'd pass Bills for such a Form as shou'd be agreed on; till then, all they did was like building upon Sand. Men were still in Danger of a Revolution, and in that Case, all that had been done would be void of it self, as contrary to a Law yet in being, and not repeal'd, &c. And in short, this Point was made out beyond

"the

A.D. 1657 "the Possibility of answering it, except upon En"thusiastical Principles." The Reasoning in the History of the Rebellion on this Question, is the most sober and rational Part of the Book. "The "wisest Person of the King's Party trembled at "this Overture, and believ'd it was the only "Way utterly to destroy the King, and to pull "up all future Hopes of the Royal Family by "the Roots. They saw all Men even already "tir'd in their Hopes, and that which was left "of Spirit in them, was from the Horror they "had of the Confusions of the present Govern"ment. A Spirit that comes from Horror, is "perfectly Cavalier, and none cou'd have thought
 "of such an Expression but the noble Author.
 "That very many who had sustain'd the King's "Quarrel in the Beginning, were dead; that "the present King, by long Absence out of the "Kingdom, was known to very few; so that "there was too much Reason to fear that much "of that Affection that appear'd. Very fine
 "Language! So that that much of that that went "under the Notion of Allegiance to the King,
 "was more directed to the Monarchy, than to "the Person, and that if Cromwel were once "made King, and let the Government run again "in the old Channel, tho' those who were in "love with a Republick, wou'd possibly fall from "him, he wou'd receive abundant of Repara"tion of Strength, by the Access of those who "prefer'd the Monarchy, &c." I wou'd repeat more of it, but nothing can be more fatiguing than the Wordiness of every Paragraph of that History. The Royalists did indeed fall in with the Republicans on this Occasion with no other View than to distress Oliver: For tho' they pretended to publick Spirit, and to assert Liberty, they meant only to perplex and destroy the Government. Minds capable of preferring the Principles of Slavery to those of Freedom, are incapable of generous Sentiments, and whenever they profess them, 'tis with some wicked Design. Who have talk'd more of the Good of the Country, of Old England, of Liberty and Property, than the Disaffected since the Revolution? whose Meaning have always been to create Difficulties and Perplexities, and by any Means and Pretences to overturn this free Government, and restore Tyranny. They learnt it of their Predecessors the Cavaliers, who, as Bishop Burnet informs us, "were all zealous
 "Common-wealths Men, according to the Di"rections sent them from those about the King.
 "Their Business was to oppose Cromwel on all "his Demands, and so to weaken him at home, "and expose him abroad. When some of the "other Party took notice of this great Change "from being the Abettors of Prerogative, to be"come the Patrons of Liberty, they pretended "their Education in the Court, and their Obli"gations to it, had engag'd them that way; but "now since that was out of Doors, they had the "common Principles of humane Nature, and the "Love of Liberty in them. By this Means, as the "old Republicans assisted and protected them, so
 "at the same time they strengthen'd the Faction
 "against Cromwel." What follows, is a Lesson to all English Men, living at this Time, to be on their Guard against the false Professions of those who having been Instruments of all the destructive Changes that have happen'd in the Administration in the three last Reigns; do now awkwardly affect a Loyalty to that Government which they heartily hate, and will betray and subvert whenever Occasion offers, which God forbid. "These "very Men, at the Restoration, shook off the Dis"guise, and reverted to their old Principles for "a high Prerogative, and absolute Power. They "said they were for a Liberty when it was a "Means to distress one who they thought had no "Right to govern: But when the Government

 "return'd to its old Channel, they were still
 "as firm to all Prerogative Notions, and as great "Enemies to Liberty as ever." It is hop'd the Reader will seriously reflect on this, when he sees any such Persons thrusting themselves into Offices, and not be disappointed if he is abus'd by them; but neither the Republicans nor Roy-alists, nor both in Conjunction wou'd have hin-der'd the Lord Protector's accepting the Title of King, which the Parliament offer'd him, if the Officers of the Army, and particularly Lieut. General Fleetwood, his Son in Law, and Major General Desborough, his Brother in Law, had not declar'd warmly against it. The Officers presented a Petition to the Parliament to that Purpose, which alarm'd him extremely; and Fleetwood and Desborough waiting his coming into St. James's Park, to his usual Walk, the Day before he was to accept or refuse the Kingship, gave him their Reasons against it in a long Conference.
 Cromwel said, It's a tempting of God to expose so many worthy Men to Death and Poverty, when there is a certain Way to secure them. The others insisted on the Oaths they had taken. Oliver re-ply'd, These Oaths were against the Power and Tyranny of Kings. In Conclusion, they believing from his Discourse, that he intended to accept of it, told him, "They saw great Confu"sions would follow on it, and as they cou'd not "serve him to set up the Idol they had pull'd
 "down, and had sworn to keep down; so they
 "wou'd not engage in any thing against him,
 "but wou'd retire and look on." They then offer'd him their Commissions, since they were resolv'd not to serve a King. Stay, says Crom- wel, 'till you hear my Answer. It is believ'd this Resolution of theirs, and the Disposition of the Soldiery, determin'd him to refuse the Crown. For most certainly he wanted not the Perswasions or Argument of Sir Richard Onslow, Sir Charles Wolfely, the Lord Broghil, or Colonel Jones, mention'd by Echard to accept it, since he was fully convinc'd, that the Government of a single Person cou'd not be firmly establish'd without the Title of King, and his Judgment, as well as his Ambition, led him to take it; however, in Complacency to the Army and the Republicans, he put a Force on his Inclinations, and as solemnly refus'd the Title of King, as it had been solemnly offer'd him.

But the new Instrument of Government, call'd,
The Petition and Advice, which was brought into the House by Sir Christopher Pack, a very busy Alderman of London, pass'd, after much debating.
 It was forwarded by the Lord Broghil, Whitlock, Glyn, and others, and consisted of several Articles, to which was afterwards added other Articles, and the whole confirm'd, and swore to by his Highness, the Lord Protector, the 26th Day of June. That Dignity and Title was settled upon him, and his Successor, to be nam'd by himself, with all the Powers and Prerogatives of a Sovereign, more extensive than ever the Laws of England made them, and perhaps those Powers and Prerogatives were necessary for the Establishment of a Government so odious to both Friends and Enemies, as was that of the Protectorate. I mean not as to the Execution of it, but as to the Form of it.

By this Petition and Advice the Lord Protector was empower'd not only to call and dissolve Parliaments, but also to issue out Writs to summon Persons to sit as Members of the other House of Parliament. They were not to be stil'd the House of Lords, tho' the Writs were the same with those that were sent to summon Peers. The Parliament

A.D. 1657 Parliament order'd Sir Oliver Fleming, Master of the Ceremonies, to give Notice to all Foreign Ambassadors and Ministers of the intended Inauguration of his Highness the Lord Protector, Crom-wel's Inaugura-

tion.

For which a Place was prepar'd at the upper End of Westminster-Hall, in the midst of which was a rich Cloth of State set up, and under it a Chair of State, upon an Assent of two Degrees, cover'd with Carpets. Before it a Table, and a Chair by it for the Speaker. On each Side of the Hall were Seats built one above another, and cover'd, for the Members of Parliament. Below them Seats on the one Side for the Judges, and on the other Side for the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London. About two a Clock in the Afternoon the Protector met the Parliament, and gave his Consent to a Bill for adjourning it from this 26th of June to the 20th of February next, and to some other Bills. Then the Speaker and Members went to their Places in Westminster-Hall, and the Judges and Aldermen took their Places. A little Time after this his Highness came, attended with his own Gentlemen, and with the Heralds and Sergeants at Arms, the Officers, Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, Lords of the Treasury, Lords of the Council, the Earl of Warwick carrying the Sword before him, and the Lord-Mayor of London, Sir Robert Tichborne, carrying the City Sword.

His Highness standing under the Cloth of State, the Speaker of the Parliament presented to him a Robe of Purple Velvet, lined with Ermines, which the Speaker, assisted by Bulstrode Whitlock, Esq; and others, put upon his Highness. Then he deliver'd to him the Bible, richly gilt and boss'd. After that the Speaker girt the Sword about the Lord Protector, and deliver'd into his Hand the Sceptre of massy Gold. He then made a Speech to him upon those several Things presented to him, wishing him all Prosperity in his Government, and gave him the Oath. Dr. Manton, by Prayer, recommended his Highness, the Parliament, the Council, the Forces by Sea and Land, the whole Government and People of the three Nations, to the Blessing and Protection of God. After this the People gave several great Shouts, and the Trumpets sounding, the Lord Protector sat in the Chair of State, holding the Sceptre in his Hand. On the right side sat Monsieur the first President Bourdeaux, Ambassador of France; on his left, Mynheer Van Beuning, Ambassador of the United Provinces. Near to his Highness stood his Son, the Lord Richard Cromwel, the Lord Deputy Fleetwood, John Cleypole, Esq; Master of the Horse, the Lords of the Council, and the Officers of State. The Earl of Warwick held the Sword on the right Side of the Chair, the Lord-Mayor of London held the Sword on the left Side. Near the Earl of Warwick stood the Lord Viscount Liste, General Montagu, and Mr. Whitlock, each of them having a drawn Sword in his Hand. Then the Trumpets sounded, and a Herald proclaim'd his Highness's Title. After which the Multitude with loud Acclamations cry'd, God save the Lord Protector. The Ceremonies ended, his Highness having his Train born by the Lord Sherrard, the Honourable Mr. Rich, Grandson to the Earl of Warwick, and the Honourable Mr. Roberts, Son to the Lord Roberts, accompany'd by the Lords Ambassadors, and attended as before, went in State to Westminster-Hall Gate, where he took his rich Coach.

In the upper End of it himself sat in his Robes: In the other End sat the Earl of Warwick. In one Boot sat his Son the Lord Richard, and Mr. Whitlock with a drawn Sword in his Hand; and in the other Boot sat the Lord Viscount Liste and General Montagu with Swords drawn in their Hands. Mr. Cleypole led the Horse of State in rich Caparisons. The Life-Guard and other Guards attended the Coach. The Officers and the rest follow'd in Coaches to Whitehall, where he heard a Sermon preach'd by Mr. Lockier.

There was a fine Medal struck on this Occasion, perform'd by that excellent Graver Simmonds, whose Dies for Coining are the best that ever were; and yet after the Restoration he was turn'd out of the Mint, because he work'd for Cromwel, to make room for a Blunderer. This Medal had on one side the Bust of Oliver excellently well done, and round it Oliver D. G. R. P. Ang. Sco. Hibernie Protector. Oliver, by the Grace of God, Protector of England, Scotland and Ireland. On the Reverse was an Olive-Tree flourishing in a Field with this round it, Non deficiet Oliva, Sept. 3. 1658. The Olive-Trees shall not fail.

The Acts above-mention'd to be pass'd by the Lord Protector, with that for adjourning the Parliament, were, An Act for preventing Multiplicity of Building in London, An Act for the quiet enjoying of sequester'd Parsonages by the present Incumbents, An Act for discovering, convicting and repressing of Popish Recusants, An Act appointing Surveyors of Forrests.

As Cromwel is now in the Zenith of his Empire, so is King Charles II. in the Extremity of Distress. France having thrown him off, he apply'd to Spain; and Edward informs us, he enter'd into a Treaty with Don John of Austria, Governor of the Netherlands, by which he was to have 9000 Pounds a Year for his and the Duke of Gloucester's Maintenance; in Consideration of which he was to put all his Forces into the Spanish Service, being 4 Regiments of Irish Papists then in Flanders, who were not only to assist the Spaniards to drive the French out of the Netherlands, but also to be in a Readiness, if any favourable Juncture shou'd invite them over to England. By Virtue of this important Treaty, the King was allow'd to live at Bruges, where he made Sir Edward Hyde Lord High Chancellor of England, which cou'd not be so beneficial as a Tipsstaff's Place after the Restoration. For the Poverty of this Court was such, that when a Gentleman, who follow'd the King's Fortune, made his Addressees to a young Lady in Holland, who was worth about 100,000 Guilders, not only the King, but the Duke of York, the Princess Royal, the Lord Jermin, and Sir Edward Hyde, importun'd her by Letters to make him her Husband. The King says in his Letter,

A.D. 1657 Le Marquis d'Ormond lequel envoie expres pour ce sujet vous en dira plus particulièrement mes sentimens, auquel je vous prie d'ajouter Foy en toute cequil vous dira de ma part & de croire que je suis,

Mademoiselle,
Vostre tres affectionne Ami,
Charles R.

His low Condition. "The Marquis of Ormond, whom I send Express about this Affair, will discourse you more particularly, and acquaint you with my Sentiments. I desire you to put Confidence in what he tells you from me, and to believe that I am, &c.

The Princess of Orange clos'd her Letter thus, J'espere que ces services vous seront agreable come le joubait passionnement,

Mademoiselle,
Vostre bien bonne bon Amie, MARIE.

I had Thoughts of inserting more such Passages out of the other Letters, the Originals of which I have by me; but they being all to the same Purpose, it is needless. The Gentleman obtain'd the Lady; and soon after he was married, the King got most of the Marriage Portion from him, which was never made good to him till after he return'd to England, unless it was by making him a Baronet, tho' the Gentleman never took the Advantage of the Patent.

Lambert's Commission taken away. The Protector's relerving to himself, by the humble Petition and Advice, to name a Successor, disgusted several of his most intimate Friends, especially Major General Lambert, who refus'd to take the Oath, enjoyn'd by that Instrument, not to do any thing against the present Government. Cromwel sending for him, said, I am well assur'd your Refusal proceeds not on account of this Authority, for you may remember you your self did at first press me to accept the Title of King; and therefore, if you are now dissatisfied with the present Posture of Affairs, I desire you to surrender your Commission. To this the Major General reply'd, Having no Suspicion that it wou'd be demand'd of me, I have not brought it; but if you please to send for it, I will deliver it. Which was done two or three Days after; but he had a Pension of 2000 Pounds a Year settled upon him to keep him quiet. Sir Henry Vane brought himself into Trouble by a Pamphlet call'd the Healing Question, wherein he upbraided the Protector with acting contrary to their first Engagement. Vane trusted this Writing with Fleetwood, and he shew'd it Cromwel, which Sir Henry had not caution'd him against. The Protector was nettled at some Expressions in it concerning himself, and requir'd him, by a Day limited, to give Security not to act against him; which Time being expir'd, Vane appear'd again before the Council, and deliver'd into Oliver's own Hand another Paper, containing the Reasons of his disapproving the present Government; which provoking the Protector's Patience still more, he was sent Prisoner to Carisbrook-Castle in the Isle of Wight. Cromwel commanded President Bradshaw to take out a new Patent for the Chief Justiceship of Chester, which he refus'd, and yet went the Circuit, the Protector not thinking fit to stop the Courte of Justice by postponing the Assizes.

Cromwel's other House. In December the Lord Protector issu'd his Writs of Summons to the Lords and Gentlemen, who were to compose his other House of Parliament; they were in all about sixty. The Lord Richard Cromwel, the Lord Henry Cromwel, Nathaniel Fiennes, Esq; John Lisle, Esq; Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal; Henry Lawrence, Esq; Lord President of the Council; the Lord Charles Fleetwood, Robert Earl of Warwick, Edmund Earl of Mulgrave, Edward Earl of Manchester, William Lord Viscount Say and Sele, Lord John Cleypole, Master of the Horse, Charles Viscount Howard, Philip Lord Viscount Lisle, Philip Lord Wharton, Thomas Lord Falconbridge, Lord Edward Montagu, George Lord Eure, the Lord Whitlock, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Lord Strickland, Col. William Strickland, Sir Charles Wolfeley, Sir William Strickland, John Fiennes, Esq; Sir Francis Russel, Sir Thomas Honeywood, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Edmund Thomas, Esq; Sir John Hobart, Sir Richard Onslow, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir William Roberts, William Pierpoint, Esq; John Crew, Esq; Alexander Popham, Esq; Lord Chief Justice Saint John, Lord Chief Justice Glynn, Francis Rous, Esq; Sir George Fleetwood, Sir Richard Ingoldsby, David Earl of Cassils in Scotland, Roger Lord Broghill, Sir Archibald Johnston, Laird of Wariston, Col. Edmund Whalley, Col. George Monk, John Jones, Esq; Sir Christopher Pack, Sir Robert Tickburn, Sir John Barkstead, Sir Thomas Pride, Sir John Hewson, Thomas Berry, Esq; William Goffe, Esq; Thomas Cooper, Esq; Sir William Lockhart, William Steel, Esq; Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Col. Tomlinson.

The Names of three Quarters of this Assembly prove that they were of the best Birth and Rank in England, and those who were Officers of the Army ought not to have been insulted for their Meanness before they took to Arms, since they had by Victory acquir'd their Greatness. Wou'd it not be base to enquire of what Origin were Craven, Cranfield, Hicks, in the former Reigns, who had Coronets given them, and Seats in the House of Peers, yet not one of them ever drew a Sword, or perhaps ever saw a Sword drawn in the publick Service, and were all of as Mechanick Descent as Barkstead the Silversmith, Berry the Woodmonger, Pack the Woollendrapery, or Whalley the broken Clothier, mention'd with singular Modesty by Mr. Archdeacon? Now it happens that Col. Whalley was of as good a Family as Col. Goring, being the Son of Richard Whalley, Esq; of Kirton in Nottinghamshire, by Mrs. Frances Cromwel, Niece to Sir Oliver Cromwel of Hintchinbroke in Huntingdonshire, and one of the above Citizens is thought to have been rich enough to have bought the whole Court of Bruges, Sir Edward Hyde included, and the Princes, the Duke of Ormonde and two or three Lords only excepted. Such Reflections as these are scandalously trivial; but you have them every where in the Archdeacon's History, and very much in Sir Edward Hyde's, whose Example only has made them inexcusable.

The Protector, at a Conference between his two Houses, speaking of the State of the publick Revenue and Expence, told them, The Charge of the Forces by Sea and Land amounted to 2,426,989 Pounds, that the whole Revenue of England, Scotland and Ireland was but 1,990,000 Pounds, that the Charge of the Government was 300,000 Pounds, so that the Deficiency of the Funds towards the Expence was 826,989 Pounds. The Army in England requir'd 1,100,000 Pounds for their Pay.

The Success of the English Arms at Sea this Year was such, that the Name of Blake, says Echar, cannot be forgotten. That General with his Fleet rode out all the Winter Storms before Cadiz, and on the Coast of Portugal, when he receiv'd

General Blake's Victory at Sancta Cruz.

A.D. 1657 receiv'd certain Information, that another Spanish Plate-Fleet, much richer than the last he had taken and destroy'd, was making homewards; but having Intelligence of the English Fleet, that wou'd probably stop at the Canaries, Blake immediately weigh'd Anchor with twenty five Men of War, and on the 20th of April stood with his Fleet off the Offing in the Bay of Sancta Cruz, in the Island of Teneriffe, where he found the Galeons already arriv'd, to the Number of 16 Men of War, protect'd, besides their own Strength, by all the Methods of Art: For the Bay was secur'd by a strong Castle well fortify'd with Cannon, besides seven Ports more in several Parts of it, mounted each with 4, 5 and 6 good Pieces of Ordnance, all united by a Line of Communication from Fort to Fort, mann'd with Musketeers. Don Diego Diaques, the Spanish Admiral, order'd all his smaller Ships to moor close to the Shoar, cover'd by the Castles and Ports, and posted the six large Galeons farther off at Anchor, with their formidable Broadfides to the Sea, sending out Word by a Dutch Merchant there, Let Blake come if he dares. And come he did with a Vengeance; but finding it impracticable to carry off the Galeons, he resolv'd to burn them in the midst of all these Dangers: He commanded Capt. Stayner, in the Speaker Frigate, to stand into the very Bay with a Squadron, and by Eight the next Morning he fell courageously on the Spaniards, who fought near half an Hour. General Blake seconded Stayner; and posted some of the great Ships to batter the Ports and Castles, which, firing on them without ceasing, drove the Enemy out of their Castles, Ports and Lines. Blake fought the Galeons four Hours, and the Spaniards made a Resistance, which they had not been us'd to; but Blake ply'd them so fast with his Broadfides, that they cou'd stand no longer. They abandon'd their Galeons, of which the least was bigger than the biggest of General Blake's Ships. The Seamen quitted the smaller Ships that lay under the Ports, and Stayner burnt every one of them, while the General did the same with the larger Galeons. Thus was the whole Plate-Fleet destroy'd, which, with the Destruction of the Fleet a Year before by Blake, made the Loss to the Spaniards amount to at least 10 Millions Sterling. No sooner was the Fight over, but the Wind, which before blew strong into the Bay, suddenly veer'd about, and brought the English Fleet out to Sea without losing a Ship. Of the English only 48 Men were kill'd, and 120 wounded.

The whole Action was unparallel'd and stupendous, as the Archdeacon phrases it. All Sea-Fights, antient and modern, have nothing to compare to it for Danger and Success, for Greatness and Glory. He fought at once with Ships and Castles; he dar'd the Fury of all Elements, and left an Example to Posterity, which is too incredible to be imitated. The News of this Victory arriving in England before the Parliament was adjourn'd, the House order'd him a Present of a Diamond Ring, to the Value of 500 Pounds. All such Presents, which were Demonstrations of the publick Acceptance of his Services, were grateful to him: But he had no Conception of Rewards in Dignities and Pensions, and an extreme Contempt for all Honours that were not solid and the Effect of heroick Deeds, as useful to the State as glorious to the Man. The General himself having been on Board three Years, contracted an ill Habit of Body by living in that Manner so long, and dy'd in his Return home on the 17th of August, as his Ship enter'd into Plymouth Sound, in the 59th Year of his Age. The next Day his Body was embalm'd

and inclos'd in a Sheet of Lead, and the Bowels were interr'd in the great Church at Plymouth. A.D. 1657

This famous General was the Son of Mr. Humphry Blake of Bridgewater, Merchant, of the antient Family of the Blakes of Planchfield, in the County of Somerset. In his younger Years he was a Student of Wadham College in the University of Oxford, where he took the Degree of Master of Arts, and stood for a Fellowship in Merton College with several eminent Scholars, as Edward Reynolds, John Earl, both afterwards Bishops, and others. He lost the Fellowship on account of his Stature, being not high enough. Sir Henry Saville, the Warden, measuring his Scholars, as the Officers do now their Soldiers, by Feet and Inches. When the War broke out, he list'd in that Cause which seem'd to be most for the Security of the Protestant Religion and Liberty. He was made Governor of Taunton by the Parliament; which Town, and afterwards Lyme, he defended with great Valour against several famous and forcible Sieges, of which mention has been made.

His Character in A Wood is thus:

"He was a fortunate Vindicator of his Country's Privileges from the Encroachments of insulting Neighbours, a victorious Enemy of the Spamards, highly valu'd of all, even of the Royalists. He devoted himself wholly to the publick Service, was resolute in his Undertakings, and most faithful in the Performance of them. With him Valour seldom mis'd its Reward, nor Cowardice Punishment. When News was brought him of a Revolution in the State at home, he wou'd then encourage the Seamen to be most vigilant abroad, saying, It is not our Duty to mind Politicks, but to keep Foreigners from fooling us.

The Lord Clarendon, another Enemy to his Cause, writes of him thus: "He was the first Man who declin'd the old Track, and made it manifest, that the Science of Sea Service might be attain'd in less Time than was imagin'd, and despis'd those Rules that had been long in Practice to keep his Ship and his Men out of Danger; which had been held in former Times a Point of great Ability and Circumspection, as if the principal Art, requisite in the Captain of a Ship, had been to be sure to come home safe again. He was the first Man who brought the Ships to contemn Castles on Shore, which had been thought ever very formidable, and were discover'd by him to make a Noise only, and to fright those who cou'd rarely be hurt by them. He was the first Man that infus'd that Proportion of Courage into the Seamen, by making them see by Experience what mighty Things they cou'd do if they were resolv'd, and taught them to fight in Fire as well as upon Water.

Tho' no Funeral Pomp cou'd be in any manner equal to the Services and Merit of this illustrious Captain, yet the Government bestow'd on his Corpse those Honours which were then paid to deceas'd Heroes. 'Twas brought by Sea from Plymouth to Greenwich, where it remain'd for some Time. From thence it was convey'd by Water on the 4th of September following, with all due Solemnity, in a Barge of State cover'd with Velvet, adorn'd with Escutcheons and Pencils, accompany'd with his Brother, Captain Humphry Blake, several of his Kindred and Servants in Mourning, together with the Lord Protector's Privy-Council, the Lords of the Admiralty, the Commissioners of the Navy, the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, the Field-Officers of the Army, and several other Persons of Honour and Quality, in a great Number of Barges

A.D. 1657 Barges and Boats cover'd all with Mourning and marshall'd by the Heralds at Arms, who directed and attended the Procession. In this Order they pass'd to Westminster-Bridge, and at their Landing proceeded in the same manner thro' a Guard of several Regiments of Foot-Soldiers to Westminster-Abbey, where the Corpse was interr'd in a Vault made on Purpose in Henry the Seventh's Chappel.

But after the Restoration, to the eternal Infamy of all that had a Hand in it, the sacred Remains of this General, whose Memory and Fame will be immortal, were pull'd out of the Place where they were deposited, and flung into a Pit. Judge of the Men and their Cause by this one Action, and reconcile it in any Degree to common Sense, common Morals, and common Shame. Cannibals and Mamahus wou'd have ador'd the Relicks of a General that had gain'd one Battle for them. Here is the Corpse of a Captain, whose Life had been a Series of Victories in the publick Service, dragg'd from the Place of its Burial to be cover'd with the Dirt of a Ditch! Can any Paint or Daubing give a Colour to this hideous Image? And now let the Reader run over the Characters the Lord Clarendon gives of himself and those unparallel'd Worthies, who thus barbarously insulted the Remains of the ever renown'd General Blake, whose Family was not treated much better by them, himself being a Batchelor. His Brother Humphry above-mention'd, with whom I liv'd when I was a Boy, suffer'd so many Hardships for Non-conformity in the latter End of the Reign of King Charles II. that he was forc'd to sell the little Estate left him by the General, scarce 200 Pounds a Year, and transport himself and his Children to Carolina, of which his great Grandson, I suppose, is at this Time one of the Lords Proprietors.

Corpse un- When General Blake was unbury'd, and his bury'd by the Royal-ists. Corpse serv'd so ignominiously and inhumanely, the like was done by those of Admiral Popham, Admiral Dean, Col. Humphry Mackworth, Col. Boscarwen, Sir William Constable, Sir John Meldrum, William Stroud, Esq; Thomas May, Esq; Mr. Marshall, Mr. Strong, two Ministers. And to complete the Triumph, the dead Bodies of several Ladies were also taken up and thrown into the same Pit on the 12th of September, 1661. I think the Men need no other Character, and this Digression cou'd no where else come in so properly as in this Place. It was propos'd after the Restoration, to take up all the dead Bodies of the Common-wealth's Men, &c. and fling them into Pits; and 'tis thought the Proposal wou'd have been effected, had not the Duke of Ormond strenuously oppos'd it, as a Scandal to Religion and Humanity.

Morgan and Reynolds in Flanders. In Pursuance of the Lord Protector's Treaty with France, he sent 6000 choice Men to the Netherlands under the Command of Sir John Reynolds, Commissary General, and Major General Morgan. The French at first had no Inclination to attack Dunkirk with those Forces, they being oblig'd to surrender it to the English, when taken; therefore they march'd into Artois, and laid Siege to St. Venant, which they carry'd with a Suddenness and Bravery beyond Expectation. But Cromwel's Ambassador, Sir William Lockhart, made such Lively Instances with the Cardinal, and complain'd so much of Breach of Faith, adding Menaces, that his Master knew where to find a more punctual Friend, That as soon as they had taken Montmedy and St. Venant, the Army march'd into Flanders, and the Season being too far spent to engage in the Siege of Dunkirk, they invested Mardyke, and carry'd on their Attack so vigorously, that October 13th it was deliver'd in about eight Days to Major General Morgan, with Consent of the French King; and that General fortify'd it so well as to fear no Enemy. But before the Fortifications were finish'd, the Spaniards sent a Body of Horse and Foot to recover it; the Loss of it very much facilitating that of Dunkirk. Of that Body 2000 were English and Irish. Here all History is lavish in the Praises of the Duke of York, who, says Echard, made two very desperate Storms upon it, the last continuing six Hours, but was both taken. Mardyke Times repuls'd, and forc'd to retire with Loss. The future Conduct of that Prince makes me believe there must be some Misrepresentation in this, as well as in the rest of his History; I'll therefore see what Ludlow says, Many of those who were kill'd on the Enemies side were English under the Duke of York: And as it was confess'd by all present, that the English, who took part with the French, behav'd themselves with more Bravery than any; so it was observ'd, that those of the Cavalier Party, who had join'd with the Spaniards, behav'd themselves worst. Brave Sir John Reynolds, who had fought his Way thro' so many Dangers in the War, being about to pass over to England at the End of the Campaign with Col. White and others, the Pink they were in was cast away upon the Goodwyn Sands, and all the Men were drown'd, the only melancholy Accident that happen'd to the English. The Army that took Mardyke was commanded by the Marechal Turenne, to whom Mazarine, press'd by the Lord Ambassador Lockhart's Instances, wrote thus before he besieg'd it, Nothing can be of more fatal Consequence to France than the Loss of Cromwel's Friendship and the Breach of the Union with him, which certainly will be broken, if some strong Town is not taken and put into his Hands. The Protector was wonderfully pleas'd to hear that Morgan was in Possession of it, and he immediately sent ten Men of War to guard the Port of Mardyke, and cruize on that Coast. A Foreigner and a Papist speak thus of this Conquest, En effect rien ne flatte d'avantage l'Ambition de Cromwel, &c. "In Effect nothing cou'd flatter the Ambition of Cromwel more than this Acquisition, knowing he had thereby won immortal Glory: He had, without the Loss of a Man, accomplish'd a Design, which the greatest Kings of England had often attempted in vain at the Expence of their People's Blood and Treasure: He had re-establish'd the English on the Continent, and put them in a Condition to make themselves Masters of both Sides of the Channel, which had been despair'd of since the Loss of Calais. He succeeded, I say, in this vast Design, without costing him hardly any thing." Read over the Reigns of the Royal House we are writing of again and again, and shew me such a Paragraph. The Dutch were alarm'd as well as the Spaniards at Cromwel's having possess'd himself of Mardyke, almost on their Frontiers; And the Protector, whose Wisdom foresaw all Consequences, dispatch'd a Minister to Holland to assure the States General, "That Neighbourhood shou'd serve only to make their mutual Friendship the more firm. He desir'd them to join with him and France in a League against Spain, their old Enemy, which shou'd be very much to their Advantage by enlarging their Barrier." The States, jealous equally of the French and Spaniards, excus'd themselves; upon which Oliver's Minister had Instructions to pray them Cromwel at least not to assist the Spaniards; for if they well did, It wou'd oblige him to take other Measures, which might not turn very much to their Profit. Such was the Language of the Lord Protector of

A.D. 1657 the Common-wealth; and the Hollanders answer'd mildly, They had no Intention to do any thing to the Prejudice of England, their only Design being to preserve Peace and Tranquillity in their Provinces.

We have no such Height as this to stand on and take a View of the Government of England, since the Reign of Henry V. But the View is like the Vision of the Night: The golden Rays vanish, and black and thick Darkneſs ſucceeds, till a new Morning dawns, and a Bright Day, as at the Revolution, bleſſes our Eyes and Hearts.

A.D. 1658
The Parliament.

The 20th of January, to which the Parliament was adjourn'd, approaching Writs, as has been hinted at, were iſſu'd to the Lords and Gentlemen, who were to form the other, or Upper Houſe. William Lenthall, Eſq; Maſter of the Rolls, was very much diſturb'd that he was not ſummon'd, ſaying, I, who have been for ſome Years the firſt Man of the Nation, am now deny'd to be a Member of either Houſe of Parliament; for I am incapable of ſitting in the Houſe of Commons by my Place, which obliges me to ſit as Aſſiſtant in the other Houſe. Cromwel hearing of his Complaint, order'd a Writ of Summons to him, at which he was ſo elevated, that, riding in his Coach thro' the Strand, and ſeeing Mr. Osbaldeſton, Maſter of Weſtminſter School, whom he knew to be a great Lover of Sir Arthur Haſelrigge; he ask'd him what Sir Arthur intended to do in Answer to the Writ he had receiv'd, Mr. Osbaldeſton replying, I know not. Write to him, ſays Mr. Lenthall, and deſire him by no Means to omit taking his Place, and aſſure him from me, that all that do ſo ſhall themſelves and their Heirs be for ever Peers of England; as was reaſonable to think, if they had not quarrel'd among themſelves; for the Cavaliers were not likely to be ever in a Condition to quarrel with them.

The two Houſes met according to Adjournment and Summons, The other Houſe in the Houſe of Lords, whither came the Protector, and, by the Uſher of the Black Rod, ſent for the Houſe of Commons to whom he made a ſhort Speech, beginning, as is uſual, from the Throne, My Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens and Burgeſſes of the Houſe of Commons. He recommended Union and a good Underſtanding between them, thank'd them for their fair Correſpondence the laſt Seſſion, minded them of the Neceſſities of the State, deſir'd their Aſſiſtance, and then, as Monarchs have been uſ'd to do, referr'd them to the Lord Commiſſioner Fiennes, who made a very long Harangue on the Foundation of the Government, and the ſeveral Branches of it. 'Tis in that Style which was then in Vogue, and being pretty much adorn'd with Texts of Scripture, is a very great Jeſt with the Archdeacon and the Author of the Compleat Hiſtory of England, whoſe Talents in Elocution qualify'd them wonderfully to judge of Language. I will venture one Paragraph of the Lord Commiſſioner's Speech, and that Paragraph ſhall be above half Scripture, againſt the beſt Piece of Oratory in their Hiſtories, or the Lord Clarendon's.

For thoſe of our Friends who content themſelves with their Privacy and Country Retirement in theſe great Difficulties of the Common-wealth, we may ſay, Why abideſt thou among the Sheep-folds to hear the Bleatings of the Flocks? Surely for the Diviſions of Reuben there are great Searchings of Heart! How ſhall we bind up the Wounds we receive in the Houſe of our Friend? What ſhall we do for our Siſter that hath no Breasts? That will afford no Milk? If ſhe be a Wall, we will build a Palace of Silver upon her; and if ſhe be a Door, we will enſeſe her with Boards of Cedar. If they will give us any Foundation to work upon, we will build upon it, we will improve it, we will multiply Obligations upon them, we will heap Coals of Fire on their Heads: If they will not let us follow them, let them follow us, we will either lead or follow in the Work of God.

But a Spirit of Madneſs and Diviſion had poſſeſs'd them: Ambition and Avarice had blinded ſome, ſuch as Haſelrigge, Scot, Harrington, Lambert, Fleetwood. A Spirit of Enthuſiaſm had blinded others; as Hariſon, Overton, Rich. The former run mading after a Republick, the latter after the Fifth Monarchy. The Protector's Party were againſt both, and both againſt them, and the Royaliſts againſt them all; all which was like to make fine Work in the End; there needed but a ſmall Portion of plain Senſe to direct to that End, and unite the three firſt Parties againſt the laſt, their common Enemy. Sir Arthur Haſelrigge refus'd to ſit in the other Houſe, but took the Oath, and got into the Houſe of Commons. Mr. Scot, and many other ſecluded Members, got in alſo, who, with the diſcontented that remain'd, were ſoon found to be a Majority. The Houſe of Lords ſending a Meſſage to the Houſe of Commons by Mr. Juſtice Windham and Mr. Baron Hill, the latter took no Notice of it, but on the contrary debated what Appellation ſhou'd be given to the other Houſe, or indeed whether they ſhou'd have any Appellation at all, or be look'd upon as a Houſe, tho' conſtituted by their own Act the laſt Seſſion. Whitlock obſerves, That one of the chief Reaſons ſome Members had to ſpeak againſt it was, Beccaſe they were not of it. The Protector looking upon himſelf as ſtruck at thro' their Sides, and being incens'd at the Diſcovery of a Fifth Monarchy Plot, carry'd on by Major General Hariſon and his Adherents, he reſolv'd to diſſolve the Parliament. Accordingly he came to the Houſe of Lords the 4th of February, and cauſ'd the Uſher of the Black Rod to go to the Houſe of Commons, and acquaint them that his Highneſs was in the Lords Houſe, and there expected them. Upon which the Speaker and the whole Houſe went to the Lords Houſe, where the Protector made a Speech to them, declaring, Several urgent and weighty Reaſons making it neceſſary for him, in order to the publick Peace and Safety, to proceed to an immediate Diſſolution of this Parliament, and accordingly he did there diſſolve them, having firſt rapp'd out a dreadful Oath, as we are told by Mr. Archdeacon.

The Fifth Monarchiſts carry'd on Matters ſo ſecretly, that they had prepar'd themſelves for a narchy general Rendezvous, when their Plot was diſcovered the Night before it was to have been executed; at which Time he ſent a Guard of Soldiers, who ſeiz'd the Principal of them as they were conſulting about it. Their Declarations were alſo taken with them, and their Standard, which had in it a Lion couchant, with theſe Words, Who ſhall rouse him? Theſe Men were for the moſt part Tradeſmen, as Venner, Jawler, &c. and were carry'd Priſoners to the Gatehouſe, where they lay long in a miſerable Condition, but were not proſecuted capitally, as they might have been. What made moſt Noiſe, ſays Mr. Archdeacon, with the Protector and the Nation, was a new and formidable Plot of the Cavaliers. For my part, if we know as much of them by Hiſtory, as we cou'd have known had we been then living, I don't ſee any thing formidable in them ſince King Charles I. was in Cornwall, and much leſs in theſe Conſpirators than in the others, as will appear by their Names, Dr. Hewett, Parſon of St. Gregory's, London, Mr. Stacy, Mr. Beſtly, Mr. Aſhton, Mr. Haley, Mr. Woodcock, Mr. Carent, Mr. Mallory, Mr. Rivers, Mr. Dyke, Mr. Staley.

Cavalier

A.D. 1658 One can scarce read the Names of them without trembling, after what the Archdeacon has said of their being formidable. I do not add Sir Henry Slingsby, because he was a Prisoner in Yorkshire, and therefore can't be in a Plot of his own. The Author of the Compleat History, to justify what he affirms of Cromwel's Cruelty, affirms that he nominated the Members of the High Court of Justice, who try'd and condemn'd as many of these Prisoners as were convicted, which is not true; for as Ludlow assures us, this High Court of Justice was nominated by his last Parliament. Mr. Mordaunt, Brother to the Earl of Peterburgh, was also charg'd with Plotting against the Government. Dr. Hewet dispers'd Commissions from King Charles the Second. Sir Henry Slingsby had endeavour'd to debauch some of the Garrison of Hull, where he was a Prisoner, and deliver'd a Commission to them from the King. The other Conspirators were charg'd with a Design to fire the City in several Places at the Time appointed for their Party to take Arms.

Dr. Hewet. The first Conspirator brought before the Court, was Dr. Hewet, who mov'd for a Jury, and demurr'd to their Jurisdiction, but was over-rul'd; and at any time to plead against the Jurisdiction of a Court, who has the Authority and Power to back it, seems to me to be extremely absurd and useless. He was told twice, that if he wou'd not plead, they wou'd proceed against him as if the Fact was confest. The Question being put to him a third Time, he said, he wou'd plead if the Judges declar'd it was according to Law. The Court told him, the Commissioners there present were his Judges, and if he wou'd not plead, they wou'd register his Contempt the third Time, which upon his Refusal a third Time was done.

The Historians, the Compleat One, and Mr. Archdeacon hold up their Hands at this extraordinary Way of Proceeding, and condemning a Criminal, because he will not plead, as if there was any other Way of doing Justice; or that Justice cou'd ever be done, if Prisoners might plead or not plead at Pleasure. Whitlock says, Hewet carry'd himself very impudently.

Sir Henry Slingsby. Sir Henry Slingsby's Plea was, that what he said was in jest, that the Commission he shew'd was an old one, which had lain long by him; and that the Persons he wou'd have corrupted, trapann'd him, by promising to serve the King. 'Tis easy to see that this must end in Conviction and Condemnation.

Mr. Mordaunt refus'd to plead at first, but being threaten'd to be condemn'd as a Mute, he pleaded Not Guilty; and by spiriting away Mal-lory, one of the Witnesses against him, the Court was so divided in Opinion, that he was acquitted by one Vote. The rest of the Conspirators were try'd and condemn'd; Woodcock excepted, who behav'd so handsomely at his Trial, that the Court discharged him. Just as Judgment was given, Sir Thomas Pride came into Court, whose Voice being for Conviction, as that of the Lord President Lisle wou'd have been, he had been condemn'd if Pride had come sooner. Tho' Echard affirms, that there is not the like Instance of acquitting a Prisoner by a High Court of Justice, as that of Mr. Mordaunt, what does he take the Earl of Norwich, and Sir John Owen to be? Alston was hang'd at Mark-lane End; Stacy in Cornhill; Bestly in Cheapside, and all the rest were repriev'd. Great Endeavours were us'd to save Sir Henry Slingsby, tho' a Papist, by the Lord Falconbridge, his Nephew, who had lately marry'd Lady Mary Cromwel; and Lady Elizabeth Cleypole earnestly solicited the Protector to pardon Dr. Hewet, but the Ingratitude of the Cavaliers, to whom he had of late been very gracious, had so exasperated him, that he was resolv'd to let Justice take its Course: So they were both beheaded on Tower-Hill. I am very far from thinking that Lady Cleypole's Death was hasten'd because her Father wou'd not save Dr. Hewet, or that Cromwel broke his Heart, because his Daughter broke hers. It is neither true in Fact nor in Reason. That Lady had been ill sometime of a Distemper, as mortal as Heart-breaking, an Ulcer in her Womb, of which she dy'd, the 7th of August, at Hampton-Court, a Month after the Execution of Slingsby and Hewet, to the great Affliction of the Protector, who lov'd her entirely, she being a Lady of uncommon Merit; and this Affliction, with his own ill State of Health, which had hung upon him several Months, so broke him, that 'twas visible his Life wou'd not be of long Duration.

Sir Humphry Bennet, another of the Conspirators in the late Conspiracy, was to have been try'd as the rest had been, and his Fate wou'd doubtless have been the same, but upon Application made by his Friends to the Commissioners of the High Court of Justice for Favour to him, his Life was sav'd. Whitlock informs us, This Kindness of his Friends was not remember'd, which is not at all strange, for Generosity and Slavery never dwell in the same Breast, and to be grateful 'tis requisite that a Man shou'd be generous, which an Enemy to Liberty cannot be. After these Trials were over, the High Court of Justice was dissolv'd, and the Protector, by Advice of Mr. Whitlock, referr'd all future Trials of Conspirators to the Upper Bench, after the Course of the Common Law; and having lately made Major General Howard, a Viscount, he was afterwards Earl of Carlisle; he sign'd a Patent to make Whitlock a Viscount, and three other Patents to make the Attorney General Prideaux, and the Solicitor General, Barons, and John Maynard, Esq; his Highness's Serjeant; which are plain Proofs that he resolv'd to exercise all the Prerogatives of a Sovereign, and be a King in every thing but the Name, which probably he wou'd still have taken upon him, had he liv'd a few Months longer.

He sent for the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, inform'd them of the Plots carrying on against the Government, and desir'd them to take Care of the Peace of the City, and they presented an Address to him, assuring him of their Faithfulness and Duty.

He receiv'd also an Address from Monk's, and other Regiments in England and Scotland of the like Tenour, for which he thank'd them; and in his Answer to some of them, he imparted to them The present Designs of the Enemy, that Commissions were sent over hither from the King of the Scots, and that he had 4000 Men in Flanders, ready to be imbark'd for England, to joyn with his Party here; and therefore it behov'd all honest Men, to provide for a Defence, and to joyn heartily together.

I have not taken any Notice of Echard's Story, A Fiction concerning an execrable Plot form'd by Oliver concerning Cromwel, Esq; John Thurloe, Esq; and Sir Rich-Morland and Willis, to murder the King of the Scots, the Duke of York, and Duke of Gloucester, because there is not a Syllable in it that's credible. They were to be tempted by pretended Letters from Cavaliers, to come over to Sussex in a single Ship, where 500 Foot, and 2000 Horse were to receive them, tho' the Design was, according to Mr. Archdeacon and his Manuscript, to cut their Throats at their first Landing, and extirpate the Royal Family. Thurloe's under Secretary, Samuel Moreland, heard Oliver and Thurloe in Conference about it, pretending to be asleep. A.D. 1658

Sir Humphry Bennet.

A.D. 1658 he runs away to Major Henshaw, a Prisoner in the Tower for a Conspiracy, tells him all, and desires him to tell the King. Away runs Henshaw out of the Tower, finds the King in Flanders, informs him of Oliver and Thurloe's Assassination Plot, and the King sent a Letter of Excuse, in Answer to the pretended Letter of the Cavaliers. Willis is suspected to make a Discovery, and he suspects Moreland. They two have an Interview in a dark deep Cellar, where, by professing only that he was Innocent, and demanding of Willis a Reason of his Suspicion; that Knight, who when he was Governor of Newcastle for the King, is represented as one of the bravest of his Majesty's brave Officers, was damp'd by it, and Moreland escap'd that imminent Danger, tho' it seems not to be so imminent neither, for Willis had only a Bible by him, but Moreland had two good Pistols in his Pocket. Echard brags that this Account never appear'd in Print before, and came from the Mouths of three Persons, two of them Knights, and the third a Person of undoubted Worth and Honour, of which this Story is an incomparable Proof; and I doubt not, most of his Manuscript History and Informations came from Persons of the like Honour and Worth. He Prints also a Letter of Moreland's, which denies that Moreland had given the King any Information relating to Willis; and the Lord Clarendon, has no less than three or four Folio Pages of Informations given by Moreland against Willis. This Contradiction, no strange Thing amongst them, confess'd by the ingenious Mr. Echard himself, and the Narrative being the Child of Invention, cou'd not possibly have Agreement with any other Narrative that was not the Work of the same Brain. It is not pretended, that the King had any such Cabinet Spies, or any Money to give them, as the Lord Clarendon observes, but Oliver had both, and thought no Expence or Hazard too great to procure them. An Instance of which, and of his Caution in the Use of them, "Thurloe was wont to tell that "he was once commanded by Cromwel to go at "a certain Hour to Gray's-Inn, and at such a "Place deliver a Bill of 20,000 Pounds to a Man "he shou'd find, walking in such a Habit and "Posture as he describ'd him;" which accordingly Thurloe did, and never knew to the Day of his Death, either the Person or the Occasion. At another Time the Protector coming late at Night into Thurloe's Office, which he kept in the last Stair-Case in Lincoln's-Inn, towards Holborn, that has a Way down into the Garden, made on Purpose for Cromwel's coming to him, unobserv'd, the Protector began to discourse with his Secretary, about an Affair of the last Importance, but seeing Moreland, one of the Clerks, afterwards Sir Samuel Moreland, was in the Office, whom he had not seen before, and fearing he might have over-heard them, tho' he pretended to be asleep upon his Desk, he drew out a Dagger which he always carried under his Coat, and was going to dispatch Moreland on the Spot, if Thurloe had not with great Intreaties prevail'd with him to desist, assuring him Moreland had sat up two Nights together, and was certainly fast asleep. Probably this Incident gave Rise to the Fictions of Moreland and Henshaw, and Moreland and Willis, but no question Moreland did betray his Master, when he found Things were like to take another Turn, and indeed I never heard much of his Integrity or Merit.

The Siege of Dunkirk being resolv'd on at the opening of the Campaign, chiefly at the Instigation of General Morgan, who insisted upon it in the Council of War, held in the Mareschal Turenne's Camp, the English, to the Number

A.D. 1658 of 6000, under Morgan, and Sir William Lockhart, who succeeded Reynolds in that Command, did Wonders, by Acknowledgment even of the French. The Cavaliers under the Duke of Tork, were still part of the Spanish Army, which march'd to the Relief of the Place, almost as soon as Turenne had invest'd it, and possess'd themselves of a Sand Hill, from whence they gall'd the English, who resolv'd, if possible, to drive them from that Post. The Ground was so deep and loose they cou'd not without extream Difficulty march up the Hill; yet at last they affected it, and having put the Spaniards to flight, pursu'd them to their main Body. But having engag'd themselves too far, and being overpower'd by great Numbers of Horse and Foot, the French leaving the whole Stress of the Fight upon them they were in Danger of being entirely cut off; which being observ'd by Major General Drummond, a Scot's Officer, who serv'd with the English as a Voluntier, he rode up to the French Horse, and by reproaching them with Treachery and Negligence, procur'd a Body of Cavalry to be sent to their Succour. Upon the Arrival of this seasonable Relief, the English took fresh Courage, renew'd their Attack, and defeated the Enemy, of whom they kill'd 1200, many of them English; so that when the French Army came up, they had little more to do than to take Prisoners. Here were taken most of the English Officers, of that which was term'd the King's own Regiment, commanded by Colonel Blague, Governor of Wallingford, in the Civil Wars. The greatest Loss the Protector's Forces had, was in the Death of Colonel Fenwick, and Captain Sherwyn, who were both kill'd. Soon after the Battle the Town was surrender'd to the French, and deliver'd to the English, tho' contrary to their first Intentions, as we are told by Wellwood.

"There was an Article in the Treaty between the Protector and France, That if Dunkirk was taken, it shou'd be put into the Possession of the English, and his Ambassador, Lockhart, had Orders to receive it from them, when the French and English Armies were marching to besiege it. Cromwel one Morning sent for Monsieur Bourdeaux, the French Ambassador, and upbraided him publicly for his Master's design'd Breach of Promise, in giving secret Orders to the Mareschal Turenne, not to deliver the Town in case 'twas taken, contrary to the Treaty between them. The Ambassador protested he knew nothing of the Matter, as indeed he did not, and beg'd Leave to assure him there was no such Thing thought of." Upon which Cromwel, pulling a Paper out of his Pocket, Here, says he, is the Copy of the Cardinal's Order: And I desire you to dispatch immediately an Express, to let him know that I am not to be impos'd on, and that if he deliver not up the Keys of the Town of Dunkirk, to Lockhart, within an Hour after it shall be taken, tell him I'll come in Person, and demand them at the Gates of Paris. Has this been the Language of the Kings of England; since the Death of Queen Elizabeth? There were but four Persons said to be privy to this Order, the Queen Mother, the Cardinal, the Mareschal de Turenne, and a Secretary. The Cardinal for a long Time blam'd the Queen Mother, as if she might possibly have blabb'd it out to some of her Women, at another Design upon Dunkirk 30 Years afterwards was so blabb'd; whereas a Correspondence between Oliver, and the French Secretary, was discover'd upon the Death of the latter, and it was not doubted but he sent him the Copy of the Order above-mention'd. The Message had it's Effect, and Lockhart took Possession of Dunkirk.

A.D. 1658 kirk, in the Name of the Lord Protector of England; upon which Mardyke was restor'd to the French.

Lord Falconbridge's magnificent Embassy to the French King.

It was not to palliate this Matter, as Wellwood and Echard assures us, that the Duke de Crequi was sent Ambassador Extraordinary to Oliver, but to return a Compliment, his Highness paid the French King, on his Arrival at Calais, just before Dunkirk was surrender'd. Oliver dispatch'd his Son in Law, the Lord Viscount Falconbridge, with a numerous and splendid Retinue, of 150 Gentlemen and Servants, to congratulate the most Christian King upon his coming into the Neighbourhood of England. The King and Cardinal arriv'd at Calais the 20th of May, and were receiv'd by the English Fleet on the Coast in a continual Fire of the Artillery, for four Hours together, which was answer'd by the Cannon at Calais. The French King presented the English Admiral with his Picture, hanging in a Gold Chain, and Medals of Gold to the Captains; 20 Ton of the best Brandy, and 2000 Pistoles were distributed among the Seamen, in all to the Value of above 20,000 Crowns. The like Presents he made the English Officers and Soldiers in his Army, whom he receiv'd with a great deal of Pleasure. The Lord Falconbridge brought a Letter from the Protector to the King, written with his own Hand, and another to the Cardinal, pressing the Reduction of Dunkirk, as it was a Nest of Pyrates. More Honour cou'd not be paid to a sovereign Prince, than was done to the Lord Falconbridge. All Rules in the Ceremonials were past over. The Cardinal receiv'd him as he alighted out of his Coach, and conducted him back to the very Gate. He gave him the right Hand in his Apartment, which was never done to the Emperor's Ambassador, or the Pope's Nuncio, and at which all the Ministers of other Princes grumbled. The Lord Falconbridge staid at the French Court five Days, and was royally treated all the while, both by the King and the Cardinal: When he had taken his Audience of Leave, the King presented him with a Gold Box inlaid with Diamonds, the Arms of France on the Cover, and three large Jewels for the three Flower de Lucies. Within it was the King's Picture set in Diamonds: The whole worth 5000 Crowns. Several Medals of Gold were given to the Gentlemen of his Retinue, and a 1000 Louis d'Ors among his Servants. The Cardinal presented his Lordship with 12 Pieces of Genoua Velvet of incomparable Fineness and Beauty; and as the Lord Viscount had presented the King with two Sets of English Horles, from the Lord Protector, eight in a Set, and the best that cou'd be got, as also a Set to the Cardinal, the King return'd a Present of a Sword, valu'd at 10,000 Crowns: And the Cardinal sent Cromwel a Suit of Tapistry Hangings, wrought in the Gobelins at Paris, after the Persian Manner.

The Duke de Crequi's Embassy to Cromwel.

The King on his Part dispatch'd the Duke de Crequi, first Lord of his Bed-chamber, to England; to compliment Cromwel, which the King's of France never do, but to the greatest Monarchs in Christendom, as he thought the Lord Protector of the Common-wealth of England. When the same Duke was afterwards sent Ambassador to Rome, he made nothing near the Figure as he did at London in the Court of Cromwel. He had 150 Gentlemen and Servants in his Train, as had the Lord Viscount Falconbridge, and was accompany'd by 60 Gentlemen more, who were of Rank, and among whom was a Prince of the Blood, to do Honour to the Embassy. Lieutenant General Fleetwood receiv'd him at his Landing at Dover, accompany'd by several great Officers in twenty Coaches with six Horfes, one hundred Life-Guard, and two hundred Horfe, who all attended the Ambassador with Swords drawn in their Hands, besides above one hundred and fifty Gentlemen who came with Fleetwood on Horseback. The Protector met him at the third Stair, and had no more Regard to the Rules of the Ceremonial, than the Court of France shew'd with Respect to the Lord Falconbridge. The next Day he entertain'd him at Dinner, seating the Duke at his right Hand, and his Son, the Lord Richard, at his left. He stay'd six Days at London, and during that Time, was feasted and treated with the utmost Magnificence. Some say he presented the Protector with the Keys of Dunkirk, telling him, His Master took Pleasure in parting with them to the greatest Captain upon Earth. At his Departure, he was accompany'd to Dover; as he came from thence, Cromwel presented him with a Sword, worth 3000 Crowns, with a striking Watch set with Diamonds of the same Value, and above forty Pieces of fine English Broad-cloth. He gave thirty fine Gold Watches to the Officers and Gentlemen of his Retinue, and 1000 Broad-pieces to be distributed among his Servants.

The Cardinal, not content with this Compliment from the King, sent his Nephew Mancini, with a most obliging Letter to the Protector, to assure his Highness, That being within View of the English Shore, nothing but the King's Indisposition, who lay then ill of the Small Pox at Calais, cou'd have hinder'd him to come over to England, that he might enjoy the Honour of Waiting upon one of the greatest Men that ever was, and whom next to his Master, his greatest Ambition was to serve. But being depriv'd of so great a Happiness, he had sent the Person that was nearest to him in Blood, to assure him of the profound Veneration he had for his Person, and how much he was resolv'd, to the utmost of his Power, to cultivate a perpetual Amity and Friendship betwixt his Master and him.

This was the mighty Man, whom the greatest Politician in Europe terms, not only the greatest Man that was then, but that ever was. Yet this too was he, of whom the Earl of Clarendon says, No Man with more Wickedness ever attempted any thing; no Man brought any thing to pass more wickealy. He was guilty of many Crimes against which Damnation is denounc'd, and for which Hell Fire is prepar'd. If such Breachment as this can come from any Head but the Head of a College, it must be void of that Humanity which is the Grace of good, as well as Christian Minds.

Some time before Oliver was taken ill of his last Sickness, dy'd the Earl of Warwick, and his Grandson, Mr. Rich, who had marry'd Lady Frances, the Protector's youngest Daughter, a young Lady of great Beauty and Virtue. The Death of the Protector's fast Friend, the Earl of Warwick, touch'd him very sensibly, and the ill Humours in his Blood did not a little stir up those in his Mind, which, afflicted and disturb'd as it was, ceast not to form vast Designs even to the very last of Life. It is said, he intended to transport 40000 Men to Flanders, and to have a Fleet of fifty Men of War; but upon what Scheme is not told us, whether to support a Protestant League, or to take the Netherlands from the Spaniards.

Bishop Burnet informs us, He design'd to set up a Council for the Reform'd Religion, in Opposition to the Congregation de propaganda fide at Rome: He intended it shou'd consist of seven Counsellors, and four Secretaries for different Provinces. These were; The first France, Switzerland, and the Vallies. The second were the Papalinate, and the other Calvinists. The third were Germany, the North, and Turkey. The fourth were the East and West-Indies. The Secretaries were to have 500 Pounds a Year each, and to

A.D. 1658 keep a Correspondence every where, to know the State of Religion all over the World, that so all good Designs might by their Means be protected and assisted. They were to have a Fund of 10,000 Pounds a Year, but to be further supply'd as Occasions shou'd require. Chelsea College was to be fitted up for them. This was a noble Project, as the Bishop observes, and must have extraordinary Effects under the Protection of a Power which was formidable and terrible to all Nations to whom it was known.

Cromwel's last Sickness.

The Lord Protector was taken ill of a kind of Ague, on St. James's Day, which some such Historians as the Archdeacon, have interpreted to be a Judgment on him, for being one of the Judges of King Charles, Son of King James, which being a Fortnight before the Death of Lady Cleypole, her Death cou'd not bring it on upon him. After this a malignant Humour broke out in his Foot, which hindring him from the Exercise of Walking or Riding abroad; he oblig'd his Physicians to endeavour to disperse it, which they endeavouring to do, drove it upwards to his Heart. By this Means he became desperately sick, and in the Beginning of September the Symptoms of Death appear'd upon him, and he asking one of his Physicians, What he thought of his Case? The Doctor reply'd, My Lord, there is no more Oil in that Lamp which has given so much Light to both Church and State. The dying Protector, reply'd with a Courage worthy of him, When do you think it will go out? The Physician reply'd, In two Days at farthest. It is Time then, said Cromwel, to settle my Mind, and provide for the Safety of the State. Accordingly he sent for his Council, and recommended to them the Choice of a Successor, tho' by the humble Petition and Advice, he might nominate one himself, which it was expected he wou'd have done; but he had not so good an Opinion of the Genius of his eldest Son Richard, and he did not care to prefer any other Person of his Family to him. In this Uncertainty he departed this Life the 3d of September, about two o'Clock in the Afternoon, the same Day on which he was born, and on which he won the Victories at Marston-moor, Dunbar, and Worcester. Some affirm he did name his Son Richard to be his Successor, and Warwick; that he was never enough in his Senses, during his Sickness, to be able to do it; which is notoriously false, as I cou'd prove very easily. As false is what we are told in the History of the Rebellion, that Cromwel had but two Daughters, whereas he had four by his Consort Elizabeth, Daughter of Sir James Bourchier. 1. Bridget, Wife of Lieutenant General Ireton. 2. Elizabeth, Wife of John Cleypole, Esq; of Northamptonshire. 3. Mary, Viscountess Falconbridge. 4. Frances, the Wife of the Honourable Robert Rich, Esq; He had four Sisters, 1. Marry'd to Major General Desborough. 2. To Colonel Jones. 3. To Colonel Walton. 4. To Dr. Wilkins, Bishop of Chester. She was Mother to Mrs. Tillotson, Wife of Dr. Tillotson, Archbishop of Canterbury. One of his Aunts marry'd Francis Barrington, Esq; another marry'd John Hampden, Esq; by which Match the famous Hampden was his Nephew, and Mr. Waller, the Goodwyns and Ingoldsbies of Bucks, his Relations: A third marry'd Richard Whalley, Esq; of Nottinghamshire, Father to Colonel Whalley; which shews that no Gentleman had a more powerful Family Interest. Cromwel is blam'd by judicious Writers, for not taking more Care of his Family, but leaving them expos'd to Want, considering their Rank, at the Pleasure of their prevailing Enemies of all Parties; for besides the Estate which his Son Richard had with his Wife, one of the Coheirs of Richard Mayor, Esq; of Hursely in Hampshire, he left not enough for them to keep a Coach after the Charge of his Funeral was defray'd. However his Care of them while living, in matching them well, both Sons and Daughters, was very laudable, of which there's a pleasant Instance.

One of his domestick Chaplains, Mr. Jeremy White, a sprightly Man and a top Wit of his Court, was so ambitious as to make his Addresses to Lady Frances, the Protector's youngest Daughter. The young Lady did not discourage him; and this Piece of innocent Gallantry in so religious a Court, cou'd not be carry'd on without Spies. Oliver was told of it, and he was much concern'd at it, obliging the Person who told him to be on the Watch; and if he cou'd give him any substantial Proof, he shou'd be well rewarded, and White severely punish'd. The Spy follow'd the Matter so close, that he hunted Jerry White, as he was generally term'd, to the Lady's Chamber, and ran immediately to the Protector with this News. Oliver in a Rage hasten'd thither himself, and going in hastily, found Jerry on his Knees kissing the Lady's Hand, or having just kiss'd it. Cromwel in a Fury ask'd what was the Meaning of that Posture before his Daughter Frank? White, with a great deal of Presence of Mind, said, May it please your Highness, I have a long Time courted that young Gentlewoman there, my Lady's Woman, and cannot prevail; I was therefore humbly praying her Ladyship to intercede for me. The Protector turning to the young Woman, cry'd, What's the meaning of this, Hussey? Why do you refuse the Honour Mr. White wou'd do you? He is my Friend, and I expect you shou'd treat him as such. My Lady's Woman, who desir'd nothing more, with a very low Courtesy reply'd, If Mr. White intends me that Honour, I shall not be against him. Sayst thou so, my Lady, cry'd Cromwel, Call Goodwyn, This Business shall be done presently, before I go out of the Room. Mr. White was gone too far to go back. The Parson came. Jerry and my Lady's Woman were marry'd in Presence of the Protector, who gave her 500 Pounds for her Portion; and that, with the Money she had sav'd before, made Mr. White easy in his Circumstances, except in one Thing, which was, that he never lov'd his Wife, nor she him, tho' they liv'd together near fifty Years afterwards. I knew them both, and heard this Story told when Mrs. White was present; who did not contradict it, but own'd there was something in it. This Lady Frances and her eldest Sister, Lady Mary Falconbridge (indeed all Cromwel's Daughters) were belov'd, admir'd and esteem'd for their Beauty, Virtue and good Sense. Lady Mary especially is said, with all these fine Imbelishments, to have inherited a Portion of her Father's Spirit, and to have deserv'd Empire better than either of her Brothers, of whom she was wont to say, Those who wear Breeches deserve Petticoats better: If those in Petticoats had been in Breeches, they wou'd have held faster. This was the Lady whom a valiant Cavalier insulted in the Park, after the Restoration, on her Father's being taken out of his Grave and hung up at Tyburn; to whom she reply'd, Had he been living, he wou'd have made you all smell worse. The Character of Cromwel has been so often drawn by Friends and Foes, that I shall not attempt to add to what has been already said of him in this History.

Mr. Baxter's Saying of his Religion is most certain, He kept as much Honesty and Godliness as his Cause and Interest wou'd allow him. And a Foreigner has this Paradox on him, which the Reader will perceive, when it is duly explain'd, takes in his whole Character, Un Tyran sans Vice, Un Prince sans Vertue. A Tyrant without Vice, A Prince without Virtue.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

During the PROTECTORATE of RICHARD CROMWEL.

A.D. 1658

UDLOW seems to doubt whether Oliver did really nominate his Son Richard to be his Successor: But Whitlock, who was at that Time much more in the Secret of Affairs, speaks of it thus: "Immediately upon the Protector's Death,

"the Council assembled, and being satisfy'd that his late Highness had in his Life-time, according to the Petition and Advice, declar'd his Son Richard to be his Successor, they caus'd the same to be proclaim'd in a solemn Manner in the Cities of London and Westminster; and they went the same Day to Richard to acquaint him with it, and sent a Committee of the Council into the City to inform the Lord Mayor of it." Accordingly Richard was proclaim'd Lord Protector in the following Words,

Whereas it hath pleas'd the most wise God, in his Providence, to take out of this World the most Serene and Renown'd Oliver, late Lord Protector of this Common-wealth: And his Highness, having in his Life-time, according to the humble Petition and Advice, declar'd and appointed the most Noble and Illustrious the Lord Richard, eldest Son of his said late Highness, to succeed him in the Government of these Nations; we therefore of the Privy-Council, together with the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Citizens of London, the Officers of the Army, and Numbers of other principal Gentlemen, do now hereby, with one full Voice and Consent of Tongue and Heart, publish and declare the said Noble and Illustrious Lord Richard to be Rightfully Protector of this Common-wealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging: To whom we acknowledge all Fidelity and constant Obedience, according to Law, and the said humble Petition and Advice, with all hearty and humble Affections, beseeching the Lord, by whom Princes rule, to bless him with long Life, and these Nations with Peace and Happiness under his Government. Sign'd by Richard Chisarton, Lord Mayor, Henry Lawrence, Esq; Lord President, Nathaniel Fiennes, Esq; John Lisle, Esq; Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Philip Lord Viscount Lisle, Major General Desborough, Col. Montagu, afterwards Earl of Sandwich, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir Charles Wolseley, Major General Skippon, Col. William Sydenham, Walter Strickland, Esq; Philip Jones, Esq; John Thurloe, Esq; Lord Viscount Falconbridge, Commissary General Whalley, Col. William Goff, Col. Thomas Cooper, Col. Edward Salmon, Sir Oliver Fleming, Col. John Clerk, Sir Thomas Pride, Edmund Prideaux, Esq; Col. Josias Bridge, Col. John Biscoe, Waldine Lagee, Esq; John Mills, Esq; Quarter-master General Grosvenor, &c. - - - - God save his Highness Richard, Lord Protector.

The Council then gave the new Protector the Oath, and with his Consent publish'd another Proclamation, for all that were Officers in his Father's Time to continue in their Places.

On the 8th of September Sir Oliver Fleming, Master of the Ceremonies, acquainted all foreign Ambassadors with the Death of the late Protector, and the Succession of his Son Richard, who was as solemnly proclaim'd all over England as ever any King had been; and more Addresses were sent him from all Parts of the three Kingdoms, than had been sent to all the Kings from the first Richard to this: All declaring their Satisfaction in his Succession, and their Resolution to stand by him with their Lives and Fortunes.

This

A.D. 1658 This Man's Accession to the Sovereign Power without one of his Father's great Qualities, and hardly any Quality of a Gentleman but Indolence, very justly elevated the Hopes of the Royalists and Republicans; but the latter, by dividing their Interest from that of the Protectorate, and taking in the Royalists to encrease their Party, had indeed so weaken'd themselves, that they cou'd never effectually recover the Government which they had so long labour'd for.

His Letters to foreign Princes.

Two Days after the late Protector's Death, his Son Richard wrote a Letter to the French King, Au serenissime & tres puissant Louis Roy de France. Serenissime & tres puissant Roy Ami & Allie, &c. wherein he says, I am now to desire your Majesty to look on me as one who is resolv'd to maintain, with an entire and constant Fidelity, the Friendship that was between you and my Father of ever glorious Memory. Sign'd RICHARD, Lord Protector of the Common-wealth of England. He wrote at the same Time to Cardinal Mazarine; and soon after he wrote two Letters to Charles Gustavus, King of Sweden; the first notifying his Father's Death; the other was a Credential Letter for Sir George Ayscue, whom he sent Ambassador to that Prince. In these Letters he says, Pray God grant your Majesty Success in all your Affairs, for his Glory and the Support of the Orthodox Church. In his Letter to the States General of the United Provinces, he recommends the Case of a Widow, Mrs. Mary Grinder, who having lent that Gentleman of King Charles the Second's Retinue, for whom he was solicitous to get a Wife, a good Sum of Money, he refus'd to pay it, pleading that he who had made himself a Subject of the States, was free from any Suit or Action for a Debt contracted in England. The Protector says, Je ne dois pas qu'il soit necessaire devons en dire d'avantage sur ce sujet, &c. I don't think it necessary to add any thing farther on this Subject, you know the Commandments of the Lord, and how much we are expressly forbidden to oppress the Widow and the Fatherless. He wrote a second Letter to the French King in Behalf of the Protestants of Provence, especially in and about the City of Arles, where their Churches were shut up on Complaint of the Clergy of the Diocese assembled in Convocation. But alas! his Recommendations and Interpositions had not the Weight in them which his Father's had. All the Princes and Powers of Europe knew the Court and Army were divided and subdivided, and that this Government was upon a sandy Foundation: However, all the Princes and Powers paid him the usual Compliments on the Death of one Prince, and the Succession of another to his Power; and if Lambert, Fleetwood, the Army, and his own Family had stood by him, all Opposition wou'd have serv'd only to have given a Pretence to take Vengeance on his Enemies. But instead of this Attachment they all fell off from him one after another, and left him a poor, destitute, forsaken Creature in an empty Court at Whitehall.

Forsaken
by his Family.

Monk
flatters
Richard.

A very loyal Address was sent by Monk from Scotland to Richard, and one from Buckinghamshire, wherein most of the principal Gentlemen were engag'd, was presented to him by Whitlocke, accompany'd with a great Number of them. Whitlocke made a short Speech to the new Protector, who thank'd them for their Affections, and, as 'tis said, in his Memorials return'd a very prudent Answer. We read a little after, "Richard gave Audience to the French Ambassador, and carry'd himself discreetly, and better than was expected." For the vulgar Notion conceiv'd of Richard, from such Histories as Clarendon and Richard's Character. Echarde's, that he was a Fool, is idle and groundless:

A.D. 1658 He wanted not Understanding but Resolution. He was capable of Business, but hated it, tho' 'tis likely that Hatred wou'd have worn off with Practice; and as he was well natur'd and virtuous, tho' no Zealot nor Sectary, had his Father's Friends been as willing that he shou'd have kept the Power, as he was to keep it, I do not see how Mr. Mordaunt, Major General Massy, the Lord Willoughby of Parham, the Shropshire Gentry, Sir Thomas Middleton, Arundel and Pollard, to whom the Lord Clarendon is giving Arms as fast as he can, cou'd have taken it from him.

The Truth is, the Cavaliers were in the lowest State of Dejection and Impotence, and might as well have expected the Resurrection as a Restoration, had their Opponents been as true to the publick Interest as they were to their private, tho' they were mistaken in the Pursuit of it.

The Party, who had a Common-wealth in their Republican Heads, did not consider that most of the Cromwells had been Commonwealths Men; that Cromwell half of their Strength was gone from them, and they were ready to join with any single Person, rather than subject themselves to a Parliament, whom they had turn'd out of Doors.

Neither did the Cromwells consider, that by dividing from the Republicans, their old sure Friends, they had made a Breach for the Cavaliers, their old sure inveterate, revengeful and cruel Enemies, to enter in at.

The Fifth-Monarchy Party consider'd nothing but the Millenniums, that they were all to be Favourites under a Theocracy, which being the Height of Madness, was incapable of any other Remedy than the Restoration: When the State Surgeon, fell into an infallible Way of Practice, and to cure an aking Head, cut it off. The Commonwealths Men, blinded with their Zeal for the long Parliament, and imagining a disgrac'd forgotten Power, might, like an old Tree, get new Root, and sprout and branch as in the Vigor of Youth, began their Machinations immediately on the Death of Oliver.

Sir Henry Vane, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Mr. Wallop, Mr. Weaver, Colonel Eyres, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Col. Kendrick, Mr. Scot, Colonel Dixon, Major Salterway, Serjeant Bradshaw, Colonel Sidney, Mr. Nevill, Colonel Morley, were the main Sticklers for the Common-wealth; and these had their Meetings at Sir Henry Vane's House, near Chaining Cross, where they consulted how they shou'd behave upon the Election of a Parliament, which was talk'd of, and Writs soon after issu'd for electing Members, and for the other House to meet; but before the Writs were issu'd, 'twas debated in Council, whether the Elections shou'd be according to the Distribution practis'd by Cromwell, or the old Way, by Counties, Cities and Boroughs, and the latter was resolv'd upon, not as being according to the ancient Law and Form, but because it was well understood, that mean and decay'd Boroughs might be much more easily corrupted than the numerous Counties and considerable Cities. Yet, contrary to this Argument, to the Fact and Truth, the Earl of Clarendon assures us, Richard follow'd the Model that was left him. And Coke errs as much, His Parliament were of his Father's Composition, to consist of 400 English, &c.

Parliament.

Notwithstanding the Opposition made by the Court, several Leaders of the Republican Party got to be elected. Sir Henry Vane had the Majority of Voices at Hull and Bristol. The Sheriffs of Bristol, Mr. Francis Glead, and Mr. Timosky Parker, refus'd to return Sir Henry, so did the Mayor of Hull; but by the Interest of Mr. Wallop, he was chosen at Whitchurch in Hampshire, and return'd, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Mr. Scot,

A.D. 1658 Mt. Weaver, Colonel Kendrick, Colonel Ludlow, and several other Republicans got into the House. Serjeant Bradshaw was return'd for the County of Chester, by the Sheriff; but some of the County returning another Person, he was kept out of the House.

Before the Parliament met, Richard, as the Lord Clarendon tells us, very truly, inherited all the Greatness, and all the Glory of his Father, as Protector. Foreign Princes address'd their Condolences to him, and desir'd to renew their Alliances, and nothing was heard in England but the Voice of Joy, and large Encomiums of their new Protector; so that the King's Condition never appear'd so hopeless and so desperate, for a more favourable Conjecture his Friends cou'd never expect than this, which now seem'd to blast all their Hopes, and confirm their utmost Despair.

If this was the sad Situation of their Affairs, can we have a better Lesson to teach us to avoid Division as we wou'd Destruction? For nothing else cou'd have given the least Glimmering of Hope amidst that utmost Despair.

Richard's Council having resolv'd to celebrate the Funeral of his Father in the most magnificent Manner, sent for Mr. Kinnersey, Master of the Wardrobe, and desir'd him to find out some Precedent by which they might govern themselves in this Affair. Kinnersey recommended to them the Solemnities us'd on the like Occasion, for Philip the second King of Spain. That vile Insult of Eckard, on the Corpse of the late Protector, They were oblig'd to bury it suddenly by Reason of the uncommon Stench, puts me in Mind of a Story, which I had forty Years ago, from a Gentlewoman who attended Cromwell in his last Sickness. She was a religious Woman, and her Authority is at least as good as John Thorowgood, the Boy from whom, at the third and fourth Hand, Eckard took the Fable of the Bargain between the Devil and Oliver. She told me, that the Day after Cromwell's Death, it was consulted how to dispose of his Corpse. They cou'd not pretend to keep it for the Pomp of a publick Burial. Among other Proposals this was one, that considering the Malice, Rage, and Cruelty of the Cavaliers it was most certain, they who never spar'd either Living or Dead, in the Lust of their Revenge, wou'd insult the Body of this their most dreadful Enemy, if ever it was in their Power; and to prevent its falling into such barbarous Hands, it was resolv'd to wrap it up in Lead, to put it aboard a Barge, and sink it in the deepest Part of the Thames, which was done the Night following: Two of his near Relations, with some trusty Soldiers, undertaking to do it. There is as much Reason to believe this Story, as any thing told us from Hear-say, by either of the two Historians, whom we have so much Cause to object against.

Cromwell's Funeral.

A Coffin without the Corpse, which was certainly interr'd somewhere before the 26th of September, was on that Day carry'd in a mourning Hearse, from Whitehall to Somerset-House, where in a short time his Effigy was, with mighty State and Magnificence, expos'd to the View of infinite Multitudes, who daily throng'd to that Place. Four large Apartments were hung with Black, illuminated with Wax Tapers, and adorn'd with rich Escutcheons, &c. of which the fourth was compleatly cover'd with Velvet, where the lively Image lay under a noble Canopy, upon a Bed of State, apparell'd in the Protectorial Robes, lac'd with Gold, and furr'd with Ermines, having in one Hand a Scepter, in the other a Globe, and a rich Cap on the Head, suitable to the Robes: Behind was plac'd a Chair and Cushion of Tissu'd Gold, in which lay an Imperial Crown beset with

A.D. 1658 Diamonds and precious Stones. The Bed of State was inclos'd with Rails and Balusters, and besides solemn Mourners, surrounded with Banners, Banner-rolls, and all Kinds of Trophies of Military Honours. The Effigy having for some Weeks been seen in this Posture, was on the first of November remov'd to the great Hall, and expos'd standing on a Bed of Crimson Velvet, cover'd with a Gown of the like colour'd Velvet, a Scepter in his Hand, and a Crown on his Head. That Part of the Hall, wherein the Bed stood, was rail'd in, and the Rails and Ground within them, cover'd with Crimson Velvet; four or five Hundred Candles set in flat shining Candlesticks were so plac'd round, near the Roof of the Hall, that the Light they gave seem'd like the Rays of the Sun. Having continu'd thus to the 23d of November, the Waxen Effigies, with the Crown on his Head, Globe and Scepter in his Hands, was plac'd in a stately open Chariot, cover'd with black Velvet, and drawn with six Horses, cover'd in the like Manner, and adorn'd with Plumes and other Ornaments. The Streets from Somerset-House to Westminster-Abbey, were guarded by Soldiers in new Mourning Habits, with their Ensigns wrap'd in Cypress, thro' which the Chariot was attended by all the Officers and Servants of the Household, the chief Officers both of the Army and Navy, the Masters in Chancery, the Counsellors and Judges, the Commissioners of the Great Seal, the Members of the Privy Council, the Members of the late Upper House, and the Lord Mayor, John Ireton, Esq; and Aldermen of London, besides several Foreign Ministers and Ambassadors, as those of France, Portugal and Holland, all in deep Mourning. These all mov'd in a solemn and pompous Procession, each Division or Company being distinguish'd by Drums, Trumpets, Banners, and led Horses, particularly the Horse of State cover'd with black Velvet; and lastly, the Horse of Honour, trapp'd with Embroidery upon crimson Velvet, adorn'd with white, red and yellow Plumes, led by the Master of the Horse, with other Ceremonies us'd at the Obsequies of the greatest Monarchs of the World. At the West End of the Abbey Church, the Effigies being taken out of the Chariot, was carry'd thro' the Church, under a Canopy of State, up to the East End, where it was plac'd on a sumptuous Mausoleum fram'd for that Purpose, with Pilasters and other Decorations of Architecture, carv'd, painted and gilt, to remain for a certain Time exhibited to publick View. Innumerable were the Spectators who came from the farthest Part of Scotland, Cornwall and Wales, to behold this astonishing Spectacle; the like of which had not been seen in England, perhaps not in the World; and may not the same be said of the Deceas'd, to whom these Funeral Honours were paid? The Expence amounted to 60,000 Pounds, and if it was not all defray'd by the Publick, the Publick who caus'd it shou'd bare the Blame. The insolent Reflection at the End of Eckard's Tale, that the Monumental Pile was broken down two Years after, and the Body carry'd to a Place more proper for his Interment (he means the Gallows) very well becomes his Person and his Party, who, as they were not capable of great and generous Sentiments, must take Pleasure in every thing base and barbarous, to hang a Man after he was dead; whose Look or Name was Death to them while he was living, is equal to such as made a Prey of the Minds and Bodies of their fellow Subjects.

I abhor Cromwell's traiterous Designs as much as the most inveterate of them; but I abhor also Insolence and Inhumanity, tho' I am very well satisfy'd they never had Oliver's Corpse at their Mercy.

A.D. 1658

The Author of the Compleat History, and the Archdeacon, do take some Pains with the Ecclesiastical as well as Civil History of the Times they write of, and I cou'd, with very little Pains, fix upon them Misrepresentation and Prevarication, if the Subject was within my Province.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.

They have confounded all Church History by a Parcel of Technical Terms or Cant, as Schism, Seet, Fanatick, Enthusiast, Church, Orthodox, and the like on one Side and t'other; Names to which no Ideas are affix'd that have the least Conformity to the one or the other. Can any Man in his Wits imagine, that by Schismatick or Seet was meant a Christian of the Reformed Religion, worshipping God in the Purity of Primitive Christianity? or that by Orthodox, these Historians, or any one else, understood Lords and Lordships, Honours and Revenues, Prerogatives and Powers? yet so it is throughout all their Histories.

In the Time of the Republick, the Presbyterians, Independants and Baptists, were alike tolerated, but not favour'd alike; the two latter being universally for a Common-wealth, as the former were for Monarchy. The Episcopalians were then conniv'd at. In Oliver's Time Presbyterians, Independants, Baptists and Episcopalians were alike tolerated by Turns, alike favour'd, except the Presbyterians, whom Cromwel had an Aversion to, for opposing the Death of the King. Dr. Gunning, afterwards the Rigid Bishop of Ely, kept a Conventicle in London before the Restoration, in as open a Manner as Dr. Burges did after it; so did several other Episcopal Divines without Disturbance: Nay, some Papists were in Cromwel's good Graces, inso much that Father White wrote a Book in Vindication of his Government. Oliver never persecuted the Churchmen for their Religion, tho' they were perpetually in Conspiracies to destroy him. King Charles II. suffer'd the Presbyterians to be persecuted without Mercy, tho' they were perpetually in Conspiracies to restore him to his Kingdoms, and in the End accomplish'd it. Such was the Generosity of the one, and such the Ingratitude of the other! But I have frequently observ'd, that Gratitude and Generosity are not of the Growth of such Minds as produce Slavery and Persecution.

Parliament.

On the 27th of January the Parliament met, and Richard went to the other House with as much Solemnity as ever King had done; and having sent for the House of Commons by the Usher of the Black Rod, he made a Speech to them, in which he represented "The Happiness of his Father's Government, and how he had left these Nations in great Honour abroad, and in full Peace at home, all England, Scotland and Ireland dwelling safely, every Man under his Vine and under his Fig-tree: He said, he believ'd a Parliament was never summon'd upon so important Occasion as this was, and so recommended to them the Care of the Fleets and Armies, the Prosecution of the War with Spain, the Assistance of the King of Sweden, the Reformation of Manners, the Protestant Religion, &c." There was nothing more remarkable in the Speech made after the Protector had done, by the Lord Commissioner Fiennes, than the Beginning of it, What can a Man say after the King? The Parliament made Choice of Challoner Chute, Esq; to be their Speaker. Whitlock informs us, He was an excellent Orator, a Man of great Parts and Generosity.

Ludlow sits in it.

Lieutenant General Ludlow, who was chosen a Member of this Parliament, sat in the House without taking the Oath not to act or contrive any thing against the Protector. One A.D. 1659 Mr. Bodurda, a Cornish Member, complain'd of it, and was seconded by Sir John Trevor, whose Name we shall meet with often after the Restoration; nor he who was expell'd the House of Commons when he was Speaker for Bribery, but he who was Secretary of State. Mr. Weaver and others oppos'd them, alledging, That for the most part Oaths prov'd only Snares to honest Men, it being generally observ'd, that those who were least conscientious in keeping an Oath, were the most forward to take it. Col. Eyres also inform'd the House, "That he had sat in the Long Parliament without taking the Oath" then prescrib'd: That Lieutenant General Ludlow mov'd the House in his Behalf, and "was the Person nominated by them to bring him into the House without taking the Oath; which afterwards was not insisted upon. Sir Walter Saint John, Grandfather to the late Lord Bolingbroke, was one of the Persons appointed to administer the Oath; and whatever is insinuated of the meanest of this Convention by our impartial History Writers, it consisted of Gentlemen of as good Ranks and Fortunes, though they did not, and wou'd not have brought in the King, as the succeeding Convention, that did.

The first Things debated by this Assembly, were the Militia and the Negative Voice, to which the Protector pretended by his Father's Magna Charta, the Petition and Advice. But Mr. Thurloe, Secretary of State, presented the House with a Declaration ready drawn, wherein was contain'd an Acknowledgment of Richard Cromwel to be Protector, and that Petition and Advice to be the Rule of Government; which Declaration was receiv'd and debated; in which Debate it was urg'd, that instead of Recognizing, the Word Agnizing might be us'd, that so his Right might appear to be founded on the Consent of the People. But the Court Party depending on the major Vote, carry'd every thing by the Question; a very short Way, and a great Saver of Time and Argument: However, by purging the House of several Malignants, who had crept into it, and by convincing several young Gentlemen, that were Members, of the Sincerity of their Intentions, the Common-wealth Party grew upon that of the Court; to which a warm Speech of Sir Henry Vane's contributed not a little: It was to this Purpose;

Mr. Speaker,

"Among all the People of the Universe, I Sir Henry know none who have shewn so much Zeal for Vane's
"the Liberty of their Country, as the English Speech.
"at this Time have done: They have, by the "Help of Divine Providence, overcome all Ob"stacles, and have made themselves Free. We "have driven away the Hereditary Tyranny of "the House of Stuart, at the Expence of much "Blood and Treasure, in Hopes of enjoying He"reditary Liberty, after having shaken off the "Yoke of King-ships; and there is not a Man
"amongst us, who cou'd have imagin'd that "any Person wou'd be so bold as to dare to at"tempt the ravishing from us Freedom, which "costs us so much Blood and so much La"bour.

"But so it happens, I know not by what Mis"fortune, we are fallen into the Error of those "who poison'd the Emperor Titus to make "room for Domitian, who made away Augustus
"that they might have Tiberius, and chang'd
"Claudius for Nero. I am sensible these Exam"ples are foreign from my Subject, since the Ro"mans in those Days were bury'd in Lewdness
"and Luxury; whereas the People of England
"are

A.D. 1659 "are now renown'd, all over the World, for their great Virtue and Discipline; and yet suffer an Idiot, without Courage, without Sense, nay without Ambition, to have Dominion in a Country of Liberty. One cou'd bear a little with Oliver Cromwel, tho' contrary to his Oath of Fidelity to the Parliament, contrary to his Duty to the Publick, contrary to the Respect he ow'd to that venerable Body from whom he receiv'd his Authority, he usurp'd the Government. His Merit was so extraordinary, that our Judgments, our Passions might be blinded by it. He made his Way to Empire by the most illustrious Actions; he had under his Command an Army that had made him a Conqueror, and a People that had made him their General.

"But as for Richard Cromwel his Son, Who is he? What are his Titles? We have seen that he had a Sword by his Side, but did he ever draw it? And what is of more Importance in this Case, Is he fit to get Obedience from a mighty Nation, who cou'd never make a Footman obey him? Yet we must recognise this Man as our King, under the Stile of Protector! A Man without Birth, without Courage, without Conduct. For my part, I declare, Sir, it shall never be said that I made such a Man my Master.

His Speech was heard with singular Applause. My Lord Falconbridge spoke in Answer to it, but 'twas visible that it had such an Effect on the House, as gave the Court no Hopes of a good Issue to this Session, tho' they carry'd the Question for the other House; with this Addition, That it shou'd be no Bar to such Peers who had faithfully served the Parliament, who by this Vote were admitted to sit if they pleas'd. But this very Vote was clogg'd with another, That in all Messages to, and Conferences with the other House, equal Ceremonies shou'd be us'd, and no other Respect observ'd by the Members of this House, than what is observ'd by the Members sitting in the other. There was something which look'd somewhat odd in this Convention, and that was in the Debate of the Members for Scotland and Ireland, those Gentlemen sitting, arguing, and voting for themselves, which was thought indecent, if not unjust; however, the Court cou'd have carry'd their Point without their Vote.

The Lord Clarendon insinuates, that the House was very busy in examining the Publick Accounts, as if there had been enormous Embezzlements. He gives every thing he takes in Hand a Turn different from what it really was, pro or con. The Truth of this Matter is, the House order'd the Commissioners of the Treasury to bring in the State of the Account of the Publick Treasury; accordingly Mr. Sherwyn, Secretary to the Treasury, and a Member of Parliament, deliver'd it, and Whitlock tells us, it was found to be very exact.

Other House. The House of Commons having pass'd a Declaration for a Publick Fast, sent it to the other House by Mr. Grove, for their Concurrence, which I take to be the only Matter transacted between the two Houses. The latter were disgusted at the Neglect put upon them by the former, and well enough pleas'd that at last they were recognis'd by this Message, which the Lords Commissioners Piennes, Lisse, and Whitlock, receiv'd at the Bar of the other House, who answer'd, That they would take it into further Consideration; and this Clashing between the two Houses, weaken'd the Authority of both, and sapp'd the very Foundation of the Petition and Advice, the great Charter of the present Government,

A.D. 1659 These Divisions were not confin'd within the Walls of the Parliament House, but broke out in the Army itself, the Officers every where diffusing their Jealousies one of another. They were divided into Three Parties, and neither of them much superior to the other in Number. One Party was known to be well affected to the Common-wealth; another to the Council of Officers, meeting by their own Authority at Wallingford-House, where Lieutenant General Fleetwood liv'd; the Third Party was the Protector Richard's.

Lieutenant General Fleetwood did, without doubt, expect to have been declar'd Successor to Cromwel, and without doubt had been so promis'd by his Father in Law, who thought worse of his own Son than he really deserv'd, which is not common in Parents. But Oliver was above any Kindred, but that of Souls; and his Son's Soul not being so great as he wou'd have had it, he took it to be less than it was: For Richard did not want Sense; his Want was Firmness and Resolution.

My Manuscript Author, who had his Memoirs from the Earl of Orrery, affirms Oliver made Fleetwood his Heir; but one of his Daughters knowing where his Will was, took it away and burnt it, before Fleetwood cou'd come at it; and a few Minutes before Cromwel's Death, when he was ask'd, Who should succeed him? he made Reply, and said, In such a Drawer of the Cabinet, in my Closet, you will find it. Fleetwood found himself trick'd indeed, and the whole Council against him; so he fell in with them, waiting an Opportunity to right or revenge himself; which offer'd in the Divisions between the two Houses, the Court and Parliament, and between the Court, Parliament, and Army.

Richard Cromwel's Friends, to increase their Party, had cajol'd and caress'd the Royalists so much, that it gave Offence to the well-affected in Parliament and City. A certain inferior Officer having publicly murmur'd at it, was carry'd to Whitehall to answer for it. Richard, besides other reproachful Language, ask'd him in a scornful way, Whether he wou'd have him prefer none but the Gaddy? Here, continues he, is Dick Ingoldsby, who can neither Pray nor Preach, and yet I will trust him before ye all. Upon which Ludlow reflects thus: "These imprudent, as well as irreligious Words, so clearly discovering the Frame and Temper of his Mind, were soon publish'd in the Army and City of London, to his great Prejudice. And from this time, all Men amongst them, who made but the least Pretences to Religion and Sobriety, began to think themselves unsafe whilst he govern'd; and thereupon soon form'd a Resolution to use their utmost Endeavours to divide the Military from the Civil Power,

A.D. 1659 "Power, and to place the Command of the Army in Lieutenant General Fleetwood; who having Intimation of this Disposition in his Favour, thought to confirm it, by joining in with the Republicans. To this end, he prevail'd with his Party to send Col. Kelsey to Lieutenant General Ludlow, and let him know, that the Gentlemen at Wallingford-House wou'd give him a friendly Reception, if he wou'd come thither and confer with them; which he did, and the Wallingford-House Officers consented, that an Agreement shou'd be proposed to Sir Arthur Haslerigge and Sir Henry Vane, who readily approved of it, and promis'd to be assisting in all things for the Publick Service. With this Answer Ludlow went to Col. Sydenham, and desir'd him to acquaint the Company at Wallingford-House with it. Sydenham told the Lieutenant General, that those Gentlemen design'd to call a General Council of Officers, and if they cou'd effect it, they doubted not to go a great way towards a good Settlement.

General Council of Officers.

All these Steps were against the Protector. His Brother in Law, Fleetwood, and his Uncle in Law, Desborough, were the main Agents; and two or three of the Wallingford-House Party finding him alone, took the Opportunity to persuade him of the Necessity of calling a General Council of Officers in order to present something to the House for the Regulation and Maintenance of the Army. Richard, not suspecting their Design, consented to the Proposition; and having issu'd out an Order to that Purpose, a General Council of Officers met. The Protector's Cabinet Council were the Lord Broghill, afterwards Earl of Orrery, Dr. Wilkins, afterwards Bishop of Chester, and Col. Phillips. These were not made acquainted with the calling of this Council, till after the Order was issu'd, and when they knew it, they represented to the Protector the dangerous Consequence of it to his Person and Government. However, Broghill, as a General Officer, assisted at the Council, having promis'd Richard to do him what Service he cou'd. There met at Wallingford-House above Five hundred Officers, in the Beginning of April. Dr. Owen made a long Prayer, and then Major General Desborough spoke for near an Hour, representing how great the Lord had been to them, how prosperous their Arms had been, which Prosperity, he fear'd, wou'd not continue; seeing, since their Peace and Happiness, there were several Men, Sons of Belial, crept in amongst them; for whose sakes there wou'd be great Judgments upon the Army; and therefore, he thought, 'twou'd be convenient to purge it by a Test, which every Officer shou'd take, "That they did believe in their Consciences that the putting of the late King, Charles Stuart, to Death, was lawful and just. Which Motion was receiv'd with Applause, till another was started which puzzled the Cause. 'Twas observ'd, that as soon as Desborough had done speaking, the Lord Viscount Falconbridge, and the Lord Viscount Howard rose up and left the Assembly. It was suppos'd to carry Advice of it to the Protector. The Lord Broghill stood up to answer Desborough, beginning his Speech thus: I am not of the same Opinion with the Noble Lord who spoke last, being against all Tests put upon the Army, as Things which wou'd enslave them, and which they have declar'd against. If they once put Tests upon themselves, they will quickly have others put Tests upon them; and so will act against their own Liberty of Conscience, which they have so much fought and pleaded for. I am in particular against the Test propos'd, because it is unjust and unreasonable to require Men to swear to the Lawfulness of that which they were not present at the doing of. And many, besides myself, were not present when the late King was Try'd and put to Death, and how can they swear that what they did not and cou'd not know, was Just and Lawful? But if you will have a Test to purge the Army, I think I have Liberty to propose one, as well as others; which is, That all shall be turn'd out of the Army, that will not swear to defend the Government, as it is now establish'd, under the Protector and Parliament. This is reasonable, because your Being depends upon it; and lawful, because it is to maintain that Authority by which you sit. I declare I am against all Tests, and for the Continuance of the Liberty of the Army. If you will have a Test, I am for this; and if you will not pass it here, or do pass the other, I will move for this Test to Morrow in Parliament, where I am confident it will pass. Many cry'd out, Well mov'd; and Col. Gough and Col. Whaley, between whom Lord Broghill sat, were brought over by him for his Test or none, as they declar'd in two warm Speeches. Upon this, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Major General Desborough, and others who were in their Secret, withdrew to consult among themselves; and when they return'd, Fleetwood said, We have consider'd what my Lord Broghill has spoken, and did not see the ill Consequences of imposing Tests upon the Army, till his Lordship had hinted them; wherefore we will not put it to the Vote which of them shall pass, but desire both may be drop'd.

The Wallingford-House Party succeeded better in their other Motions: One of them was, "That it wou'd be more advantageous to the Army, and more conducing to the Good of the Nation, if the Military and Civil Power might be plac'd in different Hands, that the one might be a Balance to the other. At this Motion there was a Hum. And the next was a Step further declaring their Apprehensions, That the Common Cause was wholly to be ruin'd by the Subtlety and Artifices of those, who had never been able to do it by open Force. Wherefore they desir'd the Command of the Army might be intrusted to the Care of some few Persons, in whom they might all confide. This Proposition found so general an Approbation, that it was impossible for the Protector's Party to resist the Stream: They were extremely alarm'd at these Proceedings, well knowing, that a Protector wou'd make a sorry Figure, when there was a General of the Army who had the whole Military Power. He and his Courtiers put some Members of Parliament upon charging the Council with mutinous Words against the Government, and against the two Houses; which Accusation was so well seconded, that the House of Commons Voted, That the Officers of the Army shou'd no more meet as a General Council. Notwithstanding this Vote, they still met, and the Parliament having Notice, declar'd the Protector General of their Army, authorizing him to disperse the Officers to their respective Posts, to turn out such as shou'd disobey, and place others in their room. They also Voted it to be High Treason in the Officers to meet in Council, contrary to their Orders; and promis'd to cause the Arrears of those that shou'd yield Obedience, to be forthwith paid, with Assurances to take Care of them for the future. The Lord Broghill advis'd Richard Cromwel to join in with the Parliament, and dissolve the Council of Officers. How shall I do it, says Richard? Broghill reply'd, If you please, I'll draw up a short Speech for you, and to Morrow Morning go to the Council, where, after an Hour's sitting among them, you may stand up and speak it. The Protector promis'd to do so, and the Lord Broghill drew

A.D. 1659 drew up a Speech for him, of about eight or ten Lines, to this Effect.

Gentlemen,

Lord Broghill " I accept of your Service with all Thankfulness. I have consider'd what does most agrieve you, and think the best and properest Way to redress what is amiss amongst you, is to do it in the Parliament now sitting, of which many of you are Members, where I will see Things righted, and therefore declare my Commission for holding this Council to be now void, and the Council dissolv'd, and desire you to get to your several Commands.

Lord Broghill gave Richard this Speech, and he learnt it by the next Morning, when, at ten o'Clock, he came to Wallingford-House, and sat down in a Chair of State, which pleas'd some, and troubled others. After an Hour's Stay, he rose up and spoke, as above; which, tho' mild, gave great Dislike to Fleetwood, Desborough, and that Party, who complain'd in Parliament how much they had been abus'd and affronted by a certain Lord in that Assembly, looking stedfastly on the Lord Broghill, and desiring Satisfaction; to which End they mov'd for an Address to his Highness, to know who advis'd him to dissolve the Council of War, during the sitting of Parliament, without the Parliament's Consent or Knowledge. Broghill standing in his Place, said,

" At the same time there is an Address made, to know who advis'd the Dissolution of the Council without the Parliament's Knowledge or Consent; I humbly move there may be also another Address, to know who advis'd the Calling of a Council of War without the Consent or Knowledge of the Parliament; for if he be guilty who advis'd the Dissolution of the Council, he must be much more guilty who advis'd the Calling it without the Parliament's Knowledge and Consent." The House cry'd, Well mov'd; and Fleetwood, Desborough, and their Party withdrew to consult further, and take new Resolutions, upon which Richard's Fate depended.

Tho' the Protector had dissolv'd the Council of Officers, yet they continu'd their Meetings in a more private Manner, and try'd all imaginable Ways to oblige Richard to a Compliance with them. But being made General by the Parliament, a Post which he knew Fleetwood aspir'd to, he resolv'd to stick close to his new Friends.

He sent for his Brother in Law, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, to come to him, hearing of the Continuance of the Officers Meetings: But the Messenger brought no Answer. He then order'd his Guards to fetch him; but they desir'd to be excus'd. The Lieutenant General having Intimation of this Design, retir'd to St. James's, where many chief Officers of the Army resorted to him, and it was concluded the whole Army shou'd rendezvous there. The Protector being inform'd of this, made a Shew of disputing his Authority by Force, and, as General of the Army, order'd a Counter Rendezvous at Whitehall. Accordingly Col. Gough sent Orders to his Regiment to march to Whitehall; but the Major had already prevail'd with them to draw to St. James's. Three Troops of Col. Ingoldsby's Horse march'd also to St. James's, with Part of two more; so that he had only one entire Troop to stand by him. Col. Whalley's Regiment of Horse, for the most Part, left him, and went off to St. James's; which he seeing, open'd his Breast and desir'd them to shoot him. Col. Hacker's Regiment of Horse being drawn up near Cheapside, the Protector sent a Message to the Colonel, with an Order for him to march to Whitehall; but he excus'd himself, and said he had receiv'd Orders from Lieutenant General Fleetwood to keep that Post. Many of the Life-Guard also went to St. James's, and most of the Troops that stay'd with Richard, declar'd they wou'd not oppose any that shou'd come to them by Order of Lieutenant General Fleetwood. Thus here was a General without an Army, and several great Officers without Soldiers, who having boasted of their Interest in the Army, and thereby led the House into their late rash Proceedings, now being utterly disappointed in their Hopes and Expectations, knew not what to advise, or what to do.

Let us here pause a little, and examine where the Cavaliers are, what they are doing? Every Step taken from this Time draws nearer to the Restoration. Who takes these Steps? Is there not one Royalist come yet into the Scene of Action? Not one of those noisy Pretenders, who, when it was effected, claim'd the Merit, and had the Reward? Not one, a few Months only before the King came in?

The Lord Viscount Howard, who was Captain of Cromwel's Guards, was the first Man that had any Thoughts of the King, of all those who had any Power to serve him. He was made a Lord by Oliver, was a Favourite to both the Protectors, and had serv'd them faithfully. But seeing Richard's Affairs desperate, and being assur'd that the Common-wealth wou'd not employ him, he resolv'd to make his Terms with the Exil'd Monarch, and do what he cou'd to restore him. However, he harbour'd no such Thoughts, till he had try'd, by all the Arguments he cou'd think of, to prevail with Richard to endeavour to stand his Ground. 'Tis Time to look about you, says the Lord Howard, Empire and Command are not now the Question. Your Person, your Life are in Peril; you are the Son of Cromwel, shew your self worthy to be his Son. This Business requires a bold Stroke, and must be supported by a good Head. Do not suffer your self to be daunted now, and my Head shall answer for the Consequence. Fleetwood, Lambert, Desborough, Vane, are the Contrivers of all this: I will rid you of them, do you stand by me, and only back my Zeal for your Honour with your Name. The Necessity of preserving your self dispenses with the severe Laws of Justice. If this is not done, the Army will be against you, and you are infallibly ruin'd; and you have nothing to fear, I'll take it upon my self, and be answerable for the Consequence.

Richard was surpriz'd at these Words: He answer'd in a Consternation, That every one shou'd see he wou'd do no body any Harm: He never had done any, nor ever wou'd: That he shou'd be very much troubled, if any one was injur'd on his Account; and instead of taking away the Life of the least Person in the Nation for the Preservation of his Greatness, which was a Burthen to him, he wou'd not have a Drop of Blood spilt. The Lord Howard heard him refuse his Proposal with Indignation, when he offer'd to run all the Risque of it himself. Do you think, said he, this Moderation of yours will repair the Wrong your Family has committed by its Elevation? Every body knows, that by Violence your Father procur'd the Death of the late King, and kept his Sons in Banishment. If the Father's Crimes cry for Vengeance, shall the Son have them past over in Silence? Mercy in the present State of Affairs is unreasonable; we may shed that Blood that strives to shed ours without being blood-thirsty or cruel; tho' Conscience may sometimes obstruct a Sovereign's sacrificing an innocent Person to his Ambition, it does not oppose his executing

Lord Howard's Proposal to Richard.

Fleetwood and Richard quarrel.

A.D. 1659 ing a Criminal for his own Safety. Lay aside this Profanumity so unbecoming the Successor of Cromwel. Be quick, for every Moment is precious. Consider your Enemies spend this Time in Acting which we waste in Consulting. Lord Howard's Heat cou'd not make it's Way into Richard's Heart. He own'd his Obligation, but did not alter his Mind, closing all thus, Talk no more of it, my Resolution is fix'd. Violent Counsels suit not with me; and all you can persuade me to by what you now give, is, that it proceeds from true Friendship, for which I am thankful. Howard having gone so far, and finding there was no Hope left in Cromwel, left Whitehall, and engag'd in the Conspiracies for restoring the King, which began to be form'd in London, and several Parts of England, on Richard's dissolving the Parliament, and the Dissolution of his Protectorate soon after.

Lord
Howard deserts to the King.

The Officers drew up a Remonstrance, which they presented to Richard, April the 14th, setting forth the Army's Want of Pay, the Insolences of the Royalists, and their Designs, together with some in Power, to ruin the Army, and the good old Cause, and to bring in the Enemies thereof: To prevent which, and to provide against free Quarter, they desire his Highness to advise with the Parliament, and to provide effectual Remedy.

This, according to Whitlock, was the Beginning of Richard's Fall. The House disgusted at the general Meeting of the Council of Officers without their Knowledge and Consent, not only pass'd those harsh Votes before-mentioned, but neglected this Remonstrance, took no Course to provide Money, and exasperated the Soldiery.

Lambert against Richard.

Lambert, after Oliver had taken away his Commission, retir'd to his Country-house at Wimbeldon in Surrey, and seem'd to have forgotten that he had ever been a General, in the pleasant and harmless Exercise of a Gardiner, with which he diverted himself in his fine Gardens, and became so skilful, that he was reckon'd the best Florist in England; but upon an Invitation from the Wallingford-House Party, he came and took a Seat amongst them, and was as forward as any in pushing Things to Extremity. The Council of Officers sent Desborough to Richard to tell him, If he wou'd dissolve the Parliament, who had slighted and abus'd the Army, they wou'd take Care of him. If he refus'd to do it, they wou'd dissolve them without him, and leave him to shift for himself. Richard put off giving his Answer till the next Morning, and in the mean time held a Cabinet Council upon it, with the Lord Broghill, the Lords Commissioners Fiennes and Whitlock, Sir Charles Wolfeley, and Secretary Thurloe. Whitlock was against dissolving the Parliament, and advis'd their sitting a little longer, especially now they had begun to consider of raising Money, which wou'd reconcile them to the Soldiery. But most were for complying with the Army, who, by the Union of almost all the three Parties, were become formidable to Court and Parliament, and indeed had both in their Power.

The next Morning, April the 22d, the House met, and several Members made extravagant Motions, rather, as was suppos'd, to vent their own Passions, than from any Hopes of Success; for whatever were the Resolutions that were made by the Court Junto, they cou'd not suddenly be brought to vote, because the contrary Party was considerably encreas'd by this Change of Affairs, which made Richard the more willing to part with them. Few of the House knew of the Dissolution which was intended; or if they did, were unwilling to take Notice of it; so that when the Usher of the Black Rod, who A.D. 1659 attended the other House, came to let the Sergeant at Arms know, it was the Pleasure of the Protector that the House of Commons shou'd attend him at the other House, several Members were against admitting the Sergeant into the House to deliver the Message; but the Commonwealth Party demanded and obtain'd that he shou'd give the House an Account of what the Gentleman of the Black Rod had said to him. The Assembly being under this Confusion, adjourn'd themselves till eight a Clock next Morning; but Care was taken to prevent their meeting again, by publishing a Proclamation, declaring them to be dissolv'd, by putting a Padlock on the Door of the House, and by placing a Guard in the Court of Requests, with Orders to refuse Admittance to all those that shou'd demand it. This Parliament was fatal to two Speakers, tho' it did not sit quite three Months, Challoner Chute, Esq; dying, his Successor was Sir Lisleborne Long, who dying also, Mr. Bampfild kept the Speaker's Chair to the Dissolution; after which the Protector, his Privy and Cabinet Councils sat close, to consult what was fit to be done. Some there were who, rather than submit to be dictated by Fleetwood and the Army Officers, inclin'd to enter into a Treaty with the King, and the Protector himself was of the same Opinion; but the Majority, deterr'd by the just Notions they had of the loose Principles, and implacable, revengeful Spirit of the Exiles, wou'd not hearken to it. The Lord Falkonbridge and the Lord Howard gave themselves up to that Interest, and under Pretence of engaging Monk to support his Master Richard's tottering Condition, they went to Scotland, where, no Doubt, they all three came to an Understanding, tho' the restoring the King was the last Thing Monk wou'd comply with.

The Character of that Monk is in Ludlow and Whitlock. The former tells us, He was a Man of a covetous Temper, of no Principles, of a vicious and scandalous Conversation, which fitted him exactly for the Work they were going to set him about. And Whitlock informs us, that the French Ambassador said of him, He had neither Sense nor Breeding; consequently, his true Character must be, that he was a Dull, Clovenish, Covetous, Vicious Person of no Principles. I cou'd have gather'd as much out of his History, but I chose to put it in the Words of Whitlock and Ludlow, whose Authorities are more than sufficient against Gumble, and Price, and Webster, and Echard, and the best of them, who wou'd make something more of Monk than Lieutenant General Ludlow, and the Lord Commissioner Whitlock, and the French Ambassador have made of him. Let it not be imagin'd that I have conceiv'd such a contemptible Opinion of him from any thing, but the Accounts that are left us concerning him by judicious Writers, and not from his Perjury and Treachery in betraying the Parliament, who put such Confidence in him. I am as sensible, as a grateful Soul can be, of the Blessings of the Restoration, without which we cou'd have had no King William, no Queen Mary, no Queen Anne, no King George, no illustrious House of Hanover, in whose glorious Reigns these Nations have been happy at home, and renown'd abroad, enjoy'd, and have, and do enjoy the greatest Felicities of Life, Spiritual and Temporal Liberty. As for any other Blessing, which Monk was a Means of procuring us, I know nothing of it, and therefore shall not be the History to pay him a Complement.

A.D. 1659 of the Parliament. For tho' Richard publish'd a Proclamation for all Papists and Cavaliers to depart twenty Miles from London, yet that was the only Act of Government we read of him after the Parliament was dissolv'd. So we may fix his Protectorate to seven Months; at the End of which he was laid down as gently as a Fall cou'd be, and hardly any thing more heard of him. The Common-wealth that was restor'd, having sent a Committee to him, Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Mr. Ludlow and Mr. Scott, to know whether he wou'd acquiesce in the present Proceedings, and that they wou'd provide for the Payment of his Debts, and an Honourable Subsistence for himself and his Family, they return'd with this Answer under his Hand, That he wou'd acquiesce. He sent them a List of his Debts, and thought of them no more than they did of him. He awoke, as out of a Dream, and return'd to a private Life with more Content and Pleasure than he assum'd the Supreme Authority. He was Chancellor of the University of Oxford, which Office he voluntarily resign'd by a Paper under his own Hand, which he sent to that University. His Debts were computed at about 29,000 Pounds; but no due Care was taken by the Common-wealth for the Discharge of them. They sent to him in a few Days to quit Whitehall, which he did with great Satisfaction, and retir'd to his Seat at Hursely in Hants shire. When he was to remove from his Palace, and the Household Goods were pack'd up, the Quondam Protector order'd his Servants to be particularly careful of two old Trunks, which were deposited in his Wardrobe. The Men wonder'd why he was so solicitous for their Preservation, since by their Appearance, and the Place they were put in, they did not seem to contain a Treasure of such Consequence. And one of his Friends hearing him enquire after them with more Concern than for any Part of the Lumber, ask'd him what was in them, that made him value them so much? Why, no less, says Richard, than the Lives and Fortunes of all the good People of England, alluding to the numberless Addresses in which they made him those Offers.

Richard generally went by the Name of Mr. Wallis; not, as is pretended, that he wanted an Alias to defend him against any Debts, except those which were indeed the Debts of the Publick; but because the Curiosity of the People to gaze at a Man who had been in the State of the greatest Prince in Europe, and was now reduc'd to the State of a plain Country Gentleman, wou'd have been very troublesome to him, had he always gone by the Name of Richard Cromwel. He liv'd above fifty Years after his Abdication, and dy'd at Chestnutt in Hartfordshire. He had a Son, Oliver Cromwel, who had the Look and Genius of his Grandfather, who was very active at the Revolution, and offer'd to raise a Regiment of Horse for the Service in Ireland, if he might name his Captains. But, among other such Advice given King William by some false Friends, he was refus'd, under Pretence that his Name and his Post, with such Advantages, might make him too popular and too powerful at such a Juncture. It was the same sort of Advice that hinder'd Mr. Samuel Johnson, of the Deanry of Durham, and that put several pretended Friends to the Revolution into Places of Trust, by which King William was so often in Danger of his Predecessor's Fate, and of losing his Life as well as his Crown.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND, DURING THE COMMON-WEALTH Restor'd.

THE Council of Officers at Wallingford-House were very willing to keep the Power they had got in their own Hands, and had Thoughts of raising Money by their own Authority; but upon Consultation with their Friends, they took a safer Method, which was, to restore the Members of the Long Parliament. This they did by a Declaration, dated the 6th of May, inviting the Members of that Parliament, who continu'd sitting till April the 20th, 1653, to return to the Exercise and Discharge of their Trust.

Sign'd by the Direction of the Lord Fleetwood and the Council of the Officers of the Army.

Tho. Sandford, Secretary.

Several Meetings were held at Sir Henry Vane's, between the chief Officers of the Army and the chief Members of the Long Parliament.

Members,

Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Major Salloway.

Officers,

Major General Lambert, Col. Jones, Col. Kelsey, Col. Berry,

Who after many Debates about Satisfaction to the Army, resolv'd that the Long Parliament shou'd be restor'd. Accordingly Major General Lambert, Col. Berry, Col. Cooper, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Col. Lilburn, Col. Ashfield, Col. Zanby, Col. Kelsey, Col. Okey, Treasurer Blackwell, Major Haynes, Col. Allen, Col. Packer, and Col. Pierston, went to the old Speaker Lenthall with their Declaration to the Rolls, and presented it to him and several Members of that Parliament, who were with the Speaker, and all declar'd their Willingness to meet again, which they appointed to do the next Day, May the 7th, in the Painted-Chamber, and about twelve o'Clock the Members went to take their Places in the House, Mr. Lenthall their Speaker leading the Way, and the Officers of the Army lining the Rooms for them as they pass thro' the Painted-Chamber, the Court of Requests, and the Lobby itself, the principal Officers

A.D. 1659 cers having plac'd themselves nearest to the Door of the Parliament-House, every one seeming to rejoyce at their Restitution, and promising to live and die by them. The same Day the House appointed a Committee of Safety, Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Major Salloway, Col. Sydenham, Major General Lambert, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Col. John Jones, Col. Desborough, Col. Berry, Mr. Scot.

First Committee of Safety.

This Committee were order'd to notify to foreign Ambassadors the Restoration of the Commonwealth. They empower'd them to displace and place all Officers that had behav'd ill in the late Times of Usurpation. Writs and all Proceedings in Law were directed to run, as formerly, in the Name of the Keepers of the Liberties of England. They sent down Colonel Whettham to Portsmouth, to take Possession of the Government of it, the House being dissatisfied with the Behaviour of Colonel Morley.

There was still a Party, who wish'd well to the late Protector Richard, out of Aversion to the Commonwealth, and the Committee of Safety had much ado to get Major General Overton, Col. Rich, Col. Alured, Major Braman receiv'd into Service, they being rigid Republicans, whom the Wallingford-House Party no more affected, than they did the Cromwellians. The Lord Howard's Regiment of Horse was given to Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Col. Gough's Regiment to Lieutenant General Ludlow, and Col. Alured was made Captain of the Parliament Guards.

The House pass'd a Declaration concerning their Meeting, and their Purpose to secure the Property and Liberty of the People, both as Men, and as Christians, and that without a single Person, King-ship, or House of Peers, and to uphold Magistracy and Ministry. The next Day after their Meeting, Dr. Owen preach'd a Sermon in the Parliament-House, and an Order was made by the Committee of Safety, That all Officers shou'd be such as fear'd God, and had been faithful to the Commonwealth. The former Part of this Order is that which occasions all the Mirth in the Earl of Clarendon's, and Mr. Echard's History, where the Rallery is as coarse as if it had been learnt in a Market; but the Language of these Court Writers may be best imagin'd to the Reader by that of Sir Philip Warwick, who speaking of the Restoring the Commonwealth, calls it Subventaneous, or Addle-Eggs, and a Page or two afterwards, a Twisting of the Guts. They are inimitably polite. They were of the Court when it was at Oxford, and besides the refin'd Expression of the Rank and Quality, they had that of the Colleges and Schools, and above all that of the Court Paper, Mercurius Aulicus, to refine and polish them.

Council of State.

Seven Days after the Meeting of the Parliament, they chose a Council of State, Twenty-one to be of their Body, and Ten not to be of it.

The Ten were,

The Lord President Bradshaw, the Lord Fairfax, Major General Lambert, Col. Desborough, Col. Berry, Sir Horatio Townsend, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Sir Robert Honeywood, Sir Archibald Johnston, Lord Warriston, Josias Berners, Esq;

The Twenty one, who were Members of Parliament,

Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Sir Henry Vane, Sir James Harrington, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Col. Algernon Sidney, Henry Nevil, Esq; Col. Morley, Thomas Challoner, Esq; Col. Walton, Robert Wallop, Esq; Lord Chief Justice St. John,

Col. Dixonel, Thomas Scot, Esq; Col. Sydenham, A.D. 1659 Robert Reynolds, Esq; Col. Thomson, Lord Commissioner Whitlocke, Col. John Jones, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Col. Downs, Humphry Salloway, Esq;

The Rest of the Members of the Parliament, term'd in reproach the Rump.

William Lenthall, Esq; Speaker, Oliver St. John, Esq; Col. William Purefoy, Esq; Sir Henry Mildmay, Nathaniel Fiennes, Esq; John Lisle, Esq; Lord Munson, Sir Thomas Widdrington, Cornelius Holland, Esq; Isaac Penington, Esq; Luke Robinson, Esq; Edmund Prideaux, Esq; Daniel Blagrove, Esq; Serjeant Wyld, Robert Goodwin, Esq; Thomas Atkins, Esq; Miles Corbet, Esq; John Weaver, Esq; John Dove, Esq; --- Rolls, Esq; Augustine Skinner, Esq; Walter Strickland, Esq; Gilbert Millington, Esq; Alexander Popham, Esq; Sir Peter Wentworth, Col. Richard Ingoldsby, Sir John Fagg, Col. Lassels, Mr. Leckmere, Mr. Gold, Col. Okey, Michael Oldsworth, Esq; Mr. Love, Mr. Rawleigh, Mr. Brewster, Col. Bennet, Mr. Pury, Mr. Say, Henry Martin, Esq; Col. Hutchinson, Mr. White, Col. Eyres, Philip Smith, Esq; Mr. Bingham, Col. Brooke, Mr. Dunch.

Echard tells them but Forty. Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, and other Members, were afterwards elected and admitted: However, the Archdeacon's Forty were a Quorum, and Ludlow observes, that the secluded Members being declar'd incapable of Sitting and Voting by a fair Quorum of Parliament, which is the Law of the House, how will the Lawyers prove that they had afterwards a Right to sit, and that those who did sit, were not a legal Parliament? A Quorum can seclude twenty as lawfully as two, and I do not see how any thing can be determin'd in Parliament, if what is done by a Quorum, is not determinative. The House appointed an Oath to be taken by all Officers of the Army and others, To be true and faithful to the Commonwealth, in Opposition to Charles Stuart, or any single Person. The Soldiery bogg'd at this Test, not on Account of Charles Stuart, none of them thought of him, but of a single Person, which many of them thought of, and to set up Fleetwood against the Parliament, or Lambert, or to restore Richard, who, tho' driven from Whitehall, had still an Interest among the Soldiers.

One of the first and most zealous Addresses to the Parliament after their Restoration, was from Monk, and the Officers of the Army in Scotland, in which they say, A glorious Cause, whose Interest was laid low, even in the Dust, is in one Day restor'd to its Life and Lustre, when almost all the Asserters of it had so manifestly deserted it by a Defection of many Years. One of these Deserters was Monk himself, as may be seen by his Addresses to Oliver and Richard. In the Sense of this, the greatest of our temporal Mercies, we now come to address your Honours, as those whose Presence we have so long wanted. Notwithstanding their Joy at the Exaltation of both the Cromwells, They beseech the God of all their Mercies, to heal the Back-slidings of his People, and not to charge to their Account, in this his Day of their Deliverance, their Miscarriages, while they were wandering in dark and slippery Places, after the Imagination of their own Hearts, and with all Humility and Affection congratulate their Honours in their happy Restoration to the Government of these Nations, which God was pleas'd once so to own in their Hands. This is General Monk, who a few Months after brought about the happy Restoration of King Charles the Second; and having taken the Oath call'd the Engagement, to Monk's Address to the Parliament.

A.D. 1659 be true and faithful to the Common-wealth, without King or House of Peers, and having sworn to be true and faithful to both the Cromwells, and having betray'd the Common-wealth, whom he had engag'd to maintain, I think there is no great Wrong done him, when he is charg'd with Treachery and Perjury. In the mean time the Wallingford-House Party, not forgetting their Design, drew up an Address to the Parliament, and presented it by the chief Officers of the Army. The Heads of it were, That those who had acted under the late Power, might be indemnify'd; that Lieutenant General Fleetwood might be appointed Commander in chief of the Forces; that the Protector's Debts might be satisfy'd, and 10,000 Pounds a Year added to his Revenue; that the Government of the Nation might consist of a Representative of the People, and a select Senate; that Care might be taken for Payment of the Debts of the Army; that Liberty of Conscience might be secur'd. The House answer'd, that they wou'd give them all possible Satisfaction, and that no Man for the future might have an Opportunity to pack an Army to serve his Ambition, as had been formerly practis'd, a Bill was prepar'd and brought in, constituting the seven Persons following, to be Commissioners for the Nomination of Officers, to be presented to the Parliament. Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Major General Lambert, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Col. Desborough, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Sir Henry Vane, and Col. Berry.

Officers of the Army petition.

Commissioners for Officers.

Speaker to grant Commissioners.

Another Bill was brought in to appoint Lieutenant General Fleetwood Commander in Chief, and that all Commissions shou'd be sign'd by the Speaker. Both these Acts pass'd, and were notify'd to the Officers, that they might obey them, and particularly take new Commissions from the Speaker.

The Parliament took very prudent Measures for their Preservation, but having nothing but Prudence to oppose to Power, the Army obey'd them just as much, and as long, as they pleas'd. The Officers did not relish the last mention'd Acts, which made them entirely dependant on the Parliament; and as they had restor'd them to their Seats in that House, they began to wish it undone, and to meditate how to undo it. Desborough said, he had a good Commission already, and he wou'd take none from the Speaker: But Matters not being ripe enough for a new Change, his Stomach came to him, and he, and all the Officers took their Commissions from the Hands of the Speaker.

The House was indefatigable in their Proceedings, and had an Eye to foreign, as well as domestick Affairs. They appointed Col. Sidney and Sir Robert Honeywood, to go Ambassadors to Sweden, to mediate a Peace between that King, and the King of Denmark. They sent Mr. George Downing to Holland to transact Matters with that Common-wealth, and appointed Col. Lockhart, Governor of Dunkirk, to be their Ambassador at the Pyrenean Treaty. The Envoys and Residents of France, Sweden, Denmark, Holstein, Tuscany, Hamburg, Hanse Towns, &c. had Audience, and were referr'd to Commissioners concerning their several Negotiations. They also wrote Letters to Charles King of Sweden, and Frederick, King of Denmark, to offer them a Mediation for a Peace between them. These Letters were sign'd, The Parliament of the Common-wealth of England, WILLIAM LENTHAL, Prolocutor of the Common-wealth of England.

They made Serjeant Bradshaw, Serjeant Tyrrel, and Serjeant Fountain, Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal.

Upper-Bench.

Lord Chief Justice Newdegate, Mr. Justice Hill, Mr. Justice Nicholas.

Common-Pleas.

Lord Chief Justice St. John, Mr. Justice Windham, Mr. Justice Archer.

Exchequer.

Lord Chief Baron Wilde, Mr. Baron Thorp, Mr. Baron Parker.

About this time, Mr. Scot, one of the Council of State, insinuated to them that he had Intelligence of a dangerous Correspondence carry'd on by Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, and the Lord Commissioner Whitlocke, with Sir Edward Hyde, beyond the Seas. Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper made the highest Professions that could be of his Innocence, denying he had ever any Correspondence with the King, or Sir Edward Hyde, or any of the King's Ministers or Friends. His Expressions were so high, that they bred the more Suspicion of him in some of the Council, tho' he was clear'd by the major Vote. The Lord Commissioner Whitlocke positively deny'd what he was charg'd with, and the Spy being a beggarly Irish Friar, the Matter was wav'd, and no more said of it.

On the 5th of June the Parliament voted, That this Parliament shall not continue longer than May the 7th, 1660; but the Officers did not design they shou'd sit so long. They had in Debate the Regulation of the Law, and order'd a Bill to reform Abuses in Clerks, Attorneys, Solicitors and Lawyers. They also referr'd it to the Council to take care, that the People be not wrong'd by Bailiffs and Juries. 'Twas worthy the Wisdom of the Nation to redress such enormous Grievances, but were they then redress'd, or are they redress'd to this Day? It is worth observing who have been the Occasion of the Stop that has been put to such generous Designs, and they are found to be Persons who make their Market of such Wrongs and Abuses. It is by no Means worthy the Wisdom of the Nation to be impos'd upon by them.

Monk had little or nothing to do in Scotland, but to enjoy the Fulness of his Fortune, with as much Luxury and Licence as a Man of no Principles cou'd allow himself. And there's no Reason to imagine he had any Thoughts of stirring from the Place where he was, till Applications were made to him from England. His Eye-sight was not good enough to see from Edinburgh to London, nor his Fore-sight to provide for Consequences, unless they were put into his Head, as we shall see presently they were.

As soon as Richard was outed of the Government, Sir Charles Coote, then in his Court, went Post for Ireland, to carry the News of this great Alteration, to the Lord Lieutenant Henry Cromwel. After him hasten'd Col. Henry Ingoldsby, and it was suppos'd, the Design was to see whether there was any likelihood of their being able to maintain themselves in the Government of that Kingdom: But the Army there declaring, they wou'd do as the Army did in England, they had no Encouragement to defend Richard against the Parliament, tho' Sir Charles Coote try'd what he cou'd do in Connaught, and the Lord Broghil did the same in Munster, as did also Lieutenant Col. Flower in Ulster; and this Party being disappointed in their Aims to continue Cromwel's Authority, which they divided with him in their several Stations, out of Despight to the Common-wealth, enter'd into Engagements for the King;

A.D. 1659 King; and it is observable, that of all those who serv'd his Majesty in his Restoration, there is hardly one Man of Note and Interest, who did it out of Principle and Affection, till the Work was done to their Hands.

Ludlow The Parliament sent Orders to Henry Cromwell to come to England, and give the Council of State an Account of Affairs there, which oblig'd him to leave that Kingdom; where Lieutenant General Ludlow arriv'd soon after, with a Commission to command the Forces in Chief; and, with other Commissioners of Parliament, to take upon him the Government. We shall leave him there, and see what he says of the Counsels in England.

Opinions about a Scheme of Government. At this Time the Opinions of Men were much divided concerning a Form of Government to be establish'd amongst us. The Great Officers of the Army, as has been hinted, were for a select standing Senate to be join'd to the Representative of the People.

Others labour'd to have the Supream Authority to consist of an Assembly chosen by the People, and a Council of State chosen by that Assembly, to be vested with the Executive Power, and accountable to that which shou'd next succeed. At which Time the Power of the said Council shou'd determine.

Some were desirous to have a Representative of the People constantly sitting, by a perpetual Rotation.

Others propos'd, that there might be join'd to the Popular Assembly a select Number of Men in the nature of the Lacedemonian Ephori, who shou'd have a Negative in Things wherein the Essentials of the Government shou'd be concern'd; such as the Exclusion of a single Person, touching Liberty of Conscience, Alteration of the Constitution, and other Things of the last Importance to the State.

Some were of Opinion it wou'd be most conducive to the Publick Happiness, if there were two Councils chosen by the People; the One to consist of about Three hundred, and to have the Power only of proposing and debating Laws; the Other to be in Number about a Thousand, and to have the Power finally to resolve and determine. Every Year a third Part of each Council to go out, and others to be chosen in their Places.

There were some, whose Scheme was, that there shou'd be a King, who might govern without a Parliament, and Imprison Men, Impress Men, and take away Men's Money by his Prerogative only. That he might enter the Parliament-House, and hale away the Members at Pleasure. That he shou'd have a High Commission Court to persecute, imprison, and beggar all those that did not think according to a Form prescrib'd them: And another Court, to cut off the Ears and Noses of such as gave them the least Offence. That there shou'd be a Convocation to make Canons and Creeds too, if they thought fit, to make People do and swear as the said Canons enjoin'd; with a Power to turn Religion into Ceremony, and the Lord's Day into a Revel. This Scheme, indeed, was so monstrous, that it was not offer'd to the Publick; but was had up very often in Cabals and Conversations, and produc'd something at last, as will be seen, if the Reader has Patience to go through this History.

Some Members of the Council of State propos'd at the Board, That the Parliament shou'd be mov'd to appoint Twenty of their own Number, and Ten of the Principal Officers of the Army, to consider of a Form of Government, to be reported to the Parliament; and if they shou'd approve it, that then the whole Army

A.D. 1659 shou'd be drawn out, and declare their Consent to it; which Proposition, though it seem'd thus to find a general Approbation, yet prov'd abortive; and the Parliament themselves pass'd a Resolution, That on every Wednesday the House shou'd go into a Grand Committee to consider of that Matter.

To the Act of Indemnity a Clause had been inserted, to restrain the Favour of the Parliament, in regard of those who, under the Cromwells, had receiv'd exorbitant and double Salaries: Which was to the great Discontent of several considerable Persons, who fear'd they might be concern'd in it. In particular Major General Lambert, now the most considerable Person in the Nation, bitterly exclaim'd against it to Lieutenant General Ludlow, saying, There is no Security given by the Act to indemnify us for what we have done, but the Parliament have taken Care to make us accountable for whatsoever we have receiv'd. Ludlow reply'd, In my Opinion, all the Soldiers are indemnify'd for what they have receiv'd; and if the Parliament shou'd ever make use of the Clause, it will only be against those, who have enrich'd themselves by the Ruin of the Common-wealth, and have oppos'd the Return of the Parliament to the Exercise of their Authority. I am persuaded, you cannot think such a Sort of Men worthy of their Favour and Consideration, equally with those who contributed to their Restitution. Sir Arthur Haselrigge, who then join'd them, and heard what they were upon, said, The Act is as full and comprehensive as can be justly desir'd. Major General Lambert reply'd, It signifies nothing, it leaves us still at their Mercy. You are, said Sir Arthur, only at the Mercy of the Parliament. Lambert retorted, I know not why they shou'd not be at our Mercy, as well as we at theirs. Both Haselrigge and Ludlow began from this Conversation, to be jealous of Lambert's Designs; which, perhaps, had broke out sooner, had not the Conspiracies all over England broken out; which, under the Pretence of a Free Parliament, intended the Restoration of the King.

The first Man who appear'd in Arms, was Sir George Booth, in Cheshire. With him join'd Sir Thomas Middleton, Colonel Brook, and Mr. Dunch, all Presbyterians and Covenanters; though they had not taken the Covenant so often as the King had done. Mr. Whitely, of Cheshire, had been with his Majesty in Flanders, to tell him, I suppose, what the Presbyterians intended to do for him, rather than to desire any Help from him. The Cavaliers promis'd to join with these Covenanters. But whether it was that they were dispirited with so many Routs and Executions, or whether they did not care to trust their new Confederates, Dr. Calamy tells us they fail'd them, and Coke says the same. However, Sir George Booth put the Thing to the Venture. The Lord Willoughby of Parham, another Presbyterian and Covenanter, and Sir Horatio Townsend, one of the present Council of State, had contriv'd to possess Lynne. Another Presbyterian and Covenanter, Major General Massey, was to surprize Gloucester, a City he had so bravely defended against King Charles I. Where are the Royalists all this while? The Lord Clarendon informs us, Arundel, Pollard, Greenwile, Trelawney, did indeed hope to possess Plymouth; which is all that I hear of them, unless it be two or three Gentlemen who kept their Words with Sir George Booth; as Oneale, the Lord Kilmurry, Col. Egerton; as did also the Earl of Derby, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, Mr. Lee of Limehouse, and Capt. Morgan.

King proclaim'd
by Sir Tho. Middleton.

The Earl of Stamford, another Covenanter, had promis'd to join with Booth; but that Earl, the Lord Willoughby of Parham, Sir Horatio Townshend, and Major General Massey, were apprehended before they cou'd appear in Arms; so were the Duke of Bucks, the Earl of Oxford, the Lord Delaware, and the Lord Falkland. One Basset, says Ludlow, appear'd with about Sixty Horse near Bath, and as many near Malmesbury, who were to have Massey for their Head, hearing the County Militia only was marching against them, dispers'd. The Shropshire Gentlemen, Lord Newport, Littleton, &c. were ready to secure Shrewsbury, as we read in Clarendon; but prevented being secur'd themselves by lying quiet; for Captain Waring with the Militia Troop, and some Assistance from Wrexham, being more in a Readiness, secur'd the Place for the Parliament. The General Insurrection all over England was appointed to be on the First of August, and the King and Duke of York drew down to the Sea-Coasts to transport themselves on the first Occasion. Ludlow was on his Way to Holyhead to embark for Ireland, just before Booth's Insurrection happen'd; and receiving a Visit from Sir Thomas Middleton, the Knight protested, He was resolv'd to continue steadfast in the Interest of the Common-wealth, which was only a Week or two before he rode into Wrexham at the Head of a Troop of Horse, and there, brandishing his Sword, heard the King proclaim'd in the Market Place. It's great pity so good a Cause as the Restoration, cou'd not have been accomplish'd without the Breach of so many Words and Oaths, so many solemn Engagements Sacred and Civil!

The County of Warwick and City of Coventry had like to have revolted by the Treachery of Col. Fotherby, who commanded there for the Parliament. But old Col. Purefoy took upon him that Command, and secur'd that County and City. Col. Crompton and Capt. Bathurst prevented any Stirring in Staffordshire. Thus was Sir George Booth pent up in Cheshire and Part of Lancashire, and very much straighten'd by the Forces Lieutenant General Ludlow sent over from Ireland under Col. Zanchy and Col. Axtel, of whom a Party under Lieutenant Col. Walker prevented a Rising in Carnarvonshire and other Parts of North-Wales.

Sir George Booth enter'd Chester with 400 Horse. Col. Croxton, who commanded there, having not a Troop to oppose him, retir'd into the Castle, and kept it. When Booth came into this City Col. Edmund Temple was there, bound for Ireland: Booth order'd him to be seiz'd and brought to him. Upon Examination finding he was going to Ireland, he permitted him to proceed, having ask'd him if he had heard of no Rising in other Parts? Col. Temple reply'd, He had found all quiet on the Road from London. At which Sir George seem'd much surpriz'd and discourag'd, saying, Other Promises have been made me. Whitlock tells us, the Presbyterian Ministers labour'd to further this Rising, and many of them appear'd in it; for which King Charles II. treated them as they might have expected he wou'd from every thing that had been seen or heard of him.

The Night before the Rising was to be, Major General Massey was taken in Gloucestershire as he was going to Gloucester. Information being given to a Captain of Horse of his being in the Country, and whereabouts, the Officer came up with him, seiz'd him, and mounted him before a Trooper; but riding down a steep Hill, the Weather being wet, and the Night dark, the Horse slip'd in a Wood and fell down, which

Massey caus'd by checking him. In the Fall he got away and hid himself in a Bush in the Wood. The whole Troop search'd for him; but he crept in so close they cou'd not find him; so he escap'd, and got the next Morning to a Friend's House, where he lay conceal'd two or three Weeks.

The Parliament had order'd three Regiments of Horse, one of Dragoons, and three Regiments of Foot to march against Sir George Booth, but were perplex'd in the Choice of a Commander. Whilst the Matter was under Debate, some Persons of the King's Party address'd themselves to the Wife of Col. Lambert, whom Gregory Leti represents as a Lady of Intrigue, who had an Amour not only with the Earl of Holland, but with Oliver Cromwel, by whom he says 'tis certain she had a Child, Il est pourtant certain que la Femme de ce major devint grosse dans le Temps qu'elle estoit aimée de Cromwel; but then he spoils all by saying, Oliver was desir'd to be Godfather to his own Child; whereas it is most certain, that both Cromwel and Lambert were Independants, and that they never had a Godfather or Godmother at any of their Christmings; and if no body else had them, 'twou'd prevent the Breach of so many thousand solemn and sacred Promises, as are made daily on those Occasions. Lady Lambert acquainted her Husband with the great Offers that were made him, if he wou'd be the Instrument of the King's Return. But Lambert receiv'd those Offers with Disdain. He thought himself as well deserving, and as well qualify'd to reign as the King was, and had it doubtless in his Head. He discover'd the Contrivance to Sir Henry Vane, who having communicated it to Sir Arthur Haselrigge, he perswaded them to renew their former Friendship with Assurances on each Part to unite their Endeavours in the Service of the Parliament. It was by this Means chiefly, that Major General Lambert was appointed to command those Forces that were design'd to suppress the Insurrection Booth, in Cheshire.

Monk had about 7000 Men in Scotland, where Echard tells us, he lay upon the Watch as a Cat watches a Mouse; a homely Simile indeed! But the Subject is every whit as homely. The Parliament sent an Order to him to detach two Regiments of Foot, and two of Horse to march to the North of England, and hinder any Increase of Forces coming to Booth. Monk excus'd himself under Colour of the Enemy's Strength and Intention to revolt, tho', according to Ludlow, "There were not wanting some, who then thought that his Engagements with the common Enemy were the true Reason of his Refusal. And it is certain, that a Gentleman from the King, Nicholas Monk his Brother, a Devonshire Parson, had been with him, and tho' what past between them was not made publick, yet, since he did not seize him, as it was his Duty, but permitted him to return safely from whence he came, he may justly be suspected even then to have betray'd those whom he pretended to serve."

On the sixth of August Major General Lambert march'd from London with the before-mention'd Troops, and a Train of Artillery. Sir George Booth had about 4000 Men with him, and possess'd himself of the Town of Warrington in Lancashire, of which the Reverend Mr. Robert Yates was then Vicar, and no doubt very forward in this Business, he having been try'd for his Life at Lancaster before Judge Twisden for only speaking against the Engagements, which Monk had swallow'd very cheerfully. Matters were carry'd so far, that Mr. Yates had prepar'd his last Speech, being resolv'd not to retract what he had

Lambert appointed to command the Forces against Sir George

Monk's Treachery.

A.D. 1659 had preach'd: But by the Clemency of the Judge he was pardon'd. Mr. Hier, Minister of Crofton in this Neighbourhood, was ejected for refusing the Engagement against the King and the House of Peers, as was also Mr. Henry Finch, Vicar of Walton. Mr. Henry Newcome, Minister of Mancaster, engag'd heartily in this Insurrection, and was much esteem'd by Sir George Booth. Mr. Robert Eaton, joint Pastor of Walton with Mr. Finch, was Chaplain to Sir George Booth. But all these pious and loyal Divines, and several others of this County, who had refus'd the Engagement, met with most grateful Returns from King Charles II. who had not been long restor'd before he pass'd an Act to take away their Bread from them, and turn them out of their Houses only for being Presbyterians, contrary to the Covenant, which he swore three Times, and contrary to the most sacred and solemn Promises he made in his Declaration, and in his Discourse with the Presbyterian Ministers at Breda.

Presbyterian Ministers with Sir George Booth.

Sir George Booth plac'd a Party of 300 Men in the Town of Warrington. The main Body was lodg'd on the other Side of the River, and a good Number posted to defend the Bridge, where the Forces on each Side met, and Booth's Forces began the Action, by sending out a Party to skirmish with an advanc'd Party of Major General Lambert's; but being repuls'd, and retreating beyond the Bridge, Sir George's Body of Horse, consisting of about 1800, one Half of which the Royalists brag'd were Gentlemen, ran before Lambert's Horse began to charge. The Cavaliers having not yet forgot their old way of fighting, and there were enough of them among Booth's Presbyterians, to spoil a better Army than his was. The Foot might have been cut to Pieces without any Assistance from the Gentry on Horseback, except only about forty commanded by Captain Morgan, who, endeavouring to secure their Retreat, were kill'd in the Action. Many of Sir George's Foot escap'd, by leaping over the Hedges and hiding themselves; but, according to Ludlow, their surest Protection was, their having engag'd against those that were more ready to save than to destroy them; so that tho' the whole Force of the Enemy was entirely defeated, yet there were not above forty of them kill'd. About 6 or 700 of their Horse, in scatter'd and broken Parties, fled to Chester; but not thinking themselves safe there, they went into North Wales with Sir Thomas Middleton, of Age and Experience too great to have engag'd in such mad Work as this was, the Knight being above fourscore. Chester was surrender'd to General Lambert, as was also Liverpool, which had been seiz'd by Booth's Forces. One sees all along, that this is one of the foolishhest Enterprizes in the whole History, and yet there's much more Folly in Eschard's Remarks on it than in the thing itself: "Colonel Zanchy might have been met and engag'd in Anglesey; Col. Lilburne might easily have been broken in Yorkshire; many other little Parties might have been met and dispers'd; and that one Blow given might have brought effectual Aid to Sir George's Party;" and if Eschard had known better, a great many such idle Reflections might have been left out of his Book.

Sir George Booth routed.

In the mean time the Parliament publish'd a Proclamation, declaring Sir George Booth and his Adherents, Rebels and Traitors. The Lord Mayor of London, John Ireton, Esq; the Aldermen and the two Sheriffs, Sir Anthony Bateman, and Sir John Lawrence attending the Council of State, the President Whitlock declar'd to them, by Command of the Council, the Designs of the Enemy; the Care and Vigilance of the Parliament and Council; the taking some of the Conspirators, A.D. 1659 and defeating their Designs; the Enemy's Intention to destroy all that had been of the Parliament's Party, and to bring in the King. He then thank'd the City for their good Affections, and faithful adhering to the Parliament, wherein their own and the whole Nation's Safety and Peace were concern'd, and desir'd them to persist therein. At this very Juncture was Davenant the Poet releas'd out of Prison, which shews us, that the Government was not so much afraid of the Royalists as of the Presbyterians, Davenant having been an Agent for the King. While Lambert was reducing two or three small Castles, and demolishing Chirke, Sir Thomas Middleton's Castle, Sir George Booth was making as fast as he cou'd to London, riding in a Woman's Habit behind a Servant of his, another going before them. They put up at an Inn in Newport-Pagnel in Buckinghamshire, where the pretended Gentlewoman, either by alighting from the Horse, or some other Action, rais'd a Suspicion in the Master of the House, that there was some Mystery under that Dress; upon which, resolving to make a full Enquiry into the Matter, he got together some of his Neighbours to assist him, and with them enter'd the Room, where the pretended Lady was; but Sir George suspecting their Intentions, and being unwilling to put them to the Trouble of a further Search, discover'd himself. The Minister of the Parish, Mr. John Gibbes, gave the Parliament an Account of his being taken in this Manner, and he was remember'd for it after the Restoration. The Bishop of the Diocese had not Patience to stay till the Bartholomew Act took place, but turn'd him out before for refusing to admit the whole Parish to the Lord's Supper. Sir George Booth was sent up to London, and by the Parliament committed to the Tower, where he was examin'd by Sir Henry Vane and Sir Arthur Haselrigge, and confess'd he had receiv'd a Commission from the King, and that many of the Nobility and Gentry had promis'd to appear with him, of whom he discover'd some, and desir'd more Time to recollect himself concerning others.

Sir George Booth in the Tower.

The Earl of Derby was taken in the Disguise of a Footman by one John Roden. Col. Skelcross and others were apprehended. Col. Brook, a Member, making his Appearance in the House, confess'd at the Bar his joining with Sir George Booth, was expell'd, and sent to the Tower for High Treason. The Parliament voted to dissolve the Corporation of the City of Chester, and that the County be no more Palatine or distinct to punish them for their Forwardness in this Insurrection. The Estates of those who were concern'd in it were seiz'd, particularly Sir Thomas Middleton's, and 3000 Pounds of his Personal Estate was distributed among Lambert's Soldiers. The Estate of Mr. Henry Finch, a Presbyterian Minister above-mention'd, was also seiz'd for his endeavouring to restore the King, who afterwards suffer'd the Bishop to take away his Living on account of his Religion, he being a Reform'd Protestant. The House order'd a Letter of Thanks, and a Jewel of a thousand Pounds for Major General Lambert; but on a Motion of Lieutenant General Fleetwood, to make him Major General of all their Armies, they avoided it, by voting, That there shou'd be no more General Officers than what were already made. Fleetwood mov'd it purposely to create a Difference between the Parliament and Lambert, who, he doubted not, wou'd resent this Slur upon him.

On the 3d of September the Parliament pass'd a Vote, That all Officers, when they receiv'd their Commissions, shou'd take an Engagement in

this

A.D. 1659 this Form of Words, and Dr. Wellwood assures us, Monk actually took it.

Engagements. I George Monk, do hereby declare, that I do renounce the pretended Title of CHARLES STUART, and the whole Line of the late King James, and of every other Person, as a single Person pretending to the Government of these Nations of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging, and that I will by the Grace and Assistance of Almighty God, be true, faithful and constant to this Common-wealth, against any King, single Person, and House of Peers, and every of them, and hereunto I subscribe my Name.

by Monk. It is pretended by Gumble, Webster, Price and such History Writers, that Monk did not take this Engagement, tho' every one else in Office were oblig'd to take it. But what's all this to the Purpose, had he not taken the Covenant, and the following Engagement for ten Years before, enjoin'd by an Act, You shall swear, that you shall be true and faithful to the Common-wealth of England, as it is now establish'd, without a King or House of Lords, which is equivalent with the last Engagement, and was taken by Monk, or he would not have had a Company under his Command? On the breaking out of Booth's Buſineſs, Monk wrote a Letter to the Parliament, with fresh Protestations of his Fidelity to them, and his Zeal for their Service, also of his Disapprobation of some Proceedings of the Army in England, meaning their Petition from Derby, "wherein they aspers'd the Parliament for not endeavouring to suppress the late Rebellion, with such Vigour as they ought, for not punishing those who had been engag'd in it, and for not rewarding the Officers who had defeated the Enemy. They press'd for a Settlement of the Government, in a Representative of the People, and a select Senate, which would have been Officers, and such only as the Officers pleas'd, and what discover'd fully their arbitrary Designs." That Lieutenant General Fleetwood might be made Commander in Chief of the Army, without any Limitation of Time; Major General Lambert, Major General of the Armies; Major General Desborough, Lieutenant General; Monk, Major General of the Foot: The latter was nam'd to keep him quiet, but he declar'd, he would not join in those dangerous Counsels, and that he would keep his Officers within the Rules of Modesty and Obedience to the Common-wealth. This was about four Months before he enter'd into a Treaty with the Common Enemy of that Common-wealth, contrary to all Covenants, Oaths and Engagements.

Monk
ers, ibid.
701. The Army, not unmindful of their grand Design, persuaded some of their Friends in Parliament, to move for an Order to continue Alderman Ireton, then Lord Mayor, and one of their Confidants, a Year longer in that Office; and the Parliament seem'd at first inclin'd to grant their Request, having perceiv'd great Discontents amongst the Citizens of London, at the Time of the late Insurrection; but, says Ludlow, "The Spirit of Sedition was much allay'd, since the Suppression of the Rebels;" the very Stile of the History of the Rebellion, and the Lord Clarendon's Artillery turn'd against him. "The City petition'd the Parliament, to permit them the Enjoyment of their Privilege, to elect their Lord Mayor, promising to employ that Favour, and all that they had for their Service; upon which they were permitted to proceed in that Affair, according to Custom, and Sir Thomas Allen, a Man of a moderate Spirit, being chosen, they invited the Parliament, and

A.D. 1659 "chief Officers of the Army to a splendid Entertainment at Dinner." The two Sheriffs were, Francis Warner, Esq; and William Love, Esq; all three, Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, Presbyterians, as were all the Aldermen, who were not Independants; tho' Robinson, who was Sheriff, when Chiverton was Mayor, and Brown, who was Sheriff in the Mayoralty of Andrews, being made Baronets after the Restoration, became most implacable Enemies, and cruel Persecutors of all those who were not of the Church of England, to which they had themselves profess'd Enmity for twenty Years together. I cannot write Panegyrics upon a Cause which took Effect, and was supported by Apostacy, Treachery and Cruelty.

The Derby Petition coming to the Knowledge of the Parliament, with the Endeavours that were us'd to procure Subscriptions to it, some who knew it to be a Contrivance of Major General by Lambert, mov'd that he might be sent to the Tower, and as Ludlow observes, "It had been well, either that the Motion had better succeeded, or that it had never been made; but it ended only in passing a Vote to disapprove the Petition, and the Proceedings thereon, and to require Lieutenant General Fleetwood to send Letters to all Parts, to obstruct any further Progress in it." This Petition was to have been presented by Lieutenant General Fleetwood, but he shewing it to Sir Arthur Haselrigge, before it got into the House, Sir Arthur procur'd this Order against it; upon which the Officers met at Wallingford-House, and tho' it was pretended to be only in order to declare their Acquiescence in the Resolution of the Parliament, yet they fell into furious Debates against the Parliament for discountenancing the Petition. Lambert, who was the main Mover in this Affair, tho' behind the Curtain, sitting all the while still, as if he had had no Hand in it, and rather encouraging than reproving their Excesses. The Result of their Debate was, that a Committee of Council of Officers shou'd prepare an Address to the Parliament, wherein, after the specious Promises of Obedience, "They desired that those who shou'd hereafter misinform the House, as had been done in their Case, might undergo the Censure of the Parliament. That a Commander in Chief might be constituted without Limitation of Time; that no Officer might be displac'd, unless by a Court Martial; that the Act of Indemnity might be enlarg'd; that the Revenue of Mr. Richard Cromwell might be augmented, his Debts paid, &c." The Parliament taking hold of that Clause in their Address, wherein they promis'd Obedience, gave them Thanks for their Affections express'd in it, and promis'd to take the Particulars of the Petition into their speedy and serious Consideration, and do therein according to Justice, and as far as they cou'd to their Satisfaction; in pursuance of this Promise, the Parliament proceeded to the Consideration of the several Parts of the Address, and had made a good Progress in it, when Col. Okey communicated to them a Letter, subscrib'd by Major General Lambert, Major General Desborough, Col. Berry, Col. Clerk, Col. Barrow, the Committee nominated by the Council of Officers, which had been sent to him to encourage Subscriptions to the Petition lately read in the House. It appear'd by this, that they intended the Petition to be the Ground on which they design'd to unite the Army against the Civil Authority: The Parliament finding that the Ways of Compliance, which they had been taking, serv'd only to encourage the Army to Mutiny and Rebellion, resolv'd upon sharper Counsels. And to that End, having caus'd the Door of the House to be lock'd, and fully inform'd themselves of the Matter of Fact, they voted the Commissions of those who had subscrib'd the Letter to be void. They voted the Commission of Lieutenant General Fleetwood to be void also, and plac'd, by an Act, the Power of Commanding in Chief all the Forces in England and Scotland, in the seven following Persons, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Major General Overton, Col. Morley, Col. Walton, Col. Monk. Then they caus'd the Speaker to demand of Lieutenant General Fleetwood, who was then present in the House, if he wou'd submit to this Resolution of the Parliament, to which he answer'd, I will. They also declar'd that no Tax shou'd be levy'd upon the People, unless by Act of Parliament, under the Penalty due to those that are guilty of High Treason. This Affair, tho' carry'd with as much Secrecy as cou'd be, yet came to the Notice of the Officers without Doors, who being surpriz'd at the Resolution of Parliament, and convinc'd that the least Delay might prove dangerous, us'd all possible Diligence in drawing together their Party, and preparing themselves for their design'd Work.

Parliament voted out the Officers of the Army.

A Committee to command in chief.

In the mean Time the Parliament order'd the Regiments of Col. Morley, and Col. Moss to march forthwith to Westminster, for their Security, and sent for the rest of the Troops that were about Town, to draw down to them also, with all convenient Speed. In pursuance of which Order, Col. Okey endeavour'd to bring down his Regiment of Horse, but the greatest Part of them deserted him. Major General Lambert was the Person who made the first Attempt against the Parliament's Guard, endeavouring at the Head of a Party of Horse, to break in upon that Part, where Col. Morley was posted with his Regiment; but the Colonel advancing, and assuring him, he wou'd fire upon him, if he persist'd; Lambert reply'd, I will then go the other Way, which he did, after he had given Orders to block up the Avenues by the Mill-bank, with Carts and other Impediments, to prevent the Guards of the Parliament from falling out upon his Men that Way. The Army plac'd also a Party of theirs in King-street, and in the Church-yard, near the Abbey, some of Col. Morley's Regiment having already possess'd themselves of the Old Palace-yard. In this Posture they continu'd all Night. The next Morning, October the 13th, that Guard of the Army which lay in the Church-yard, advanc'd with one Major Grimes, at the Head of them, towards those of Col. Morley's Regiment that were in the Palace-yard. The Colonel being inform'd of this Motion, drew out those he had with him, and hasten'd to their Relief. Both Parties being come within Pistol shot, those of the Army began to invite Morley's Men to come over to them, desiring them to remember they had hitherto fought together, and it was unreasonable now to become Enemies. Morley's Men endeavour'd to bring over Grimes's Soldiers, and the chief Officers at length interposing, 'twas agreed that both Parties shou'd for the present, retire to their Stations. On the other Side, Major General Lambert being advanc'd near the Party, which was commanded by Col. Moss, demanded of them, if they wou'd suffer nine of their old Officers, who had so often spent their Blood for them, and with them, to be disgrac'd and ruin'd with their Families? The Colonel answer'd, Tho' this shou'd be the Case, yet it was much better that nine Families shou'd be destroy'd than the civil Authority of the Nation be trampled under Foot, who design'd not the Ruin of any, but only to remove from their Com- mands nine Officers, who by their seditious Carriage, had render'd themselves unworthy of that Trust. But Lambert's Oratory was more prevalent with Evelyn, who commanded the Parliament's Life-Guard of Horse, and marching forth at the Head of his Troop to do his Duty, was met by Lambert, at Scotland Yard Gate. His Men by the treacherous Perswasions of one Catnefs, his Lieutenant, revolted, and the Major General commanded Evelyn to dismount, which he did at the Head of his Troop, which went over to the General who was a Foot, and none with him. The same did some of Col. Moss's Regiment, Lambert each Party using their Rhetorick to bring over as many as they cou'd. And some came over to the Parliament's Party, particularly three entire Companies of Col. Sydenham's Regiment. At last the Army gain'd their Point, and plac'd Guards both by Land and Water, to hinder the Members of Parliament from approaching the House, tho' Sir Peter Wentworth being row'd by a Crew of able Watermen, broke thro' their Guard on the River, and got into the House.

In the mean Time, the Speaker endeavouring to pass in his Coach, thro' the Guards of the Army, was stopp'd near the Gate of the Palace-yard, by Lieutenant Col. Duckenfield, who had been very busy about the Derby Petition. Duckenfield ask'd the Speaker, whither he was going? He answer'd, to perform my Duty at the House, and turning himself to the Soldiers, he said, I am your General, and expect your Obedience; but the Soldiers forc'd his Coachman to drive back, and as he pass'd by Wallingford-House, wou'd have compell'd him to drive in at the Gate, telling the Speaker, he must go to Lieutenant General Fleetwood; but Lenthall commanded his Coachman to drive home, saying to the Officers, If Lieutenant General Fleetwood has any Business with me, he may come to my House; so they desist'd.

Col. Sydenham endeavouring to justify this Violence in the Council of State, saying, 'Twas the last Remedy made use of by a particular Call of divine Providence, the Lord President Bradshaw, tho' in a languishing Condition, stood up, and interrupted him, telling the Council, He was now going to his God, and had not Patience to bear his great Name so openly blasphem'd; so he left them, departed to his Lodgings, and withdrew himself from publick Employment. Lambert and Desborough for the Army, Haselrigge and Morley for the Parliament, had a warm Debate in the Council about this Transaction, but the Officers prevail'd in it, and it was agreed to save the Effusion of Blood, that the Parliament shou'd not sit. So the general Council of Officers undertook the Government, and to draw up a Form for a new Parliament, who were to settle all Things. After which the Council of State sent Orders to the Soldiers of each Party to draw off, and depart to their several Quarters, which they obey'd.

The Council of Officers declar'd Fleetwood Commander in Chief, sent Col. Barrow to Ireland, and Col. Cobber to Scotland, to acquaint the Officers of the Forces there, of their Proceedings, and to desire their Concurrence. They nominated a Committee of Ten, to consider of Affairs, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Major General Lambert, Lord Commissioner Whitlock, Sir Henry of State, Vane, Humphry Salway, Esq; Sir Archibald Johnston, Lord Waristoun, Sir James Harrington, Major General Desborough, Col. Sydenham, Col. Berry.

The old Council of State was dissolv'd with the Commonwealth, which had lasted but five Months three Days. Sir Arthur Haselrigge and his Party, continu'd their Consultations how to restore

The Council of Officers appointed Lieutenant General Fleetwood; Major General Lambert, Sir Henry Vane, Major General Desborough, Lieutenant General Ludlow, and Col. Berry, to be a Committee to nominate Officers of the Army; and they also agreed upon a New Council to manage the great Affairs of the State till the Meeting of the new Parliament.

Monk and his Wife's Character.

The Writers of History, who are transported with the Blessings of the Restoration, without telling us one of them, enter here into the Encomiums of Major General Monk, who, probably, about this Time began to think that he might make himself some Body, by siding with the weaker Party, which was that of the Parliament. To imagine that a Man of his Head cou'd have foreseen, amidst the Despair the Royalists were in on the suppressing Sir George Booth's Insurrection, that he might be able to restore the King, is making him to have more Understanding, not only than ever he was thought to have had, but more than all the whole Party pretended to. Lord Clarendon says, It put an end to all Endeavours of Force, and that the King's Condition was a State of Despair, two or three Months only before he was restor'd. One need only consider, that it was not reasonable for Monk to expect that Lambert, who had restor'd the Commonwealth four or five Months before, wou'd destroy it again in so little time; and without his destroying it, Monk might have as well have thought of bringing in the Pope as the King. The Persons he is said to have consulted, and to have been advis'd by, were Nicholas Monk, his Brother, a Country Parson, of very mean Parts, afterwards a Bishop; his Cousin Morrice, a Pedant, and a conceited Person, of no true Judgment, according to Bishop Burnet, Dr. Thomas Charges, an obscure Apothecary, and his Sister, Monk's Wife, a ravenous, mean, contemptible Creature, as the Bishop of Salisbury terms her, and Greenwile, who, says the Bishop, thought of nothing but of getting and spending. I cou'd expatiate on all these Characters, and set them further in their proper Light, or rather, their proper Darkness, if I were not apprehensive that I must have very good Authority for every thing within this Period. These were excellent Managers to overturn the Government, if unforeseen Accidents had not fallen out one after another to lead Monk, Step after Step, till the Business was done before he was aware of it. Yet Echard, putting on a grave Air, tells us, After all, we have the greatest Reasons to believe he has not one Reason in the World, that his Intention to restore the King was very early. Another such Writer affirms, He took a Commission in the Parliament Service, the better to conceal his Intentions of serving his Majesty secretly. Webster, and Gumble, and Price, Ecclesiasticks, tell us the same, which is not only contrary to the Truth, but to Credibility. Dr. Welwood, who speaks better Things of him than he deserv'd, says, I question whether he design'd to restore the King till after Richard Cromwel was depriv'd, and I question whether he had ever any such Design at all, till after he was afraid he wou'd be restor'd by some body else. He proceeds, If he had really such an Intention, he did not prove himself to be a very good Christian in it, for he declar'd once again at that time for a Commonwealth, without a King, a single Person, or House of Lords, and formally renounc'd the Family of the Stuarts. All which is deny'd by Welwood the three Ecclesiasticks above-mention'd. Warwick, after he has told us of another Twist of the Guts, tells us, No Man can say, that Monk design'd any more than a general Quiet of the Land; tho' Father Orleans affirms he was timorous and heavy, a Man of slow Understanding; yet it must be own'd he had Courage enough, of that sort of Courage which proceeds from Insensibility of Danger, and not from a Desire of Glory: Or if he had any Thirst of Fame, it was no other than as it wou'd acquire him Posts, and bring him in Pay, Bishop Burnet informing us, that as to the latter he was perfectly ravenous. He and his Wife sold all that was within their Reach, nothing being deny'd them for some time, till he became so useless, that little personal Reward cou'd be paid him. But the King maintain'd still the Appearance of it, for the Appearance of the Service he did him. And indeed it was very little more than Appearance: Had much more been wanting to do the Business, it wou'd not have been done by him. He said little, not having much to say; and when he did say any thing, 'twas with an ill Grace. He lov'd good Eating and Drinking, and had Plenty of it while he liv'd at Dalkeith, in the House belonging now to the Dutchess of Monmouth, where he fed his Cavalier Guests high, and had always a Table for the Kirkmen, who wou'd come to him. A Man who can eat and drink well, is, in the vulgar Acceptation, very good Company; and he, who had no other Way of becoming popular, succeeded in that. While he was in Scotland he profess'd much Friendship for the Marquess of Argyle; and having receiv'd some Letters from that Lord, after he return'd to England, where he unbosom'd himself, as to a Friend, concerning the Cause they were then both engag'd in, Monk sent those Letters to Scotland when the Lord Argyle was to be try'd for his Life, which, says Bishop Burnet, was a betraying the Confidence they had liv'd in; and it was the more vile and wicked, for that the Marquess was condemn'd upon those Letters. He was little consider'd, according to the same Author, after he had modell'd the Army, and we shall see in the Course of the History, that he was more consider'd before it than the Merit of his Services to his Country amounted to.

Lieutenant General Ludlow, a very Wise and Brave Man, perceiv'd that the Misintelligence between the Parliament and Army would necessarily bring in the King; and as he had a very just Conception of the Characters of that Prince and his Followers, he did his utmost to prevent it. In order to which, he endeavour'd to reconcile both Parties: At a Meeting of both, Sir Henry Vane, Major Salway, and Ludlow for the Parliament; Fleetwood, Lambert, Sydenham, and Desborough for the Army, the Matter was debated, and Lambert excus'd what he had done, by Promises of what he wou'd do. Mr. Ludlow procur'd another Meeting, and did all he cou'd to moderate the Warmth of his Brother-

A.D. 1659 the Common-wealth's Men, who wou'd hear of no Accommodation, without being restor'd to their Seats in Parliament. Some of the Council of State wrote Letters to Monk to encourage him in his Resolutions to stand by the Common-wealth, in Opposition to the Wallingford-House Party. No sooner was Col. Cobbet arriv'd at Dalkeith, than Monk order'd him to be seiz'd, together with some other Officers whom he suspected, particularly Major Holmes, a very good Soldier, and good Englishman; who, Thirty Years after, lost his Life, not in a very unwarrantable Contest, though against a very unwarrantable Government; he suffering Death for joining with the Duke of Monmouth against King Charles's Brother, King James. Dr. Welwood tells a Story, which if it had come off as was design'd, wou'd have spoil'd all the Projects that Monk himself, his Wife, or her Brother Clarges cou'd have invented. The Committee of Safety had form'd a Design to secure his Person, just as he was about Marching into England. They dispatch'd secret Orders to Scotland, by the ordinary Packet which us'd constantly to touch at Dalkeith while the General resided there; but this Packet was order'd directly to Edinburgh, four Miles off.

It happen'd that one of Monk's Life-guard accidentally met the Post turning out of the Road which led to Dalkeith, and finding he had not touch'd there, brought him back, notwithstanding the Packet was directed to Edinburgh. Monk suspecting something, open'd all the Letters that were directed to the Officers of the Army; among which, there was one from the Committee to Col. Wilks, ordering him to use the most effectual, speedy, and secret Way to secure the Person of General Monk, and to send him up to London under a strong Guard, in a Frigate which lay in Leith Road; and to take upon him the Command of the Army till farther Order. Having taken out this, and what other Letters he thought fit, together with his own from the same Committee, full of high Compliments and Expressions of Trust, he sent away the Packet as it was directed. But having communicated the Matter to some particular Friends, he gave Orders for a General Rendezvous of the Army at Edinburgh, where he Arrested Col. Wilks, and some other Officers of whom he was suspicious, sent them Prisoners to the Castle, and fill'd up their Commissions with others of his own Creatures; and also declar'd his Resolution to his Soldiers, To adhere to the Civil Authority, and to restore the Parliament.

In the mean Time, the Officers at Wallingford-House took away the Commissions of Col. Okey, Col. Morley, Col. Mured, and Lieutenant Colonel Farley; and were more solicitous to secure themselves at Home, than to make Provision against Monk in Scotland; to whom Col. Whalley, Col. Gough, Mr. Caryl, and Mr. Barker were sent to persuade him to a right Understanding to prevent Effusion of Blood. The Committee of Safety appointed Major General Lambert to command all the Forces in the North, where there were enough to have cut Monk's, and another such Army to pieces, had not the Parliament Party, under-hand, given him Encouragement, and prevail'd with the Soldiery almost to a general Defection.

On the first of November the Committee appointed Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Lord Commissioner Whitlock, Sir Henry Vane, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Major Salway, and Alderman Tichburne, to consider of a Form of Government for the Three Nations, as a Common-wealth, and to present it to the Committee of Safety; but nothing came of it. Monk secur'd A.D. 1659 Berwick, and attempted Carlisle in vain. Lambert having taken his Leave of the Committee, and earnestly recommended to them to hasten and perfect the Form of Government, took Post for Tork; where he found Major General Morgan, famous for his Services in Flanders and Artois, who was then going to Scotland to confer with Monk; and promis'd Lambert to use his Credit with him, to bring him to an Accommodation. While Morgan was at Tork, he had several Conferences with the Reverend and Learned Mr. Bowles, one of the Four Ministers maintain'd by the State in that City; who sent a Letter by Morgan to Monk, importing, That the Compl. Lord Fairfax, and many others of good Interest Hist. p. were willing to join with him, but disapprov'd his Declaration which was restrain'd to that Parliament only, which sat after the rest were seclud'd, and was fill'd with Protestations for no other Government but a Common-wealth. Thus we see here, that the first Person who insist'd upon the Admission of the seclud'd Members, which of course admitted the King, was a Presbyterian Minister. Monk, who was still the Champion of the Republick, sent Clarges to Tork, to satisfy Mr. Bowles, that whatever his Declaration said, his Intentions were the reverse of it, but till he had more Strength, he must not talk otherwise. Clarges was order'd to discourse Mr. Bowles before he spoke to my Lord Fairfax: Bowles desir'd him to stay privately in Tork while he transacted the Affair with that Lord, and he did it so effectually, that the Lord Fairfax return'd an Answer by him to Monk, assuring him of Assistance from himself, Mr. Bothel, Mr. Smithson, and other leading Gentlemen of that large County, all Presbyterians.

Whatever is said in the Earl of Clarendon's, Warwick's, and Echard's Histories of Monk's Reservedness and Taciturnity, must be taken as the best Turn they cou'd give to his want of Genius and Expression; for he was not so silent and so reserv'd, but Men of Sense knew the very Bottom of him, and wou'd have prevented his doing Mischief, if the People had not been stir'd with Changes of Government, that they were resolv'd to submit to any thing, rather than make new Experiments of the late Forms. Lieutenant General Ludlow writes, It was manifest to me through all his Discourses, by the Persons he favour'd and advanc'd, by the Company he kept, and by the Course he steer'd, that he was not bound to the Harbour he pretended; and cou'd I have prevail'd with the majority of the Parliament to be of the same Opinion, he shou'd not have carry'd on his Design so smoothly.

Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Lord Commissioner Whitlock, Commissary General Desborough, with several Principal Officers of the Army, went to the Common-Council of London the eighth of November, and represented to them the Proceedings of Monk, and that his real Design was to bring in the King. They shew'd the Danger of it to the City, and the People of England, and counselled them to provide for their own Safety, and to join for the Safety of the whole Nation, and for the Preservation of the Peace. The Common-Council thank'd them, and said they wou'd follow their Advice; the Officers of the Army in Ireland, and of the Fleet, wrote to Monk not to oppose the General Council of Officers. The Officers of the Fleet, Capt. Richard Stayner, Capt. Richard Haddock, Capt. Christopher Myngs, Capt. Charles Wager, and about twenty more, say, It is obvious to us where-ever we come, that few or none take pleasure in your Actions but the Cavaliers,

A.D. 1659 who make their Boast of you, and place their Confidence in you; which, as it is irksome to us to hear, so we trust, and shall pray that the Lord will preserve you from such a Defection, as knowing that never any prosper'd that help'd them. These discouraging Letters gave a Check to Monk's Proceedings, and Lambert's advancing Northward so startled him, that he came to a Treaty, and nam'd his Commissioners, Col. Wilks (which shews that it must have been before Wetwood's Incident of the Packet) Col. Knight, and Lieutenant Colonel Cloberry, who coming to London, made such strong Professions of Monk's good Intentions, that they convinc'd many of his honest Meaning, and by their readiness to accommodate Matters, took off much of Peoples Thoughts, either as to Monk's Treachery, or their own Danger.

In the mean Time Col. Whetbam, Governor of Portsmouth, was prevail'd with to admit Col. Walton, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, and Col. Morley; with two Regiments, into that important Place; upon which they declar'd for the Parliament, and sent for more Forces to join them. These Officers, impos'd upon by Monk's fair Pretences, gave out, that they were all engag'd in the same Cause; and this powerful Diversion, with the Defection of Vice-Admiral Lawson, and the Officers of the Fleet, from the Wallingford-House Party, gave Monk Encouragement to proceed, especially after he had got 30,000 Pounds of the Scots to pay his Army; whereas the English Soldiers were unpaid, and in no likelihood of Pay, having a Vote of Parliament against raising Money without their Act, and there being no Parliament sitting to raise any.

Monk's Intent was so well known, that 'twas the common Discourse in Conversation; but the Parliament Party was so blinded by Resentment against the Army, that they cou'd not, or wou'd not see it. Whitlock informs us, that having told the Convention in Scotland he had a Call from God to march into England, he caus'd an Engagement to be sign'd, and then began his March about the twentieth of November. While this was transacting in Scotland, the Lord Willoughby of Parham, Alderman Robinson, Mr. Brown, Whitlock and Mr. Loe, came to the Lord Commissioner to bring in Whitlock, and confirm'd him in his Suspicion of Monk's Treachery, and propos'd to him to go to the Lord Fleetwood, and advise him to send forthwith to the King at Breda, to offer to bring him in upon good Terms. These Gentlemen talk'd like reasonable Creatures, and wou'd thereby have got beforehand with Monk, who, without question, intended to bring in the King. Whitlock, upon serious Thoughts of it, went to Fleetwood, and they had a long private Discourse together on the Twenty second of November. The Lord Commissioner told him, "That by the desire of his Brother, Sir William Fleetwood, the Lord Willoughby of Parham, and the Gentlemen above-mention'd, he was come to discourse with him about their present Condition, and what was fit to be done in such an Exigency as their Affairs were now in; that it was more than evident Monk's Design was to bring in the King, and that without any Terms for the Parliament, whereby all their Lives and Fortunes wou'd be at the Mercy of the King and his Party, who were sufficiently enrag'd against them, and in need of repairing their broken Fortunes." How natural this was for Men to consider! Their Fortunes, as Whitlock tells us, were broken, the King and his Followers enrag'd, and there cou'd hardly have been found such another Man as Monk, to consent to their Return, without some Provision against their Revenge and Rapine. Whitlock proceeded, "The Inclinations of the Presbyterian Party generally, and of many others, and of the City, and most of the Parliament's old Friends were the same way, so was a great Part of the Soldiery; that those here were revolted from Fleetwood, and those in the North were ready to revolt from Lambert: That Monk had deluded Haselrigge, and the rest of the old Parliament Men; that all the incens'd Lords and secluded Members wou'd be, and were active in this Design; so that the coming in of the King is unavoidable, and, I think, continues Whitlock, being that must be, it is more Prudence for you and your Friends to be the Instruments of bringing him in, than to leave it to Monk; by this Means you may make Terms with the King, for Preservation of your self and your Friends, and of the Cause, in a good measure, wherein we have been engag'd; but if it be left to Monk, we, and all that has been done, will be left to the danger of Destruction. We see what a wretched Opinion the Lord Commissioner had of his Head and his Heart, his Capacity and Conscience. Had the King's Restoration, for which almost all Men wish'd, been in good Hands, as he was a well-natur'd Prince, he wou'd have comply'd with their reasonable Requests; and though he wou'd not have put away his Followers, he wou'd not have put them in a Condition to bring so much Misery on their Country as they did by their future Administration, in reviving the old Laudian Persecution, which was one of the Causes that produc'd such terrible Effects in his Father's Time.

Whitlock again; I therefore propound to you one of these two Things, either to give Orders for all your Forces to draw together, and your self and your Friends to appear in the Head of them, and see what Strength you can make that will stand by you, and accordingly to take further Resolutions. If you find their Strength but small, as I doubt, then with these few you have, to go to the Tower, and take Possession of it; and to send to the Mayor and Common Council of London to join with you, and declare for a Free Parliament, which, I think, the City will willingly do; and furnish you with Money for your Soldiers, which will encrease their Number.

Lieutenant General Fleetwood ask'd Mr. Whitlock, Will you go with me into the Field and to the Tower? Whitlock reply'd, I will. Then said Fleetwood, What is the other Way you have to propose to me in this Exigency? It is this, answer'd Whitlock, Send away some Person of Trust immediately to the King at Breda, offer him and his Friends Service for his Restoration, upon such Terms as the King shall agree upon; and for this Purpose give your Instructions to the Party you shall send upon this Affair.

Fleetwood ask'd Whitlock, Are you willing to go your self upon this Employment? The Lord Commissioner reply'd, I will go, if you think good to send me. They had more Talk on this Subject; and Fleetwood seem'd fully satisfy'd to send Whitlock to the King, desiring Whitlock to prepare himself forthwith for the Journey; and in the mean time Fleetwood and his Friends wou'd draw up Instructions for him, so that he might set out that Evening, or next Morning early.

Here was a Crisis for the Liberty and Happiness of these Kingdoms, for the Glory and Happiness of the King! If Whitlock had gone, and Fleetwood had prepar'd the Army to receive him, his Majesty might have been on his Throne before Monk was got to Torkshire, and been restor'd by Men, who wou'd have taken equal Care of A Crisis.

Ld. Willoughby, etc. desires of Parham, Alderman Robinson, Mr. Brown, Whitlock and Mr. Loe, came to the Lord Commissioner to bring in Whitlock, and confirm'd him in his Suspicion of the King.

A.D. 1659
Conference between Whitlock and Fleetwood upon it.

A.D. 1659 his Honour, and the Subjects Peace and Safety, Spiritual and Temporal: They were virtuous, sensible Men, of a quite different Character from Monk, who had never till now a greater Name in the World than that of Oliver's Tool. But 'twas the King's and the People's ill Fate, that he fell into the Hands of a Set of Men, who thought of nothing but Titles, Honours, Riches, Pride, Vanity, Luxury, Revenge, Riot and Prostitution! In a Word, he was hardly warm in his Royal Seat, before we have this Description of the Blessings he brought with him from Bishop Burnet, "A Spirit of extravagant Joy spread over the Nation, that brought on with it the throwing off the very Professions of Virtue and Piety. All ended in Entertainments and Drunkenness, which over-run the three Kingdoms to such a Degree, that it very much corrupted all their Morals," of which I shall have too much Occasion to say more hereafter. For it is an undeniable Proof, that there was hardly any Shadow of Religion left, but what consisted in a flaming Zeal for the Laudian Church, and more flaming Rage against the Presbyterians. All this would have been prevented, had Fleetwood, Whitlock, and their Friends conducted this Affair. For without the Stale Covenant (which as much a Jest as it was, the King had taken all Sacraments to confirm as soon as he was restor'd to his Kingdoms) they would have obtain'd such reasonable Terms, as would have prevented the patching up of the broken Fortunes mention'd by Whitlock, at the Expence of the publick Treasure, and the cruel Persecutions which ruin'd the Men who had put it into the King's Power to ruin them. But the Crisis receiv'd it's unhappy Turn by Fate, against which no Wisdom, no Care is a Defence.

The Blessings King Charles brought in with him.

Whitlock going away from Fleetwood, met Vane, Desborough and Berry in the next Room, and they desir'd him to stay a little. Whitlock suspected what would be the Issue of their Consultations; and within a Quarter of an Hour Fleetwood came to him, and in much Passion said, I cannot do it, I cannot do it. The Commissioner desir'd his Reasons why he cou'd not do it? The Lieutenant General answer'd, These Gentlemen have remember'd me, and it is true, that I am engag'd not to do any such thing without my Lord Lambert's Consent. Whitlock reply'd, Lambert is at too great a Distance to have his Consent to this Business, which must be instantly acted. Fleetwood said again, I cannot do it without him. The Commissioner reply'd, You will ruin your self and your Friends. I cannot help it, said Fleetwood; which put an End to this Discourse and Negotiation. It was the King's Work to try every Thing, and every Body, as he did Col. Lockhart, Governor of Dunkirk, long enough after Monk's Brother Nicholas and Greenville had been with him. Lockhart, after the Peace of the Pyrenees was made, of which we must make further Mention, went from Dunkirk to London, where he found Monk, and took all the Pains he cou'd to sift him. But Monk disappointed his Penetration by the most solemn and sacred Vows, that he would be true to the Common-wealth, and against Charles Stuart, about a Month before he restor'd him. There's no Defence against detestable Treachery, such steady Defiance of Truth, and of it's God. An honest Mind can have no such Conception of Fraud in a Man's Heart, when with a settled Countenance he calls the Almighty to witness to the Sincerity of his Intentions. Bishop Burnet tells us further, Lockhart went away persuaded that Matters would continue still in the same State; so that when his old Friend Middleton wrote to him to make his own Terms, if he would invite the King to Dunkirk, Lockhart said, I am trusted by the Common-wealth, and cannot betray it. There are not, in a corrupt Age, many such Traitors to be found, who for Lucre will betray a high Trust, and his best Patrons and Friends that confided in him. A Man's Soul must be extremely callous, his Conscience fear'd, and his Corruption next to Infernal, to turn Traitor to loving and bountiful Masters, and sell his Country, his Religion, his Friends, and whatever is precious to good Men, for a swelling Title, and ill-got Goods. Lockhart said, if it had not been for the Division in England, the English might have had what Terms they cou'd have ask'd from France or Spain. Col. Ingoldsby, his Son in Law, Mr. Lee, and the Lord Viscount Howard, who all bore Kindness to the Lord Commissioner Whitlock, came to him the next Day, and had Discourse of the Change which they saw coming on, insinuating to him, that, as his Condition was, he cou'd not do better than go away to the King with the Great Seal. The Advice was good; and every such Man would have been a Treasure to his Majesty, to balance the rash Counsels of the weak Men he had about him, if we may believe Cardinal Mazarine. But tho' his going off in that Manner would have been only leaving a Trust which was of no great Significance in that State of Confusion, yet Mr. Whitlock thought the very Appearance to be vile, wicked and abominable, and ventur'd his and his Family's Ruin, tho' of much more Consequence than Monk's, rather than give his Friends Cause to think ill of him. Upon which the three Gentlemen before-mention'd made their Peace with the King in their own Way.

Whitlock refuses to go to the King.

The Truth is, Lieutenant General Fleetwood had not such an entire Command of the Soldiers, as to be able to draw them whither he would. Most of them had shew'd a Willingness to submit to the Parliament for their Pay; and he had no other Use to make of them, than to joyn with the City, and declare for a free Parliament, which probably they would have fallen in with.

Before Monk left Scotland, he had modell'd his Army for his Purpose. A great many conscientious Officers suspecting his Intentions, laid down their Commissions, for which they are blam'd by Ludlow, as thereby giving Monk an Opportunity to put in his own Creatures.

The Treaty between the Wallingford-House Treaty between Commissioners and Monk's was concluded: The latter was to have Money to pay his Forces, to be one of the Committee for Nomination of Officers, a Representative of the People to be speedily call'd, and Commissioners appointed to consider of the Qualifications for the Members; and Commissioners were agreed upon by

Monk's Party,

Thomas Scot, Esq; Sir James Harrington, Col. Thompson.

Wallingford-House Party,

Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Sir Henry Vane, Major Salway.

Army in Ireland,

Lieutenant General Ludlow, Col. Barrow, Lieutenant Col. Dobson.

By another Article of the foregoing Treaty, a General Council of the Officers of the Armies in England, Scotland and Ireland were to meet at Whitehall on a certain Day, and to consist of two Persons chosen out of each Regiment; as also

Deputies

A.D. 1659 Deputies from the Fleet; which Assembly were to prepare Matters for the Consideration of the new Representative, and to engage for the Army's being obedient to the Settlement they should make. This very wise and rational Scheme was again frustrated by the Management of the Wallingford-House Party, who were loath to part with the Power they had usurp'd, the Committee of Safety, which was the present Government, being their own Creatures. Cloberry and the rest of Monk's Commissioners refus'd to shew what Authority they had from him to treat; it is thought they had no regular Authority: However, the Wallingford-House Officers did treat and conclude with them, and by that Means Lambert's Forces were kept from attacking Monk, which Ludlow says he was afraid of, having found his own Troops wavering and doubtful. The Confusion of the Times had infected the Heads of the Officers of the Army, and Lambert, who had as good a one as any in Europe, was so confounded, that he gave Monk all manner of Advantages, by modelling his own Army, and corrupting Lambert's, to prepare the Way for his safe March into England; whence he had good Intelligence that the Parliament Party were stirring every where, and would be ready to receive and welcome him when he came: Besides, the Taxes which maintain'd Fleetwood's Soldiers expir'd in January, and then he doubted not they would all desert to the first fair Bidder. In Expectation of these Things, which might have been expected with as much Thought as he was capable of, he sat down quietly at a Village call'd Cold-Stream, on the Scotch Side of the River Tweed. From which Village, and his Stay there, his Regiment, made a Regiment of Guards, was call'd the Cold-Stream Regiment, as is the Second of Foot-Guards to this Day.

There was a Project which would have balk'd his Politick Views relating to the Taxes, had it succeeded, which too much exposes the Designs of Men of two Faculties to be remembered in my own Words; take it therefore in Lieutenant General Ludlow's:

Tythes to be taken away.

"The Parliament had manifested, before their last Interruption, an Inclination to ease the People of the Payment of Tythes." The Earl of Clarendon, Mr. Archdeacon, and the Compleat Historian, do in several Places urge this Sinking of Tythes against the Parliament, to prove they had no Religion, and were meer Infidels. We will not infer from thence, that these Historians and their Disciples did build Religion on the Foundation of Revenue and Power, because Tythes do invest Incumbents with so much of every Freeholder's Property, as to enable them to be very troublesome to their Parishioners; but we can't help observing, that they avoid letting us know why the Parliament talk'd of it, and how they tended to supply the Room of Tythes. Ludlow has it, "The Parliament in lieu of them would have appropriated a certain Sum of Money for the Maintenance and Encouragement of the Ministry, to be distributed in a more equal manner than had formerly been practis'd; hoping, that if this could be effected, the Clergy would no longer have any other Interest to promote than that of the Publick, nor be a distinct Party from the People." What Hopes these were? Why they might as well have hop'd for Reformation, Peace, and Union! If such Clergy may not look upon themselves as Independant of the State, and promote their own, or any other Interest, separate from that of the Publick, they would not pride themselves much in the Establishment.

Clergy, a distinct Party, p. 351.

The Lawyers, and surely they had as much Learning and Disinterest as the Lawyers of our own Time! were alarm'd at the Bill for Regulating their Practice, which, as it is now, is still more a Grievance than it was then, fell in with the Clergy. Ludlow proceeds, "These two Parties therefore being equally concern'd to perpetuate the Abuses practis'd amongst them, became equally sensible of their common Danger; and in order to prevent it, Whitlock and St. John for the Lawyers, Dr. Owen and Mr. Nye for the Clergy, had at this time frequent Meetings at the Savoy, and enter'd into a private Treaty with the principal Persons of the Wallingford-House Party, offering to raise 100,000 Pounds for the Use of the Army, upon Assurance of being protected by them in the full Enjoyment of their respective Advantages and Profits; whereby we were left destitute of Hope to see any other Reformation of the Clergy. Good God! If there was no Hope of their Reformation then, when there was every where to be seen the Face of Purity and Piety, what Hope have we now, when there is every where to be seen the Face of ----- Our Enemies will tell the rest with Pleasure, than what they themselves would consent to, nor any other Regulation of the Law, than what the Chief Justice and the Commissioner of the Seal would permit." A bold Scheme this! But Monk's approaching, and Lambert's and Fleetwood's Soldiers falling off, hinder'd it's taking Effect.

There was a pack'd Assembly of Officers pursuant to the before-mention'd Agreement. But no Deputies came from Monk, and none from Ireland. Those that did come quarrell'd amongst themselves, and it broke up without determining any thing. But there was a Meeting of some Officers and some Members of Parliament in private, Sir Henry Vane, Major Salway, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Desborough, Berry and others, where the restoring of Richard was mov'd, and then the restoring of Charles Stuart, which was only hinted by Major Salway. The Officers and Members were so jealous of each other, that nothing which was said by one had any Influence on another; they all stood on their Guard, in a Suspicion that they all might have reconcil'd themselves to Monk or the King, to the Parliament or the Army. No body knew on what Ground he stood. Every one fear'd it might every Minute give Way under him; and in this Perplexity, Distraction and Uncertainty, this Tyranny of Soldiers, this Impotence of the Parliament, what Government could have been propounded to the Nation, which, if they had been in their Wits, they would not have prefer'd to any they had liv'd under for twelve Months past? 'Tis true, they were reduc'd to one Choice, and they made it with the Success of those poor People who have but one Choice to make.

In the mean while the Parliament Party was not wanting to promote their Interest, and to that End form'd a Design to seize the Tower. Colonel Fitz the Lieutenant had consented to open the Gates to Colonel Okey, who was to bring 300 Men to change the Garrison; but by some Accident or other the Design was discover'd to the Lord Mayor, who inform'd the Wallingford-House Officers of it the Night before 'twas to be executed, and Major General Desborough went to the Tower, chang'd the Guards, caus'd Fitz to be apprehended, and left Colonel Miller to command there. Major Croke in Wiltshire declar'd for the Parliament; so did the Governor and Garrison of Hurst-Castle; and what was much more to the Purpose, the Officers of the Fleet sent Word to Sir Arthur Haselrigge

A. D. 1659 rigge at Portsmouth, that they wou'd not oppose the Parliament. With this News was Col. Walton dispatch'd to Monk, who still pretended to be the greatest Republican and Presbyterian in the three Kingdoms. Ludlow very justly terms the Obstinacy of the Wallingford-House Party against the Parliament to be an Infatuation: Their Ruin was infallibly involv'd in that of the Commonwealth, yet they were harden'd as was Pharaoh, and as all proud Men are, who are fated to Destruction.

Cavalier-
Plot.

We are come within a few Weeks of the Restoration, and we yet hear not a Word of the Cavaliers, unless from those whom Dr. Davenant, in one of his Political Essays against the Government, in King William's Reign, calls Under Spur-Leathers. The first that Ludlow thought worth taking Notice of was, while Monk lay quiet at Coldstream. Several of them who fled beyond Sea, return'd secretly to London, choosing rather to venture their Necks at home, than to starve any longer abroad; and hearing there were great Divisions in the Army, General against General, and Regiment against Regiment, they hop'd to surprize them thus divided, and cut them off one after another, whom they durst not look in the Face, when united in a Body. The Troops in and about London were most expos'd to their sudden Attempts, the City being exasperated against the Soldiery, for pulling down the Commonwealth, who had always taken Care to oblige them, and endear them by all the friendly Acts that were in their Power, and many of them despairing of seeing the Parliament restor'd, fell in with those who were for restoring the King, which very much increas'd that Party in London, the Suburbs, and Neighbourhood. It was contriv'd among them, that they shou'd rise against the Army in ten several Parts of the City, surprize the Soldiers in their Quarters, knock them on the Head, and proclaim the King; but it happen'd that the Army receiv'd Information of that Design too, the Night before it was to be executed, and being alarm'd at the Danger, they immediately sent several Parties of Horse and Foot to take Possession of those Places which were appointed by the Enemy for their drawing together, by which Means they seiz'd some of them, who at twelve o' Clock the same Night were already come together, compleatly arm'd in a Part of the Temple, near the Water-Side. Others of the same Company got over the Wall, and escap'd in Boats. Many of the Conspirators were taken in other Parts of the Town, with Horses and Arms; some of them confess'd that the Officer who commanded a Party plac'd near St. Paul's Church, had promis'd to join with them; but here is not the Name of one Royalist of Note. They who had contributed so much to the driving the King out of the Kingdom, contributed little or nothing to the bringing him in again; for tho' there was an Insurrection soon after, which the Earl of Clarendon writes the History of, by the Royalists, yet no Man amongst them was so considerable, as to deserve to be remembred. Indeed they were not Men in their full growth of Mind or Body. They were only Apprentices, What the Masters durst not publicly own, says the Lord Clarendon, the Apprentices did; meeting in great Multitudes to Petition the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, to procure a free Parliament, by which was always understood the King. Many of the King's Party, says Ludlow, Men of desperate Fortunes, intermix'd with them, insomuch that the Army thought it necessary to send Col. Hewson with a Regiment to suppress them; accordingly he march'd into the City, where he was affronted to his Face, his Men fir'd upon from Windows, and Stones thrown down on them A. D. 1659 from the Tops of the Houses, and as they proceeded in their March, they were so press'd on by the Multitude, that the Soldiers, to preserve themselves from Violence, were oblig'd to fire upon them, and having kill'd three or four of their Number, the rest dispers'd themselves for that Time; but Tumults were now become so frequent in the City, that the Army Party found themselves oblig'd to send considerable Guards thither, almost every Day, to suppress them; one of which being commanded, by Col. Desborough, carry'd themselves so roughly towards several eminent Citizens, that they greatly disgusted the whole City. The Aldermen and Common-Council not thinking it convenient openly to patronize those Disorders, agreed upon a Paper to be presented to the Council of Officers, wherein having disown'd the late Tumults, they complain'd of the killing of their Men and of the Guards that were kept in the City, desiring that they might be withdrawn, and the Guard of the City left to the civil Magistrate, who cou'd not otherwise undertake to secure the Peace, and that a Parliament might be call'd. The Council of Officers return'd for Answer, That if the Aldermen and Common-Council wou'd declare against the Family of the Stuarts, and promise to be true and faithful to the Commonwealth, without a King, single Person, or House of Lords, they wou'd withdraw their Soldiers, and leave the City to be guarded by itself. They acquainted them also that they had already resolv'd to call a Parliament, and appointed Lieutenant General Ludlow, and five other Members of the Council, to confer with the Aldermen and Citizens, touching the Reasons of those Resolutions, and of the late Proceedings in the City.

The Officers, and Aldermen met at Whitehall, Lieutenant and Commissary General Desborough, having shew'd the Necessity of doing what had been Ludlow's done in the City for securing the Peace, and made large Protestations of the Army's Friendship to them, General Ludlow spoke as follows.

Gentlemen,

Those who are Members of the Army, can best inform you of their own Intentions, in the late Proceedings in the City, wherein I shall not intermeddle; but having this Opportunity, and being a Well-wisher to the Commonwealth, I will take upon me to put you in Mind, that we have all been engag'd together in the Defence of our Rights and Liberties, against arbitrary Power. The City has been eminently instrumental in assisting the Parliament and Army, to carry on that weighty Affair, by which you have acquir'd Honour to yourselves, Esteem among good Men, and Satisfaction in your own Minds. But withal it ought to be consider'd, that by this you have highly incens'd, and vehemently provok'd the common Enemy against you, who tho' they may care for the present, and make you the most solemn Promises of future Kindness, will never forget the Aid and Support you have afforded to the Parliament, during the whole Course of the last War, but will certainly take a Time to be reveng'd on you to the utmost. Wherefore I desire you, as you tender the Peace of the Nation, and the Preservation of your Persons and Estates, that you will not suffer yourselves to be deluded by our common Adversaries, and seduc'd by specious Pretences to promote that Interest which, prevailing, will not only render all the Blood and Treasure that have been spent in asserting our Liberties, of no use to us, but also force us under such

A.D. 1649 suck a Yoke of Servitude, that neither we, nor our Posterity shall be able to bear.

This Lesson, for true Eloquence, Reason and Truth, is worth all the Declamations from the Beginning to the End of the History of the Rebellion. It is what every good English Man shou'd learn by Heart, and it will defend him against the Delusion and Seducements of the Enemies to the present Government.

Cavaliers
false Presences.

Can one doubt but that the Cavaliers deluded and seduced the Citizens, and others with an extraordinary Concern for their Liberties and Properties, which they had been invading continually ever since the Death of Queen Elizabeth? That they groaned under the Calamity of Standing Forces; that their Hearts bled for the immense Taxes which were laid on the People; that they cry'd out against any War abroad, which was for the Honour and Interest of the Nation, as wasting of Blood and Treasure for Allies only? That they were always preaching up Peace, if it was like to be attended with Loss and Shame, and in despair of any Remedy to their imaginary Evils, but by bringing in the King? They were hearken'd to, they were believ'd! The King was brought in, and his Brother with him; to get rid of whom, it cost the Nation more Blood and Treasure, than had been expended in all their Wars from the Reformation to the Revolution.

Lord
Broghill
for the King before
Monk.

By the following Account taken out of the Manuscript Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, we shall still find that Monk ran away with the Reward, when other Men did the Work; and that what is said in the History of the Rebellion about Sir Charles Coote's sending Sir Arthur Forbes to the King at Brussels, is injurious to the Merit and Memory of the Lord Orrery. His Lordship, soon after Richard's Abdication, went to Ireland, where he was Lord President of the Province of Munster, and had great Power and Interest. He had not been long there before the Parliament's Commissioners in Ireland, Serjeant Steel, Lord Chancellor, Col. John Jones, Miles Corbet, Esq; and Col. Tomlinson, sent for him to attend them at the Castle of Dublin, where he made his Appearance, and was required to give Security for his peaceable Behaviour under the present Government, the Commissioners telling him, he must be accountable for whatever Disturbance happen'd within his Province. His Lordship answer'd, If the Power of the Province was committed entirely to him, he wou'd be accountable; but if any other Commander had Power in his Province, he wou'd not be responsible for what might happen where he had not the sole Command. Serjeant Steel thought what he said reasonable, and prevail'd with the other Commissioners to take my Lord's Word of Honour, that he wou'd do his Utmost to keep the Province in Peace.

From that Time the Manuscript Author informs us, the Lord Broghill finding all other Interests broken, or breaking to Pieces, resolv'd to sacrifice them all to the King's, and set himself heartily about it. He founded all the Officers of his own Regiment of Horse, and Regiment of Foot, and found them very well dispos'd to follow his Fortunes; only the Governor of Limerick, Col. Wilson, not being immediately under his Command, he was for some time cautious of trusting him; but that strong Place wou'd have been an insurmountable Impediment to his Design; so he resolv'd to venture, and try what he cou'd do with him: Accordingly he sent a trusty Messenger to desire him to come to my Lord as privately as he cou'd, for he had something of the last Importance to confer with him about. The Governor came, and Lord Broghill taking him into his Closet, after due Preparations, began at first to discourse in general of the present State of Affairs, how unsettled they were, and what Changes they were subject to, adding, What think you of them, Colonel? the latter reply'd, I cou'd wish they were otherwise, and settled some way or other. The Lord Broghill continu'd the Discourse thus, I see plainly those at the Helm will rather unsettle than settle them, and therefore it wou'd be well if some Man of Spirit wou'd stir and try to bring things into better Order, for they can't last as they are now. The Colonel said, You, my Lord, are a fit Man to stir, I wonder why you don't; the Lord Broghill reply'd, I am not a Man of any great Interest, and am suspected already. No doubt, says the Colonel, many Persons will be glad to join with you in so necessary an Undertaking: For my part, I will be one. Well then, reply'd my Lord, Will you indeed join with me in any good Design? The Colonel answer'd, I will, there's my Hand, and I will stick close to you to the Death. Lord Broghill proceeded; These Kingdoms will never be well without a free Parliament, every one complains of the Oppressions of Committees; Will you join with me in declaring for a Free Parliament? I will, says the Colonel, with all my Heart, I will: Will you do it, continued my Lord, if there were a King at the Bottom? The Colonel answer'd, I like it the better. Then Lord Broghill acquainted him what his Intentions was, to send to his Majesty and invite him to come to Ireland, where all Munster was ready to receive him; adding, I will send to Sir Charles Coote in the North, and to Colonel Monk in Scotland, to desire them to declare for the same Thing; which the Colonel highly approv'd of, and vow'd he wou'd live and die with him in it. My Lord enjoin'd him to Secrecy, upon which the whole Matter depended, and the Colonel immediately swore it. After which he return'd to Limerick to prepare for putting the Design in Execution; and by a Gentleman who accompany'd him thither from Lord Broghill's House, he return'd a Letter to my Lord, wherein he said, He wrote it and subscrib'd it purposely with his own Hand, that if ever he prov'd false, that Letter might rise up in Judgment against him.

The Reader will observe, that this is before Coote or Monk had taken one direct Step towards restoring the King.

Lord Broghill dispatch'd a Gentleman in whom he cou'd confide, to Sir Charles Coote in the North of Ireland to dispose him to engage with him in declaring for a Free Parliament; which Coote did very readily, wanting only such an Invitation from a Person of Name and Interest; for he had taken Disgust at the Superiority of Lieutenant General Ludlow, and the Parliament's Commissioners, and thought that his Services, which had been very eminent, were not sufficiently recompens'd by the Presidency of Connaught. Lord Clarendon tells us, he had not so much Guilt as Lord Broghill, but I don't know how he cou'd make it out. He had kill'd more Papists than Broghill; he had hung up a Bishop as well as Broghill; he had courted and serv'd both the Protectors as much as Broghill. But, in short, there's no understanding what the Earl of Clarendon sometimes means by Guilt, by Merit, by Religion, by Schism, by Rebellion, by Loyalty, and the like; they must very often be read backwards.

When the Gentleman return'd from Sir Charles Coote, and told the Lord Broghill what his Resolution was, his Lordship got a Letter sign'd by most of the Chief Officers in Ireland to invite the King, then at Brussels, to that Kingdom.

Y. M. C. Lord

A.D. 1659 Lord Broghill's Brother, the Lord Shannon, was sent with this Letter, which his Majesty receiv'd before Matters were quite settled with Monk, and resolv'd to embark at Calais for Cork, where the Lord Broghill promis'd to receive him with a good Force; but before he cou'd take Shipping, an Address came from the Convention in England, which invited him thither, and put off the Voyage to Ireland.

In the mean time it began to be rumour'd that Broghill and Coote held Intelligence with Monk, and that their Design was for a Free Parliament. Coote, impatient of Delay, or rather greedy of the Reward he might expect for the Service, made that Declaration, having engag'd a good Part of the Army in Ireland to join with him in it. Col. Brayfield, Governor of Athlone, refusing to do it, Sir Charles Coote brought down his Forces before it, and by tampering with some of the Garrison, and falsely affirming that Brayfield wou'd deliver them up to him, he prevail'd with them to set open the Castle Gates, and to betray the Governor into his Hands. You see how the Work is done, Falshood and Treachery again! Col. Temple possess'd himself of Carlo, and turn'd out Col. Pretty; Capt. Lisle dispossest Col. Desborough of Drogheda; Col. Fouke, assisted by the Cavaliers, seiz'd Tongball; Major Stanley had done the same at Clonmel; Col. Cooper was remov'd from his Command in the North, and a Friend of Coote's put into it with little or no Opposition, and left still in Munster, where the Lord Broghill declar'd for a Free Parliament, though not so hastily as Sir Charles Coote did, which caus'd a Letter from the latter to his Lordship, wherein he tells him, The Design of declaring for a Free Parliament begins to take Vent, and I am therefore forc'd to declare before the Time determin'd, lest I shou'd be circumvented or hinder'd by the Rump Party; upon which Account I desire your Lordship forthwith to do the same, that the whole Force of the Enemy may not be employ'd against me, but be divided. Remember, your Lordship first put me upon this Design, and therefore shou'd not leave me in what you first put me upon. Lord Broghill, who was ready to begin the Work if he had thought the Time proper for it, cou'd not help thinking Coote had precipitated it; yet finding he had so done, he resolv'd to support him, and accordingly declar'd for a Free Parliament, which was then understood to be the King, whom they did not care directly to mention, it being made Treason by so many Laws. By this Means the Parliament Party were thrown into great Perplexity, and knew not which way to turn, being pent in as they were between two Powers, and Lord Broghill and Coote met with as little Opposition as cou'd well be expected from Persons that were in Possession of the Government. These Gentlemen sent Capt. Campbell to Monk to acquaint him with their Proceedings, but he had no more Concern in the Revolution in Ireland, than the Lord Broghill had in that of England: Both appearing in the same Cause, were both Instruments in carrying it on, and both succeeded in the several Islands where they commanded, without receiving the Assistance of a Troop or Company from each other. Sir Hardress Waller, Major General of the Forces in Ireland, shut himself up in the Castle of Dublin, and one Stanley, a rank Republican, and a Major in the Parliament Army, Lieutenant Sir Ch.

Coote's Letter to Lord
Broghill.

Colonel Warren, and others, immediately join'd themselves to him. It was resolv'd amongst them to send out a Party to seize Sir Charles Coote, Col. Theophilus Jones, and their Adherents, who were come to Dublin by Encouragement from the Citizens; instead of which, Coote tamper'd with the Garrison of the Castle so effectually, that they deliver'd up their Governor and his Adherents. Lieutenant General Ludlow was oblig'd to return to England, and there found no very good Welcome; for Broghill and Coote declar'd first for the Parliament only, and sent Word to England that Ludlow was against them, in favour of the Army, which occasion'd his being recall'd to vindicate himself, as soon as the Rump were restor'd, which happen'd the 24th of December. A.D. 1659

Lieutenant General Fleetwood finding himself deserted by most part of the Army sent the Keys of the Parliament-House to Mr. Lenthall, the Speaker, with Notice that the Guards were withdrawn, and that the Members of Parliament might attend the Discharge of their Duty. Col. Miller, Governor of the Tower, sent him Word also, that he and his Garrison were ready to receive his Orders. Col. Alured and Col. Okey muster'd the Forces about Town in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, where, after they had declar'd for the Parliament, they march'd by the Speaker's House in Chancery-Lane, and saluted him as their General, as he stood at his Door. About the same Time Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Col. Morley, and the rest of the Officers from Portsmouth, coming to London by the Bridge, were receiv'd with loud Acclamations. The Speaker, Lenthall, Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Weaver, and Mr. Berners, went to the Lord Mayor, and discours'd with him and the Sheriffs concerning the Parliament's meeting again, and found them to like well of it. Parlia-
stor'd.

Admiral Lawson wrote to the City, and to the Militia of London, to declare for the Parliament, which was no small Argument, considering he lay at the Thames Mouth with Twenty five Men of War; and that Officer, who was a rigid Independant, was brought into this Temper by the Persuasion of Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, whose Merit, as to the Restoration, will be found upon Enquiry to be much more than Monk's. The Committee of Safety sent Sir Henry Vane, and two other of their Members to confer with Lawson, whom they knew to pay great Deference to Vane's Judgment; but when they came aboard his Fleet, they found Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper had been there before them, and so wrought upon Lawson, that he was determin'd to declare for the Parliament, telling Sir Henry Vane plainly, he wou'd submit to no other Authority.

From the Lord Mayor, the Speaker, Lenthall, went to the Tower, and, as General of the Commonwealth, remov'd Col. Miller, and put Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper in his Place.

At the same Time Commissary Desborough's Regiment, which was sent by Lambert to keep the City in Awe, having march'd as far as St. Albans, and heard what was done by their Fellows at Westminster, with whom they were to join, resolv'd not to be last in their Submissions, but declar'd for the Parliament, and gave the Speaker Notice of their Obedience; which put an End to the Committee of Safety, after an Usurpation of Ten Weeks Four Days.

The COMMON-WEALTH.

A.D. 1649

ON the 26th of December the Speaker, Mr. Lenthall, and the Members of Parliament then in Town, met at Whitehall, and from thence walk'd together to the Parliament-House in the Evening, the same Soldiers shouting as they pass'd by, who not long before kept them by Force from sitting.

They immediately pass'd some Votes for the Pay of the Army, and appointed a Committee to direct and order the Forces.

Alexander Popham, Esq; Sir Anthony Aspley Cooper, Thomas Scot, Esq; Col. Okey, Col. Thompson, Col. Alured, Col. Markham.

No sooner was this Committee settled, than Sir Anthony Aspley Cooper gave a singular Proof of the Dexterity of his Management. He immediately procur'd a great Number of Clerks, whom they instantly order'd to transcribe as many Copies of a Form of a Letter as were wanted, wherein they recited, That it had pleas'd God to restore the Parliament, who had given them a Commission to command the Army; wherefore they commanded him, the Officer to whom the Letter was directed, immediately with his Troop, Company or Regiment, as it happen'd, to march to - - -

These Letters were directed to the Chief Officers of any Part of the Army, who had their Quarters in any Part of the Kingdom. They were dispatch'd away by particular Messengers that very Night; and coming to the several Officers so peremptorily to march immediately, they had not Time to assemble and debate among themselves what to do. They had no other Intelligence but that the Parliament was restor'd, and that London, Portsmouth and other Parts of England had declar'd for them. The Officers durst not disobey, but all of them march'd according to their several Orders, some one Way, and some another; so that those Forces which were the Support of the Wallingford-House Party, were by this Means quite dispers'd, and render'd perfectly useless to the Committee of Safety, who were hereby totally reduc'd under the Power in the Parliament, as so many disarm'd Men, to be dispos'd of as they thought fit. This fine Stroke of Policy is so superior to any thing in Monk's Character, or in any of the Characters of the History of the Rebellion, that, after reading this, they will all appear lame and contemptible in the Article of Politicks. Thus is the Way every where clearing for Monk, tho' he was so far from being accessary to it, that he knew nothing of the Matter.

Digression about Monk.

Yet how do Webster, Gumble, Price, Warwick and others labour to make him the main Mover in all things. Warwick calls him a great Man, without considering that there never was, and never will be a great Man a Traitor to his Trust, Ingrate, False, and Forsworn. He was an Admiral, a Major General; he had beat, and been beaten, as was the Chance of War; but never had the sole Conduct of any great Action, tho' he had the joint Execution, and was hardly enough to run into those Dangers, of which he had no Foresight. Warwick owns, that no earthly Power could have destroy'd the Common-wealth, and that Monk's Treachery and Army wou'd have signify'd nothing, if God in this Work had not made his own Arm bare, and his Interposition visible, by bowing the Hearts of all Israel to their exil'd David. This cou'd be done by none but him who said he wou'd destroy Israel, but save Judah, but not by the Bow or Sword. You see how they cant, and yet how loudly do they vilify the Presbyterians for canting? Wou'd not one think that this exil'd David was the Man after God's own Heart? and that his Followers in Exile were the chosen People of the Lord; whereas in Truth Col. Doleman, a Cavalier, said, If you call home the King, you will put the Government under Pimps and Whores; and Sir William Morrice, Monk's Cousin, afterwards made Secretary of State for calling him home, said, Colonel Doleman was the truest Prophet he ever met with in his Life. Yet Warwick, fifteen or sixteen Years after his Coming, and the fulfilling of the Prophecy, terms him the Favourite of Heaven, and the holy David of our Israelites, at the same Time that he rails at Cromwel for making use of Scriptural Phrases. This is one of Eckard's chief Guides in Stile and Fact, and no doubt he learnt all his Delicacy from those delicate Expressions in him, a third Twisting of the Guts, and a Man snells not his own Dung. I digress thus to shew what Metal they are made of, and if there is now need of it, to prevent the Reader's being impos'd upon by Names, and nothing else.

Warwick.

The Lord Commissioner Whitlock had very dexterously shifted with the Wind in almost all the Changes, and been almost of all the Councils, whether of State or Safety. The last stuck closest to him. The Republicans highly resent-ed his giving any Countenance to the Army, in-somuch that Scot said, He shou'd be hang'd with the great Seal about his Neck; but Scot's Menace came home to himself. Whitlock however absented himself from the House till he receiv'd a Letter from the Speaker, and when he attended, he found his old Acquaintance, Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Nevill, and others, very shy to him, which boded not well on that Quarter; so he retir'd into the Country till the Heat was somewhat abated, sending the Great Seal to the Speaker by his Lady.

Major Willman and Colonel Henry Ingoldsby, with 300 Voluntier Horse, coming before Windsor, the Governor, Colonel Whitchcor surrender'd it for the Use of the Parliament, and Commissary General Desborough sent them an humble Letter, acknowledging his Fault, and promising future Obedience.

The House approv'd of Monk's placing and displacing of Officers, and order'd a Letter of Thanks to him under their Seal for his Fidelity and great Services; and indeed the Services he did them were as signal as his Fidelity. They also order'd Thanks to Vice-Admiral Larson, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Robert Wallop, Esq; Col. Walton, Col. Rich, Col. Whetbam, Col. Morley, Mr. Nevill, Mr. Love, Major Braman, William Lenthall, Esq; Speaker.

Monk in placing and displacing Officers, little deserv'd the Thanks of the Parliament, which most of the other Gentlemen did for their Fidelity and Zeal. Lieutenant General Ladlow informs us, "that in his March he remov'd many Officers from their Commands, placing in their room, Persons of profligate Lives and ruin'd Fortunes. In particular he discharg'd from their Employments, several Officers of Col. Zanchy's Irish Brigade, who had been the most zealous for asserting the Parliament's Authority, and fill'd their Places with such as had been dismiss'd for their vicious Lives, and corrupt Principles," which was extremely natu-

A.D. 1659 ral and agreeable to the Account the same Author gives of his own Morals and Principles. P. 643. Martin's Saying of Monk. Harry Martin, the only merry Member of the Rump, said in the House, that Monk was like a Taylor, who being sent for to make a Suit of Cloaths, brought with him a Budget full of Carpenter's Tools, and being told, such Things were not at all fit for the Work he was desir'd to do, he reply'd, It matters not, I'll do your Business I'll warrant ye. The Lord Clarendon, and all writing Royalists, labour nothing more than to silence Monk's Taciturnity, his working like a Mole under Ground, and the like, whereas every one, but the Cavaliers, cry'd out against the Bare-facedness of his Design to bring in the King, and the Madness of the Parliament and Army to let him. If they cou'd have been reconcil'd, even after Monk had lodg'd himself at White-hall, they might have turn'd him out, as easily as they did Richard Cromwel: And he must have been content with Richard's Impotence and Obscurity afterwards.

The Order of the Army Commissioners above-mention'd coming to Lambert as well as to other Generals, he found himself all at once deserted by both Officers and Soldiers. Lord Clarendon assures us, the Parliament sent him no other Order, and that being abandon'd by his Soldiers, he was left in a most disconsolate Condition, and with scarce 100 Men attending him, return'd towards London, where, as soon as he arriv'd, he was apprehended and confin'd first to his own House, and then to Holmby, the Place of the late King's Confinement. Where was Monk's Hand in all these things? He lies quiet at Cold-Stream, and when the Way is thus made for him, he moves heavily forward, as if he did not think himself out of Danger, tho' there was not a Man in Arms against him, after the Parliament reassum'd the Government, and own'd him in all his Proceedings. On the last Day of the Year the House agreed upon Persons to be a Council of State, whose Names were as follow; Lord Fairfax, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Col. Morley, Col. Walton, William Love, Esq; Robert Wallop, Esq; Thomas Scot, Esq; John Weaver, Esq; Robert Reynolds, Esq; Luke Robinson, Esq; Miles Corbett, Esq; Major General Monk, Mr. White, Mr. Rolts, John Say, Esq; Thomas Challoner, Esq; Alderman Foot, John Fagg, Esq; Serjeant Terret, Hugh Bethel, Esq; Mr. Berners, Mr. St. John, Sir Thomas Widdrington, Sir James Harrington, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Vice-Admiral Lawson, Henry Nevil, Esq; ———— Love, Esq; Col. Dixwell, Col. Thompson.

Col. Dixwell was made Governor of Dover, and all Posts and Offices dispos'd of by the Parliament were given to Men in whom they might confide.

King Char. II. During these Transactions at home, the King and his Courtiers were in great Anxiety and Melancholy abroad. They were flatter'd from time to time with Hopes of some sudden Change in England in their Favour, but scarce receiv'd the News which brought them Hope, before the next Letters brought them Despair. All Attempts for the King's Restoration prov'd in vain; and upon the Suppression of Sir George Booth's Insurrection, the King, who was in Bretagne waiting for Advices to call him over to England, left France, and posted away to St. John de Luz, on the Frontiers of France and Spain, where the Ministers of the Two Kings were treating of a Peace and a Marriage to confirm it. This other ill-advis'd Step only expos'd him to such ill Usage as never Prince met with from Crown'd Heads, much less from their Ministers. Princes shou'd be sure of their Treatment before they put their Persons into the Hands of Strangers. A.D. 1659 There's a long Account of this Journey in the Lord Clarendon and Mr. Echard's Histories, to which I refer those whose Curiosity is insatiable. What I shall say after good Authorities will, I think, shew, that it was not worth so many Words.

It is very short in Bishop Burnet, "The King went to the Meeting at the Pyrenees, where Cardinal Mazarine and Don Lewis de Haro were negotiating a Peace. He apply'd to both Sides to try what Assistance he might expect upon their concluding a Peace. It was then known that he went to Maf's; yet it was carry'd secretly, and was confidently deny'd."

Dr. Wellwood is a little longer about it. "King Charles made this long Journey to no Purpose. It's true, Don Lewis de Haro receiv'd him with all possible Marks of Respect: But the Cardinal positively deny'd him Access. All he cou'd be brought to, after several Messages, was to allow the Duke of Ormond to talk to him upon the Road from St. John de Luz to the Place of Treaty, as if it had been but an accidental Rencontre. Ormond obtain'd nothing of the Cardinal but general ambiguous Answers, till being press'd, he told Ormond plainly, All my Master can do for his Cousin the King of England, is to compassionate his Misfortunes, as not being in a Condition himself to break with the Government of England, with which his Affairs oblige him to keep a good Correspondence. Besides this Neglect of Mazarine's, King Charles had the Mortification to see Ambassador Lockhart receiv'd at the same time with the greatest Pomp and Splendor, having the Cardinal's Coaches and Guards sent a Day's Journey to receive him, and the Cardinal giving him the Right Hand, which was a Respect he deny'd the Ambassadors of Crown'd Heads. Nor was Don Lewis kinder upon the Matter to King Charles; for having ask'd the Command of the Army in Flanders, which the Prince of Conde was by the Treaty to quit, Don Lewis refus'd it, as any one might have reasonably expected."

The Contests among Authors about King Charles the Second's Religion, are the more pleasant, because nothing is more certain than that he had no Religion at all in a Christian Sense of the Word; but if Profaneness and Lewdness may consist with Religion in the same Person, he may be allow'd to be a Papist, tho' not of so late standing as Echard makes it, this Journey to St. John de Luz, from whence passing to Fontenabia in Spain, he was there reconcil'd to the Romish Idolatry, as were also the Earl of Bristol and Sir Henry Bennet, whom he made Secretary of State, an Earl, and Lord Chamberlain, if Dependence cou'd be made on any thing in Echard's History, which, as he boasts of this, he had not from the publick Writers. This Vanity is the more extravagant and whimsical, for that there is not in any Book more Trifling, more Hearsay, more Poverty, and more of every thing which debases History! The Bishop of Salisbury affirms, he chang'd his Religion before he left Paris, several Years before this pretended Conversion in Spain, as was well known to Cardinal de Retz and the Lord Aubigny. The Marquess de Roucy, a Hugonet, related to De Retz, being much press'd by him to turn Papist, urg'd to him, that the Protestant Religion must certainly be ruin'd, for the Protestants cou'd expect no Protection from England, both the Princes, Charles and James, being turn'd Papists. Monsieur de Roucy told this in great Confidence to the Pastor of the French Church, who, after his Death,

A.D. 1659 Death, sent Bishop Burnet Advertisement of it.
 King Charles turns Papist.
 Sir Allen Broderick declar'd on his Death, that King Charles the Second made Profession of the Popish Religion at Fontainebleau, where Sir Allen attended him, before he was sent out of France to Colen. After three such Witnesses, what becomes of Echard's rare Account, never printed before, that he turn'd Papist at Fonterabia? and with what Front can People extol this King's Zeal for the Protestant Church of England, when he was a Member of the Church of Rome! and what Opinion must one have of the Honour, the Honesty of those, who got an Act pass'd, after he was restor'd, which made it Ruin for any one to say the King was a Papist! one of the first Blessings of that Blessed Reign. Echard wonders why this shameful Hypocrisy is sunk in the Earl of Clarendon's History. A little Thing will make him wonder. For my Part, whatever is said, or not said, in the History of the Rebellion, is not strange to me, for they were to do, and say any thing that wou'd cover the Wolf with a Sheep's Cloathing, and the Sheep with a Wolf's. King Charles wanted not good Sense, nor good Nature, when he was not a Slave to his Pleasure or Passion, and his Severity and Ingratitude to the Presbyterians, were inspir'd by Hyde, Cosins, Morley and others, his Companions in Exile, who cou'd never forget how they were pinch'd by Want for twelve Years together, and came home ready to burn with Revenge. The Bishop of Salisbury writes, He seem'd to have no Sense of Religion, both at Prayers and Sacraments; he took Care to satisfy the People, that he was in no sort concern'd in that about which he was employ'd, there was not the least Appearance of Religion in him. He said, he cou'd not think, God wou'd make a Man miserable, only for taking a little Pleasure out of the way. "He disguis'd his Popery to the last, but cou'd not help speaking against the Reformation. He commended Infallibility and implicit Faith." This is the King whom Sheldon, Morley, and Cosins were wont to stile their most religious King in their most solemn Worship of God. This is the King whom Hyde, Warwick, Turner, &c. extol for his Zeal for the Protestant Religion, and his Love to the Church! You have it in all their Histories and Speeches at the same time that some of them knew he was a Papist, and all of them knew he was an Atheist in his Life and Conversation. This is the King of whom Echard tells us, that Sir Edward Hyde wrote in his Letters to Dr. Berwick, The King has done all that is in his Power for the Church; he means while he was at Paris, Cologne, Brussels, Bruges, St. Maloes and Breda. I'll quote no more of it, 'tis too incredible, as is what he says in the next Paragraph, that the Duke of York's Marriage with Chancellor Hyde's Daughter, was kept a Secret from the Chancellor. I cannot animadvert upon it out of Respect to the two great Queens that sprang from it, whose Memory will be immortal and dear to all good English Men, and good Protestants. But the Chancellor's History is never the truer for that, nor the less liable to Objection. His Majesty return'd from Fonterabia to Brussels, while Monk lay on the Banks of the Tweed, and he had but cold Comfort from England; all Advices from thence, speaking only of the Restoration of the Common-wealth, at whose Name only the Princes of Europe trembled, and the Royalists in Exile were confirm'd in their Despair.

1660. On the 1st of January, Monk pass'd the Tweed, and enter'd England with four Regiments of Horse, and six of Foot.

On the 2d of January he took up his Quarters at Weller, where he receiv'd Letters from the Parliament, thanking him (to use Whitlock's Words) for his high Deservings, and to desire him to come up to London, as speedily as he can.

He came to Morpeth on the 5th of January, where he was met by Alderman Fowke, Alderman Robinson, and a Committee of the City Common-Council, whose Instructions were to desire him to use his Interest to procure a Free Parliament. The next Day he enter'd Newcastle, and thence dispatch'd Gumble with Letters to the Parliament, and Council of State, full of Protestations of Duty and Fidelity. His Messenger receiv'd Assurances from both Parliament and City, that they wou'd favour his Patron's Design; the former gave him a hundred Pounds, and recommended him to be a Fellow of Eaton College, whose Abilities hardly qualify'd him to be an Usher to a Country School; however, he was equal enough to the Post he was in. When he return'd to his Master, he found Monk at Mansfield, and acquainted him with the Divisions at London, and the Inclinations of the City, which with the Reception he had met with in Yorkshire, puff'd him up with a Swell of Pride and Arrogance, the sure Effect of Success in narrow His Pride. Minds.

The Lord Fairfax, Sir Hugh Bethel, Col. Smithson, Mr. Arbington, and other Yorkshire Gentlemen, had appear'd in Arms at York, before Monk came thither, and were immediately join'd by Zanchy's Irish Brigade of 1500 Men, the Rear of Lambert's late Army. Lord Fairfax invited Monk to Appleton, his Seat in that County, and says Echard, "Much was expected of two such great Men and Soldiers." Then he gives the best Reason he had, why there were such Expectations. Because of their Taciturnity. Much was expected from Persons noted for saying nothing. This way of Ratiocination runs thro' all their Books, whether Story Books or others. The Lord Fairfax, and all the Gentlemen with him, desir'd either the restoring the seclud'd Members, or a Free Parliament, which he was well pleas'd with; but, says Echard, took all Occasions publickly to declare for the Monk Common-wealth. He adds, Mr. Bowles the Mini- treacherous, ster, one of the Earl of Clarendon's illiterate factious Assembly-Men, being alone with him at Mid-night, went further than a Free Parliament, urging him to stay at York, and declare for the King, assuring him of great Assistance; which being immediately told Mr. Price, another such worthy Chaplain as Gumble, he put him in Mind of the Saying of Gustavus, when he enter'd the German Empire, If my Shirt knew what I intended to do, I wou'd tear it from my Back and burn it. The Truth is, he then intended nothing but to make a Penny of his Market in that Way which offer'd soonest and safest. Warwick confesses, No Man can positively say,

A.D. 1660 say, he design'd any more than a general Quiet of the Land, and so he fram'd all his Designs suitable to the Opportunity; then follows an Example of his Oratory and Politeness, that were given him, but that he wish'd that, They were all bred at some University or other, all fine Scholars, Eloquent and Learned, tho' the Remnants of Latin in the History of the Rebellion, might easily have been pick'd up by Indexes, as the Texts of Scripture before each Book were by Concordances, and Doctors, and College-Men could not be without such Helps. Echard goes on, So the General wisely resolv'd to sleep, till he got within the Walls of London, and then to open his Eyes extremely metaphorical, and the more just, because there is a Heaviness in the Character of his Hero, which is very dormitorious. In Yorkshire, he gave Lambert and Lilburn's Regiments of Horse, to Sir Hugh Bethel and Col. Smickson, both Presbyterians still, and there is not a Word said of a Cavalier in all his March to London. He receiv'd a Letter from the Devonshire Gentry, who for a long while were as proud of their Countryman Monk, as he was of his Garter, when he had one. They wrote to him for the Restitution of the secluded Members, and he in answer to them, said, I cannot do it, because it is not only contrary to my own frequent Declarations, but directly opposite to the Interest of the Common-wealth, as well as to that of the Army, a Thing not to be done by me, or born by you, being a total Reversing of all that has been done for the last twelve Years in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and tending to charge the Nation with all the Blood that has been shed during that Time. Here does this false, forsworn

Monk's Letter against the Church and King.

Man, take on him the Blood of 2 or 300,000 Men, who fell during that twelve Years. For as we shall see presently, he himself restor'd these secluded Members, and then, to shew how he hated the Church of England, he adds, It will unsettle the Possession of Deans, Chapters, Delinquents, Crown, and Rebel Lands. He calls the Royalists Rebels, How does this agree with Lord Clarendon's History of Rebels? If we suffer Monarchy to return amongst us after so long a Fruition of a Common-wealth, we shall be driven to a worse Condition than ever, and put past all Hopes of appearing to defend our Liberty. He printed this Answer, that his Perfidy might remain upon Record against him. Is it not Prodigious that the Heart of Man shou'd be capable of such a Mixture of Bigotry and Villainy? I am sorry that it is made necessary to defile History with such a Word. There is an Historian, and a Dignitary, who speaking of Fleetwood's Dejection, and that he said, God had spit in his Face, upbraids him that he cou'd not be bravely perfidious for Church and King as Monk was: No, though every Man of common Understanding in the Kingdom must then have desir'd the Restoration of the King and the old Constitution, to be deliver'd from an odious Anarchy, yet no Man but Monk cou'd have done it, in defiance of a hundred Oaths and Protestations, and with no manner of Concern for the future Interest and Liberty of his Country.

Parliament.

In the mean while, the Parliament pass'd a Vote to confirm the Seclusion of the Members in 1648, who about six Weeks after were admitted by Violence, Monk being the Agent, as they had been secluded by Violence, when Pride was the Agent. Nor must it be thought a Lessening to Monk, that Pride, the Brewer, is nam'd with him, who, according to Warwick, descended from the Plantagenets by the help of some Harlotry: For I think they became so nearly related, as that Pride's Son or Grandson pretended Heirship to his Estate, in the great Trial between Bath A.D. 1660 and Montague about it in King William's Reign. I heard his Name mention'd, and something relating to Monk's and his Lady's Virtue, which, though no Secret History is too biographical and too scandalous for this.

The Parliament pass'd a Bill to Renounce the Title of Charles Stuart, and the Line of King James. 'Tis pretended Monk and others boggled at it: What then, they had all done it before: They renounc'd Charles Stuart in renouncing a King and House of Lords, as by the Engagement often mention'd; nay, Monk was not content with such a Renunciation himself, he made the Scottish Nobility abjure him and his Interest, as we read in Coke; and in Orleans, That he always abhor'd that wicked Oath, which is just as true as where he says he was a great Genius.

p. 92.

Sir Henry Vane being sent for by the Parliament, came and took his Place in the House, and Vane was question'd for his acting during the late Interruption; to which he made an ingenious Answer, and it was Voted, That he shou'd forthwith repair to his House at Raby in the County of Durham, and remain there during the Pleasure of the Parliament, of which he was discharged from being a Member.

Commissionary General Desborough, Col. Ashfield, Col. Berry, Col. Kelsey, and Major Creed, were confin'd to their Houses furthest off from London.

Thomas Scot, Esq; was made Secretary of State, and Custos Rotulorum of the City of Westminster: He, and Luke Robinson, Esq; were order'd by the House to meet Monk, to congratulate his great Services, good Success, and Repairing towards London, and to let him know the Parliament wou'd provide Money for his Forces. They expell'd Col. Sydenham and Major Salway for acting against them during the Interruption, and sent one Downing their Agent to Holland. He was an obscure New England Fanatick, who had a sort of American Learning, which got him the Character of a Man fit for Negotiation; and his Enthusiasm and blind Zeal against Episcopacy and Monarchy, prefer'd him under the two Protectors.

The Parliament appointed new Commissioners for Ireland: Sir Hardress Waller, John Weaver, Esq; Robert Goodwyn, Esq; Sir Charles Coote, Ireland, Col. Markham; but Coote let them share no more of the Government than he thought fit.

Sir Thomas Widdrington, Serjeant Tyrrel, Serjeant Fountain were made Commissioners of the Great Seal about four Months before the Author of the History of the Rebellion was made Lord High Chancellor of England. The Parliament pass'd an Order for selling the Estates of those who were with Sir George Booth.

Before Monk arriv'd at London, he wrote to the Parliament, that for the greater Security of the publick Peace, the Forces which were in and about London amounting to 7 or 8000 Horse and Foot, more than enough to have driven him and his Army into the Caledonian Sea, if the Parliament had kept them where they were, and made use of them for that Purpose, might remove. But Infatuation was upon them, and purely out of Spite to Sir Arthur Haselrigge, who pretended to have the greatest Interest in these Forces. They had so contriv'd it, that Monk shou'd write that Letter for their Removal, as we are told by General Ludlow, who was upon the Spot, and in the Secret of the Counsels at that Time. Yet Warwick assures us the Removal of those Forces was entirely owing to the Contrivance of Monk, and those that deny him that Honour, intrench upon his

A.D. 1660 his Foresight. Such is their Infatuation, such their Judgment and Sincerity! Warwick intimates if you will allow nothing else, you must allow that this Arrow cou'd come out of no Quiver but his own; and Ludlow affirms, that in order to lessen Haselrigge's Power in the Army, it was contriv'd that Monk shou'd write to the Parliament, &c. Sir Philip Warwick is one of the main Buttresses of Eckard's Stupendous Fabric, and you see what his Authority is.

Mr. Scot, before mention'd, had by Letters been much courted by Monk, and always maintain'd a friendly Correspondence with him. In the Time of the Committee of Safety, Mr. Scot publish'd some of that Treacherous Man's Letters, wherein Monk declar'd his Resolution to live and die with the Parliament, without a King or single Person, or House of Lords. I wou'd not have the Reader censure me for my plain dealing with this double Dealer, I am authoriz'd to do it by his own Confession; for the Lord Commissioner Whitlock tells us, Monk sent Letters to the Parliament, frankly owning his Prevarications with Fleetwood for their Service.

691. Mr. Scot and Mr. Robinson being at Leicester, went out six Miles to meet Monk, who, by his slow Marches, seem'd willing to keep near enough to run back to Scotland in case Peril came upon him, and Way was not made for him to approach with Safety. When Robinson and Scot met him, his Forces were drawn up, and saluted them with Volleys of Shot, and the Bells rung in every Village through which they pass'd. Monk alighted from his Horse to receive them, went with them into their Coach, and rode with them to Leicester, where they sup'd together in Scot's Quarters. He profess'd inexpressible Devotion to the Service of the Parliament, and complemented their Commissioners, especially Mr. Scot, in an extraordinary Manner.

Several Addresses were presented to Monk, as he march'd along in great State and Security, for the Restitution of the secluded Members, or a Free Parliament, to which he avoided giving Answers, as not knowing what Answer to give, till he saw how Matters wou'd go at London. But as much as he abhor'd the Abjuration Act, when he came to Northampton he oblig'd those of his Officers who had not done it before, to abjure Charles Stuart and his Interest. Clarendon, and Eckard, and the rest of them, are positive that he abhor'd this Abjuring.

When the London Commissioners apply'd themselves to him about the secluded Members, he told them he reserv'd them to the Parliament; to whom he was resolv'd intirely to submit; and Sir Arthur Haselrigge is reported to have said; Monk can't be such a Devil to betray a Trust so freely repos'd in him: But Sir Arthur, it seems, knew not how much of that Spirit was in him.

The Gentlemen of the West having drawn up a Remonstrance against the late Changes and Usurpations, sent it to Monk, to encourage him to come to their Assistance. The Gentleman whom they chose to carry it, was Thomas Bampfield, Esq; Recorder of Exeter, who had been Speaker of Richard Cromwel's Parliament; and who, after the Restoration, was thrown into Goal for being a Presbyterian.

While Monk was at Northampton, a hundred Gentlemen presented an Address to him, that he wou'd be instrumental for the secluded Members, or for a Free Parliament; to which he answer'd, I am a Servant to the Parliament in a Military Capacity, and these Things, of Great and Civil Concernment, are to be left to them. The High Sheriff of Hertfordshire met him at St. Albans the 28th of January; and the Lord Richardson,

Sir John Hobart, and Sir Horatio Townsend, A.D. 1660 brought an Address from Norfolk to the like Purpose, and had a like Answer.

On the first of February, Dr. Clarges, the Apothecary, was made Commissary General of the Musters: Monk, his Brother in Law, was made Custos Rotulorum of Devon, and Keeper of St. James's Park. Orders were issu'd for the Soldiers in and about London to march forth to make room for Monk's, which so disgusted them, that many refus'd to march till their Arrears were paid. The Mutiny began at Somerset House, where one whole Regiment were Quarter'd, who London were join'd by several Parties of the rest. The Mummy, Cavaliers and Presbyterians of the City now lovingly united to the Ruin of the latter; hop'd to improve this Opportunity, and invited them to join with the City, as they term'd their Party then, promising them their whole Arrears, constant Pay, and a present Gratuity, giving them some Money in Hand as an Earnest of the rest. The Soldiers took their Money, but threaten'd them, that unless they departed immediately they wou'd fire upon them. Ludlow writes of it thus, "The Council of State, that they also might cut the Grass from under their own Feet, sent Orders to Monk to hasten his March, and with all Diligence to come to their Relief. These Malecontents were very numerous, above 4000 Horse and Foot; but the Colonel of the Regiment at Somerset House, Sir John Lenthall, and their Officers, prevail'd with them to march the next Morning, on promise of Payment of their Arrears; and the other Soldiers march'd with them according to the Orders they receiv'd.

On the 4th of February Monk march'd into London in all State with his Horse and Foot, not above 6000 Men, and came to Whitehall, where the Prince's Apartment was fitted up for him and his Wife, who had been a Sempstress in the New Exchange, before, if not whilst she was his Wife. The Speaker met him in the Strand. Monk alighted, and the Speaker came out of his Coach. They embrac'd each other with the extraordinary Signs of Joy; and in the Evening Monk went to the Council of State, who tendering the Abjuration Oath, the Substance of which he had so often sworn to, he desir'd Time to consider of it. Several of the King's Party came soon after to London from beyond Sea, giving out, they were sure the King wou'd be in England very shortly, but not one of them even yet is nam'd to have lent a helping Hand towards it.

Mr. Scot, Monk's fast Friend, and Mr. Robinson, were sent to him by the House to congratulate his Arrival in Town, and desire his Attendance the next Morning. All the Members of Parliament, and Persons of the best Quality, visited and complimented him.

Mr. Scot reported to the House, Febr. the 6th, that Monk was come to attend them, and in the Court of Wards, The Serjeant at Arms was sent for him, and brought him into the House, accompany'd still with his dear Friend Mr. Scot and Mr. Robinson. A Velvet Chair was set for him on the left Hand within the Bar, and he having made his Obeysance, was desired by the Speaker to sit down; but he pray'd to be excus'd, and stood behind the Chair, while the Speaker made a fulsome Speech to him, magnifying his Service and Merits, which however had as yet cost nothing but Words, and giving him the hearty Thanks of the House. Monk began his Answer with Hands and Eyes lifted up to Heaven, extolling the Mercy of their Restoration, and acknowledging the Goodness of God in making him instrumental therein, which was but his Duty,

A.D. 1660 Duty, and desir'd not the Honour they had done him. He desir'd that no Cavalier might have a Share in the Civil or Military Power, and said every one ought to acquiesce in their Judgment, as to the Secluded Members, who had frequent Meetings with their Friends in the City, particularly Mr. Edmund Calamy, a Reverend learned Divine of great Prudence and Moderation. Several Members of Parliament conferr'd with them, and were earnest Promoters of their Return to the House, as Col. Lassels, Col. Ingoldsby, Col. Hutchinson, all three Members of the High Court of Justice for putting the King to Death. The Parliament wanted not good Advisers to be provided against the wicked Designs of treacherous, perjur'd Persons. Ludlow and others, Men of Sagacity and Foresight, advis'd them to accept the Assistance of their old Servants to encourage their Fidelity, as the only Means to preserve themselves and the Common-wealth from certain Ruin. But they are deaf to all salutary Counsel, and resolv'd to finish the Work with the new Instruments which they had chosen. To that End they proceeded on the Bill for filling up the House, which by wise Men was thought a most dangerous Expedient in that Conjunction, unless Monk shou'd prove more honest than they cou'd believe him to be.

City of London oppose the Parliament.

The City of London also took upon them in their Common-Council to receive Petitions from the adjacent Counties touching the Payment of the Taxes and other publick Affairs, presuming not only to call in the Petitioners, and to give them Thanks for their kind Affections, but also to pass a Vote, that they wou'd pay no Taxes but such as shou'd be impos'd by a Free Parliament. The Council of State having receiv'd a particular Account of these Proceedings, sent for Monk to consult with him concerning the best Means to put a Stop to these Disorders. Some of them moving, that the Common-Council shou'd be forbidden to sit; some few of the most active were seiz'd, the Gates of the City taken down, the Portcullices wedg'd, and the Posts with their Chains pull'd up. Monk said, If you do no more, that will serve for nothing, because the Damage may be soon repair'd. The Disaffection of the City is so great, that they will never be quiet till some of them are hang'd; and it is absolutely necessary for the present to break their Gates and Portcullices in Pieces, to burn their Posts, and carry away their Chains to the Tower. If you command it to be done, I'll see your Orders put in Execution. Eckard, who takes no Care to keep within Credibility, affirms, that this very Action which Monk himself advis'd, and voluntarily offer'd to execute, was unavoidably forc'd upon him. The Council of State order'd him to march into the City with his Forces early the next Morning, Febr. the 9th, before the Occasion of his coming amongst them shou'd be known. Various Reports were publish'd touching the Design of his March into the City, and many suspected he had already declar'd for the King; tho', as Bishop Burnet observes, None had any Ground to believe he had any Design that Way. Some have thought he intended to try, if possible, to set up for himself; others rather believ'd he had no settled Design any way, which is also my Belief, but resolv'd to do as Occasion shou'd be offer'd to him, tho' all the while he declar'd in a most solemn Manner for a Common-wealth.

London Posts and Chains pull'd up by Monk.

The House being met, the Council of State made their Report, and inform'd them of the unwarrantable Proceedings of the Common-Council, and of their own Resolutions and Orders concerning them. In the Execution of which they assur'd the Parliament Monk had by that Time made a considerable Progress, having already pull'd up their Posts and Chains, taken down the Portcullices and Gates of the City, which he had begun to cut to Pieces, and seiz'd some of the most active of the Common-Council. The House approv'd of what the Council of State had done; and order'd Monk fifty Pounds to defray the Expence of his Dinner that Day, he having refus'd to dine at the Charge of the City, tho' earnestly importun'd by several Citizens. Sir Arthur Haselrigge was so transported at this News, that he broke out in these Expressions, All is our own; he will be honest. But as Ludlow says, It was not long before his Wine was turn'd into Water. For in the Afternoon a Letter was presented to the Speaker from Monk, the Contents of which made them easily perceive, that his Zeal in their Service began to cool: He acquainted them with what he had done in Prosecution of the Orders he had receiv'd, and that he wanted Tools and Instruments to finish the Work, having already spoil'd all those he had brought with him to cut the Gates and other Defences of the City in Pieces; that the Mayor and Citizens had promis'd Obedience to the Parliament for the Time to come, and therefore he desir'd they wou'd respite the Execution of what remain'd of his Instructions, hoping what had been done wou'd be a sufficient Admonition to the City for their future Behaviour. The House highly resent'd Monk's Presumption in neglecting and disputing their Commands, and dispatch'd a Message to him, requiring the exact Performance of the Orders he had receiv'd; at which Monk seem'd much disturb'd, and yielded little or no Obedience to them, but lay that Night in the City.

His Letter to the Speaker.

The Day following, Febr. the 10th, he return'd with his Forces to Whitehall; and on the 12th or 13th sent a Letter to the House, directed to the Speaker, and subscrib'd by himself and some of his Officers, "Wherein they complain'd that the Parliament had put them upon the late disobliging Work in the City to render them odious to the City; that they continu'd to favour the Fanatick Party, by not prosecuting those who had acted with the Army in the Committee of Safety, and by permitting Sir Henry Vane and Col. Lambert to stay in Town, contrary to their own Order, for their Removal; that they admitted Men to sit with them in the House, who lay under Accusations of High-Treason, meaning Lieutenant General Ludlow and Mr. Miles Corbet; that on the contrary they shew'd a Backwardness to repose any Confidence in those who were their truest Friends, upbraiding them with refusing to approve some Officers that had been presented to them, and delaying to grant Commissions to others, whom they had approv'd. They also reflect'd upon the Parliament, for not making Provision for the Army, nor minding the publick Work, putting them in Mind of the Vote for their Dissolution in May following, and adding some threatening Expressions in case they shou'd not issue out Writs for filling up the Parliament.

His bold Letter to the Parliament.

After the reading of this Letter, most of the Members who had Affection for their Country, appear'd much dejected. But the Parliament having divested themselves of their own Strength, and abandon'd all into the Hands of Monk, tho' no Man had ever before dar'd to address himself to them in so insolent a Manner (they are Ludlow's Words) took his Letter into Consideration, and resolv'd to give him as much Satisfaction as they cou'd with any Colour of Justice

A.D. 1660 Justice. They sent Mr. Scot and Mr. Robinson to him, to assure him of their good Intentions. He was then at Alderman Wale's House in the City; for he had left Whitehall, and quarter'd his Army in London, that he might have the more Opportunities to ingratiate himself with the Citizens. He drew up his Forces in Finsbury Feb. the 12th, din'd with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen at the Bull-Head in Cheapside, and was follow'd by Multitudes of People, congratulating his coming into the City, making loud Shouts and Bonfires, and ringing the Bells. He was every Day and all Day long visited by the chief Citizens and Ministers, as Mr. Arthur Jackson, Minister of St. Faith's; Mr. Edmund Calamy, Minister of Aldermanbury; Mr. Thomas Gouge, Minister of St. Sepulcher's; Dr. Drake, Minister of St. Peter's Cheap; Dr. Manton, Minister of St. Paul Covent-Garden; Mr. Watson, Minister of St. Stephen Walbrook; Dr. Bates, Minister of St. Dunstan in the West; Mr. Simeon Ash, Minister of St. Austin's; Mr. Matthew Pool, Minister of St. Michael Quern; Mr. Matthew Haviland, Minister of Trinity Parish, Mr. William Blackmore, Minister of St. Peter's Cornhill; Mr. Samuel Slater, Minister of St. Katherine's, Tower; Dr. Annesley, Minister of St. Giles's Cripplegate; Mr. William Taylor, Minister of St. Stephen's Coleman-street; Dr. Jacomb, Minister of St. Martin's Ludgate. I mention only some of the most noted, of whom Mr. William Taylor was by good Churchmen call'd The Loyal Presbyterian. All these, and almost all the other London Presbyterian Ministers, were as Loyal as Mr. Taylor, and most of them very instrumental in the Restoration, which I desire may be remember'd, when we come to see how the King rewarded them. For if Ingratitude is the basest and blackest of all Sins, 'tis no Wonder it has not been in the Power of Eloquence and Adulation to brighten the succeeding Reign. Of these Ministers Mr. Calamy and Mr. Ash, Dr. Bates, Dr. Manton and Dr. Jacomb, very much influenc'd the City in their earnest Desire for the King's Restoration, in which they were encourag'd by the Earl of Manchester, who had a particular Correspondence with the King and Hyde, by Mr. Hollis and Mr. Annesley, who had the same without Participation, and all three carry'd on the great Work as well as Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper, in their own Way, before Monk was ever thought of as an Agent in it. Mr. Ash wrote to Col. Sanders, Col. Barton and others in Monk's Army, to engage them for the King.

Monk had forgot his bosom Friend Scot, and did not admit him to his Presence without Difficulty; and when he condescended to speak to him and Robinson, his Discourse tended always to the same Purpose with his Letter. Yet for all his insolent Carriage to the Parliament, says Ludlow, his Party in the House had the Confidence to move, that he might be made General of their Forces. But the Parliament still retaining some Sparks of that Courage with which they had formerly been animated, chose rather to perish by the Hands of an Enemy, if Monk shou'd prove so, than by the Delusions of a pretended Friend; and therefore having rejected the Proposal to make him General, they pass'd a Vote, that their Armies in England and Scotland shou'd be govern'd by Commissioners, who were, Sir Arthur Heselrigge, Major General Monk, Col. Morley, Col. Watson, Col. Aured.

Tho' Monk was disturb'd at this, yet he endeavour'd to disguise his Dissatisfaction, and began again to court the Members of Parliament, whilst, with the Advice and Assistance of his Party in the City, he was forming a Militia there,

A.D. 1660 and nominating Officers to command them, who were chosen for the Purpose, rather on account of their Disaffection to the Parliament than any other good Quality. He got the Lord Mayor to call a Common-Council, and went to Guild-Hall; and all the Way as he went, leaning on Colonel Cloberry's Shoulder, the Cry was, A Free Parliament. Monk said nothing; but Col. Cloberry told them, They shou'd have a Free Parliament. At Guild-Hall he excus'd what he had been constrain'd to do in the City by Order of Parliament, tho' the Advice was his own: "He assur'd them" he was much troubled for that rigorous Work; "that he had been long of the same Opinion with them, but had been oblig'd to conceal it, till he might have an Opportunity to discover his Sentiments with better Advantage. He added, he had sent a Letter to the Parliament, that they wou'd fill the House, and put an End to their sitting by the 6th of May." The Citizens receiv'd this Declaration with great Joy, and the Rabble were as mad, as when they ran after Sacheverel in the late Queen's Time. They made no less than 6000 Bonfires at Night all over the City; and to shew that they cou'd be witty too upon Occasion, the Cavaliers and Loyal Presbyterians roasted Rumps, and burnt those they did not eat, as they serv'd the Pope afterwards.

Lieutenant General Ludlow visited Major General Monk at Alderman Wale's, to satisfy him concerning his Conduct in Ireland; and having in Conversation with him, said, that Fidelity and Zeal for the Common Good were the best Qualifications for publick Service, Monk cry'd; Yea, we must live and die together for the Commonwealth. And Ludlow dropping a Hint, as if the Secluded Members, when restor'd, wou'd bring in the King, Monk said, It may be they may attempt it; but they say they will not; and I assure you, tho' I bear as much Respect to Parliaments as any Man, yet, if I shou'd observe a Parliament to be about such a thing, I wou'd interrupt them in it. Sir Henry Vane being about to leave London, pursuant to an Order of Parliament, Ludlow gave him a Visit; and Sir Henry told him, Unless I am much mistaken, Monk has yet several Masks to pull off. As for what concerns myself, I have all possible Satisfaction of Mind, as to those Actions God has enabled me to do for the Commonwealth, and hope the same God will fortify me in my Sufferings, how sharp soever, to bear a faithful and constant Testimony. For he foresaw the Exiles wou'd murder him if ever they had him in their Power. The Opinion they justly had of his prodigious Genius being Death to them.

By the Giddiness of Monk's Conduct at this Time, I take his Mind to be in as much Agitation as it was capable of, whether to set up himself, or to restore the Secluded Members and the King, or to continue the Commonwealth, himself to have the Power of a Stadtholder as in Holland. It is evident he had yet determin'd nothing, and very probable that he was driven away with the Tide of Peoples Inclinations for the King, which were every where for restoring the Secluded Members, and leaving the Free Parliament and the King's Restoration to them. To this End Monk procur'd a Meeting of twelve of those Members, with as many of the Parliament then sitting. The latter alledg'd at this Conference, "That the General had declar'd, when he first appear'd for them against the Army, that it was for the Parliament as it sat the 11th of October." The Secluded Members reply'd, "That their Re-admission was no Infringement of it, for the same Parliament wou'd

A.D. 1660 "wou'd sit still; that the Purport of the General's Declaration was to reduce the Military Power in Obedience to the Civil, and that they had been excluded the House only by Force of the Sword, without any legal Forfeiture of their Right." But the Sitting Members urg'd their own Safety, that of the Army, and the Sale of Publick Lands, all which they fear'd wou'd be disturb'd by the Introduction of the secluded Members. The other engag'd upon their Honours, "Not to look upon what had been done since their Exclusion, nor disturb the Propriety or Pretences of any, but wou'd amicably Sit and Vote for the Good of their Country, till by their Dissolution they made a Way for another Parliament." Here is not one Word of Answer to the Safety of the Sitting Members, but the Parole of the Secluded Members, of which one Word was not kept; as if they had been infected with Falshood and Perfidy by their Patron Monk, who declar'd arbitrarily, That in Justice the secluded Members ought to be admitted before the calling of another Parliament. Annesley, one of the secluded Members, reflected so indecently upon the Proceedings of the Parliament since their Seclusion, that Sir Arthur Haselrigge rose up hastily, and design'd to leave the Company; but Monk, in a droling way, desir'd him to be patient till he shou'd moderate Annesley, which, says he, I know well enough how to do. Annesley had been a Covenanter, a Presbyterian, a zealous Parliamentarian, a Commissioner in Ireland, and done the last King as much Disservice as he cou'd; but he had made his Peace with his present Majesty, receiv'd a Letter from him, and given himself up Body and Soul to his new Master and Principles. Himself, Mr. Hollis, Sir Harbottle Grimston, Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper, and other leading Men, met often with the Earl of Manchester, the Lord Roberts, and the rest of the Presbyterian Party. Mr. Hollis told Bishop Burnet that the Presbyterians press'd the Royalists to be quiet, and to leave the Game in their Hands; for their appearing wou'd give Jealousy, and hurt that which they meant to promote. The Ministers of London were very active in the City. Annesley continuing his Railing, Haselrigge lost all patience, rose up and left the Company; but Mr. Scot, Mr. Robinson, Col. Morley, Mr. Rawleigh, and the Lord Chief Justice St. John, staid with the secluded Members till Monk declar'd himself for them. Ludlow owns that Monk did not stir up the Riot and Disorder in the City, though he was not a little pleas'd with it; and speaking of the Parliament thus insulted by Rump-roasting, he said, They rais'd the Glory of the Nation from the Dust, meaning the Reigns of the Stuarts, wherein it had been buried by the Negligence and Corruption of the preceeding Governments, and had render'd the English Name formidable to all Europe. When any of this Author's Enemies can prove what he says here to be false, we will pass over all the Fables in the History of the Rebellion, in Echard's and the Compleat History.

About a Week after Monk return'd to his former Lodging at Whitehall, where, according to a Summons from him, he was attended by all the secluded Members, and the Archdeacon assures us he told them abundance of notable Things, whereas they were the Contents of a Paper which his Secretary read to them, and of which the following are two Paragraphs.

"As to the Interest of this famous City (which hath been in all Ages the Bulwark of Parliaments, and unto whom I am for their great Affection so deeply engag'd) certainly it must lie in a Common-wealth; that Government only being capable to make them, through the Lord's Blessing, the Metropolis and Bank of the Trade to all Christendom, whereunto God and Nature hath fitted them above others.

"And as to a Government in the Church, the Want whereof hath been no small Cause of these Nations Distractions, it is manifest, that if it be Monarchical in the State, the Church must follow, and Prelacy must be brought in, which these Nations I know cannot bear, and against which they have so solemnly sworn. Indeed, moderate Presbyterian Government, with a sufficient Liberty for tender Consciences, appears to be the most indifferent and acceptable Way to the Settlement of the Church".

And two or three Years after this, he sends his Dragoons about the Country to hunt down the Presbyterians as the Protestants were hunted in France. This Paper, which he cou'd no more draw than he cou'd write Clarendon's History, has a pretty deal of the London Clergy in it.

Before this Matter cou'd be brought about, Mr. Praise God Barebone, with a Multitude of Watermen, presented a Petition to the Parliament, For excluding Charles Stuart and all that Family; and that those who refus'd to renounce them, might be incapable of any Employment; for which the House thank'd them.

Robinson, Haselrigge, and Nevill, who pretended to be most in Monk's good Graces, did and said what they cou'd to hinder the Admission of the secluded Members, but no body cou'd prevail with him to prevent it, and no body durst oppose him. The Spirit of the People in general, especially of the Presbyterians, ran that way, and the Cavaliers were the more eager for it, as the Way to bring in the King.

On Tuesday the 21st of February, Monk having given the Command of the Guard to Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper, the secluded Members march'd from Whitehall to the Parliament-House, William Prynne, Esq; with a great Basket-hilted Sword by his Side, leading the Way.

Monk's Speech to the secluded Members.

For the Presbytery.

Secluded Members admitted.

The LONG PARLIAMENT.

THE first Thing the Parliament did after the secluded Members were admitted, was to vacate all the Votes made by the House in 1648, and 1649, against themselves; then they Voted their Champion, George Monk, Esq; General of all the Forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and John Lawson, Esq; Vice-Admiral of the Fleet. They repeal'd the Commission of the Gentlemen who were empower'd to govern the Army, they releas'd Sir Robert Pye and Colonel

Fincher of their Imprisonment: The same they did by Sir George Booth, Colonel Brooke, Lord Crawford, Lord Lauderdale, Lord Sinclair, the London Apprentices, and several Addressers to the former House. They also Voted to make all void that had been done in Parliament against those of Sir George Booth's Party; they made John Thurloe, Esq; and John Thompson, Esq; Secretaries of State, and Dr. Clarges the Apothecary, Monk's Wife's Brother, Clerk of the Hanaper-

A.D. 1660 Chamber-Office. They also pass'd an Act for a Council of State, who were Arthur Annesly, Esq; Lord President, Lord Fairfax, General Monk, William Pierpoint, Esq; John Crew, Esq; Richard Knightly, Esq; Alexander Popham, Esq; Edward Harley, Esq; John Swinjen, Esq; John Weaver, Esq; Oliver St. John, Esq; John Birch, Esq; John Trevor, Esq; John Maynard, Esq; Denzil Hollis, Esq; Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir Thomas Widdrington, Sir John Evelyn, Sir Richard Onslow, Sir William Waller, Sir John Temple, Sir Harbottle Grimston, Col. Morley, Col. Montague, Sir John Potts, Sir William Lewis, Col. Rossiter, Sir John Holland, Col. Norton, Col. Thompson.

Eckard tells us, the soper Part of these Gentlemen were for clogging the King's Return with Conditions, naming the Concessions the King made at the Isle of Wight, though no wise Man cou'd expect those Articles cou'd be put in Practice. You see this is said with the utmost Assurance; yet that most wise Magistrate the Lord Chief Justice Hale, mov'd in the next House of Commons, of which he was a Member, That a Committee might be appointed to look into the Propositions that had been made, and the Concessions that had been offer'd by the late King, particularly at the Isle of Wight, to be sent over to the King: Bishop Burnet adds, To his coming in without Conditions may be well imputed all the Errors of his Reign; more of this hereafter.

Several Members of Parliament, who thought the Admission of those who had been secluded to be irregular and illegal, refus'd to act. Ludlow, before they were admitted, mov'd that the Parliament shou'd adjourn to the Tower, gather their Friends and Forces about them, and vindicate their Authority, but he was not seconded. After the others were admitted, he refus'd to sit with them; and being ask'd the Reason of it by Mr. George Montague, as he was walking in Westminster Hall, Ludlow answer'd, Having done as much as I cou'd to serve the Common-wealth, and seeing an Impossibility of contending against the present Torrent, I have resolv'd to absent myself from the Place where the Parliament us'd to meet, that I might publicly disown the Authority of those who have violently possess'd themselves of the House, and not seem to consent to the Confusions they are bringing upon us. Mr. Montague reply'd, "The Conditions on which the secluded Members have enter'd the House, are in my Opinion more dishonourable than those upon which others are gone out, and I am not willing to sit amongst them, they having engag'd to make Monk General of all the Forces by Sea and Land, to settle a constant Maintenance for the Army, to appoint a new Parliament to be chosen, and when these Things are dispatch'd, to put a Period to themselves within a Day or two at the most."

About Seventeen of the Common-wealth Members, of whom several were of the late Council of State, went to Monk, to be inform'd from his own Mouth of the Reasons of these Proceedings. He receiv'd them with no less Civility than formerly, and having understood from them the Occasion of their coming, he made as solemn Protestations of his Zeal to a Common-wealth Government as he had ever done. This was two or three Weeks only before he at once broke all Oaths and Protestations, and deliver'd up his Masters, his Friends, his Country, to the Mercy of implacable Enemies. He desir'd these Gentlemen to believe, that the Permission he had given to the secluded Members to enter the House, was only to free himself from their Importunity, and that he wou'd take effectual Care to provent them doing any Hurt in that Place. But these Gentlemen having resolv'd to try him to the utmost, demanded further, If he wou'd join with them against Charles Stuart and his Party? In Answer to which he apply'd himself to Sir Arthur Haselrigge, who was one of them, and said, Sir Arthur, I have often declar'd to you my Resolution so to do; then taking off his Glove, and putting his Hand in Sir Arthur's, he added, I do here protest to you in the Presence of all these Gentlemen, that I will oppose to the utmost the setting up of Charles Stuart, a single Person, or a House of Peers. After this he began to expostulate with them touching their Suspicions, saying, What is it that I have done in bringing these Members into the House? Are they not the same that brought the King to the Block, though others cut off his Head, and that justly? This is the Earl of Clarendon's good Lord General! This is the Man whom that Earl commends so much for his Zeal for the Church, and this is the Man who a few Months afterwards hang'd his dear Friend Scott, for agreeing to the Sentence for cutting off the King's Head.

Col. Montague, who had been in the Sound some time, concluding a Peace between Sweden and Denmark, in Conjunction with the Dutch Admiral de Ruyter, was made joint Admiral of the English Fleet with General Monk, at which the latter was disgusted, it being contrary to the Bargain he had made with the secluded Members, to have the Chief Command by Land and by Sea, without a Partner. However, he thought not convenient to insist upon the Alteration of that Particular, Montague, and the Fleet's Assistance, being very necessary to him for carrying on his Projects, be they what they wou'd.

He took away Col. Walton's Regiment of Horse, and gave it to Col. Howard; he made Choice of Two hundred Horse for his own Guard, and gave the Command of them to Col. Philip Howard; Col. Rich's Regiment he gave to Col. Ingoldsby.

The grand Design of destroying the Common-wealth, being so far advanced, Monk caus'd a Declaration to be drawn in the Name of the Officers about London, and recommended to the rest of the Officers in the three Nations, declaring it to be their Duty and Resolution, to submit to the Authority that was over them, and to obey such Orders as they shou'd receive from them, which when they were upbraided with, as a thing contriv'd to betray the publick Cause. Many of the Officers shew'd themselves so sensible of the Consequences of it, that they earnestly press'd that a Council of War might be call'd.

Here was another Crisis, had this Council of War been call'd, all Monk's pretended Schemes had vanish'd at once. The Officers urg'd several Reasons for it to their General, but the true Reason was to unite themselves to each other, and in a publick Manner express their Resolutions to lay down their Lives for the Common-wealth; but Monk being inform'd of their Design, dispers'd them to their respective Command, to which they tamely submitted, notwithstanding the big Words they had spoken without Doors.

Sir Arthur Haselrigge being summon'd to attend the secluded Members, made his Submission, and promis'd to acquiesce under the present Power. Major General Lambert surrender'd himself to the new Council of State, but refusing to give Security that he wou'd behave quietly, he was committed to the Tower, the very Name of him being a Check to all Monk's Exultations in this Hurricane of Joy.

Most

Monk Treacherous.

A.D. 1660

A Design of the Republicans against
Monk.

Most of the Republican Party were very sensible of the Danger they were in, and that they might not be altogether wanting to their own Preservation, and to the Service of the Publick (to use Ludlow's Phrase) some of the principal Persons among them had several Meetings; at one of which, Ludlow made the following Propositions, That several of the Council of State, and three of the Generals that had been appointed by the Parliament, shou'd Sign such Orders as were necessary for putting their Design in Execution: That the Regiment of Col. Moss, which lay in Kent, and not far from London, and another which lay in the Borough of Southwark, commanded by Lieutenant Col. Farnly, consisting in all of 2000 old Soldiers, of whose Integrity and Affection they had good Assurance, shou'd be order'd to march to the Tower to join with Col. Morley's Regiment, which was then there, and wou'd be ready to receive them, having sent to Ludlow, to let him know the Tower shou'd be at his Command, whenever he pleas'd to desire it. That the Commanders of these Forces shou'd take with them Provisions for six Months, giving Tickets for the Quantity so taken, payable by the Parliament of England. That the Militia of London, which had been lifted during the Government of the Parliament, shou'd be authoriz'd to meet as there shou'd be Occasion to assist the Forces in the Tower. That four or five Places of Rendezvous shou'd be appointed for the Forces of the Army that lay scatter'd up and down, in several Parts of the Nation, and that Officers shou'd be agreed upon to appear at the Head of them. That the Soldiers, both Horse and Foot, shou'd have the Liberty, either to follow their old Officers, or to appoint new. That those Officers who shou'd prevail with the major Part of their Men to follow them, shou'd continue in their respective Posts, and that those who appear'd heartily to promote this Design, tho' they cou'd not perswade the greatest Part of their Soldiers to follow them, shou'd have Provision made for them, equal to their Merits: That the Country Militia, both Horse and Foot, shou'd be authoriz'd to draw together, and be empower'd to seize, and disarm such Persons in the respective Counties, as were known Enemies to the Commonwealth. That the Fleet shou'd be order'd to declare at the same time, and to send one or two Thousand Seamen to the Assistance of those in the Tower, which General Ludlow conceiv'd might be done, without Danger to the Nation, because the Enemies they were to contend with, were intestine and not from abroad. Admiral Larson, who commanded the Fleet, had declar'd his Resolution, to continue faithful to the Parliament, which cou'd not well be doubted, by any that wou'd reflect upon his former Conduct, he having readily taken the Oath for Abjuring the King's Family. Lieutenant General Ludlow propos'd further, "That all Persons who shou'd act by the Parliaments Authority, in this Service, shou'd be justify'd in so doing. That the Governors of Garrisons shou'd be requir'd to refuse Obedience to any Power, which was not deriv'd from the lawful Authority of the Parliament, whose Place the secluded Members had now usurp'd, and that a Declaration shou'd be forthwith prepar'd, to shew the Grounds and Reasons, together with the Necessity of these Proceedings.

Some of the Officers and Gentlemen, who were at this Consultation, promis'd to advise with their Friends of the Council of State, and hop'd that a Quorum of them, as well as of Generals, might be found to put the Things in Execution that shou'd be agreed on: "But, continues Ludlow, we being ripe for the Correction of Heaven, nothing cou'd prevent our Enemies succeeding in all their Attempts, and all our Endeavours proving Abortive.

This Scheme seems to be very chimerical, if we don't consider that Monk had left his best Commander, General Morgan, and his best Troops behind him, to keep Scotland in Awe; and that the Army in England were generally Republicans, insomuch, that I'm satisfy'd 4 or 5000 of them, under such resolute and principled Men as Ludlow, wou'd have clear'd City and Suburbs of him and his secluded Members; but there being no regular Opposition, he swam down with the Current, which, says the Bishop of Salisbury, ran so strong for the Restoration, that Monk only went into it dexterously enough to get much Fame and great Rewards: If he had dy'd soon after, he might have been more justly admir'd, because less known, &c. Again, Monk had the Praise and Reward, tho' I have been told a very small Share of it belong'd to him, as is all along very visible. The Share he had, was in the Extent of his Monk's Conscience, which enabled him to do every thing, Greediness, and any thing that fed his Appetite of Gain, which, as has been hinted, the Bishop tells us Dr. Cal. was very ravenous; and Mr. Calamy stuck not to Eject. Min. tell him so from the Pulpit, even after the Restoration; for Monk by Profession was a Presbyterian, and one of Mr. Calamy's Hearers, after he had brought in the King. That pious Man, preaching on a Sacramental Day, had Occasion to speak of filthy Lucre; And why, said he, is it call'd Filthy, but because it makes Men do base and filthy Things? Some Men will betray three Kingdoms for filthy Lucre's Sake, saying which, he threw his Handkerchief, which he usually wav'd up and down, while he was preaching, towards Monk's Pew; however, his hearing Monk of godly Sermons, made him not in love with Godliness. His Life being very immoral, I use Lieutenant General Ludlow's Words, who knew him as well as the Earl of Clarendon, and tells us, "The Companies of London made a great Entertainment for Monk, the 3d of March, where the Bargain they had driven with him, was ratify'd and confirm'd by desolute and unbecoming Debauchery: For it was his Custom not to depart from those publick Meetings, 'till he was as drunk as a Beast." Gumble assures us, he was so temperate, he wou'd fast thirty Hours together, and his Countryman Mr. Prince, a Devonshire Vicar, affirms, he so abhor'd the Debauchery of Drinking, that he wou'd never prefer an Officer who was guilty of it. Do these reverend Authors need Remark? Col. Okey attending him at this very Meeting to take his Leave of him, before he repair'd to his Command, and desiring to be satisfy'd of his Intentions touching Charles Stuart, he gave him his Hand before all the Officers then present, as a Pledge of his Sincerity, saying, I will oppose him to the utmost.

The Parliament having voted him a Sum of 1000 Pounds a Year, it was debated, whether Hampton-Court shou'd not be settled upon him for it, and was carry'd in the Affirmative. Several of the secluded Members, says Ludlow, hating the Traitor, tho' they accepted the Treason, and gave their Vote for it, That the Grant might be usefess to him; but his Tools in the House got it chang'd to an Order for 20,000 Pounds at once, to be paid him out of the publick Money. Mazarine, who had put great Sights, if not Affronts, on the King and his two Brothers, was so far from any Disposition to change his Conduct, on Account of the Changes in England, that

A.D. 1660 that he order'd the French Ambassador at London, to offer Monk, the Assistance of France, if he wou'd usurp the Government, as Cromwell had done, which Offer was not made out of Fear of the King, or Loye to Monk. I know not one Male of the royal House we are writing of, who was ever fear'd abroad; and Monk's Qualities were such, as no body cou'd be enamour'd with, but then they were exactly such as a hearty Enemy to this Nation might have wish'd in a supream Governor, who cou'd not avoid being hated and despis'd by every one over whom he had usurp'd Lordship. An Enemy to England cou'd not have done her so much Mischief by War, as by imposing such a Governor upon her, who had neither Capacity nor Virtue, nor any other Qualification for Government. It was like putting a Man, blind or drunk, at the Helm of a Ship in a Storm. And when the English were once ruin'd by him, Mazarine matter'd not what Religion they were of afterwards. Eckard writes, Some say he bravely resisted the Proposal, but what is his some say? When Mr. Locke says, that he accepted of it, and he had his Information from Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper, who was the very Person that hinder'd its taking Effect. Sir Anthony having certain Intelligence of the Bargain made between Monk and Monsieur Bourdeaux, the French Ambassador, procur'd the Council of State, of which he was a Member, to be summon'd immediately. Monk attending as usual, the Doors of the Council Chamber were lock'd, and the Keys laid on the Table. He then began to charge Monk, not in direct and open Accusation, but in obscure Intimations and doubtful Expressions, giving Ground of Suspicion, That he was playing false with them, and not doing as he promis'd. This he did so skilfully and intelligibly to Monk, that he perceiv'd he was discover'd, and was perplex'd what Answer to give, which made the rest of the Council suspect him, though they knew not what the Matter was: At last he aver'd, That what had been suggested was upon groundless Suspicions, that he was true to his Principles, and stood firm to what he had profess'd to them; that he had no secret Designs that ought to disturb them, and that he was ready to give them all manner of Satisfaction. Sir Anthony clos'd with him, and made a further Use of what he said than he intended. For Monk meant no more than to gain Time to make his Escape from them; but Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper told him, That if he was sincere in what he said, he might presently remove all Scruples; he shou'd presently take away their Commissions from such and such Officers in the Army, and give them to those whom he nam'd, and that presently before he went out of the Room. Monk, as Eckard tells us, was no quick Man, and being alone among a Company of Men who fell in with Sir Anthony, and insisted on that Satisfaction, he knew not how to avoid it, but in the Fear and in the Surprize, took away the Commissions of such Officers as were nam'd to him, and sign'd Commissions for others, particularly for Sir Edward Harley, Father of the late Robert Harley, who was made Governor of Dunkirk in the room of Sir William Lockhart: By which means, says Mr. Locke, the Army ceas'd to be at Monk's Devotion, and was put into Hands that wou'd not serve him in the Design he had undertaken. The French Ambassador, who had the Night before sent away an Express to Mazarine, positively to assure him, that Things went as he desir'd, and that Monk was fix'd by him in his Resolution to take on himself the Government; was not a little astonish'd the next Day to find Things taking another Turn, and according to Eckard, this so much disgrac'd Monsieur Bourdeaux in the French Court, that he was presently call'd home, and soon after broke his Heart. For Mazarine having made the Contents of Bourdeaux's Letters known, there were Bonfires all over Paris, the French were so well pleas'd to hear that England was so near Ruin under such a Dictator. This, continues the Archdeacon, was that which gave the great Turn to the Restoration of King Charles, so that hitherto, his Taciturnity, his Slowness, his Craft, and all the other Topicks in the Panegyricks upon him, were of no Use to the King, and are therefore thrown away; what Warwick writes is one of the greatest Whimfies that ever crept into Memoirs. His great Sagacity comes upon the Stage to perfect the last Scene, which wou'd have been finely perfected indeed, had it not been for the Lord Shaftsbury, He was a Men cut out to do such a Work, to make himself a Monarch of three Kingdoms. He was a fit Instrument in the Hand of divine Providence, to work his Majesty's Restoration: You see how he was working it to almost the very Minute that Sir John Greenville came to him from the King. It were to be wish'd that such Men as Warwick, who had been Witnesses of the Torrents of Lewdness and Impiety, which overwhelm'd the Court and Country, after the Restoration had been more sensible of the righteous Workings of divine Providence, than to turn those Incidents into Happinefs, which are more justly interpreted, Correction.

Here, and in a great many other Places, will the Reader observe, that the Author walks in Fetters and Chains, and laments the Loss of that Roman Liberty, which allow'd History in every thing that was true. As it is so in Temporals, 'tis much more so in Spirituals, where the Force of Truth is here often broken out of complacency to Establishment, and where in most Cases at least, the Ground is made so slippery, that there's no walking upon it, without sliding, if not falling. 'Tis a Shame to Literature, to abridge the Freedom of Thought, and a Shame to any Cause not to be able to stand what is true, without the Buttrices of Penalties and Punishments. It is not my Fault, that this is not fully explain'd, I can do it to Satisfaction; but let our Posterity, as well as ourselves, regret the Incumbrances with which Bigotry and false Zeal have loaded all Kinds of Writing.

The Temper of King Charles the Second, wou'd easily have reconcil'd People to his Government, if some of the old Counsellors, whose bad Counsel had destroy'd the Father, had not remain'd still about the Son. There wou'd have been no Occasion of Complaint, as to arbitrary Government or Persecution, had his Majesty been left to the bent of his own Mind, which inclin'd him to Ease and Indulgence; but the Knowledge of the bitter Spirit of his Followers in Exile, made their Return so dreadful to the Republicans, that they wou'd have submitted to any Government, rather than have admitted them again to it. It was for this Reason some of the Chief of them propos'd to Monk, to restore the Common-wealth, with a single Person at its Head, and himself to be the Man. I do not suppose that he was restrain'd by his Oath against a single Man, because a Day or two after he sacrific'd all the Engagements he had solemnly enter'd into, to a Compliment he receiv'd from the King, by Sir John Greenville, to whom he gave Audience, as to a Messenger sent by the King at the Perswasion of Mr. William Morrice, a noted Presbyterian of Devonshire, and a Member of Richard's Parliament. The Archdeacon is once in the Right, and thinks very Monk receives a Message from the King.

A.D. 1660 justly, that Monk was fix'd by the Management of Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, or thought if he did not strike with Expedition the Work wou'd be taken out of his Hand, so he resolv'd to close with Greenville. This was about the 20th of March. Monk met Greenville at Mr. Morrice's Lodgings, receiv'd a Letter from the King, as also a Commission for him to be his General, at sight of which he step'd back and frown'd; but on a Word or two from Greenville, he call'd him his Dear Cousin, begg'd the King's Pardon for what was past, and protested that his Heart was ever faithful to him, even when he made the Scotch Nobility and the English Officers abjure him, and that he was now ready to obey his Commands. Then Morrice told Greenville what was to be done, That the King shou'd write a Letter to Monk, in which, after some Gracious Expressions, he shou'd desire him to deliver a Letter and Declaration to the Parliament, the Contents of which were minuted; and Monk advis'd Greenville to desire his Majesty to leave the Spanish Netherlands, and go to Breda, otherwise he wou'd be seiz'd by the Spaniards. Why, or to what Purpose no body can imagine? If they had stopp'd him a few Days, the Temper of the People might have alter'd, and then they might have kept him for the Money he ow'd them. Thus instructed, Sir John Greenville taking the Lord Mordaunt with him, went to Flanders, where the King met him very privately with Chancellor Hyde, Secretary Nicholas, and the Marquess of Ormond. Then, according to Mr. Archdeacon, one of the first Things that fell into Debate upon this hopeful Prospect of Affairs, was what shou'd be done with the Lands, and then what shou'd be done with the Presbyterians. He confesses it was wisely urg'd that a Granting a general Toleration for Religion cou'd not consist with the Peace of the Kingdom. But after great Deliberation, it was resolv'd to draw up one Letter to the General, another to the House of Commons, another to the House of Lords, and another to the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London; in each of which was inclos'd a Declaration, that will be mention'd again hereafter; and Sir John Greenville was sent back to England with these Dispatches. But before he went, he let his Majesty know that he had offer'd Monk in the King's Name, 100,000 Pounds a Year, and to be Lord High Constable of England, but he had generously refus'd it; he also offer'd him to be Lord High Chancellor of England, which he also generously refus'd; and in Imitation of this unparalleled Generosity, the Archdeacon assures us Greenville refus'd all Proposals of Reward. But when he came to open the Packet of Letters, he found there, like the Cup in Benjamin's Sack, a Warrant for an Earldom, an Assurance of 3000 Pounds per Ann. and a Promise to pay his and his Father's Debts. He carry'd to the General another Commission, which empower'd him to make a Secretary of State; and by the Advice of Sir John Greenville, he confer'd that Honour upon Mr. William Morrice, who not long after was made a Knight, and his Son a Baronet. This Secretary has been mention'd before; and Bishop Burnet informs us, Monk follow'd his own Judgment in the Choice of Morrice; and what his Judgment was we read in his Lordship's History. For when afterwards King Charles was weary of Morrice, and wou'd have turn'd him out, had it not been for his General, the latter express'd himself to this Purpose, I know not what is necessary for a good Secretary of State in which he is defective; for he can speak French, and write Short-hand. I shall have more Occasion in the Course of this History to speak of these excellent Politicians.

Sir John Greenville goes to Flanders and returns.

Great Officers to Monk.

p. 99. Secretary Morrice's Merits.

A.D. 1660 While these Things were upon the Anvil, the Lords perceiving which Way Things were turning, solicited Monk that they might take their Places according to antient Custom in the House appointed for their sitting, alledging, that nothing done by the Commons without their Assent, cou'd justly be esteem'd legal. But Monk had now made his Agreement with Bourdeaux the French Agent, and therefore he not only gave a positive Denial to their Demand, but plac'd a Guard of Soldiers upon their House, to prevent the Lords from acting the same Part that the secluded Members had done.

The House of Commons, to bear their last Testimony against Bishops, and shew how zealous they were for Presbytery, order'd Copies of the Covenant to be fairly drawn, and hung up in every Parish Church throughout England. The Assemblies Confession of Faith was also confirm'd by an Act. The Parliament pass'd another Act for the Militia, with a Clause in it, that every Commissioner before he acted, shou'd acknowledge and declare, That the War undertaken by both Houses vindicates of Parliament in their Defence against the Forces rais'd in the Name of the late King, was just and lawful; and that Magistracy and Ministry are the Ordinances of God. They pass'd a Vote to discharge Dr. Owen from being Dean of Christ-Church, and Dr. Reynolds to be put in his Place; and another Vote, to disable those who had been in the War against the Parliament to serve as Members of the next Parliament. Monk's Officers were dissatisfied with the Militia Bill, for all the Common-wealth's Friends being excluded Commands by it, they represented to him, that it wou'd be a Means of putting Commissions in the Hands of those who were known to be Favourers of the King's Party, which might prove Injurious, if not Destructive to the Army. Upon which he wrote a Letter to the Parliament, letting them know, "That being inform'd of the Disaffection of the Commissioners nominated in the Militia Act, he desir'd they wou'd forbear the Execution of it, lest the Persons they had entrusted therein might erect such a Power in opposition to the Army, as might be sufficient to bring in Charles Stuart." Many of the Members were perplex'd with this Letter, but others knew Monk better, and that it was one of his Masks; so Mr. Pryme procur'd the Act to be printed immediately, and dispers'd before any Stop cou'd be put to it; and Sir William Waller, to carry on the Farce, was sent to let Monk know, that no Man cou'd be a Militia Commissioner, who did not first subscribe a Paper acknowledging the Justice of the Parliament's Cause. Monk was contented with this Answer, though, says Ludlow, All Men saw how little Conscience the Cavalier Party made of signing any Paper in order to promote the Interest of their Faction.

The Council of State summon'd Mr. Praise-God Barebone to attend them, and upon his signing an Engagement not to act any thing in Disturbance of the Peace, he was let go. Mr. Scot did the like, but Lieutenant General Ludlow avoided it by keeping out of the Way. Colonel Berry was committed by them. Major General Desborough, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, and Colonel Kelsey sign'd the Engagement.

About the same Time, March the 16th, the Long Parliament pass'd for Dissolving the Parliament, after it had continu'd in several Forms Nineteen Years, dissolved. Four Months, and Thirteen Days, and from the restoring of the secluded Members Twenty three Days only. They had Enacted that a new Parliament shou'd meet the 25th of April following, and Writs were issu'd out accordingly in the

Before they broke up, John Crew, Esq; who had been as forward as any Man in beginning and carrying on of the War against the last King, mov'd, that before they dissolv'd themselves, They shou'd bear their Witness against the horrid Murder of the King. This unexpected Motion prevail'd with many then present to deny their Concurrence to that Act against the King, though not to reflect in the same Manner on those who had been concerned in it. And one of them concluding his Discourse with protesting that he had neither Hand nor Heart in that Affair, Thomas Scot, Esq; who had been so much deluded by the Hypocrisy of Monk, in Abhorrence, says Ludlow, of that base Spirit, said, "That though he knew not where to hide his Head at that Time, yet he durst not refuse to own, that not only his Hand but his Heart also

"was in it;" and after he had produced divers Reasons to prove the Justice of it, he concluded, "That he shou'd desire no greater Honour in this World, than that the following Inscription might be engraven on his Tomb, Here lieth One who had a Hand and Heart in the Execution of Charles Stuart, late King of England." Having so said, continues Ludlow, "He and most of the Members who had a Right to sit in Parliament, withdrew from the House, so that there was not the fourth Part of a Quorum of lawful Members present in the House, when the secluded Members, who had been Voted out of the Parliament by those that had an undisputed Authority over their own Members, undertook to dissolve the Parliament, which was not to be done unless by their own Consent; and whether that Consent was ever given, is submitted to the Judgment of all impartial Men."

COUNCIL of STATE.

Sir Arthur Hafel-rigge in Despair,

Lambert
escapes, and appears in Arms.

ABOUT the Time of the Dissolution of the Parliament, there was a very considerable Sum of Money rais'd by the Common-wealth Party to pay such Troops as shou'd be willing to draw together against Monk and his Adherents; and two of their Number were to be Security for Major General Lambert's peaceable Behaviour, in 5000 l. Bail, which was to be paid out of this Stock, if it was forfeited. The principal Manager in this Affair was Slingsby Bethel, Esq; who visiting Sir Arthur Hafelrigge to confer with him upon it; he found him in a most melancholly Posture sitting in a Chair, and leaning his Head upon both his Hands; Mr. Bethel ask'd him, Why so sad? Sir Arthur reply'd, I have been this Morning with Monk, and pressing him to give me some Assurance of his Care of the Common-wealth, reminding him of his Oaths and Protestations of Fidelity to the Cause, he treated me in an unusual Manner, demanding how I cou'd expect any thing from him, whom I had endeavour'd to make less than he was before he march'd from Scotland. Ah, Mr. Bethel, we are undone! we are undone! and his Despair was so great, that it put off the intended Discourse.

While the Elections for the ensuing Parliament were carrying on, Major General Lambert made his Escape out of the Tower, and immediately sent the Man, who had assisted him in escaping, to Lieutenant General Ludlow to give him Notice of it, and desire Ludlow to draw the Western Forces together, and meet him in Oxfordshire. Ludlow was willing to see what Troops came to Lambert's Rendezvous, which was to be at Daventry, before he appear'd openly; but he in the mean Time dispatch'd Messengers to several Officers, who commanded the Forces in Dorset, Somerset and Wilts, to be ready to march upon Occasion, and receiv'd Assurance, that the Castle of Taunton shou'd be deliver'd to him. Several other considerable Places were also promis'd him. A few Days after Major Whitby came to him from Lambert, who he said, had near 1000 Horse with him, and good Assurance, that most Part of the Army wou'd join him. Ludlow was willing enough to engage, but he was always jealous of Lambert's Ambition, and ask'd Whitby, what Lambert had declar'd for. The Major reply'd, This is not a Time to declare what we will be for, but what we will be against, which is that Torrent of Tyranny and Popery, which is ready to break in upon us. Ludlow was desirous to be satisfy'd in that Point before he went further, and Lambert's Party was dispers'd soon after Whitby return'd. The Lieutenant General had Reason to distrust Lambert's Designs, who was so far from meaning a Republick, that it is said, he had promis'd the Papists to turn if they wou'd join with him, and get him Assistance from abroad. That he told his Soldiers they shou'd have the Plunder of London, and his Plot was to stab Monk if his Soldiers cou'd have come at him, and have set up for himself: 'Tis said the Papists sav'd his Life by their Interest with the King. The Council of State had proclaim'd Lambert, and all his Adherents Traitors, and requir'd all Persons to endeavour to suppress them, but theirs and Monk's Fears were soon over. The People being weary'd out with so many different Governments within a few Months, hop'd for little Relief by any one of them, and resolv'd to return into the old Way. Tho' Col. Cobber, Col. Axtel, and Col. Okey, were got to Lambert, he cou'd make but two or three Hundred Horse; against these were sent Col. Ingoldsby, with a Regiment of Horse, and Col. Streater's Regiment of Foot, and Col. Rosfiter with other Forces, advanc'd from Lincolnshire and Nottinghamshire. Ingoldsby making the best of his Way towards Daventry, a Party of his met Capt. Hafelrigge, Son to Sir Arthur, whose Troop was with Lambert. Col. Ingoldsby examin'd him, and young Hafelrigge said, that not liking Lambert's Designs, he had quitted the Party, wherefore he hop'd he shou'd be set at Liberty; but Ingoldsby told him, that unless he wou'd bring off his Troop also from Lambert, his quitting them, shou'd be of no Advantage to him: Hafelrigge promis'd to use the best of his Endeavours to serve him; upon which he was permitted to return to Lambert. When the two Parties were ready to engage, he brought off his Troop, as he had promis'd to endeavour, which rais'd such a Consternation among Lambert's Men, that most of them went over to Ingoldsby, and those who did not, shifted for themselves as well as they cou'd, leaving Lambert talking with Ingoldsby, and endeavouring to dissuade him from engaging further against him. But Ingoldsby had made his Bargain with Monk, and instead of being hang'd up with the rest of the

A.D. 1660 the King's Judges, he was highly honour'd, having a red Ribbon given him instead of a Halber. Ingoldsby perceiving Lambert had no Body with him to help him, rode up briskly to him, told him he was his Prisoner, and requir'd him to yield, which after a short Hesitation, he did, desiring Ingoldsby's Lordship, as he call'd him, to give him leave to escape; but Ingoldsby knew better how to make his Market of him, and saw him safe to London, where he was re-committed to the Tower with Col. Cobber before-mention'd, Lieutenant Col. Young and Major Creed. Okey and Axtel made their Escape. When Col. Ingoldsby came to Northampton with Major General Lambert, then his Prisoner, the Crowd shouting at his Success, Lambert put Ingoldsby in Mind of what Cromwel had said to them both in the Year 1650, when they were returning victorious from Worcester, and were met on the Road towards London by innumerable Crowds of People shouting and rejoicing at their Success. Lambert said to Cromwel, he was glad to see that the Nation was for them; Cromwel answer'd, Do not trust to that, for those very Persons wou'd shout as much, if you and I were going to be hang'd; Lambert added, I look on my self as in a fair Way for that, and begin to think Cromwel had prophesy'd. Col. Rich endeavour'd to have engag'd his Regiment, which was quarter'd at Bury, but the Common-wealth Party were now as much bewitch'd as the Cavaliers had been after the Battel of Naseby. They had a hearty Contempt for Monk, but had not Spirit enough left to make one bold Attempt to save themselves.

Cavaliers
tion.

In the mean time the Royalists to remove all Obstacles that lay still in the Way of the King's Restoration, threw the Wolf off, and put on the Sheep; and as if they had really meant a Syllable of what they said, they publish'd a Declaration, wherein "They reflected on their past Sufferings, as from the Hand of God, and therefore did not cherish any violent Thoughts or Inclinations against any Persons whatsoever, who had been instrumental in them, and if the Indiscretion of any particular Person shou'd transport them to Expressions contrary to this their general Sense, they shou'd disclaim them." There were many other soothing flattering Expressions, which they made good after the Restoration, as the King did his Promises of Indemnity and Indulgence. This Declaration was sign'd by the Marquis of Dorchester, Earl of Northampton, Earl of Devonshire, Earl of Berkshire, Earl of Dover, Earl of Peterborough, Earl of Norwich, Earl of Cork, Earl of Carbery, Earl of Desmond, Viscount Ogle, Viscount Grandison, Viscount Lumley, Viscount Brouncker, Lord Bellasis, Lord Loughborough, Lord Lexington, Lord Lucas, Lord Brereton, Bishop of Kerry, Sir Jervace Clifton, Sir William Thoroild, Sir Thomas Corbet, Sir Thomas Littleton, Sir Arthur Gorge, Sir William Compton, Sir Thomas Prestwich, Sir Edward Pye, Sir Thomas Smith, Sir William Carey, Sir Hugh Cartwright, Sir Henry Chickely, Sir Edward Savage, Sir John Stevens, Sir William Howard, Sir William Dawes, Sir Anthony Jackson, George Morley, D. We shall find after the Restoration how meekly George Morley, D. D. behav'd, and how well he kept to the Letter of this Declaration, which was follow'd by another from the King himself, wherein he granted a Free and General Pardon to all his Subjects, of what Degree or Quality soever, who within Forty Days after publishing thereof, shall lay hold upon his Grace and Favour, and shall by any Publish'd Act declare their doing so. Again, Let all our Subjects, how faulty soever, rely upon the Word of a King, that no Crime whatsoever committed against Us or Our Royal Father before the Publication of this, shall ever rise in Judgment, or be brought in Question against any of them, to the least Indamagement of any of them, either in their Lives, Liberties, or Estates. It will be very proper to read this with Attention when the Blood of Sir Henry Vane is going to be spilt. Again, nay not so much as to the Prejudice of their Reputation, by any Reproach or Terms of Distinction from the rest of our best Subjects, such as Regicides, King-killers, Forty-one Men, Fanatics, Rebels, Schismatics, and as many more as Malice and Ribaldry could invent, and foul Language and foul Mouths express. This was so notorious, that Annesley, President of the Council of State, who when a Motion was made in it to call in the King by Treaty and Covenant, persuaded them to trust the King Absolutely: I say, this very Annesley cry'd out against the shameless Licence with which the Cavaliers, countenanc'd by the King, abus'd and insulted the very Men that brought him and them into the Kingdom. He is speaking of the Lord Commissioner Whitlock's Memorials, and his fair Way of Writing, glancing at the same Time at the Intemperance of Tongue and Pen after the Restoration. "You find always in Whitlock that Principle of a Gentleman, not to report dishonourably of an Enemy;" What then was the Earl of Clarendon's Principle? What that of Mr. Archdeacon? "Livy every where made honourable Mention of Scipio, Afranius, and even Brutus and Cassius, yet was not he the less belov'd of Augustus Caesar. Nor did those Times ever call them ROGUES and REGICIDES, Terms that afterwards a more degenerate Un-Roman Generation under the Ministry of Sejanus, bestow'd upon them." Let this be also remembered when we come to Clarendon's and Turner's Speeches about the Conformity, and other Acts. His Majesty again, We desiring and ordaining that henceforward all Notes of Discord and Difference of Parties be utterly abolish'd among all Our Subjects, whom We invite and conjure to a perfect Union among themselves, under Our Protection.

The next Portion of it relates to Religion, and deserves especial Observation, it being an admirable Preamble to the Bartholomew Bill. And because the Passion and Uncharitableness of the Times have produc'd several Opinions in Religion, by which Men are engag'd in Parties and Animosities against each other; which when they shall hereafter unite in a Freedom of Conversation, will be compos'd or better understood; WE DO DECLARE A LIBERTY TO TENDER CONSCIENCES, and that no Man shall be disquieted or call'd in Question for Differences of Opinion in Matters of Religion. One of the first Laws he made was against Liberty of Conscience, and to disquiet and call in Question every Man and Woman that differ'd in Opinion with

A.D. 1660 with Cosins and Morley in Matters of Religion. It began well.

The Elections for Parliament Men went every where as the Party of the secluded Members wou'd have it, except in a few Places only, there being no more than these following Members who had sat in the Common-wealth Parliament since the King's Death, and were chosen to sit in this:

Pierpoint, Esq; Lord Broghill, Henry Cromwel, A.D. 1660 Esq; Lord Howard.

There were several that had sat in Oli-ver's Parliament, but few of the above-nam'd did sit, though chosen. Mr. Robinson, who had been very fierce against the King, highly magnify'd his Goodness and Clemency in the above-mention'd Declaration. Mr. Ludlow was chosen for Hendon in Wiltshire, but Sir Thomas Thynne being also return'd for that Borough with Mr. How, the Election was brought before the Com-

The CONVENTION.

THE Parliament not being call'd by the King's Writ, is by our nice Chroniclers term'd the Convention, who, as soon as they met, appointed a Day of Humiliation, and chose Dr. Gauden, afterwards a Bishop, Mr. Calamy, and Mr. Baxter, to carry on the Work of the Day.

King's Letters to Monk.

Two Days after, April the 27th, Sir John Greenville, who was return'd from Flanders, deliver'd a Letter from the King to the General, which was cold enough considering the Importance of the Subject. Monk carry'd the Letter into the House of Commons, of which he was a Member, being chosen by that Learned and Venerable Body the University of Cambridge to be their Representative. He told the House, he had not only receiv'd a Letter from his Majesty, but that the Messenger who brought it, Sir John Greenville, was at the Door, with another to them. Upon which he was call'd for, and having deliver'd his Letter, the General's Letter and that were both read in the House with as much Joy as People, who did not very well know why they were so joyful, cou'd express. Sir John Greenville deliver'd a Letter to the Lords from the King, the Contents of which was a Congratulation of their being restor'd to their Authority; another was deliver'd by him to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, all which had the like Effect on the Persons to whom they were address'd, as had that to the House of Commons. In a Word, Their, and the whole Nation's Joy, was without Measure. The People were out of their Wits, and to shew that a Man had any left, was enough to have had his Brains beaten out.

Conditions for the King rejected.

When the Motion for sending Conditions to the King, preparatory to his Admission, was mention'd in the House, the Persons who mov'd and seconded it, though the Wisest and Gravest in that great Assembly, were disregarded as supercilious and impertinent; and General Monk, who spoke in Answer to the famous Lord Chief Justice Hale, as he was instructed, according to Bishop Burnet, put an End to that extravagant Debate. He told the House, "That there was yet, beyond all Mens Hope, an universal Quiet all over the Nation; but there were many Incendiaries still on the Watch, trying where they cou'd first raise the Flame. He said, he had such copious Informations sent him of these Things, that it was fit they shou'd be generally known; he cou'd not answer for the Peace either of the Nation or the Army, if any Delay was put to the sending for the King. What Need was there of sending Propositions to him? Might they not as well prepare them, and offer them to him when he shou'd come over? as he was to bring neither Army nor Treasure with him, either to fright them or corrupt them: So he mov'd that they wou'd immediately send Commissioners to bring over the King, and added, he must lay the Blame of all the Blood or Mischief that might follow on the Heads of those who shou'd still insist on any Motion that might delay the present Settlement of the Nation." This was eccho'd with such a Shout over the House, that neither Judge Hale, nor any other Member, durst venture to say a Word more of it. Bishop Burnet observes, this was the Great Service he did. And it was explain'd afterwards by that Right Noble and Virtuous Peer the Earl of Southampton, whose Loyalty was not more Exemplary than his Love to his Country. Take it in my Lord Sarum's Words: "When the Lord Southampton came to see what King Charles was like to prove, he said once in great Wrath to Chancellor Hyde, It is to you we owe all we either feel or fear; for if you had not possess'd us in all your Letters with such an Opinion of the King, we wou'd have taken Care to have put it out of his Power either to do himself or us any Mischief, which is like to be the Effect of our trusting him so entirely." Chancellor Hyde answer'd, "He thought the King had so true a Judgment, and so much good Nature, that when the Age of Pleasure shou'd be over, and the Idleness of his Exile, which made him seek new Diversions for want of other Employment, was turn'd to an Obligation to mind Affairs, then he wou'd have shaken off those Entanglements." How he shook them off, he shew'd the very first Night after his Restoration-Day, by a new Entanglement which he cou'd never clear himself, or perhaps never desir'd to clear himself of, though it was such a mortal Wound to his Conscience and Honour; I mean the taking away Roger Palmer's Wife, which must be mention'd more than once in this History.

The Acclamations of Lords and Commons were so great, that they had hardly Leisure to pass serious Votes; but the Tempest of Joy at last subsided so much, that having Voted Thanks again and again to their General, and to Sir John Greenville, they appointed a Committee to draw up an Answer to his Majesty's most Gracious Letter, and order'd 50,000 Pounds for the King, 10,000 Pounds for the Duke of Tork, and 5000 Pounds for the Duke of Gloucester. Both Houses also agreed that the King shou'd be solemnly King Proclaim'd, and it was done with as much Ceremony

A.D. 1660 money as cou'd be thought of amidst so much Transport, May the 7th.

One may easily imagine the Common-wealth Men are creeping every where into Corners and Holes, and their Enemies every where ferreting them out of them. Ludlow sat in the House a Week or two, but it soon grew too hot for him, though he receiv'd good Offices from Mr. Hale, Mr. Amesley, Major Robert Harley, Serjeant Glynn, and Mr. Pierpoint. He writes of it thus in his Memoirs, "In the Convention Things went high, Men not daring to shew Moderation; but in private, several Members of both Houses declar'd their Opinion, that a General Indemnity ought to be granted for all that had past, without any Exception. The Earl of Northumberland was heard to say, Though I had no Part in the Death of the King, yet I am against questioning those that had been concern'd in that Affair." The Reason he gives for it is entirely Republican, and consequently very irrational and unwarrantable, That the Example might be more useful to Posterity, and profitable to future Kings, by deterring them from the like Exorbitances; which I can hardly believe the Lord Northumberland ever said, it being very inconsistent with Monarchical Principles, which his Lordship espous'd; and Ludlow is sometimes too credulous, when his Judgment and Discretion are subjected by his Passion and Resentment.

He proceeds, "The Lord Fairfax on that Subject plainlly said, If any Person must be excepted, I know no Man that deserves it more than my self, who being General of the Army at that Time, and having Power sufficient to prevent the Proceedings against the King, had not thought fit to make use of it to that End."

"Several Members mov'd in the House of Commons, That Limitations and Conditions might be drawn up, on which they shou'd consent to receive the King, till at length finding that Monk, who had the Power in his Hand, gave constant Intelligence of all that was said, and by whom, none of them durst insist any further on those Heads. And that he might compleat his Treachery, when the Lord Say propos'd to him, that for the Quiet of Men's Minds, an Act of Indemnity shou'd be pass'd, in which some of those who had been principally concern'd in the Death of the King might be excepted; he in a great Rage answer'd, Not a Man; for if I shou'd suffer such a Thing, I shou'd be the arrantest Rogue that ever liv'd." We have this Account of his managing the House in Burnet. "Yet for all this, under Colour that the House might have better Terms from the King by relying on his Ingenuity, than by Capitulating with him, especially at a distance, he had the Confidence to move them, That their Commissioners might be empower'd simply to invite him into England; which Motion concurring with the Opinion of the Unforeseeing Cavaliers among them, and dislik'd only by those who had not Courage enough to publish their Dissent, for fear of exposing themselves to a future Revenge, was taken for the Sense of the whole House, and so pass'd." However, one of those Cavaliers hapning to call the Civil War a Rebellion, the House cry'd out, To the Bar, to the Bar; and he was reprimanded upon his Knees, the Speaker by their Order declaring, It was a Defensive War to preserve the Peoples Rights and Privileges.

The Commissioners appointed by the Lords and Commons to attend the King, were

King.

The Lord Fairfax, the Lord Bruce, the Lord Falkland, the Lord Castleton, the Lord Mandeville, the Lord Herbert, Denzill Hollis, Esq; Sir Horatio Townshend, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Sir George Booth, Sir John Holland, Sir Henry Cholmly.

For the CLERGY,

Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Manton, Mr. Calamy, Mr. Cate, Mr. Bowles.

Dr. Calamy tells us, They were sent by the Parliament and City, and Echar'd very idly and invidiously says, They wou'd not be look'd upon as Chaplains to the rest, but as the Representatives of that Party, the same which brought in the King; and before he is come Mr. Archdeacon begins to insult them for it. Twenty Aldermen and principal Citizens also attended his Majesty. The Parliament being about to dispose of the Great Seal, the Earl of Manchester was nam'd for it; but upon Intimation that the Seal was dispos'd of abroad already, that Matter drop'd. Col. Bowyer, without any Order from them, took a Party of the Staffordshire Militia, and by his own Authority seiz'd Major General M.G. Harrison, with his Horses and Arms. The Major General had Notice that Bowyer wou'd do so if he did not fly for it, which he absolutely refus'd, looking upon it as a Flying from the Cause, though in Truth the Cause fled from him, and there was as much Enthusiasm in his Political as his Religious Principles. Sir Charles Coote in Ireland seiz'd the Lord Chief Justice Cook, and L.C.J. they being both sent to London, were imprison'd Cook in the Tower by the Parliament.

The King staid all this blessed Time at Breda, The King in Expectation of Times still more blessed in at Breda. England, as he express'd it, when he said, What a World of Love shall we have there! Mr. Archdeacon will excuse me for not speaking it as it was said. Applications were daily made to him by Persons of all Parties and Denominations. The Cavaliers brought him or sent him great Boasts of Services; the Presbyterians and Parliamentarians paid their Compliments in Money; Mr. Lenthall, the late Speaker, sent 3000 Pounds, with a Hint that it wou'd be acceptable to him to continue in his Place as Master of the Rolls, but he miss'd his Aim.

There was great Contention in the House of Commons who shou'd be of the Number of the above-mention'd Commissioners, to be early in paying their Respects to his Majesty; every Man expecting some Mark of Favour to be conferr'd on him for this Service. To these, many others, Ludlow says, of the Looser Sort of Men, added Cavalier themselves; and some, to make an early Offer Loyalty. of their Subjection, and to provide themselves of Places, went over before the Commissioners. These Men being one Day in the King's Apartment boasting of their Loyalty and Services, his Majesty call'd for Wine, and applying himself to the Duke of York, drank to the Health of those Gentlemen with this Remark, That he was now even with them, having, as he thought, done as much for them as they had done for him. Echar'd repeats this after Ludlow, and I hope I shall be allow'd the Use of that Historian as well as Mr. Archdeacon in this and other Cases.

These

Sir Cha.
Coote's Injustice to Lord
Broghill.

These Gentlemen did not only over-value their own Merits, but they under-valued the Merits of one another; an Instance of which I have in my Manuscript Author. When the Lord Broghill came to pay his Duty to his Majesty, after his Accession to the Throne, the King, instead of giving him Thanks for his Services in Ireland, of which we have given some Account, gave him a very cold Reception, at which he was extremely surpriz'd and troubled; and it being observ'd by his Brother the Lord Shannon, he desir'd to know the Reason of it, which Lord Broghill acquainted him with, and entreated him to use all the Interest he had with the Courtiers to find out what might be the Occasion of his Majesty's Coldness to him. Lord Shannon was so happy in his Enquiry, that he understood Sir Charles Coote had told the King, He was the first Man that stir'd for him in Ireland; that the Lord Broghill oppos'd it, and was at last, with much ado, prevail'd upon to close in with it. Lord Shannon being well assur'd, that Coote had given this Misrepresentation of the Matter, told it to his Brother Broghill; who, says my Reverend Author, wonder'd at the Impudence and Slander of Sir Charles Coote; and immediately berought himself of the Letter Coote had written him, which he had still by him, and in which were these Words, Remember, my Lord, you first put me upon this Design, and I beseech you, forsake me not in that which you first put me upon. Meaning the declaring for a Free Parliament, a safer Phrase for the King. This Letter was delivered to Lord Shannon, to let his Majesty have a Sight of it, which was done; and Lord Broghill was not only receiv'd very favourably afterwards, but made Earl of Orrery, Sworn a Privy-Counsellor of England and Ireland, and at last was admitted into the Cabinet-Council: These petty Treacheries are easily forgotten, amidst a Number of enormous Ones, and it is not at all strange, that Men shou'd betray their Friends, whose Conscience wou'd let 'em betray their Country. While the King was at Breda, with his two Brothers, and his Sister the Princess of Orange, whose City it was, in Right of her Son the Prince of Orange, a Minor, our late glorious Monarch William III, the Governor of the Spanish Netherlands, and Cardinal Mazarine invited him, the one to take Flanders, and the other to take Calais, in his Way to England, their Countenances towards him being changed with the Face of his Affairs in England: But his Majesty prefer'd an Invitation he receiv'd from the States General of the United Provinces, who sent Deputies to him on Purpose; and when they return'd with his Majesty's Acceptance of it, they laid themselves out to make Amends by his Entertainment then, for their refusing to give him any at all, or even Shelter in their Dominions, five or six Years before.

Parliament Commissioners at Breda,

The Commissioners arriv'd at Breda, three or four Days before the King's Departure from thence to go to Holland. The Temper of the Cavaliers appear'd at the first Appearance of those Commissioners; for Mr. Denzil Hollis being appointed Spokesman, at least for the Commons, was interrupted and ruffled by Mr. Henry Howard, Brother to the Earl of Arundel, who said, It is insolent in him to pretend to that Honour which belongs to —; another of the Commissioners, who was his own Kinsman; but he mistook his Man. Mr. Hollis was not wont to part with an Inch of Ground which he had a Right to keep, and affirm'd; the House had entrusted him with their Complements and Desires. Upon which the King thought fit to make up the Difference, and to suffer Mr. Hollis to perform his Part, which was to present the Parliament's Supplication, "That his Majesty wou'd be pleas'd to return" and take the Government of the Kingdom "into his Hands, where he should find all possible Affection, Duty and Obedience." And then the Commissioners did the most welcome Part of their Commission, presenting the King and his two Brothers, with the Money the Parliament had given them, which, with the other Presents they had received from particular Persons, amounted to more than the Three Princes had ever seen in all their Lives before, and was sufficient to enable them to pay their Debts in Breda and Holland: For probably those in Flanders were left to another Season, when Money was still more Plenty. The Lord Fairfax was most taken notice of, of all the Commissioners, all Foreigners having an insatiable Curiosity to see a Captain, who some Years before was at the Head of the most victorious Army in the Universe. But this Commission was fatal to Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper, afterwards Earl of Shaftsbury, who travelling in a Brabant Waggon some Part of the Road, was by some Accident or other so bruised in his Side, that it occasion'd a Tumour, which was incurable, and the Chirurgeons were forced to keep it open to prevent the Humours falling back on the Vital Parts, which occasioned that dull and scandalous Reflection of the Tap, as that gave Occasion to much of the Party's Wit in the middle of the following Reign.

His Majesty Knighted all the London Commissioners, and no doubt Eckhard speaks Truth in this too; that they were wonderfully pleas'd with Knighthood, which tho' it cost the King nothing, was chargeable enough to the City, who presented him and his Brothers with 10 or 15000 Pounds.

The poor Presbyterian Ministers, who were and Presbyterian Business, were receiv'd the worst of all of them, if what Mr. Archdeacon says is true; which is as much to be question'd here, as in other Places. He tells us indeed, they declared they were no Enemies to moderate Episcopacy, who knew not that! There is not a Man in England, of common Sense, and common Knowledge, who is against moderate Episcopacy; neither were the Presbyterians in King Charles the First's Time against it: It was against the High Commission Court Episcopacy; the Star-Chamber Episcopacy; the Laudian Episcopacy; the Crosses, the Cringings, the Suspendings, Silencings, Banishings, Scourgings, Beggarings, and the intolerable Pride, Oppression and Cruelty of Laud and his persecuting Brethren, which the Presbyterians were then, and are now against: But not an Episcopacy in the Hands of such reverend and pious Fathers of our Protestant Church, as are now its Pillars and Ornaments. Such Bishops, and almost all such as have been admitted into that sacred Order, since the Revolution, are never intended, when Episcopacy and Prelacy are animadverted upon in this History. Eckhard repeats what the Presbyterian Ministers said to the King about the Common-Prayer-Book, and he repeats it, as if what they said, was extravagant and unpardonable, The Book of Common-Prayer having been long discontinued in England, the People are so disus'd to it, that many of them had never heard it in their Lives, and it wou'd be much wonder'd at, if his Majesty at his first Landing in the Kingdom, shou'd revive

A.D. 1660 revive the Use of it in his own Chapel, whither all Persons would resort; wherefore they pray'd, that he wou'd not use it, entirely and formally, but have only some Parts of it read, with Mixture of other good Prayers to be us'd by his Chaplains. Echard, as if this King had had any Religion in him, or matter'd any Prayer at all, unless it was taken out of the Mass-Book, says, his Majesty answer'd with some Warmth, While I give you Liberty, I will not have my own taken from me. His Liberty was to be an Atheist and Papist in Belief and Practice. I have always us'd that Form of Service which I thought the best in the World. Thought he so when he was at Fontainebleau or Fonterabia? What cou'd Echard mean, by repeating such Hypocrisy and Absurdity? The Presbyterians, according to him, made another most impious Request, that the Use of the Surplice might be discontinued by his Chaplains. The King, adds he, immoveable here too, reply'd, Tho' he was oblig'd for the present to tolerate much Disorder and Indecency (he means a long Cloak and extempore Prayer) yet he wou'd not discountenance the good Order of the Church, otherwise than as my Lord of Salisbury informs us, by keeping no Order at all at Divine Service, and taking Care even at the Sacrament, that the Assistants shou'd observe, he did not think of what he was about. He told Dr. Burnet, he thought God wou'd not damn him for taking a little Pleasure out of the Way. This is he whose Conscience was so scrupulous in the Worship of God, that he cou'd not bear the Indecency of Prayer without a white Linen Vestment! The Folly of these Men is prodigious, to think the Church honour'd by the Pollutions of a Prince who abhor'd or despis'd it, as he must do, believing it, as much as he believ'd any Thing that is Sacred, to be a Heresy. But I have observ'd these Men care not what Hands their Dignities, nay, their very Religion, Revenues and Powers pass thro', provided their Point is gained by it. Tho' I do not suppose King Charles said a Word of what Echard makes him say; yet I do suppose, he was Libertine enough to have said it; but as he had good Nature, when Cosins and Morley, Hyde and Benner, did not influence him, and had always good Sense, when he gave himself Time to think, so I cannot believe, he wou'd have assum'd that Air, and us'd those disagreeable Expressions to Men, who had ventur'd every thing to recover three Kingdoms for him. Did Mr. Archdeacon never hear that his Majesty, on the contrary contriv'd it so, that the Ministers shou'd be plac'd in a Chamber, as by Accident, which join'd to a Closet where the King was to be at Prayer, extempore too, for its greater Efficacy with the Presbyterians, and that he thank'd God in his Prayer for his being a Covenanted King; that he hop'd the Lord wou'd give him an humble, meek, forgiving Spirit, that he might have Forbearance with his offending Subjects, as he expected Forbearance from offended Heaven, with a great deal more of it, full of Cant and Enthusiasm, which deceiv'd some, but not all of the Ministers. Those who were impos'd upon, wrote Home, that the King of the Covenant was coming: But others of them heard such Accounts of his Morals and Principles, that they began to raise Fear in the Breasts of the most Sanguine.

The King's Prayer.

From Breda the King went to the Hague, where Crouds from the three Kingdoms were waiting for him, and where the States had made Preparations for the Entertainment of himself and his Court, and the Commissioners that attended him, who were all provided for at their Expence. Echard says, the Latter had their first Audience at the Hague, but Ludlow and others place it at Breda. Admiral Montague, who had made his particular Bargain with the King by the Management of Mr. Edward Montague, his Kinsman, of the Hallifax Family, came with the English Fleet before Scheveling, about the same Time that the King came to the Hague, where he made his Brother the Duke of Tork, Lord High Admiral of England, and he went aboard the Fleet to take Possession of the Command. Nor can it be deny'd, that he did something in his Post, for he alter'd the Names of the Ships, as being Remembrances of the late Times, such as the Victory, the Triumph, and other Names which were suitable to the Glory the English Fleet had acquir'd, to give the Ships Names more suitable to the Disgrace that was coming upon it, as the Katherine, the Fubs, &c. which are to be met with in the Navy Rolls from the Year 60 to 80. At the Hague, all the Ambassadors and publick Ministers of Kings, Princes and States, complimented his Majesty on this Change of his Fortune: So that it might well be thought, according to our excellent Historian, that he was restor'd by the Activity of Christianity. How quaint his Expression is!

Among others who came to the Hague, was Ech. one Sharp, afterwards Archbishop, who carry'd Archbishop Sharp a Letter from the Earl of Glencairn, to Sir Sharp a zealous Presbyterian, p. 64. Edward Hyde. This Sharp had been employ'd by the Resolutioners, as their Agent with Cromwel. We will make use of the Bishop of Salisbury's Words, "He seem'd more than ordinary zealous for Presbytery, and while he was in Cromwel's Court, Dr. Wilkins, afterwards Bishop of Chester, having only mentioned Episcopacy, Sharp could not hear the Discourse, and reject'd it with Horror. The Earl of Glencairn's Letter recommending him to Hyde, as the only capable Person to manage the Design of setting up Episcopacy in Scotland. Pray mind what Persons they make use of, and what their Practices are!" He was receiv'd into great Confidence, and as he had observ'd very carefully the Success of Monk's solemn Protestations against the King, and for the Covenant, it seems he was so pleas'd with the Original, that he resolv'd to copy after it, without letting himself be diverted from it by Scruples: For he stuck neither at solemn Protestations, both by Word of Mouth, and by Letters (of which I have seen many Proofs) nor at Appeals to God, of his Sincerity in acting for the Presbytery, both in Prayers, and on other Occasions, joining with these many dreadful Imprecations on himself, if he did prevaricate." Archdeacon Echard calls him an illustrious Person, and the Bishop of Salisbury further explains what you must understand by illustrious in their Characteristicks. "He was all the while maintained by the Presbyterians, as their Agent, and continued to give them a constant Account of the Progress of his Negotiation in their Service, while he was indeed undermining it. This piece of Craft was so visible, he having repeated his Protestations to as many Persons as then grew jealous of him, that when he threw off the Mask, about a Year after this, it laid a Foundation of such a Character of him, that nothing cou'd bring People to have any tolerable Thoughts of a Man, whose Dissimulation and Treachery was so well known, and of which so many Proofs were to be seen under his Hand." As this Man is illustrious with Echard, so is he the Pious and the Holy with

P. 92.

A.D. 1660 with others of them, and his Grace in every Sentence that is said of him.

The King's Entertainment at the Hague, was very magnificent and expensive. His Majesty made them in Return, all the Professions of Amity, to use Echara's Words, that were due to their generous Civilities; and at his Departure, the States made a fullsome Speech to him, of which we shall have Patience to repeat a little, because it is spoken by Men, who, four or five Years before had forbidden him their Country.

States Speech to the King.

Your Majesty might observe in the Looks of all our People, the Joy they had in their Hearts, to see a Prince cherish'd of God; a Prince wholly miraculous, and a Prince who probably will make a Part of their Quietness and Felicity: Your Majesty shall presently see all the Streets filled, all the Way cover'd, and all the Hills loaden with People, who will follow you to the Place of your Embarkment, and wou'd not leave you, if they had wherewithal to carry them to your Kingdoms, &c. Mr. Archdeacon informs us, The Hollanders shew'd all Expressions of Joy at his coming, and at his going. The Hills were throng'd with innumerable Multitudes, and his Majesty mounting on the Stern of his Ship, cast his Eyes on the friendly Shore, and said, I think my own Subjects can scarce have more Tendernefs for me than these People, in whose Affections I see I reign, no less than I am going to reign in the Wills of the English. So Rhetorical, that one may be sure it was extempore. Eight thousand of these loving Dutchmen were kill'd four or five Years after, by his Brother the Duke of York, and above Thirty of the States capital Men of War taken, sunk and burnt.

Bill of Indemnity.

While these Ceremonies were passing in Holland, the House of Commons were preparing the Bill of Indemnity, that it might be ready to pass at the Arrival of the King. They unanimously agreed, that some of the King's Judges shou'd be excepted, both as to Life and Estate; the remaining Dispute being only about the Number. Some propos'd that all might be excepted, others would be contented with twenty, and many with thirteen. But, says General Ludlow, "Monk who had betray'd them all, pretending to be for Moderation, the Number was reduced to nine, which Mr. Prymme, contrary to the Order of the House, undertook to name." Monk at last prevail'd with the House, to bring the Number to seven. The Commons in preparing this Act, were very careful not to let any Blot or Blemish remain on the Civil War, which the Long Parliament engag'd in, to defend their Religion, Laws and Liberties. This particularly appear'd in the Case of Mr. William Lenthall, who had been Speaker of that Parliament, and was a Member of this, and hapning to drop this Expression, in the Debate about the Indemnity, He who first drew his Sword against the late King, committed as great an Offence as he who cut off his Head. He was seiz'd by the Serjeant at Arms, and Sir Harbottle Grimstone, the Speaker, by Order of the House, reprimanded him in these Words; Sir, the House hath taken great Offence at some Words you have let fall in this Debate; which in their Judgment, contain as high a Reflection on the Justice and Proceedings of the Lords and Commons of the last Parliament, in their Actings before 1648, as cou'd be expressed. They apprehend there is much Poison in the said Words, and that they were spoken out of a Design to inflame, and to render them who drew the Sword to bring Delinquents to Punishment, and to assert their just Liberties, into a Balance with them who cut off the King's Head.

Parliament vindicate the Civil War.

I mention'd something of this elsewhere, and it had been so little taken notice of, that I received Letters from Gentlemen to produce the Life of Proofs of a Matter which so solemnly justifies the Proceedings of that Long Parliament, call'd by don, p. the Earl of Clarendon the Grand Rebellion. Monsieur des Maizeaux informs us, Echara has been very disingenuous in representing it, "He wou'd make us believe, that the Commons proceed- ed with all Tendernefs and Caution, with respect to the late Civil War." You see Men of Candour and Sincerity never call it the Grand Rebellion, nor the Parliament Rebels, as the Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Echara do, and therefore were unwilling totally to condemn the Parliaments Part in it: But this is a gross Misrepresentation of their Proceedings. Mr. Archdeacon will perceive I am not singular in my Opinion of his Integrity; "For they did not proceed with Tendernefs and Caution in that Respect, but expressed their Sense of it with great Warmth and Freedom; and so far from being only unwilling totally to condemn the Parliament's Part in the Civil War, that they fully justified it by declaring as above. And that Mr. Lenthall's Words were a high Reflection on the Justice of the Lords and Commons in their Actings." Thus are all the Lord Clarendon's and Mr. Echara's Reflections on those Actings declared to be highly Injurious, and the History of England, and that of the Grand Rebellion, which treat that glorious Parliament as Rebels, are condemn'd in the most solemn Manner by the Declaration of the House of Commons pronounc'd by their Speaker.

The King being suddenly expected, great Numbers of those who had been Officers in the lands at Cavalier Army, or were otherwise zealous for him, procur'd Horses and Cloaths; Ludlow says, for the most Part, upon Credit, and form'd themselves into Troops, under Charles Stuart, Earl of Litchfield, Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Cleveland, and Major General Brown, whom Ludlow calls the Apostate Woodmonger, in order to attend him at his Reception: And News being brought that he was put to Sea, Monk, accompany'd with a Guard of Horse, marched to Dover, and received him at his Landing, May the 25th. The King embrac'd him, kiss'd him, and call'd him Father; and, according to my Author, it might be truly said, that in some Respects they were very nearly ally'd. At Canterbury, his Majesty presented him with the George and Garter. The first was put on by the Duke of York, the other by the Duke of Gloucester. And because it was suspected, that the Army which had fought against him, might still retain some of their former Inclinations, it was resolv'd, that the King with his two Brothers should lodge at the House of Colonel Gibbons, one of their Officers at Rochester. Many Knights were made in this Journey, and Bonfires were to be seen in great Numbers on the Road. Ludlow tells us, the inconstant Multitude in some Places, burning the Badges of their own Freedom, the Arms of the Common-wealth. Ludlow proceeds, "Monk's Army was drawn up on Black-beath, and by the best Judges, was thought to deserve the Fool's Coat, rather than the Soldier's Casaque. The Lord Mayor, Sheriffs and Aldermen of the City, treated the King with a Collation under a Tent, plac'd in St. George's Fields. Five or six hundred Citizens cloath'd in Coats of black Velvet, and (not improperly) wearing Chains about their Necks, by an Order of the Common-Council, attended on the Triumph of that Day, with much more empty Pageantry, which I pur- pose

His Entry.

A.D. 1660 "posely omit. But I must not pass over the Folly and Insolence manifested at that Time by those who had been so often defeated in the Field, and had contributed nothing either of Bravery or Policy to this Change, in ordering the Soldiery to ride with Swords drawn, thro' the City of London to Whitehall, the Duke of York and Monk leading the Way, intimating, as was supposed, a Resolution to maintain that by Force, which had been obtain'd by Fraud." Sir John Stawel, at the Head of about one hundred Cavalier Gentlemen, who had spent their Estates in the late King's Service, attended the Cavalcade, and some Time after told his Majesty he had a Son who lov'd Dogs, and being fit for nothing but the Country, he desir'd his Majesty to make him Keeper of the Buck-hounds, a Place then void; which being deny'd, he took the Liberty to represent to the King, that he had expended, and been sequester'd to the Value of 105,000 Pounds: The King said, You might have compounded, and sav'd a good Part of it, and sent it to me. Sir, reply'd Sir John, Since it is so, I have four Sons, and I shall give them Advice, not to venture any more for any Monarch in England. Mr. Fox, afterward Sir Stephen Fox, who had liv'd with the King in Exile, was sent to London the Day before the Entry, which was on the 29th of May, the King's Birth-Day also, with Orders to speak to all the Lords in Town, and desire them to do themselves the Honour to attend his Majesty when he made his Entry, which they were all very ready to do, and had prepar'd the most rich Dress and Equipage for that Purpose, insomuch that the Lord Wharton, a zealous Presbyterian, laid out above 10,000 Pounds for his Appearance in the Cavalcade, and it is said to have been the finest in it, tho' a finer Shew was never seen. But an Accident happen'd which hinder'd Mr. Fox himself from making one in it. It is well known that he was a temperate abstemious Person, not us'd to drink much; and one of the Lords prevailing with him to drink a Glass of Cyder only, at about five a-Clock in the Morning, it so intoxicated him, that he fell from his Horse, and was incapable of sitting it all that Day. He had over-heated himself with riding from one House to another in the hot Sun-shine, and was caught in the Manner I have related. The Archdeacon seems to be entirely out of his Wits for Joy at his Majesty's Restoration. He has the infinite Blessings of it over and over again, tho' in its Infancy he confesses, the Court gave all Encouragement to all Sorts of Pleasure, and the greatest Licentiousness. The truly inestimable Blessing we have enjoy'd, and do still enjoy by it, is its making Way for the glorious Reigns of King William, Queen Mary, Queen Anne, and King George; wherein the People of England have tasted of the Sweetness of Liberty, without that Irregularity and Confusion, which imbitter'd it in the Days of Usurpation.

An Accident to Sir Stephen Fox.

The Court vicious.

Good Courtiers.

We should do great Injustice if we did not distinguish the Courtiers in King Charles's Reign, who abhor'd the above-mention'd Licentiousness, from those who wallowed in that Mire; and among the former will be found the illustrious Names of Seymour, Butler, Wriothefley, Bertie, Montague, Berkley, Hollis, Piercy, Fiennes. But the Counsels and Morals of these noble Lords were soon found to give Way to the prevailing Taste and Example.

Instead of describing the Day of Restoration as a Celestial Jubilee, and Beatifying it, as if it had been a kind of Resurrection from the Dead, and the opening Scene was Heaven, as Echar'd labours to paint it, the Bishop of Salisbury invents it, and it is a Gulph in his History, which we cannot look into without Horror.

"With the Restoration of the King, a Spirit of extravagant Joy spread over the Nation, that brought on with it the throwing off the very Professions of Virtue and Piety. All ended in Entertainments and Drunkenness, which over-run the three Kingdoms to such a Degree, that it very much corrupted all their Morals. Under Colour of drinking the King's Health, there were great Disorders and much Riot every where; and as a Man cou'd not be a good Courtier, without doing as the King did, so few were deficient in following his Example.

What blessed Times he brought with him, may be guess'd by his Character, as it is given by Bishop Burnet.

"He was liberal of good Looks, kind Words, and fair Promises, because he intended nothing by them: He had no Sense of Religion, both at Prayers and Sacraments: He, as it were took Care to satisfy the People, that he was in no sort concern'd in that about which he was employ'd; so that he was very far from being an Hypocrite, unless his assisting at those Performances, was a sort of Hypocrisy (as no doubt it was) but he was sure not to encrease that, by any the least Appearance of Religion. He said once to my self, He was no Atheist, but he cou'd not think God wou'd make a Man miserable, only for taking a little Pleasure out of the Way. He disguis'd his Popery to the last; but when he talk'd freely, he cou'd not help letting himself out against the Liberty, that under the Reformation, all Men took of enquiring into Matters of Religion. He said often, he thought Government was a much safer and easier Thing where the Authority was believ'd infallible, and the Faith and Submission of the People were implicit. He had a very ill Opinion both of Men and Women, and did not think that there was either Sincerity or Chastity in the World out of Principle, but that some had either the one or the other out of Humour or Vanity. He thought that no Body did serve him out of Love, and so he was quit with all the World, and lov'd others as little as he thought they lov'd him. He hated Business, and cou'd not easily be brought to mind any. The Ruin of his Reign, and of all his Affairs, was occasion'd chiefly by his delivering himself up at his first coming over to a mad Range of Pleasure. One of the Race of Villiers, then marry'd to Palmer a Papist, soon after made Earl of Castlemain, who afterwards being separated from him, was advanc'd to be Dutchess of Cleaveland, was his first and longest Mistress, by whom he had five Children: She was most enormously vicious and ravenous, &c." Such was the Prince, who, according to Warwick, was brought in by the Good Angel of God, and according to Echard, by the all merciful Hand of Heaven, according to Clarendon, by the merciful Hand of God. Divine Providence directs every thing sometimes to blefs, sometimes to curse; and to what End it directed here, let the Reader determine by the ensuing Reign.

As his Majesty pass'd through the City towards Westminster, the London Ministers attend over against the School in St. Paul's Church-Yard, and Mr. Arthur Jackson, Minister of St. Faith's, at the Head of them, presented him with a Bible richly adorn'd, for which the King thank'd them, and promis'd to make that Book The Rule of his Government and Life; and it must be own'd, that it was as much the Rule of his the Bible.

King Charles's Character, by Bishop Burnet.

A.D. 1660 his Life as of his Government. Two Years after, Mr. Jackson was turn'd out of his Living only for being a Presbyterian.

The Lords and Commons receiv'd the King at Whitehall, after this tedious Cavalcade, and their Speakers made surfeiting Speeches, as may be seen at large in the Common Histories. Ludlow tells us, "The Speakers of both Houses loaded him with Complements, and took the best Care they cou'd to make him believe himself to be the best, greatest and bravest Prince in the whole World. His Answer to them was short, by Reason as he said, of his present Discomposure, caus'd by the great Acclamations he had receiv'd in his Passage, which yet he pretended had been very agreeable to him, as they were Expressions of the Affections of his People. Most of those who had attended his Entry, finding the Streets thro' which they had pass'd, to be full of People, return'd to the City, by the Way of Holborn; by which Means I had a View of them from the House where I then was; and I confess it was a strange Sight to me, to see the Horse that had formerly belong'd to our Army, now put upon an Employment so different from that which they had at first undertaken; especially when I consider'd, that for the most Part they had not been rais'd out of the meanest of the People, and without Distinction, as other Armies had been, but

The Army corrupted,

"that they consisted of such as had engag'd themselves, from a Spirit of Liberty, in the Defence of their Rights and Religion: But having been corrupted under the Tyranny of Cromwel, and kept up as a standing Force against the People, they had forgotten their first Engagements, and were become as mercenary as other Troops. The Diffolution and Drunkenness of that Night was so great and scandalous, in a Nation which had not been acquainted with such Disorders for many Years past, that the King who still stood in need of the Presbyterian Party, which had betray'd all into his Hands, for their Satisfaction caus'd a Proclamation to be publish'd, forbidding the Drinking of Healths: But resolving for his own Part to be oblig'd to no Rule of any Kind, he publicly violated his own Order in a few Days, at a Debauch in the Mulberry-Garden, and more privately at another Meeting in the City, where he drank Healths to the utmost Excess, till two in the Morning." It is credibly reported, he took Barbara Villiers from her Husband that very Night, notwithstanding, as we are told by Warwick, he made his Presence-Chamber his Oratory, wherein to pay his Devotions to God; and the Compleat Historian, after him, He paid his Devotions and Thanks to God in the Presence-Chamber.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND, During the REIGN of King CHARLES II.

HIS Reign is full of Creations, Honours, Poms and Ceremonies, and we are to live in it like Men who feed upon Sauces. Purveyors, Cooks and Heralds are the Men of Business, unless what was carry'd on by Lord Lauderdale and the Ladies. I own it will be impossible for one to go thro' it without Pain. Here's such a Run of Pleasure and Persecution, of Riot and Bigotry, of Lewdness, Disgrace and Shame, that common Patience is not sufficient to support it.

Creations.

George Monk, besides the George and Garter, had these Titles bestow'd upon him, Duke of Albemarle, Earl of Torrington, Baron Monk of Potberidge, Beauchamp and Teyes; but his Figure and Manners were so rude, that he became all this as ill as a Bear wou'd a Roquelaure. Edward Montague the Admiral, was created Baron Montague of St. Neots, Viscount Hinchingbroke, and Earl of Sandwich, by Patent dated the 12th of July. He had also the George and Garter given him, together with the Marquis of Hertford, created Duke of Somerset, and Thomas Earl of Southampton, who deserv'd every thing the King cou'd give him.

The Privy-Council were,

James Duke of York, Henry Duke of Glou-Prester, Sir Edward Hyde, General Monk, Admiral Montague, the Marquis of Ormond, the Marquis of Dorchester, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Lindsey, the Earl of Berkshire, the Earl of Norwich, the Lord Viscount Say, the Lord Wentworth, the Lord Seymour, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earl of Manchester, the Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of St. Albans, the Earl of Leicester, the Lord Colepepyr, the Lord Roberts, Denzil Hollis, Esq; Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir George Cartaret, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Sir John Berkley, Sir Edward Nicholas, Sir William Morrice, Col. Charles Howard, Arthur Annesley, Esq.

The Duke of York was made Lord High Admiral, and Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports. Monk was continu'd Captain General, and made Master of the Horse; Sir Edward Hyde was made Lord High Chancellor; the Earl of Southampton, Lord High Treasurer; the Marquis of Ormond, Lord Steward of the Household; the Lord Say, Lord Privy Seal; the Earl of Manchester, Lord Chamberlain; the Lord Seymour, Chancellor of the Dutchy; Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Treasurer of the Household; Sir George Cartaret, Vice-Chamberlain; Sir John Berkley, Com.

A.D. 1660

Comptroller of the Household; Sir Edward Nicholas, Sir William Morrice, Secretaries of State; Sir Edward Hyde was created Earl of Clarendon; Arthur Annesley, Esq; Earl of Anglesey; Denzil Hollis, Esq; Lord Hollis; Sir John Berkley, Lord Berkley; Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Lord Cornwallis; Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Lord Cooper; Lord Colepeper was made Master of the Rolls; Sir Robert Foster, Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench; Sir Thomas Mallet, Sir Thomas Twissden, Sir Wadham Windham, Justices; Sir Robert Hyde, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; Sir Thomas Tyrrel, Sir Samuel Broome, Justices; Sir Orlando Bridgman, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer; Sir Matthew Hale, Sir Edward Atkins, Sir Christopher Turner, Barons; Sir Jeffry Palmer, Attorney General; Sir Heneage Finch, Solicitor General. And all the Offices Civil and Military, were put into such Hands as were fit for the Work they were to be set about, only the two Secretaries wou'd have been very unfit, had there been any Work for them to do. Of Morrice, Bishop Burnet says, He had no great Judgment about Foreign Affairs; of Nicholas, He had no Understanding in Foreign Affairs. What need was there of Understanding or Judgment about Affairs abroad? the Name of England was no more terrible to Foreigners. All the World knew the King had given himself up to his Ministers and his Pleasures; and that the Ministers were too busy about Church Matters to study Politicks, or have any Concern for the Balance of Power. The chief of them, Hyde, according to Burnet, never understood Foreign Affairs, and yet meddled too much with them.

Echard blames the Presbyterians for challenging the chief Hand in the wonderful Revolution, which he attributes to the Wisdom of the VICTORIOUS GENERAL, who by the way, never struck a Stroke for his Victory, and the immoveable Fidelity of the royal Party, who had not a Finger in the whole Affair. I will not say how ungenerous, but how base and ungrateful, as well as false and impudent, are the Pretensions of these Men who, as Ludlow affirms, contributed nothing towards the Change, as we have prov'd in every Paragraph, that has Relation to it. The royal Party was in the most desperate, despicable Condition that ever poor Wretches were; their Heads and their Hearts were so sunk, that they durst not think of Opposition, or look an Enemy in the Face; they had been beaten, baffled, and hang'd for fifteen or sixteen Years together, as often as they stir'd against their Rulers; and if the Presbyterians had not deliver'd them out of their Misery, they might have been still as miserable as when the Common-wealth was in the height of its Glory.

I shall make use of the Words of a modern Author on this Subject, "While the Affair of the Restoration was transacting, the Presbyterians were hugg'd and caress'd by the King and his Party, as Persons who were really what they afterwards pretended to be, the only Restorers of the King. But as soon as they had restor'd him, both the King and his Party grew cold to them at first, and afterwards ungrateful and cruel. Read what the Archdeacon writes: Whatever the Presbyterians did in this Matter, was principally to relieve themselves from the Oppression of the Independants, who had wrested the Power out of their Hands, and not out of any Affection for the King and the Church, which very much alter'd the Merit of their Services. Why had not these ingenious Gentlemen talk'd after this Rate before? Why did they not tell them,

"You shall not bring in the King unless you do it out of Zeal for the Church: To talk thus, now they were about to reward them with Poverty and Prisons, only adds Insolence to Ingratitude, and blackens the latter still more. I confess, the Presbyterians will have no great Reason to boast of their Knowledge of Men and Things, if they expected any thing better from the Pride, Arrogance, Revenge, Rage, and Necessity of their Enemies. Had the Cavaliers been ever guilty of Moderation and Charity, their giving themselves up to them, and putting their Fortunes and Liberties into their Hands, wou'd have savour'd less of Inconsideration and Rashness. Again, The Presbyterians had much more ground to complain, as having been the sole Cause of the Restoration; I do not say Helpers towards it, but Causers of it; and that it wou'd not, it cou'd not have been brought about by any other Party. The Independants and Baptists were Republicans almost to a Man. The Cavaliers were so totally suppress'd, that they durst hardly shew their Heads, or open their Mouths; and to act ever so cautiously in behalf of the King, was only a ready Way to the Gallows," as Echard observes on Sir John Greenville's delivering his Majesty's Letter to the Parliament: So mighty a Change was this, that a Servant of the King's, who for many Years together had been in Prisons and Confinements for being his Servant, and but a few Months before wou'd have been brought to a shameful Death, if he had been known to have seen the King, shou'd now be rewarded for coming from him.

Again, "Through the whole Transaction, Presbyterians there was scarce one Agent who was not a Presbyterian, above the Character of a Letter-carrier. There was not one Man who had Interest with a Foot Soldier in the Army, who acted for the King, but he was or pretended to be a Presbyterian. General Monk was a Presbyterian, or rather an Independant; so were his two Chaplains, Gumble and Price. Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper was a Presbyterian, so was Mr. Annesley, and even Sir William Morrice, Monk's great Confident and Counsellor in this Business, which he promoted more than Monk, himself having a better Head, though not a much better, and more Practice in Politicks, though not much more." He was a Member of Richard's Parliament, and so zealous for Presbytery, that he wrote a Book in Vindication of its Principles; yet directly contrary to all this is Mr. Echard, He will not enter farther into the Controversy. In Truth, it never was controverted by any Man which had not Forehead enough to controvert the Senses, and assert in the Face of the Sun there is no such Thing as Light in the World.

Bishop Burnet very justly represents their Enemies, "They were follow'd by the Herd of the Cavalier Party, who were now very fierce and full of Courage over their Cups, tho' they had been very discreet Managers of it in the Field, and in Time of Action. But now every one of them boasted he had kill'd his Thousands, and all were full of Merit, and as full of high Pretensions. Again, Vices of all sorts were the open Practices: Drinking was the most notorious of all, which was often continu'd through the whole Night; and many Disorders hapning after these irregular Heats, the People, who had never before that Time seen any thing like it, look'd with an ill Eye on every thing that was done by such a Set of lewd and vicious Men. This laid in all Minds a new Prejudice against Episcopacy." The Scene is partly Wicked Times.

A.D. 1660 partly in Scotland, but it will not be pretended that it was purer in England. 'Tis highly necessary to clear up and ascertain these Things, that when we (as we shall presently) come to the burning Zeal of these People, we may the better judge from what Spirit it came, and whether there could be any real Concern for Religion and the holy Worship of God in such a Set of lewd and vicious Men; or whether Persons, who could be ungrateful to the highest Degree of Infamy, could really be capable of any Principle truly Religious and Sacred.

Ep. Bur-

The Chancellor's handsome Speeches.

Two Days after the King's Arrival, he went to the Parliament House, the two Princes his Brothers accompanying him, where he pass'd an Act constituting the present Convention to be a Parliament; an Act for 70,000 Pounds a Month, as had been before levy'd; and An Act for Continuance of Process, and all Judicial Proceedings. After which the Lord Chancellor, according to Echard, made a handsome Speech; indeed it was handsomer than most of the rest of the Lord Chancellor's Speeches, because it was shorter: For as I have observ'd already, his Speeches and Declarations are a String of study'd Periods, full of Words and Declamations musical and well chosen, but with a very small Portion of Reason, Argument, Sincerity, and Truth, which I shall be very ready to prove when call'd upon; and in the mean while beg Leave to make Use of no more of them than will serve to give an Idea of the rest. Echard has them at length, and takes them to be the greatest Ornaments of his History, which indeed is not otherwise much ornamented; and it would be unconscionable to rob him of any Riches amidst so great Penury. The Lord Clarendon told them, The King would in all Points make good his Declaration from Breda, particularly, That he granted a Free and General Pardon to all, except those whom the Parliament excepted.

King promises Liberty of Conscience.

That no Man should be disquieted or call'd in Question for Differences of Opinion in Matters of Religion.

These Things, says the Chancellor, He will in all Points make good. A Man needs a vast deal of Patience that writes of these Times after such Copies as Echard's. Here are a Set of lewd, vicious Men rais'd out of the Dust by the help of the Presbyterians, and now hear how they bluster. The Commons thought that neither themselves nor the People of England were freed from that Guilt and Punishment which the unhappy Times had contracted, unless they laid hold of his Majesty's Grace mention'd in the Declaration; which they did very formally, by a Paper which Denzil Hollis, Esq; presented to the King in the Banqueting-House.

In direct Opposition to every Testimony born of this King and his Morals, Echard gives us his Evidence, That his Majesty gave all such Testimonies of Virtue as might render him deservedly Glorious in the Esteem of all sober Persons; and to prove this staring Falstity to be the naked Truth, he informs us the King issued a Proclamation for punishing Debauchery, Profaneness, and other Vices, of which himself was a most notorious Example.

On the 5th of July the King din'd at Guild-hall upon the most exquisite Rarities, says Echard, or I should not have said it, as not being very Historical.

The Lord Clarendon propos'd at the Council-Board, to burn all the Memorials of the Parliament and Oliver, which met with Opposition even from his Friend the Earl of Southampton, who said, It was better to leave those Papers as an Example of Rebellion, to deter others from prosecuting the same Measures, and the Council fell in with his Opinion.

His Majesty affected a great Impatience at the Parliament's delaying the Act of Oblivion, and sent a long Message about it to the Commons by Secretary Morrice. He made a Speech also concerning it in the House of Lords, and sent an obliging Message to the Commons to settle a Revenue upon him in lieu of what he should lose by the Oblivion Act; which, continues Echard, did not only produce the hearty Thanks of the House, but likewise a particular Order for the settling such a Revenue on his Majesty as might maintain the Splendor and Grandeur of the Kingly Office, which was never better maintain'd in this Reign than by the Expence.

A Proclamation was publish'd against Duels, and then, says Mr. Archdeacon, his Majesty took Care of the Church, which he explains by the Terms Revenues, Glebe-Lands, and other Emoluments, without one Word of God or Religion in a long Paragraph; and informs us, that the House of Commons thank'd his Majesty for his pious Intentions. It is prodigious! that People of a Holy Profession should be to learn what Piety is, and that it does not refer to Gold and Silver, Lands and Houses, to Vanity or Lucre of any Name or Kind whatsoever!

p. 773

The Act of Indemnity, so much boasted of as an Effect of his Majesty's unparallel'd Clemency, receives another Turn in Ludlow's Memoirs. One cannot deny but there is sometimes a Bitterness of Spirit in those Memoirs, and a very warm Republican Zeal; but he was a Gentleman otherwise of too much Virtue and good Sense to mingle Falshood with Fact, and his Mind was too Roman to submit to the Baseness of Malice and Slander.

When the Oblivion Bill was first in Debate, Oblivion Seven Persons only were to be excepted; Major Att. General Harrison, John Lisle, Esq; William Say, Esq; Thomas Scot, Esq; Col. John Jones, Cornelius Holland, Esq; Col. Barkstead.

One Col. Skipwith mov'd that Lieutenant General Ludlow might be one of the Seven, but not being seconded, Col. Barkstead was nominated. After this Three others were Voted for Exception, Lord Chief Justice Cook, Mr. Broughton, Mr. Edward Dendy. Ludlow proceeds, "And that no Means of gratifying the Passions of our Enemies might be omitted, having already under Pretence that some of the late King's Judges were fled, order'd their Estates to be seiz'd; it was contriv'd by the Creatures of the Court, who were a great Part of the House, that a Petition should be drawn and presented to the King to issue out a Proclamation for requiring all those of the late King's Judges, and others therein nam'd, to surrender themselves within the Space of Fourteen Days, under Pain of Exception from the Benefit of the Act both for Life and Estate. This Petition having had its Rise from the Court, and on that Account receiv'd with Joy by the King, soon produc'd a Proclamation;" upon which Lieutenant General Ludlow surrender'd himself, and gave Security for his forth-coming; notwithstanding which, he had Notice from Secretary Morrice, That where-ever he was he would do well to stand upon his Guard, for if he was taken he was a dead Man. About this Time the Lord Brogill was prevail'd upon to write to Sir Charles Coote in Ireland, that Mr. Ludlow's Personal Estate there might be deliver'd to his Agent, upon Security to be responsible where it should be adjudged to belong. But Coote was so far from satisfying his own Conscience or the Lord Brogill in this Matter, that fearing

A.D. 1660 Ludlow might be in a Condition to call him to an Account for the Injustice he had done him, he wrote a Letter to the King, in which having first inveigh'd against him as the most bitter of all his Enemies, he inform'd him, that dining with Ludlow at his House, he had assur'd him that Cromwel had not proceeded to Extremities against the late King, if Ludlow had not press'd him, and almost forc'd him to that Resolution. And for the Confirmation of the Truth of this, he desir'd that the Lord Broghill, who he said had din'd with them the same Day, might be interrogated. But when the King ask'd the Lord Broghill concerning this Business, he protested he had not charg'd his Memory with any such Thing, adding, He thought it unbecoming a Man of Honour to remember any thing to the Prejudice of a Gentleman who had spoken freely at his own Table.

Lud. p. 33. While these Things were doing, Lady Vane told Mrs. Ludlow that Mrs. Monk the Exchange-Woman had said, She wou'd go upon her Knees to the King, and beg that Sir Henry Vane, Major General Lambert, and Lieutenant General Ludlow might die without Mercy: And some Time after Monk himself said to the King, There was not a Man in the Three Nations more violently against you than Col. Ludlow. To which his Majesty reply'd, I have been otherwise inform'd by many of my Friends who receiv'd Civilities from him in their Troubles. We see by this, how the King's old and new Friends labour'd to irritate him against those whom they hated and fear'd, and whose Blood they thirsted after. His Indolence and Love of Pleasure wou'd not have driven him upon those sanguinary Acts which rais'd so much Horror in the Beginning of his Reign, if he had not been incited to it by the Revenge and Cruelty of others. It was his Father's last Charge to him, and some of his last Words, to forgive his Murtherers, as Dr. Juxon, Bishop of London, inform'd the Council of State. Had Hyde and his Counsellors fallen in with his natural Clemency, I believe there wou'd have been little or no Blood spilt; for it is very well known he us'd to reflect severely on his Father's Conduct, and losing his own Life to save the Lives of Delinquents who little deserv'd it of him. Coke tells us, I do not find he ever regarded the Memory of his Father. On the contrary, he industriously endeavour'd to have it believ'd that the Portraiture of his Father's Sufferings, a Book of late so much controverted, was none of his. Nay, I have been inform'd by a Person of Honour, and at the Head of Affairs some Years ago, that a certain Noble Lord taking Notice of this King's Swearing in common Discourse, his Majesty retorted, Your Martyr swore more than ever I did: All which induces me to think that he was put upon the Bloody Executions by the vindictive Exiles, as well Spiritual as Temporal, whom he brought home with him, and who had no hard Task to work up his Spirit to those Cruelties, considering how many Years he had been forc'd to live in Banishment and Beggary. There are some Particulars in Ludlow concerning the King's Judges, which are very curious.

p. 101.
King
Charles I.
a Swearer.*

The Bill of Indemnity being brought to the House of Lords, a great Contention arose concerning the Number of Persons to be excepted. The Widow of Dr. Hewet and Mrs. Penruddock, with other Widows, soliciting them with such Importunity for particular Satisfaction on Account of their Relations who had been put to Death, that they found themselves oblig'd to appoint a Committee to hear their Demands. The Lords also, says Ludlow, were inclin'd to revenge their own Order on the Persons of some in the high Court of Justice, by whom some of A.D. 1660 their Number had been condemn'd, and to except one of the Judges for every Lord they had put to Death; the Nomination of the Person to be excepted being refer'd to that Lord who was most nearly related to the Person who had suffer'd. According to this Regulation, Colonel Croxton, Governor of Chester, was nominated by the next Relation to the Earl of Derby, Major Waring by the Kinsman of another. The Earl of Denbeigh being desir'd by the House to name a Judge for his Brother in Law Duke Hamilton, nominated a Person who was dead; and being call'd upon to name another, his Lordship desir'd to be excus'd from naming any more. The Earl of Denbeigh, says my Author, being known to be a generous Man, and a Lover of his Country.

Sir John Winter, a Papist, Secretary to the Queen Mother, visited Lieutenant General Ludlow, to inform him that Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, and the Marquis of Argyle, were thrown into Prison by the King's Order, and to advise him rather to withdraw than to trust to the Mercy of his Enemies.

Col. Ingoldsby was pardon'd for his Service against Lambert, tho' he had been as zealous against the late King at his Trial, as any one of the Judges; yet having join'd with Monk in his treacherous Design, he had obtain'd a Pardon from the King, while he was beyond Sea. Major Lister came off by the Credit and Interest of William Pierpoint, Esq; Col. Thomlinson upon the Information of Mr. Seymour, that the late King had signify'd to him his Pleasure, that the Colonel shou'd receive Favour, on Account of his civil Carriage to him. The Earl of Litchfield objected against it, for the same Reason the present King did, that he might have betray'd his Trust as Monk had done, and have let the late King escape; but the Earl of Bristol being engag'd for Thomlinson, reprov'd the Earl of Litchfield so sharply, it had like to have ended in a Duel. The Lord Litchfield solicited in behalf of Lieutenant General Fleetwood, and speaking to the Lord Sturton for him, the latter promis'd to be for Fleetwood, if the Earl of Litchfield wou'd be for Lieutenant General Ludlow, whom the Lord Sturton, tho' a Papist, and his Lady, visited in the Place of his Concealment.

Thus the Oblivion Bill met with many Obstructions in the House of Lords, and the King coming to the House, thank'd the Lords for excepting those who had been the Judges of the King his Father, Who, he said, were guilty of such a Crime, that they cou'd not pardon themselves, much less expect it from others. This is so little agreeable to the Truth, that they pardon'd themselves in an extraordinary astonishing Manner; but a Turn of Thought, tho' ever so small and trifling, is very apt to mislead the Author of the History of Rebellion, who is the chief Speech-Maker of the Times. Eckard assures us, the King's Judges were so far from thinking they needed Pardon, or expressing the least Repentance, that they glory'd in it. Another reverend Historian writes, None betray'd a Repentance, most of them glory'd in it, and justify'd the Cause and Authority by which they acted; a particular Instance of which we have in Sir John Bouchier, one of these Judges, who being old and infirm, was seiz'd with a Fit of Sickness, about the Time of this Oblivion Act; his Relations despairing of his Recovery, desir'd him to sign a Paper, acknowledging his Sorrow for the Part he had in the Condemnation of the King: But according to Ludlow, He being highly displeas'd, rose suddenly from his Chair, which for

A.D. 1660 for some Days he had not been able to do without Assistance, and receiving fresh Vigour from the Memory of that Action, cry'd out, I tell you, it was a just Act of God, and all good Men will own it; and having thus express'd himself, he sat down again, and soon after dy'd.

The King's Promise broken. John Carew, Esq; Brother to Sir Alexander Carew, who lost his Head for serving this King's Father, being apprehended by the Warrant of a Justice of Peace, in which his Name was mistaken, the Officer refus'd to keep him in hold, till the Error was amended. Mr. Carew, however, told him, he believ'd he was the Person intended, and that he was going to such a Place, where he was found again and secur'd within the fourteen Days limited by the Proclamation for the Judges to surrender themselves; yet he was excepted out of the Indemnity Bill, contrary to the Tenour of that Proclamation: So was Col. Adrian Scrope, notwithstanding the Commons had contented themselves with a Year's Forfeiture of the Value of his Estate, and of Col. Laffels, "Yet continues my Author, upon Information from the Renegade Browne of some private Discourse between Col. Scrope and him, in which the Colonel, as he said, had justify'd the Part he had in the King's Trial, he was condemn'd without a Hearing, and added to the Exception in Respect to Life and Estate. An Action of such a Nature, that I shall forbear to give it the Name it deserves; but the King not satisfy'd with these Sacrifices, greedy of Revenge, and forgetting his Message from Breda, encourag'd his Creatures in the House of Lords, to insist upon their Exceptions; however the Commons being averse to break the publick Faith in every Particular, a Conference of both Houses was appointed, in which some of the Lower House pressing the Promise of the Proclamation, Hyde the Chancellor presum'd to affirm, That the Proclamation was in the Nature of a Subpœna," which puzzled the Cause with technical Cant, that had no more Agreement with the Publick Faith, given in the Proclamation, than with the Confession of Faith in the Liturgy. The wife and virtuous Earl of Southampton, conceiv'd a just Indignation against this daring Breach of Promise in a Matter of Blood, and mov'd, That since it was not thought fit to secure the Lives of those who had been induc'd to surrender their Persons, upon the Faith of the Proclamation, they ought at least to give them the like Number of Days for saving themselves as were appointed by that Paper for their coming in. But as my Author proceeds, "Finch, who had formerly fled from the Justice of the Parliament, oppos'd that Motion, saying, By such Means they may be enabled to do more Mischief, as he knew had happen'd in his own Case." Upon this, the following Persons who had surrender'd themselves on the Publick Faith in the Proclamation, were in Breach of that Faith excepted for Life and Estate, as Thomas Challoner, Esq; Col. Roe, Augustine Garland, Esq; Col. Harvey, Mr. Smith, Henry Marten, Esq; Sir Hardress Waller, Col. Scrope, John Carew, Esq; Alderman Tichburn, Col. J. Temple, Col. P. Temple, Col. Wayte, Simon Mayne, Esq; William Heveningham, Esq; Lieutenant General Fleetwood, Alderman Pennington, Col. Lilburne, Gilbert Millington, Esq; Vincent Potter, Esq; Thomas Wogan, Esq; John Downes, Esq. Of these Col. Scrope and Mr. Carew were excluded the Benefit of the Act, by which in Case they were attainted, Execution should be suspended till the King and Parliament should order it.

A.D. 1660 The following Judges were excepted absolutely, as to Life and Estate; Sir Michael Livesey, John Lisle, Esq; Lieutenant General Ludlow, William Say, Esq; Commissary General Whalley, Major General Harrison, William Carew, Esq; Daniel Blagrove, Esq; Cornelius Holland, Esq; Gregory Clement, Esq; Thomas Scot, Esq; Miles Corbet, Esq; Nicholas Love, Esq; Col. Walton, Col. Barkstead, Col. Okey, Col. Hewson, Col. Goffe, Col. Jones, Col. Hacker, Col. Axtell, Col. Dixwell, Chief Justice Cook, Sergeant Dendy, Mr. Broughton, Mr. Hewlett, and Mr. Peters. Mr. Hugh Peters was not one of the King's Judges, but he was a Minister, and had been too busy; so there was no room for Mercy.

The following Judges were attainted, tho' in their Graves; Oliver Cromwel, Esq; Captain General, Henry Ireton, Esq; Lieutenant General, Col. Ever, Col. Purefoy, C. Alured, Col. R. Dean, Col. Horton, Major General Skippon, President Bradshaw, Col. Hammond, Col. Pride, Sir John Danvers, Sir Thomas Maleverer, Sir William Constable, Sir John Bouchier, Sir Gregory Norton, John Blackston, Esq; Francis Allen, Esq; Peregrine Pelham, Esq; John Venn, Esq; Thomas Andrews, Esq; Anthony Stapely, Esq; John Fry, Esq. All these having no Lives to lose, were to forfeit their Lands, Goods, Rights, and Trusts. The following were excepted from receiving any Benefits of their Estates, and subjected to such farther Punishments as shou'd be inflicted upon them, Sir Henry Mildmay, Sir James Harrington, Robert Wallop, Esq; the Lord Mounson, James Challoner, Esq; and Mr. John Phelps. Sir Henry Mildmay's fine Estate at Wanstead in Essex, and the Lord Mounson's at Rygate in Surry, were given to the Duke of York, and Part of it forfeited by him afterwards with his other Possessions. When News was brought to the King, that Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Heselrigge, Major General Lambert, and Col. Axtell, were voted by the Lords to be excepted both for Life and Estate, he is said to be overjoy'd at it; and when Monk or Buckingham, told him, St. John narrowly escap'd, he cry'd, I wish'd he had been in also. St. John and seventeen more were excepted, only upon their taking any Office in England, Ecclesiastical, Civil or Military.

This is the Scene which is so carefully painted in the Compleat History and the Archdeacon's; thus have they open'd it, expecting the Reader shou'd be transported with it, as much as with the glittering, dazzling Lustre of a Stage Triumph. They are both as busy about the Executions, as if they had themselves been the Executioners: They are not mov'd at the Stream of Blood which ran down our Streets, nor the mangled Carcasses of those unhappy Gentlemen that were dragg'd about, and hang'd up in every Quarter of the City. Echard, who makes nothing of falsifying History, will get off of what I am about charging him with by the Letter of the Text; After all, we must not forget, says he, that Sir Henry Vane and John Lambert were entirely excepted out of the Act. The Truth is told us by Ludlow, "Sir Henry Vane, and Major General Lambert were excepted for Life and Estate, with this Reserve, that if upon Trial they shou'd be found guilty, the two Houses were then to join in a Petition to the King, for the Pardon of their Lives." This is what Echard calls entirely excepted, and let the Reader judge what a faithful Historian he is.

My Author proceeds, "At last the Commons, partly from Inclination, and partly from their own Safety, pass'd the Lords, or rather

A.D. 1660 "rather the King's Alterations in the Indemnity Bill; which Business being over, the House order'd the Serjeant at Arms to deliver those of the King's Judges who were in his Custody, into the Hands of the Lieutenant of the Tower;" accordingly he deliver'd to him Col. Adrian Scrope, Mr. William Heveningham, Mr. George Fleetwood, Col. James Temple, Mr. Peter Temple, Mr. Henry Smith, Mr. Simon Mayne, Col. Vincent Potter, Col. Thomas Wayte, Mr. Henry Marten, Alderman Pennington, Col. John Downes, Mr. Gilbert Millington, Col. Robert Lilburn, Mr. Augustine Garland, Col. Owen Roe, Col. Edmund Harvey. Sir Hardress Waller, and Alderman Tickburn had surrender'd themselves, but afterwards withdrew from the Serjeant at Arms. The former was got to France, but return'd to England, and surrender'd himself again; as did also Alderman Tickburn, and were both shut up in the Tower: But notwithstanding that the Crime these Gentlemen were accus'd of, was done in the most open flagrant Manner, yet it was not thought fit to be very expeditious in trying them. Ludlow, one of them, gives us this Reason for it; "It was delay'd during the time that William Love, Esq; was to continue Sheriff of London, he being no way to be induc'd, either for Fear or Hopes, to permit Juries to be pack'd in order to second the Designs of the Court; but after new Sheriffs had been chosen, Sir William Boulton and Sir William Peake, more proper to serve the present Occasion, a Commission for hearing and determining of this Matter, was directed to Thirty four Persons," as will be farther spoken of in the Course of the History.

With the Oblivion Act several others pass'd; as an Act for Confirmation of Judicial Proceedings in Law, Equity, &c. since the First of May, 1642; an Act for Money to pay off the Army and Navy; an Act for Restraining the taking of excessive Usury; and another for establishing a new Holiday the Twenty-ninth of May, the King's Birth-Day and Day of Restoration. At the passing of these Acts his Majesty made a Speech, wherein he spoke of his Person's being traduc'd, and earnestly recommended Rigor and Severity against those who shou'd express a Dislike of his Government by Words. He also remember'd them that he wanted Money, adding, And that which troubles me most, is to see many of you come to me at Whitehall, and to think you must go somewhere else to seek a Dinner.

Sir Harbottle Grimston the Speaker made a long Speech, in which he shew'd himself to be an apt Scholar in the Sentiment and Language which became the Mode. Your Majesty offer'd us a Pardon before we had the Confidence to ask it; looking over a long black prodigious dismal Roll and Catalogue of Malefactors, we there met not with Men but with Monsters, guilty of Blood, precious Blood! precious Royal Blood! incomparable in all kind of Villanies by the worst of Miscreants, Perverters of Religion, Subverters of the Government. Some are set apart as an Antidote to expel the Poison of Sin and Rebellion, Sacrifices to God's Wrath, and to satisfy Divine Vengeance. He had a few Days before reprimanded the former Speaker, Mr. Lenthall, for confounding the Civil War with the Death of the King, and he confounds them now himself. This very Parliament justify'd the Civil War by his own Mouth, and the Civil War is the Rebellion, according to the Earl of Clarendon, Mr. Echard, and all the Compleat Historians. The Death of the King was the Act of a Set of Men disown'd by those who began and carry'd on the Earl of Clarendon's Grand Rebellion; and yet Sir Har- bottle sacrifices them in this Speech for that Re- A.D. 1660 bellion. The King's Trial and Death were after the Civil War was over, and are a Murder in Law and Reason, an Act of Violence and Blood. This is the same Sir Harbottle who made a Rushw. Speech twenty Years before, wherein he told p. 39. the House of Commons, that the Convocation by their Canons wou'd have us swear to a Damnable Heresy; you see he had a strong Way of expressing himself, and that Matters necessary to Salvation are contain'd in the Discipline of our Church. Again, Nay Mr. Speaker, they go a little farther, for they wou'd have us swear that the Government of the Church by Archbishops, Against Bishops, Deans, Archdeacons, &c. is Jure Di- Archbi- vino; whereas we meet not with the Name of an shop, &c. Archbishop, or a Dean, or an Archdeacon in all the New Testament. And whatsoever may be said of the Function of Bishops, it is one Thing, but for their Jurisdiction it is merely Humana Institutione, and they must thank the King for it.

Who are they that have countenanc'd and cherish'd Popery? Who are they that have given Encouragement to those that have boldly preach'd those Damnable Heresies in our Pulpits? Who are they, Mr. Speaker, that have of late Days been advanc'd to any Dignity in the Church, but such as have been notoriously corrupt in their Doctrines, and for the most part vicious in their Lives?

Now turn to the Earl of Clarendon; There Clarend. was not one Churchman in any Degree of Fa- wrong- vour of a scandalous Condition of Life. As diametrically opposite as this is to what Sir Harbottle Grimston tells us, and he tells us the Truth, the Lord Clarendon or the Christ Church Men aver, Not one Churchman in any Degree of Fa- vour cou'd be found out that was of a vicious Life, after the strictest Inquisition that ever was made. Sir Harbottle Grimston is the Man of P-755. whom, now he is concurring with him and his Partisans, he said, that he rather sat in the Long Parliament, than concour'd with them; which is as false in Fact as affected in Expression. He shew'd his Concurrence still farther in this same Speech:

Who are they that have overthrown our two great Charters Magna Charta, and Charta de Forester?

What Imposition hath been laid down, or what Monopoly hath been damned in any Court of Justice?

Hath not Ship-Money, Coat and Conduct-Money, and Money for other Military Uses been collected and levied with as great Violence as ever they were, in Violation of our Liberties confirm'd to us in our Petition of Right; notwithstanding all our Supplications and Complaints the last Parliament?

And who are they that have caus'd all these dangerous Convulsions, and all the desperate unnatural bloody Distempers that are now in our Body Politick? Mr. Speaker, I will tell you a Passage I heard from a Judge in the King's Bench: There was a poor Man committed by the Lords for refusing to submit to a Project; and having attended a long Time at the King's Bench Bar upon his Habeas Corpus, and at last pressing very earnestly to be bailed, the Judge said to the rest of his Brethren, Come, Brothers, let us bail him; for they begin to say in the Town, that the Judges have overthrown the Law, and the Bishops the Gospel. This is the Gentleman who did not concur. The rest of this, and his other Speeches are full of the like Negatives in Concurrence; and the repeating it here is intended to caution the Reader against trusting too much to the Speeches of such as are no more consistent

A.D. 1660 consistent with themselves, than with right Reason and Sincerity.

Sir Harbottle sat in the same Parliament with some of the Sacrifices he is now making to Divine Vengeance, and Voted as they Voted, to the End of the Lord Clarendon's Grand Rebellion, if the Civil War is meant by it, and as much as his Indignation was rais'd by the Hainousness of their Crime afterwards, his Fellowship with them for many Years made such Expressions as Villains, Monsters, Miscreants, less decent in his Mouth than it wou'd have been in Chancellor Hyde's, who was excepted out of every Pardon propos'd by that Parliament; to which Sir Harbottle spoke about the Overthrow of Law and Gospel. He made another Speech a few Days after, the 29th of August, when he presented a Bill to the King for raising 100,000 Pounds for a present Supply; another for settling a Revenue upon him of 1,200,000 Pounds a Year; another for raising 240,000 Pounds in two Months; another to disband the Army and Garrisons, and pay off part of the Fleet; another for encouraging and encreasing Shipping and Navigation; an Act for restoring some Ministers into their Places, and for confirming others in vacant Places; an Act for regulating the Bay Trade. He gave due Praises to all these several Acts, and clos'd with a Foresight of the inexpressible Happiness of the People, if they cou'd rest and wholly rely upon his Majesty's Grace and Goodness. The King spoke after the Speaker, and told them, He hop'd they wou'd join with him in reducing of Parliaments to their antient Rules and Orders, the deviation from which had done them no good. And he shew'd how he join'd in keeping to antient Rules, by his continuing the next Parliament to this Eighteen or Nineteen Years, whereas the antient Rule was to continue them not so many Weeks; and to renew the Parliamentary Writs every one, two, or three Years at most. Then the Lord Chancellor made his Speech, wherein he told them, He conjur'd them from the King to join with him in restoring the whole Nation to its primitive Temper and Integrity, to its old good Manners, to its old good Humour, and its old good Nature, &c. He said it was penal by the Act of Indemnity to use Names or Words of Reproach, and that surly Looks were within the Equity of the Statute. To prove the Integrity of these Speeches, we need only mention a Book mention'd by Echard, and written by the infamous Roger L'Estrange. The Reverend Historian fills one of his Folio Pages with what he takes out of that Notable Piece; wherein some of the Presbyterians prefer'd by the King for restoring him to his Kingdom, are call'd Cromwel's Creatures, Bradshaw's Creatures, St. John's Creatures, meaning the Great Grandfather of the St. John in Harley's Time, Parasites, Villains, Knaves, Seditious Ministers, Constitution Masters, Rank Separatists, Scandalous Lecturers; which Libel was countenanc'd, applauded, and bought up by the Creatures of the Court, and sufficiently shew'd what Dependence was to be made on the most fair Words, and indeed the most solemn Promises in publick Speeches and Declarations.

Mention has been made of the King's thanking the Parliament for excepting his Father's Judges out of the Act of Indemnity. Upon which Ludlow writes as follows, "By which he not only manifested his own revengeful Temper, and the little Regard he had to the Promise he had made in his Proclamation from Breda, to refer himself wholly to the Parliament for pardoning what had been done during the late Troubles; but his Imprudence

" in this so early Violation of the Privileges of the Parliament, by taking Notice of what was depending before it came to be judicially presented to him, and by that Means fomenting a Division between them concerning an Affair in which he himself was principally interested. He told them, other Ways might be found to meet with those who were of turbulent and factious Spirits; insinuating, if I mistake not, That his Intentions were not to be guided by the Direction of the Laws, but that he had some secret Reserves to render the Act of Indemnity insignificant; concluding with Desires that they wou'd be careful to make Provision for his Irish Subjects, who had manifested great Affection to him during his Exile; expressing the same Zeal in the latter Part of his Speech for the bloody Irish Rebels, as he had done in the former against those who had dar'd to defend the Liberties of England.

By this Means the Irish grew immediately to Papists that Confidence, that one Fitzbarris publicly insolent. affirm'd in Westminster Hall, that they were the best Subjects the King had, and for that Reason shou'd be soon restor'd to the Possession of their Lands; of which the Parliament being inform'd, they committed him to the Gate-House, but after two Days he was by the prevalency of the Court Faction discharg'd from his Imprisonment.

It far'd not so well with a Scots Gentleman, the Laird of Swinton, who was seiz'd and sent to the Tower. The Cause of his Seizure was at first reported to be for a Design to stab the King as he was curing the King's Evil; but afterwards 'twas said he was imprison'd for deserting the Scots after the Battle of Dunbar.

The Imprisonment of the Marquis of Argyle has been spoken of. The Marquis of Antrim coming to Court about the same Time, was sent after him to the Tower. He had been an Irish Rebel, and gave out That the Irish were authoriz'd by the late King to act as they had done. However, Lord Argyle was sent to Scotland to lose his Head on a Scaffold, and Lord Antrim to Ireland to have the Estate that had been taken from him for his Rebellion. I think these Things need no Explanation nor Remark.

The Commission for trying the King's Judges being issu'd soon after there were proper Sheriffs chosen, as Ludlow observes, the following Persons were the Commissioners: Sir Thomas Allen, Lord Mayor of London, Lord Chancellor Hyde, Earl of Southampton, Duke of Albemarle, Marquis of Ormond, Earl of Lindsey, Earl of Manchester, Earl of Dorset, Earl of Berkshire, Earl of Sandwich, Lord Say, Lord Roberts, Lord Finch, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir Charles Berkley, Secretary Nicholas, Secretary Morrice, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, Mr. Arthur Annesley, Sir Harbottle Grimston, Sir William Wild, Recorder of London, Sir Orlando Bridgman, Lord Chief Baron, Judge Hyde, Judge Foster, Judge Malles, Baron Atkins, Judge Twisden, Baron Turner, Judge Tyrrel, Serjeant Browne, Serj. Hale, Mr. John Howel.

PROSECUTORS,

Attorney General, Sir Jeffry Palmer; Solicitor General, Sir Heneage Finch; Attorney to the Duke of York, Sir Edward Turner; Serjeant Keeling, Mr. Wadham Windham, Mr. Edward Shelton, Clerk of the Crown.

WITNESSES,

Mr. William Lenthal, Mr. John Rustworth, Mr. Anthony Mildmay, Col. Tomkinson, Col. Hunks,

A.D. 1660 assum'd, to the Oppression of the People: He insisted that having done nothing, in relation to the Matter in Question, otherwise than by the Authority of the Parliament, he was not justly accountable, either to this or any other inferior Court, which being a Point of Law, he desir'd to have Council assign'd upon that Head, but the Court over-ru'd it, and by interrupting him frequently, and not permitting him to go on in his Defence, They clearly manifested, says Ludlow, a Resolution of gratifying the Resentments of the Court upon any Terms, so that a hasty Verdict was brought in against him; and the Question being ask'd, If he had any thing to say, why Judgment shou'd not pass? he only said, Since the Court has refus'd to hear what was fit for me to speak in my Defence, I have no more to say. Upon which Sir Orlando Bridgman pronounc'd the Sentence. Mr. Ludlow cannot help proceeding thus; "And that the Inhumanity of these Men may the better appear, I must not omit that the Executioner in an ugly Dress, with a Halter in his Hand, was plac'd near the Major General, and continu'd there during the whole time of his Trial, which Action, I doubt whether it was ever equall'd by the most barbarous Nations; but having learnt to condemn such Baseness, after the Sentence had been pronounc'd against him, he said aloud as he was withdrawing from the Court, I have no Reason to be ashamed of the Cause in which I have been engag'd." Echard owns that the Prisoner having said, that he acted in the Fear of the Lord, the Court and Audience were amaz'd, and cry'd, Away with him, for he makes God the Author of his Treasons and Murders. Sir Edward Turner added, He has the Plague all over him. This Knight had not the Plague, but it is most certain that a small moving Member of his, was full of deadly Poison. Turner and all of them are in astonishment, that the Prisoners shou'd plead Authority of the Parliament; why had they any thing else to plead? Or was there any Plea in the World that cou'd have serv'd one that was brought before them, in case he was arraign'd for this Crime?

Col. Adrian Scrope's Trial came on next. He deny'd nothing of the Charge, but pleaded the Authority of the Parliament in his Justification, denying that he had been acted by any Motive of Malice, as the Indictment had suggested, and asserting, that in what he had done, relating to the King, he had follow'd the Light of his Reason, and the Dictates of his Conscience. At this Trial, the principal Witness was that Browne, who having been Major General in the Parliament's Service, and mention'd already in this Work to be of a mercenary Spirit, was now brought to betray a private Conversation, and to depose, that talking one Day with Col. Adrian Scrope, in the Speaker's Chamber, and telling him that the Condition of the Nation was sad since the Death of the King, the Colonel answer'd, Men have different Opinions touching that Matter, and being desir'd by the said Browne to explain himself, he reply'd, I shall not make you my Confessor, which amounts to nothing at all; for nothing is more sure than that Men had different Opinions touching that Matter. Lieutenant General Ludlow wou'd have been hang'd, drawn and quarter'd for it in England. In Switzerland, the Lords of the Canton of Berne granted him their Act of Protection, and as to his saying he wou'd not make Browne the Woodmonger his Confessor, it prov'd nothing but his Contempt of the Man he spoke to; yet Echard says, he had so much the Port and Language of a Gentleman, that had it not been for the Evidence of Sir Richard Browne, Lord Mayor elect, it is justly believ'd he wou'd have escap'd with Life, and if that Evidence hang'd him, I will leave it to the Reader to make a Judgment of the Justice and Humanity of the Times. He was found guilty as hastily as Major General Harrison had been.

John Carew, Esq; was Brother to Sir Alexander Carew, of the ancient Family of that Name Carew, in Cornwall. He had his Education in one of the Universities, and at the Inns of Court; he had a plentiful Estate as well as Col. Scrope, which is no small Aggravation to Guilt in bad times. He had been a Member of the Council of State, and employ'd in many important Affairs, wherein he shew'd great Ability; he found the same Usage from the Court as Major General Harrison had done, being frequently interrupted, and Council deny'd, tho' earnestly desir'd by him, in that Point of Law, touching the Authority by which he had acted; tho' I do not see what Advantage Council cou'd be to him. For if he pleaded that Authority was by Parliament, nothing was better known than that the Parliament was under Force; and had not the Soldiers purg'd the House, the Act for Trying the King cou'd never have pass'd. And it is not on Account of the Prisoners that I take Notice of the Hardships they complain'd of, but to give as good an Idea as I can of the Persons then in Power, who in a Year or two will shew us some other Acts of theirs in favour of the Church, as these are in favour of the State.

When Mr. Carew found all he cou'd say was to no Purpose, he frankly acknowledg'd that he sat in the High Court of Justice, and had sign'd two Warrants, one for summoning the Court in order to the King's Trial, and another for his Execution. Upon this the Court, who, says my Author, were well acquainted with the Disposition of the Jury, permitted him to proceed, and he began his Defence thus. In the Year 1640, a Parliament was call'd according to the Laws and Constitution of this Nation, and some Differences arising between the King and that Parliament, the King withdrew his Person from them, upon which the Lords and Commons declar'd, ----- Here the Court interrupted him, contrary to the Liberty they had promis'd him, alledging that what he was about to say, tended not only to justify the Action for which he was accus'd, but to cast a Ball of Division among those who were present. Mr. Carew neglecting that Ball of Division, began again, The Lords and Commons in their Declaration, ----- Here Judge Foster interrupted him again, and told him, "He endeavour'd to revive those Differences which he hop'd were laid asleep, and that he did so blow the Trumpet of Sedition, demanding if he had ever heard, or cou'd produce an Act of Parliament made by the Commons alone." To this he wou'd have answer'd, but was not permitted to finish what he began to say, or hardly any one thing he endeavour'd to speak in his Defence, during the whole Trial. Mr. Arthur Annesley particularly charging him with the Exclusion of the Members, in the Year 1648, of which Number he had been one; Mr. Carew only reply'd, It seems strange that a Man who sits as Judge on the Bench, shou'd give Evidence as a Witness in the Court. My Author adds, "These irregular Proceedings so unbecoming a Court of Judicature, oblig'd Mr. Carew to address himself to the Jury, leaving them to judge of the Legality of his Trial," and having said this Matter, had been controverted in the Face of the whole World, and that the Lord had given an Answer upon solemn Appeals to these things.

Sir

A.D. 1660 Sir Orlando Bridgman bad him remember, The Devil sometimes appears as an Angel of Light. The Jury without removing from the Bar, brought him in guilty.

Mr. Scot's Trial. Thomas Scot, Esq; late Secretary of State, being next at the Bar, was brought to a Trial, Ludlow says, or rather to receive the Sentence of Condemnation. He was charg'd with Sitting in the High Court of Justice, at the King's Trial, and signing the two Warrants before-mention'd, as also with desiring that the following Inscription shou'd be engrav'd on his Monument, Here lies Thomas Scot who adjudg'd the late King to die. Several Witnesses were produc'd to prove these Things, and among the rest William Lenthall, Esq; Speaker to the Parliament, who, tho' when the King enter'd the House of Commons, and had demanded of him the five Members, he knew how to answer, I have neither Ears to hear, Eyes to see, or Mouth to speak, except what the House gave, cou'd now appear as an Evidence against Mr. Scot for Words spoken in Parliament, which he was conscious to himself was a high Breach of Privilege; acquainting the Court that the Person accus'd had justify'd in the House the Proceedings against the King. Mr. Scot urg'd in his Defence, "That whatever had

p. 67.

"been spoken in the House ought not to be given in Evidence against him, not falling under the Cognizance of any Inferior Court, as all Men knew; that for what he had done in relation to the King, he had the Authority of the Parliament for his Justification; that the Court had no Right to declare whether that Authority were a Parliament or not." And being demanded to produce one Instance, to shew that the House of Commons was ever possess'd of such an Authority, he assur'd them he cou'd produce many. He began with the Saxon Times; immediately the Court interrupted him, and told him the Things of those Ages were obscure. Finding he might not be permitted to proceed in that Way, he took the Liberty to tell them, He cou'd not see for what Reason it was not as lawful for that House of Commons in which he had sat as a Member to make Laws, as for the present Convention, which had been call'd by the Authority of the Keepers of the Liberties of England. I had the Authority of Parliament, the Legislative Authority to justify me. Here the Court interrupted him, and Ludlow writes, Having no Reason to give, Finch said in a Passion, Sir, if you speak to this Purpose again, I profess for my own Part I dare not bear any more; 'tis a Doctrine so Poisonous and Blasphemous, that if you proceed upon this Point, I shall (and I hope my Lords will be of the same Opinion) desire that the Jury may be immediately directed. Mr. Scot reply'd, My Lord, I thought you wou'd rather have been my Council, as I think 'tis the Duty of your Place; but in this Matter I am not alone, neither is it my single Opinion, even the secluded Members of whom several were then sitting upon the Bench, own'd us to be a Parliament, else why did they, supported by an arm'd Force, intrude themselves contrary to the Resolution of the House, in order to procure the major Vote for our Dissolution? To which Mr. Annesley answer'd, If the secluded Members had not appear'd in Parliament, and by that means put an End to all Pretences, the People had not so soon arrived at their Happiness. After some little Struggle more, says Eckard, the Jury, as directed, soon brought him in Guilty.

My Author proceeds, "Col. John Jones and Mr. Gregory Clement finding all that had been said in Vindication of the Things objected against the Gentlemen who had been already

A.D. 1660 "tried, to prove ineffectual, inform'd the Court "that they cou'd say no more than had been already alledg'd, and therefore confess'd the "Fact, upon which they were declar'd Guilty, "as the Persons before-mention'd had been.

These Five Prisoners receiving Sentence together, Eckard informs us Sir Orlando Bridgman made an affecting Speech to them. I knew well enough before what a fine Judge he was of the Pathos in Eloquence, and was only confirm'd by this Saying of his now in my Opinion, that his Judgment was equal to his Practice, there being not a moving Word in it, unless this is the Pathetic: "There is a Spiritual Pride; Men may over-run themselves by their own Holiness, and may follow pretended Revelations. How affecting it is! Men may say, I have pray'd about such a thing; a Man may commit a Robbery or Murder merely because he will, and may come and say, I have pray'd against it, and cannot understand it to be a Sin, as the Man in Shropshire did, and yet notwithstanding kill'd his own Father and Mother." Which puts me in Mind of an old Saw upon Similies, As Tinterden Steeple was the Cause of Goodwin Sands, so good People love one another.

The next brought to his Trial was Mr. John Mr. Solicitor Cook, who was not one of the King's Judges, but licitor Solicitor to the High Court of Justice appointed by Parliament, as they call'd themselves, and were call'd by others. Mr. Cook's Plea shews us that his Capacity was much superior to the Lawyers that sat upon him; and the Lord Chief Baron Bridgman must be a Man of Resolution to put his Abilities in opposition to Mr. Cook's, whose Cause, 'tis true, was as bad as Bridgman's was good; and it was as great pity that Bridgman made no more of it, as that Cook made so much of his.

He was accus'd of preferring in the Name of all the good People of England, an Impeachment of High Treason to the High Court of Justice against the late King; that he had sign'd the said Impeachment with his own Hand; that upon the King's Demurrer to the Jurisdiction of the Court, he had press'd that the Charge might be taken for confess'd, and therefore had demanded Judgment from the Court against the King; but this Indictment is more particularly charg'd upon him in the three following Articles.

I. That he with others had propounded, counselled, contriv'd, and imagin'd the Death of the late King.

II. That to bring about this Conspiracy, he with others had assum'd Authority and Power to accuse, kill, and murder the King.

III. That a Person unknown did cut off the King's Head, and that the Prisoner was abetting, aiding, assisting, countenancing, and procuring the said Person so to do.

One can easily believe that he did counsel and imagine the King's Death, that he did accuse him and demand Justice, and really I think that was enough of Conscience to do what they did to him, without adding what no body will believe, that he kill'd the King himself, or that he went for the Hangman, as in the second and third Article. Mr. Cook's Answer shews us how a very bad Cause may be colour'd over by an artful experienc'd Counsel.

He answer'd first, "That he cou'd not be justly said to have contriv'd or counsell'd the Death of the King, because the Proclamation for the King's Trial, even by the Confession of his Accuser, was publish'd on the 9th of January, which was a Day before he was appointed Solicitor to the High Court of Justice.

"In

A.D. 1660

" In the second Place, tho' the Court shou'd not admit that to be an Act of Parliament which authoriz'd him to do what he did, yet he assur'd himself they wou'd allow it to be an Order, which was enough to justify him.

" Thirdly, That he who had neither been Accuser, Witness, Jury, Judge, or Executioner, cou'd not be guilty in this Case.

He urg'd, " That having acted only as Council, he was not answerable for the Justice or Injustice of the Cause he had manag'd. I take that to be the strongest Part of his Answer, If Hyde, or Bridgman, or Palmer, or Turner, were to have been accountable for the Injustice of all the Causes they had managed, which must be suppos'd to be all the Causes wherein they were cast, it wou'd not have been possible for them to have held out long enough to sit upon that Bench. Solicitor Cook alledg'd farther, " That being plac'd in that Station by a publick Command, it cou'd not be said he acted maliciously, or with a wicked Intention, as the Indictment mention'd. That Words spoken do not amount to Treason, much less when set down in Writing by the Direction of others; especially since no clear Proof had been produc'd that his Name subscrib'd to the Charge against the King was written by himself. He said, That to pray and demand Justice, though Injustice be done upon it, cou'd not be Treason within the Statute; that when he demanded Justice, it might be meant of Acquittal as well as Condemnation; and that if it shou'd be accounted Treason in a Counsellor to plead against the King, it must also be Felony to plead against any Man who may be unjustly condemned for Felony. That the High Court of Justice, tho' now call'd Tyrannical and Unlawful, was yet a Court, had Officers attending them, and many think had Authority, there being then no other in this Nation than that which gave them their Power; and if this will not justify a Man for acting within his own Sphere, it will not be lawful for any one to exercise his Profession, unless he may be sure of the Legality of the Establishment under which he acts."

So says General Ludlow; the Archdeacon adds more of his Answer, on purpose to shew how well it was answer'd from the Bench. He observ'd, " That the Word Instrumental in the Exception of the Act, was insignificant, or otherwise incomprehensiv of him." After all his long Pleadings, says the Archdeacon (and by long there, means dull and tedious, as I do when I mention certain long Speeches in his History) he was answer'd by the Court, and then he tells us how, That he had been sufficiently prov'd instrumental, &c. and so was every one that brought the King from Holmby to the Army, and from Hurst-Castle to Windsor, and from Windsor to St. James's, and from St. James's to Westminster-Hall, and from thence to the Scaffold: Not to push that Argument farther, all concern'd in any of those Actions were instrumental. This has no manner of relation to the Justice or Injustice of the Cause; it turns only on the Exception in the Act, and then the Question is, Whether the Degree of Instrumentality does or does not except the Person? which I suppose will not be allow'd by Lawyers at this Time. But to give the Reader an Idea of the Argumentation of this Bench, we will repeat a Paragraph, the rather because Echard has repeated it, and did not see there was nothing at all in it. " As no Man can have a lawful Call to pursue the Life of his King, so for a private Person, though he only intends to beat a Man, yet if he dies

" thereupon, in Law it is Murder; and if a Man counsels another to commit Murder, he is guilty himself." Here are As and So attended with as much Nonsense as ever they were since they were Adverbs. As no Man can lawfully pursue the King's Life, so no Man can lawfully pursue another Man's. Or it must be, As it is not lawful to pursue the Life of the King, so it is not lawful to beat a Man, if he dies upon it. But it may be lawful to intend to beat a Man only, and the Man may thereupon die without committing Murder, as is the Case of all legal Correction, by the Severity of which many Persons in all Ages and Conditions have dy'd, though Death was not in the Intention. I do not leave out what few Arguments this Court give, for any other Reason than that they are no better than this, when they leave the substantial one, and they wanted no other, which is, That to imagine and conspire the Death of the King is Treason; and that the Prisoners imagin'd and conspir'd was never deny'd by themselves, though they pretended they were justify'd by the Authority of the Remnant of the Parliament, which cou'd not be, because Force had been put upon the Assembly, and what they did afterwards cou'd not be legal.

Ludlow gives this Account of the Success of Mr. Cook's Pleadings. " These, and divers other things of no less Weight, he said in his Defence; but the Cabal thinking themselves concern'd to prevent the like in Time to come, and to terrify those who were not only able, but willing also to be employed in such Service, procured from the Jury a Verdict of Condemnation against him, according to their Desire."

After which Mr. Hugh Peters, of Col. Mr. Hugh Peters. lege in Cambridge, was try'd for compassing and imagining the Death of the King, as Ludlow says; probably he mistook, and it was for imagining and compassing; and probably he did not mistake, considering the Heads of the Lawyers that were at Work upon this Business, For conspiring with Oliver Cromwel; methinks this Indictment shou'd have been prefer'd in Oliver's Life-time, and then he might have been made an Example of as well as Hugh is, at several Times and Places, and procuring the Soldiers to demand Justice; by preaching divers Sermons to persuade the Soldiery to take off the King, comparing him to Barabbas, and applying part of a Psalm, where 'tis said, They shall bind their Kings in Chains, &c. to the Proceedings against him, assuring them, if they wou'd look into their Bibles, they shou'd find there, That whoever sheddeth Man's Blood, by Man shall his Blood be shed; and that neither the King, nor any other Person, are excepted from this general Rule. He was also accus'd of saying, That the Levites, Lords, and Lawyers must be taken away, in order to establish a Common-wealth. That the King was a Tyrant, and that the Office it self was chargeable, useles, and dangerous." All which Things and many more of the like nature were sworn against him, and I doubt we shall have but a poor Defence from him; such as it is you have it in Ludlow, " That the War began before he came into England; that since his Arrival he had endeavour'd to promote sound Religion, the Reformation of Learning, and the Law; which Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper, one of his Judges, might have witness'd for him if he wou'd, having been a joint Committee Man with him for that Purpose." That for the better effecting these Things, and the Employment of the Poor, he had espous'd the Interests of the Parliament, in which he had acted with-

Condemn'd.

 "whatever Prejudices or Passions might possess
 "the Minds of Men, yet there was a God who "knew these things to be true." This is what Echard calls speaking meanly. Ludlow gives it another Turn; It was not expected any thing he cou'd say shou'd save him from the Revenge of the Court, and therefore he was without Hesitation brought in Guilty.

Con-
 demn'd.
 Col. Axtel
 try'd.

The next Prisoner brought to his Trial was Col.
Daniel Axtel, who had escap'd, as he thought, says Echard, the Exception in the Act, but was lately added, on Account of other Blood that lay upon him, which is false; for that other Blood lay more upon Monk than it did upon him, and as much upon Montague Earl of Sandwich, both then sitting in Judgment upon him. The Blood of the King needed no Aggravation, it wou'd make one tremble, even but to read it, had not the Rage, Malice, and Stupidity of some History Writers diverted part of ones Thoughts when we meet with it in their Writings. The chief Heads of the Indictment against Col. Ax-tel were, "That he commanded the Guards
 "both at the Trial and Execution of the King;
 "that he order'd the Soldiers, in a tumultuous
 "Manner, to demand Justice, and afterwards "Execution; that he threaten'd to shoot a Lady (Lady Fairfax) who from a Gallery that "was near the Court where the King was try'd,
 "had contradicted the President when he was "speaking concerning the Charge. That he sent "for and encourag'd the Executioner, and that "he upbraided with Cowardice, one of the Per"sons to whom the Warrant for seeing Ex"ecution done upon the King was directed, for "refusing to sign it." Ludlow adds, These, with some other things of less Weight, were call'd compassing and imagining the Death of the King. Echard mentions his charging the Person with Cowardice for refusing to sign the Warrant, but does not tell us who that Person was, because he was a very willing Witness against his Brother Officer. It was Col. Hercules Huncks, who, according to Ludlow, was one of the three to whom that Warrant was directed, one of the forty Halberdiers attending the High Court of Justice, and one who had oppos'd with more than ordinary Vehemence, all those who were for the King. This Man was the principal Witness against Col. Axtel, who having first acknowledg'd his Ignorance in Matters of Law, and therefore desir'd that no undue Advantage might be taken on that Account, proceeded to speak to this Effect.

His Defence.

"That the War was made by the joint Autho"rity of the Lords and Commons assembled in "Parliament, who claim'd a Right in employ"ing the Military Force of the Nation for the "publick Safety, as appears by divers Acts and "Declarations publish'd by their Order. This "Authority rais'd an Army, made the Earl of "Essex General. Then the Earl of Manchester, "sitting on the Bench, General of the Forces of "the Eastern Association, and after that created "and authoriz'd Sir Thomas Fairfax to be Ge"neral of all their Forces."—Having thus stated the Case, he proceeds, Under this Authority I acted, which I conceive to be legal, because this Parliament was not only call'd by the King's Writ, which the Parliament then sitting was not, and chosen by the People, but also because a Bill had pass'd, that they shou'd not be dissolv'd otherwise than by their own Consent. Having this unquestionable Authority for my Justification, I presume my Case comes not within the Reach of the Statute, 25 Edward III. which cou'd by no Means intend such a Power, as was not only own'd and

A.D. 1660 obey'd at home, but acknowledg'd by Princes and States abroad, to be the chief Authority of the Nation, by sending Ambassadors and Agents to them. The Judges, who ought to be the Eye and Guide of the People, acted under them; divers of them publicly declaring that it was lawful and justifiable to obey the Parliament, but if their Acts may not be accounted such, tho' they carry'd that Title, and were obey'd by the Judges, Ministers, Officers of State, and the whole Nation; yet surely they cannot be deny'd to be Orders of Parliament, which wou'd be sufficient to justify any Man who acted by them. This Parliament so constituted, so acknowledg'd, so obey'd, having made choice of a Person to be General of their Forces, I was by that General, Sir Thomas Fairfax, in Virtue of the Authority he had receiv'd from them, constituted an Officer under him; and therefore whatever I have done, was as a Soldier, and according to the Duty of my Office:
 For if I was in Westminster-Hall at the time of the King's Trial, I was there by command of the General; and if it be so great a Crime to have been an Officer in that Army, which was rais'd by the Earls of Essex, Manchester, the Lord General Fairfax, Monk, and others, who have acted by the same Authority, were no less criminal than my self. Here he cited the Declarations of the Lords and Commons, publish'd when they engag'd the People to take Arms, in which they asserted, "That it was repugnant to Reason that "the Judgment and Actions of the Parliament
 "might not be a Rule and Guide to the Na"tion in their Duty, and declar'd, that the Per"sons who shou'd act under their Authority,
 "ought not to be question'd for so doing.

Wherefore, continues he, I presume that an inferior Court will not expound the Law, contrary to the Judgment of the high Court of Parliament.
 If the House of Commons, who are the Representatives of the whole Nation, may be guilty of Treason, it will follow, that all the People of England who chose them, are guilty also; and then where will a Jury be found to try the Cause?
 My Commission is dated the 27th of March, 1648, ten Months before the King's Death. The Commission by which General Fairfax was authoriz'd to give mine to me, he receiv'd from the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament. I did nothing but my Duty in going to my Regiment; for if the General says, Go to such a Place and stay there, if I refuse, by the Law of Arms, I am to die; but if I obey, it seems I am in Danger also: The Question therefore in Law, I humbly conceive will be this, and I desire it may be truly and fairly stated, Whether a Man who is guided by the Judgment of the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, and acting only according to that Judgment of Parliament, and under their Authority, can be question'd for Treason?

To this the Council answer'd, "That he was "not accus'd of levying War, but of assisting
 "at the Trial and Examination of the King,
 "and encouraging the Soldiers to clamour for "Justice and Execution." The Colonel reply'd, I am no more guilty than the General, my Presence in Westminster-Hall was not voluntary, and I was there by Command.

I do not find that any Attempt was made to answer this; but it was said that he was not commanded to cry Execution; that to cry Justice and Execution, was an Overt Act, which was confirm'd in his wrathful Speech to the Lady, who, according to the Testimony of the reverend Historian, he call'd Whore, and according to other Testimony, he smil'd. His Answer was, If any Lady talk'd loud during the King's Trial, to the Inter-

A.D. 1660 Interruption and Disturbance of the Court, I suppose it was no Treason to bid her hold her Tongue. If I smil'd, as Col. Temple depos'd, it cannot amount to so great a Crime. If some Soldiers did cry out Justice, it was not by my Instigation; yet I hope that to desire Justice, which is one of the principal Attributes of God, is not high Treason. Having said these, with many other Things in his Defence, he address'd himself to the Jury, saying, Gentlemen, I leave my Case and my Life in your Hands. Tho' he was not one of the King's Judges, and acted as a Soldier by Command of his General, at least as far as his Attendance at the King's Trial; yet those Gentlemen took not the least Notice of it. Lieutenant General Ludlow reflects on the Lord Chief Baron Bridgman for directing the Jury as he did. "In answer to these Arguments Bridgman, who was the President of this Assembly, contented himself with repeating that strange and unheard of Doctrine; That no Person whatsoever, nor Community, not the People, either collectively or representatively, have any coercive Power over the King." For this he quoted some Precedents, as little to the Purpose as the Assertion it self, and then concluded the Case to be so clear, that the Jury need not stir from the Bar. It soon appear'd that he knew the Men, for they fully answer'd his Expectation, and as they were directed, without any Difficulty declar'd Col. Arxel to be guilty of the Treason with which he had been charg'd.

Con-
demn'd. The next Prisoner brought to the Bar was Col. Francis Hacker; the Indictment against him was like that against Col. Arxel, for compassing and imagining the Death of the King, which being read, Witnesses, of which a Cloud was at the Service of the Court, were produc'd to prove that he was one of the Persons who were upon the Guard, and kept the King Prisoner; that the Warrant for seeing the Sentence which had been pronounc'd by the High Court of Justice against the King, put in Execution, was directed to him: That in the Prosecution of that Commission, he had sign'd a Warrant for executing the King, and that he took the King by virtue of the Warrant he had receiv'd, out of the Custody of Col. Tomlinson, and conducted him to the Scaffold, on which he had been put to Death. Col. Hacker excepted not against any of the Jury, finding all of them to be of the same Stamp, and said little more in his Defence, than that he had acted by the Command of his Superiors, and that he had always endeavour'd to serve his Country; so that his Trial was quickly dispatch'd, and he declar'd guilty of High Treason.

Con-
demn'd. Capt. William Hewlet was also accus'd and try'd for cutting off the King's Head, or at least for being one of the Persons that stood mask'd upon the Scaffold during his Execution. Several creditable Witnesses depos'd, that Gregory Brandon, who was the Common Hangman, had confess'd and own'd to have executed the King; that he affirm'd as much to the Lord Capel, when he suffer'd by the same Ax: And Capt. Hewlet offer'd to make it appear that he was not upon the Scaffold that Day, nor near it; nay, that he was seiz'd and secur'd for refusing to be there: However, the Jury clear'd their Way, and found him guilty of the Indictment; but, says Ludlow, "the Court being sensible of the Injury done him, procur'd his Reprieve."

Con-
demn'd. One may see what sort of Justice was like to be administred in this Reign by the Condemnation of Hewlet for a Crime of which he was not guilty, as appears plainly by what Lilly writes of the Matter in his own Life; "The next Sunday

A.D. 1660 "but one after Charles the First was beheaded, Robert Spavin, Secretary to Lieutenant General Cromwel, invited himself to dine with me, Joyce cut and brought Anthony Pierfon and several others off King along with him to Dinner. Their principal Charles's Discourse was who it was that beheaded the Head. King: One said it was the Common Hangman, another Hugh Peters; others were also nominated, but none concluded. Robert Spavin, as soon as Dinner was done, took me by the Hand, and carrying me to the South Window said, These are all mistaken, They have not nam'd the Man that did the Fact, it was Lieutenant Colonel Joyce: I was in the Room when he fitted himself for the Work, stood behind him when he did it, and when done went in again with him. There's no Man knows this but my Master Cromwel, Commissary Ireton, and myself."

We come now to those of the King's Judges, whom we have mention'd before to have been excepted both for Life and Estate, with a Reserve, that if upon Trial they shou'd be found guilty, Sentence of Death shou'd not be executed against any of them, except by Act of Parliament, as these following, Col. Harvey, Alderman Judges Pennington, Col. Henry Morley, Alderman Tich-condemn'd, burne, Col. Owen Roe, Gilbert Millington, Esq; but re- Col. Lilburn, Henry Smith, Esq; Col. Downs, priv'd. Augustine Garland, Esq; Col. Potter, William Heveningham, Esq; Col. James Temple, Peter Temple, Esq; Col. Wayte, Simion Meyne, Esq; These were all brought to Trial before this Court, where some of them pleaded Guilty simply, but others, tho' they acknowledg'd the Guilt, deny'd the Malice, and some confessing the Fact deny'd the Guilt. Of the last was Col. Henry Marten, Col. Henry who was charg'd with signing the Precept for sum- Marten's moning the High Court of Justice, and signing the Trial. Warrant for executing the King; with sitting in Court almost every Day of his Trial, and particularly that on which he receiv'd Sentence of Death.

To these Things he answer'd, that he declin'd not to acknowledge the Matter of Fact that was alledg'd against him, the Malice imputed to him by the Indictment set aside. Upon which being told by one of the Council employ'd by the Court, that he seem'd to be of Opinion, that a Man may sit and adjudge a King to Death, and sign a Warrant for his Execution, meekly, innocently, charitably and honestly. Now on a Supposition, that the Authority by which these Judges, and Col. Marten in particular, acted, had been legal, All That, might have been done, and it was for want of common Sense, that that Counsellor pretended to Wit; for a Judge having a lawful Commission, or believing upon the best Conviction his Mind cou'd give him, that his Commission was lawful, may meekly and charitably pass a Sentence, as I doubt not wise upright Judges always do. Col. Marten answer'd, that tho' he shou'd not compare his Knowledge in the Law with that of such a learned Gentleman, yet according to the little Understanding he had been capable of acquiring, he presum'd that no Fact cou'd be nam'd, which in it self is a Crime, but only as it is circumstantiated; and to make good his Assertion, gave several Instances: But the Council, to prove that he had acted maliciously, produc'd a Person who depos'd, That he sign'd the Warrant merrily, and in a jesting Way, as he was rallying with Lieutenant General Cromwel. I think this shews too what Heads they had; to which Col. Marten immediately retorted, Then it was not in Malice. General Ludlow adds, "The Council finding their Insinuations and Aggravations of the Charge, against him so easily blown away by these and other Answers, made up with Passion what they

A.D. 1660 "they wanted in the Weight of Reason, Finch the Solicitor General exclaiming, That all good People abhor'd the Action, and that he was sorry to see so little Repentance. To this the Colonel said, I hope what is urg'd by the Council, will not make that Impression upon the Court and Jury as seems to be design'd." If it were possible for that Blood to be in the Veins again, and every Drop of what was shed in the late Wars, I cou'd wish it with all my Heart; but I presume it may be lawful to say in my own Defence, that what I did, I thought at that time I might do. There was a House of Commons, as I understood it to be, tho' perhaps your Lordships think them not to have been a House of Commons; however, they were then the supreme Authority in England, and acknowledg'd and reputed so to be, both at home and abroad. I suppose he who gives Obedience to the Authority de Facto, sufficiently shews himself of a peaceable Temper, and far from a Traitor. If it shou'd be said that the Authority by which we acted, was only one Estate of Three, and but Part of that, I answer, it was all that was then existing; and I have heard Lawyers say, if there be Commons appurtenant to a Tenement, and that the Tenement be all burnt down except one small Stick, the Commons still belong to that small Piece, as much as when the Tenement was all standing. I shall also humbly offer it to Consideration, Whether the late King, for some time before his Trial, cou'd truly and properly be call'd a King, who was not in the Execution of his Office, but made a Prisoner, and no ways concern'd in the Administration of Publick Affairs? All which had no more Effect upon the Jury than it had upon the Goalers.

Colonel Downs
try'd.

Col. Downs to a like Indictment pleaded, That at the King's Trial he had caus'd the Court to adjourn, and had said and done what wou'd have been of the highest Importance to the King, had he not been over-ru'd. But that hinder'd not his being condemn'd with Col. Marten, and the rest last mention'd.

Sentence being to be pronounc'd against the convicted Prisoners, Echard tells us, the Lord Chief Baron Bridgman made another affecting Speech to them, after he had acknowledg'd many of them to be of liberal Education and great Parts.

It is on no other Account worth repeating, than as it shews again what Mr. Archdeacon understands of Affecting in Discourse: "He repeated to them some things he had formerly said concerning the legal Supremacy of the Kings of England; How Paithetick it is! He told them, no Body or Community of Men had any Coercive Power over them; wonderfully moving! Then he nam'd the Words of the Act of the First of King James, wherein the Lords and Commons did acknowledge a natural Liege Obedience to the King as Supreme, his Heirs and Successors; and in the Name of themselves and all the People, humbly submit themselves until the last Drop of their Blood (that affects) be spent in Defence of the King and his Royal Posterity. Remember, added he, these were not Words of Complement, &c." I will repeat no more of it, but refer to Mr. Archdeacon's History, where many such Parcels of affecting Eloquence, some longer, some shorter, are to be found, from this Page 779, to the End of his History.

What is to come of their Dealings with the King's Judges has no Parallel in any Story; and to use the Words of the Compleat Historians, One cannot but think there was the Spirit of Hell in it. For though these condemn'd Criminals were justly to suffer the Law, and their

A.D. 1660 Punishment shou'd have been as Exemplary as their Crime was Capital, yet to make Sport with dying Men, and Diversion of the Butchering Part, cou'd not have happen'd but in Times as wicked as those when Sodom perish'd in a Tempest of Fire.

The first that was dragg'd on a Hurdle thro' the City to Charing-Cross, where a Gallows was erected for them, was Major General Harrison, M. Gen. who was hang'd on the 13th of October, with his Face towards the Banqueting-House; the People, says Echard, loudly shouting at his Fall. He adds, he was cut down alive; and another Author says, He was cut down alive, and saw his Bowels thrown into the Fire. I don't find any Reason given for putting the Gallows at Charing-Cross by any Writer but Ludlow, who tells us, it was that the King might have the Pleasure of the Spectacle, and inure himself to Blood. The Major General's Body being quarter'd, was plac'd upon the City Gates, and his Head upon Westminster-Hall.

p. 69.

The Major General declar'd, The Lord's Spirit did witness with his Spirit that all his Sins were done away in Jesus Christ; that he was about to suffer for the most glorious Cause that ever was in the World; that he believ'd the Lord would e'er it be long make it known from Heaven, that there was more of God in it than Men were aware of.

Two Days after John Carew, Esq; was brought to the same Place, and was hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd; but in Consideration that his Brother, Sir Alexander Carew, was beheaded for serving the late King, his Quarters were permitted to be put into a Grave. Mr. Carew declar'd, What he said was of the Lord, and if it were to be done again, he wou'd do it. The Lord has once already justify'd the Cause in the Field, and will again do it with a witness. I die not in the Lord only, but for the Lord; and think not that this blessed Cause will be lost, for it shall reach to the End of the Earth.

The Day following Mr. John Cook, who had been Lord Chief Justice in Ireland, and Mr. Hugh and Mr. Peters the Minister, were together brought to the same Place, and executed in the same manner. When Mr. Cook was drawn upon his Sledge, the Head of Major General Harrison, with his Face uncover'd, was plac'd before him, to the great Detestation of the People, as we read even in Echard, and in Ludlow, "That it was so far from producing the design'd Effect on Mr. Cook, that he not only seem'd to be animated with Courage from the Reflection he might make upon that Object, but the People every where express'd their Abhorrence of such Usage." He is doubtless bely'd in the History of England, where the candid Author tell us, he cou'd not conceal the Lashes of a troubled Conscience for this particular Crime, when he was in the height of Preferment: For if that Conscience had ever been troubled, it wou'd have been most visible in the last Moments of his Life, when the vilest Hypocrite can no longer dissemble; instead of which, the same Excellent Author assures us, he began his Speech upon the Ladder in these Words: The most glorious Sight that ever was seen in the World was our Lord Jesus upon the Cross, and the most Glorious next to that, is to see a poor Creature suffer for him in his Cause. He has these Words in his Prayer, I believe an Army of Martyrs wou'd willingly come from Heaven to suffer in such a Cause as this I come here to suffer for. He declar'd, "He had us'd the utmost of his Endeavours that the Practice of the Law might be regulated, and that the Publick Justice might be administer'd with as much Ex-

"petition and as little Expence as possible; and that he suffer'd a more than ordinary Persecution from those of his own Profession on that Account. He said, he understood not the Meaning of the Court, when they affirm'd, That if the Lords and Commons had brought the King to the Bar, it had been Treason." It was Sir Orlando Bridgman who said it, and consequently that all the Members of the most Honourable House of Peers, and all the Members of the Honourable House of Commons, were liable to be hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd for bringing a King to Trial. He may not be Try'd, but he may have Articles of Mis-government brought in against him. He may not be Beheaded, but he may be Abdicated, as King James the Second, the beheaded King's Son was. That Sir Orlando wou'd have given in upon Oath, if he had been then living, as all the Judges have done ever since the Revolution, in renouncing and abjuring King James and the Pretender. Mr. Cook proceeded, As to the Part I had in the Action with which I was charg'd, I am so far from repeating what I have done (mind the Lashes of his Conscience) that I am ready to seal it with my Blood. Here one of the Sheriffs, Boulton or Peake, rudely interrupting him, he reply'd, It has not been the Custom in the most barbarous Nations, much less in England, to insult over a dying Man; adding, I think I am the First who ever suffer'd Death for demanding Justice. As soon as Mr. Cook was cut down, and brought to be quarter'd, one Col. Turner call'd to the Sheriffs Men to bring Mr. Peters to see what was doing; which being done, the Hangman came to him, and rubbing his bloody Hands together, ask'd him, How he lik'd it? Mr. Peters reply'd, I am not terrify'd, and you may do your worst. Mr. Echard tells us, That during these Executions, the King and Ministry were using all softning Methods. When Mr. Peters was on the Ladder, he said to the Sheriff, Sir, You have butcher'd one of the Servants of God before my Eyes, you have forc'd me to see it, in order to terrify and discourage me, but the Lord has permitted it for my Support and Encouragement. Echard avers he was drunk, and that Mr. Cook said, He was not fit to die. Sure I am, that Men who are capable of abusing, belying, and insulting Persons, otherwise than as King's Judges, of singular Virtue and Eminence, in the last Moments of Life, are not fit to live. Major General Harrison and Mr. Carew are also said by him to have made themselves drunk with Cordials and strong Liquors. There never liv'd Men of more Temperance than Mr. Harrison and Mr. Carew; and as to their Religion, it has been observ'd elsewhere, that they are censur'd rather for having too much than too little. Mr. Cook's Head was plac'd upon Westminster-Hall, and that of Mr. Peters's upon London Bridge.

Thomas
Scot, Esq;
Gregory
Clement, Esq;
Col.
Scrope,
Col. Jones,
hang'd,
drawn,
and quar-
ter'd.

On the 16th of October, Mr. Thomas Scot, and Mr. Gregory Clement were drawn in one Sledge, and Col. Adrian Scroop, and Col. John Jones in another, to Charing Cross, in order to suffer Death as the rest had done. Mr. Scot had surrender'd himself within the Time limited by the Proclamation, however he far'd not the better for it. He behav'd at the Place of Execution with the greatest Chearfulness and Satisfaction of Mind; he attempted several Times to speak, and none of his Judges cou'd speak better; but, says Ludlow, Those who fear'd nothing so much as Truth, interrupted him so often, that he found himself oblig'd to say, It surely must be a very bad Cause which cannot suffer the Words of a dying Man. He declar'd, He cou'd not repent of what he had done as to the King's Trial, but did repent of his asking the Benefit of the King's Proclamation. Mr. Clement said, Nothing troubled him so much as his pleading Guilty, which he did to satisfy the Importunity of Friends; and by doing of it, had render'd himself unworthy to die in so glorious a Cause. Col. Scrope's Speech was to this Purpose. *Though I have been accusom'd to be seen in better Places, and other kind of Circumstances, yet it being the Will of God I should be brought into this Condition, I submit chearfully; I never entertain'd Malice against any Man, and I now wish no Ill either to the Jury who found me Guilty, or to the Judges who pronounc'd Sentence, or even to the Person by whose Means I am brought to this Place, who I presume is so well known that it is not necessary to name him, Browne, the Mayor Elect, whom Ludlow calls the Renagado Woodmonger. I shall not boast of my * Birth or Education, or the private Conduct of my Life, because I am going to appear before a Tribunal where all Men must come, and where the Justice or Injustice of every Action will be manifest. I desire the People in the mean Time not to think uncharitably of me, for I am firmly persuaded I suffer for the Cause of God and my Country.* Col. Jones going into the Sledge, said, It is like Elijah's fiery Chariot, only it goes through Fleet-street; and being dragg'd along in it to Charing Cross with Col. Scrope, Mr. Ludlow says, "The Gravity and graceful Meen of these aged Gentlemen, accompany'd with visible Marks of Fortitude and internal Satisfaction, surpris'd the Spectators with Admiration and Compassion.

* He descended from the Lord Scrope of Bolton.

That this dreadful Spectacle might spread another Length of the Town, Col. Hacker and Col. Axtel were drawn from Newgate to Tyburn, and there hang'd, imbowell'd and quarter'd. Col. Hacker read a Paper at his Execution, wherein he said, I thank the Lord I have nothing lies upon my Conscience as Guilt, whereof I am now condemn'd, and do not doubt to have the Sentence revers'd. Echard, who writes of all this with much Jollity, says as a Joke, Axtel very charitably wish'd, That his Blood might not cry to the third and fourth Generation. Colonel Axtel did indeed say, If I had a thousand Lives I cou'd lay them all down for this Cause, tho' they had nothing against me, neither by God's Law nor their own Law, to condemn me; wherefore my Death is meerly Murther, and they might as well have done it at the Tower, as have brought me hither to make this Bustle.

From the Beginning of those Tragedies to the End, the Reverend Author last mention'd, and the Reverend Author of the Compleat History, have not one Sentiment of Compassion; nay, the last Reverend Author, mentioning the Trials and Speeches at large of these Sufferers, printed after their Deaths, does not stick to say, Some of their surviving Friends were so very insolent, that they publish'd their Pleadings, Prayers and Speeches to all the Advantage that the Spirit of Hell cou'd invent. And the other Reverend Historian says of their Prayers and Dying Speeches, Such were the prodigious Effects of Enthusiasm, Possession, as if the Devil was in them, or something that wants a Name which is sufficient to raise Horror in good Men, and Infidelity in bad. 'Tis there he also tells us, that it was the Effect of Drunkenness as well as Possession, and in the same charitable Disposition affirms, Mr. Peters the Minister had a Whore with him.

Neither of these Historians had Sobriety enough to observe that these repeated Executions one Day after another, were a wretched Effect of the Want of good Policy as well as good Nature in those who then had the Administration

A.D. 1660 of Affairs. Bishop Burnet lets us into the Truth of the Matter, where he writes thus, "In one Thing the Temper of the Nation appear'd to be contrary to severe Proceedings; for tho' the Regicides were at that Time odious beyond all Expression, and the Trials and Executions of the first were run to by vast Crouds, and all People seem'd pleas'd with the Sight, yet the Odiousness of the Crime grew at last to be so much flatten'd by the frequent Executions, and most of those who suffer'd dying with much Firmness and Shew of Piety, justifying all they had done, not without a seeming Joy for their Suffering on that Account, that the King was advis'd not to proceed any farther, at least not to have the Scene so near the Court as Charing-Cross." I have often been oblig'd in this Work to take Notice of the Want of Sense as well as Temper in the Ministers of the former Reign as well as this. They seem to be guided wholly by Fury and false Zeal. Their Rage against Major General Harrison was such, that without thinking that the Man was intrepid and firmly principled in the Cause he had engag'd in, that he despis'd the Power they were got into, and made a Merit of his Sufferings, they, without Thought or Patience, wou'd needs begin with him, "The ill Effect of which," says Bishop Burnet, soon appear'd, for he was "a Man of great Heat and Resolution, fix'd in his Principles, and so persuaded of them, that he had never look'd after any Interests of his own, but had oppos'd Cromwel when he set up for himself. He went thro' all the Indignities and Severities of his Execution, in which the Letter of the Law in Cases of Treason, was punctually observ'd with a Calmness, or rather a Chearfulness that astonish'd the Spectators. He spoke very positively, that what they had done was the Cause and Work of God, which he was confident God wou'd own and raise up again, how much soever it suffer'd at that Time.

Harry Marten did not suffer, and the Bishop informs us that his Life was spar'd out of Complacency to his Vices, which were pretty near of a Size with those of the Court.

After Echard has seen all these Sufferers ript up and mangled, he performs the last Office, and kills them in their Characters.

Thomas Harrison, says he, was a Butcher's Son, so was Thomas Wolsey, Archbishop of York and Cardinal. A long Ancestry of Gentlemen gives no Man a Right to insult another for the want of it; but for a Person to do it who is no otherwise a Gentleman than as he is enroll'd in a Profession or Faculty, is equally preposterous and ridiculous. Harrison turn'd a Fifth-Monarchy Man, and was re-baptiz'd to please the Anabaptists.

Cook was a Man of mean Birth and inconsiderable Fortune. Ludlow says, Mr. John Cook in his younger Years had seen the best Part of Europe; and at Rome had spoken with such Liberty and Ability against the Corruption of that Court and Church, that great Endeavours were us'd there to bring him into that Interest; wherefore he departed to Geneva, and resided some Months in the House of Signior Gio. Diodati, Minister of the Italian Church. Fair Proof of his being a Man of mean Birth and inconsiderable Fortune. Hugh Peters was whip'd out of Cambridge. Ludlow, Mr. Peters had been a Minister in England for many Years, till he was forc'd to leave his Native Country by the Persecution set on Foot in the Time of Archbishop Laud.

Thomas Scot was born of obscure Parents in Buckinghamshire, by whom, according to Ludlow, he was sent first to Westminster School, and then to Cambridge. He liv'd privately in the Country till he was chosen a Member of Parliament. A.D. 1660

Gregory Clement was first a Merchant and broke: He then forc'd himself into the Parliament House. Ludlow, Mr. Gregory Clement was a Citizen and Merchant of London, who by trading with Spain had rais'd a very considerable Estate.

Mr. John Jones, a Man of a mean Family in Wales, Servant to Sir Thomas Middleton. Ludlow, Col. John Jones was a Gentleman of a competent Estate in North-Wales.

Col. Hacker was a Soldier of Fortune. Ludlow, Col. Hacker was a Gentleman of a considerable Estate, deriv'd to him from his Ancestors in Leicestershire.

Whatever has been said of the King's Judges, their Trials and Executions, is not intended to render them the less criminal in the Reader's Opinion. If I had been living and one of the Jury, I wou'd have given Judgment against them, and shou'd have pronounc'd it, had it been my Office, tho' not with so much Pleasure, yet with as much Conviction of the Justice of the Sentence as Sir Orlando Bridgman did. The Intention is only to shew the Temper and Turn of Mind of the Court and Ministry after the Restoration, what Work was done, and what Tools they work'd with, that the Reader may make his Use of it when he finds them busying themselves about Matters of Religion, which have the next Place in the Archdeacon's History. Tho' we have sufficiently prov'd the Falseness of and Ingratitude of those who deny the Presbyterians to have had the Honour of the Restoration, yet in further Confirmation of it, we shall repeat what Mr. Richard Baxter, one of the King's Chaplains, said of it.

"What the Presbyterians did to preserve and restore the King, is a Thing that we need not go to any Corners or Cabinets to prove. The Votes for Agreement upon the King's Concessions in the Isle of Wight prove it. The Ejection and Imprisonment of most of the House of Commons, and all the House of Lords, prove it. The Death of Mr. Love, with the Flight of other London Ministers, prove it. The Wars in Scotland, and their Conquest by Cromwel, prove it. The Rising of Sir George Booth, and his Army's Overthrow, prove it. The Surprize of Dublin Castle by Colonel Bridges and others in Ireland, prove it. The Congratulations of General Monk in England, the Concurrence of the Londoners, and the Ministers there, prove it. The actual Preparations of the restor'd Members of the Long Parliament, and the Consent of the Council of State, prove it. The Calling in of the King by the next Parliament without one contradicting Voice, and finally the Lords and Gentlemen of the King's own Party addressing themselves to the Parliamentarians, and the King's grateful Acknowledgments in his Letters, and his Speeches in Parliament, do all put this Matter out of Question. Presbyterians restore the King.

We are going to see how he rewarded them for it, even after his solemn Promise in his Declaration at Breda, That no body shou'd be disturb'd on account of Conscience, and even after a second Declaration he publish'd in England in October, which was drawn by the Lord Chancellor Hyde, and for its Eloquence and Reason may match with the best of his Performances.

Before the King was restor'd, Mr. Baxter and Dr. Manton had a Meeting with Dr. Gauden and Dr. Bernard, to discourse of an Agreement between the Presbyterian and Episcopal Party; but tho' both Sides express'd a Desire for Concord,

A.D. 1660 cord, yet neither that Meeting, nor another with Dr. Morley, came to any thing.

Bishops restor'd. In the mean time the Bishops who were living were restor'd to their Sees; as Dr. William Juxon to the See of London, Dr. William Pierce to that of Bath and Wells, Dr. Robert Skinner to that of Oxford, Dr. John Warner to that of Rochester, Dr. William Roberts to that of Bangor, Dr. Matthew Wren to that of Ely, Dr. Bryan Duppa to that of Salisbury, Dr. Henry King to that of Chichester, Dr. Accepted Frewen to that of Coventry and Litchfield: And the following Doctors were made Bishops; as Dr. John Cosens Bishop of Durham, Dr. William Lucy Bishop of St. David's, Dr. Benjamin Laney Bishop of Peterborough, Dr. Richard Stern Bishop of Carlisle, Dr. Bryan Walton Bishop of Chester, Dr. Hugh Lloyd Bishop of Landaff, Dr. John Gauden Bishop of Exeter, Dr. George Griffith Bishop of St. Asaph, Dr. Gilbert Ironside Bishop of Bristol, Dr. William Nicholson Bishop of Gloucester, Dr. Robert Sanderfon Bishop of Lincoln, Dr. George Morley Bishop of Worcester, Dr. Isaac Barrow Bishop of Man.

Presbyterians King's Chaplains.

Dr. Reynolds, a Presbyterian, was offer'd the Bishoprick of Norwich, and he afterwards accepted of it. Mr. Baxter was offer'd that of Hereford; Mr. Calamy the Bishoprick of Coventry and Litchfield, on the Translation of Dr. Frewen to the Archbishoprick of York. Dr. Manton was offer'd the Deanery of Rochester, Dr. Bates the Deanery of Coventry and Litchfield, Mr. Bowles the Deanery of York; but all refus'd on account of the uncertain Continuance of the Terms of the second Declaration. Several Presbyterian Divines were made King's Chaplains; as Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Manton, Dr. Bates, Dr. Spurston, Dr. Wallis, Mr. Calamy, Mr. Asb, Mr. Case, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Woodbridge. Mr. Newcomen refus'd it; and none of the above Ministers were call'd to preach at Court but Mr. Calamy, Dr. Reynolds, Mr. Baxter, and Dr. Spurston, each of them once.

The Earl of Manchester introduc'd Mr. Baxter, Mr. Asb, Dr. Reynolds, and all the Presbyterian Ministers who were King's Chaplains to his Majesty, who was with the Lord Chancellor and the Earl of St. Alban's in the Lord Chamberlain Manchester's Lodgings. They congratulated his Majesty on his Restoration, and then the Ministers spoke to the King of a Union among his Protestant Subjects. His Majesty bad them draw up such Proposals as they thought fit, telling them that he was glad they inclin'd to an Agreement, and that he resolv'd to do his Part to bring them together. Accordingly they did it in Conjunction with Dr. Worth, afterwards a Bishop in Ireland, Dr. Fulwood, afterwards Archdeacon of Totness, Mr. Matthew Newcomen, &c. These Divines, because they wou'd give as little Occasion of Exception as possible, reduc'd all their Requests to Archbishop Usher's Reduction of Episcopacy, which they deliver'd to the King with an humble Address concerning Preaching, the Observation of the Lord's Day, Ceremonies, &c. They were promis'd a Meeting of Episcopall Divines before the King when their Proposals were ready, but none of them came; and instead of a Meeting, the Presbyterian Ministers receiv'd a Paper full of bitter Oppositions by way of Confutation of their Proposals.

The Bishops, in their Answer to the Presbyterians Proposals, have some extraordinary Things worth repeating, as Bishops Plea.

"We believe Ecclesiastical Hierarchy to be for the main, the true, antient, primitive Episcopacy;" that is, the antient Apostolical Bishops had Courts Prerogatives, Chancellors, Commissaries, Officials, Proctors, Paritors, Powers under their Pagan Princes.

"We cannot grant that the Extent of any "Diocess," such as Lincoln, consisting of Lincoln County, 630 Parishes, Leicester 200, Bedford 124, Buckingham 185, Huntington 120, Hertfordshire in Part 41, in all 1300 Parishes, "is so great, but that the Bishop may well perform that, wherein the proper Office and Duty of a Bishop doth consist."

They do acknowledge that Ministers are not deny'd the Use and Exercise of their Gifts before and after the Sermon.

They do believe that the laying aside of the Common-Prayer, was one of the great Causes of our sad Divisions. The Presbyterian Divines made a Replication, and some very learned godly Men amongst them said, It is a vain Attempt to endeavour a Reconciliation with such Men; their Minds are exasperated, and they are resolv'd to monopolize the Favour of our Prince, and all Honours and Preferments to themselves. There's no Hope they will do any thing for the Presbyterian promoting of strict serious Godliness, or any thing that deserves the Name of Ecclesiastical Discipline. They undoubtedly do but draw us on, partly to spin out the time, till they are ready to persecute us without any Danger to themselves, and partly to set us together by the Ears, and otherwise abuse us, by drawing us to grant them that which they know our Brethren cannot grant.

Shortly after this, instead of the Diocesan's Concessions, the Ministers were told, his Majesty wou'd put all that he thought fit to grant into the Form of a Declaration, wherein the King repeated the Promise of Liberty of Conscience, which he made at Breda; and that no Man shou'd be disquieted, or call'd in Question for Differences of Opinion in Matters of Religion. This was in October, about two Years before 2 or 3000 Presbyterian Ministers were turn'd out of their Livings, and 2 or 300,000 Families were disquieted by an Act of this very King's. This Declaration was read by the Lord Chancellor Hyde, at the Earl of Manchester's House, in Presence of his Majesty, King Charles II. Duke of Albemarle, Duke of Ormond, Dr. Sheldon Bishop of London, Dr. Morley Bishop of Worcester, Dr. Henchman Bishop of Salisbury, Dr. Cosens Bishop of Durham, Dr. Hacket, Dr. Barwick, Dr. Gunning, Earl of Anglesey, Earl of Manchester, Lord Hollis, Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Spurston, Dr. Wallis, Mr. Calamy, Mr. Asb, Mr. Baxter. After the Declaration was read, there was much Discourse about several Parts of it; Bishop Morley seeming to charge Mr. Baxter as if he had contradicted what he had written in his five Disputations of Church Government, Mr. Baxter told him, He had best Reason to know what he had written, that he was still of the same Mind, that he stood to it all, and spoke nothing against it. A great many Words pass'd about Prelacy and Re-ordination. Dr. Gunning and Bishop Morley spoke almost all on one Side, and Dr. Henchman and Dr. Cosens sometimes. Mr. Calamy and Mr. Baxter spoke most on the other Side. Mr. Calamy answer'd Dr. Gunning from Scripture, against the divine Rights of Prelacy, as a distinct Order; and when Dr. Gunning told them Dr. Hammond had said enough against the Presbyterians Cause, and Ordinations, and was yet unanswer'd, Mr. Baxter reply'd, I have answer'd the Substance of his Arguments, and said enough against the Diocessan Frame of Government, and to prove the Validity of the English Presbyters Ordination, which indeed is unanswer'd, tho' I am very desirous to see an Answer to it.

King's Declaration in Favour of them.

A.D. 1660

The Earl of Clarendon produc'd a Paper, being a sort of Petition from the Independants and Baptists: in behalf of themselves, for whom this Clause was added to the Declaration. Others shall be permitted to meet for religious Worship, so be it they do it not to the Disturbance of the Peace, and no Justice of the Peace or Officer shou'd disturb them; which when the Earl had read, he desir'd them all to think on it, and give their Advice; but all were silent. The Presbyterians perceiv'd as soon as they heard it, that 'twas intended to tolerate Popery, and Dr. Wallis whisper'd Mr. Baxter in the Ear, that he shou'd say nothing, 'tis an odious Business, let the Bishops speak to it. But the Bishops wou'd not say a Word, nor wou'd any one of the Presbyterians speak to it. At length Mr. Baxter fearing their Silence wou'd be misinterpreted, spoke to this Purpose; Dr. Gunning, a little before, speaking against Sects, nam'd Papists and Socinians. For our Parts, we do not desire Favour for ourselves alone, and rigorous Severity against none; but as we humbly thank his Majesty for his declar'd Indulgence to OURSELVES, so we distinguish the Tolerable from the Intolerable; for the former we humbly crave just Lenity, but for the latter, such as the two sorts mention'd; for our Parts we cou'd not make their Toleration our Request. The King reply'd, There are Laws sufficient against Papists. Mr. Baxter answer'd, We understand the Question to be, whether those Laws will be executed or not, so that Matter drop'd. Several Alterations were made, and the Earl of Anglesey, the Lord Hollis, Bishop Morley, Bishop Henckman, Dr. Reynolds, and Mr. Calamy were appointed to determine any Dispute that might arise about Words in the Declaration. Accordingly the Declaration came out so amended, with such a pastoral persuasive Power of Governing left to the Ministers, with the Rural Deans, as that it was fitted to be an Instrument of Concord and Peace, if settled by a Law; and so, continues Dr. Calamy, the Division might have been heal'd upon the Alteration of the Liturgy, as the Declaration promis'd, with other Matters.

King's Declaration about Religion.

The Preamble to this Declaration is worth reading: "When we were in Holland we were attended by many grave and learned Ministers from hence, who were look'd upon as the most able and principal Assertors of Presbyterian Opinions, with whom we had as much Conference as the multitude of Affairs wou'd permit us to have; and to our great Satisfaction and Comfort, found them Persons full of Affection to us, of Zeal for the Peace of Church and State, and neither Enemies, as they have been given out to be, of Episcopacy or Liturgy, but modestly to desire such Alterations in either, as without shaking Foundations might allay the present Distempers." Echar'd cries out against this Declaration as over-strain'd, not only to over-rule the Canons (the Lord help them! What signify the Canons to the Peace of Church and State?) and disable the Discipline of the Church, but likewise to lie hard upon the Constitution, by dispensing with the Statutes. What Strength there is in what he says! If those Statutes, or any Statutes, tended to the Disturbance of Church or State, they shou'd have been repeal'd rather than dispens'd with; but these were Times that requir'd irregular Methods. The Reason and Temper of this irregular Declaration, as he terms it, are equally conspicuous, and oblige him, notwithstanding what he has said, and what he wou'd have said against it, to recommend it as an excellent Pattern of Wisdom and Goodness. Had it been as sincere as it was wise and good, the Happiness of the Times wou'd have deserv'd another Sort of Panegyrist than that Historian. The Substance of it was, "That the King resolv'd to promote the Power of Godliness, to encourage the Exercise of Religion, take Care that the Lord's Day shou'd be applied to holy Exercises, without unnecessary Diversions, such as the Book of Sports had enjoyn'd; that insufficient, negligent, and scandalous Ministers shou'd not be permitted in the Church; that no Bishop shou'd ordain or exercise any Part of Jurisdiction without the Advice and Assistance of the Presbyters, and neither do nor impose any thing but what is according to the known Laws of the Land: That Chancellors, Commissaries, and Officials be excluded from Acts of Jurisdiction." Here King Charles and the Earl of Clarendon declar'd themselves against Spiritual Courts, so justly odious to the English Nation, and of no other Use than to feed the Malice and Revenge of passionate, insolent Priests, or the splenetick, litigious Humour of revengeful, malicious Layicks, and pamper a parcel of ravenous, vitious Advocates and Proctors.

A.D. 1660

"That the Power of the Pastors in the several Congregations shou'd be restor'd, and a Liberty granted to all Ministers to assemble Monthly for the Exercise of the pastoral persuasive Power to the promoting of Knowledge and Godliness in their Flocks.

No mention here of our Archdeacon or his Visitation, which, whether to the promoting of Knowledge and Godliness, I refer to our Dignitary himself.

"That the Ministers shou'd be freed from the Subscriptions requir'd by the Canons, and the Oath of Canonical Obedience, and receive Ordination, Institution, and Induction, and exercise their Function, and enjoy the Profits of their Livings without being oblig'd to it: And that the Use of Ceremonies shou'd be dispens'd with where they were scrupled." If this most Christian Declaration had been pursu'd, all Nonconformity had been confounded: There wou'd have remain'd no Pretence for Scruple, and not to conform, wou'd have been a sad Effect of Stupidity, as it is now of Mistake.

The Lord Clarendon, who drew up this healing Declaration, told the Parliament a very few Months after, That the Clergy still repeated their old Errors, and were not effectually subdu'd. Instead of a Conference, 'tis turn'd about to a Conquest; instead of Comprehension, 'tis now Persecution. The Truth is, King Charles never intended to relieve the Dissenters; and it is more than probable that the Earl of Clarendon drew up the above-mention'd Declaration and the Act of Uniformity at one and the same time, or within a few Days odds, though they differ one from the other as much as Reward and Punishment.

Some of the above-mention'd Bishops, as Morley, Henckman, and Cosens, being but Elects, tho' not Consecrated, the Presbyterian Ministers call'd them my Lords; which Dr. Morley once return'd thus upon Dr. Reynolds, Mr. Calamy, and Mr. Baxter, We may call you also I suppose by the same Title, meaning the Bishopricks to which those three Ministers were nominated. These Divines had frequent Discourse together on that Subject. They all thought a Bishoprick might be accepted according to the Description of the Declaration, without any violation of the Covenant, or owning the antient Prelacy. But all the Doubt was, whether this Declaration wou'd be made a Law, as was then expected, or whether it were but a temporary Means to draw them in to all the Diocesans desir'd. Mr. Baxter, after much Consideration and Consultation, refus'd to accept

A.D. 1660 accept a Bishoprick, and gave his Reasons in a Letter to the Lord Chancellor Hyde. Dr. Reignolds accepted it a little in haste, as it was thought, saying, A Friend had taken out the Congé d'Elire for him without his Knowledge.

The London Ministers were divided in their Sentiments concerning the Declaration; some thought it to be a Breach of the Covenant they had taken against any Sort of Prelacy, others, that it was reduc'd in the Declaration so far, as not to be within the Obligation of that Oath against the old Episcopacy. The latter drew an Address of Thanks to the King, and presented it November the 16th: 'Twas sign'd by Dr. Jacomb, Dr. Bates, Dr. Meriton, Mr. Cafe, Mr. Clark, Mr. Gouge, Mr. Rawlinson, Mr. Sheffield, Mr. Sangar, Mr. Cooper, Mr. Whittaker, Mr. Lye, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Pledger, Mr. Gibson, Mr. Poole, &c. All this fair Proceeding was meer Grimace, and intended to blind the Presbyterians till the Army was disbanded, and the Prelatical Party cou'd throw off the Mask with Safety.

The King did not forbear shewing his Dislike of his Presbyterian Company, and Mr. Cafe the Minister, who thought he had deserv'd highly of the King by what he had done towards his Restoration, wou'd once have pres'd with his usual Freedom into his Presence, and being deny'd Entrance, sent in his Name. The King suffer'd him to be admitted in compliance with his Importunity; but by the Carriage of those who were present, their deriding his Habit and uncourtly Address, he might easily perceive he was not welcome at Whitehall. His Majesty ask'd him, What he had to say? Mr. Cafe told him, He had a Word of Advice to offer concerning the Brethren of the Presbytery; but the King presently interrupted him, saying, I do not remember I have made you one of my Council.

The Princess of Orange, Mother to King William III. paid her Brother King Charles a Visit about the latter End of the Summer. Just before she landed, her Brother Henry of Oatlands, Duke of Gloucester, dy'd of the Small Pox. He was the most Virtuous of the three Brothers, and the most belov'd. It is said he reconcil'd himself to the Church of Rome in France, and that the Papists had more Hopes of him than of the two other Princes, King Charles and the Duke of York, he being principled in their Religion, whereas those Princes did not much trouble themselves about Religious Principles. Eckard affirms, he was an invincible Assessor of the Protestant Faith; which he cou'd not learn of his Mother, nor any about her. He adds, that to preserve him from Temptation, his Sister the Princess of Orange allow'd him half of her yearly Income; and considering she allow'd something too to her other Brothers, the King and the Duke, she cou'd not have much left out of about 15,000 Pounds per Annum.

He assures us he had all this from an unquestionable Hand, and I take on me to assure the Reader, that what I say of his being reconcil'd to the Church of Rome, I had from a Minister of State, a Man of known Wisdom and Probity, who liv'd many Years abroad in France and Holland, and was in particular Favour with his Highness the Prince of Orange at the Hague.

Within a few Days after arriv'd the Queen Mother, and her Daughter the Princess Henrietta Maria, with Prince Edward, his late Majesty King George the First's Uncle. Whatever Business the Queen came to do, there's no doubt it was bad enough for the Interest of England and the Protestant Religion. Eckard tells us, She propos'd a Match between the King and the Lady

Hortensea Mancini, Cardinal Mazarine's Niece, A.D. 1660 who was to have twenty Millions of Livres to her Portion, which is as credible as other Parts of Dutchess his History. She is the same Lady who afterwards liv'd and dy'd in England in a mean Condition, both as to Fortune and Character.

Ludlow speaks of this Visit very differently from the Archdeacon. "Henrietta Maria of Queen Mother France, Widow to the late King Charles, who had been a principal Instrument to advise and encourage him in his illegal Actions, pass'd over into England about this Time, and being arriv'd at London, the House of Commons, in which were many Persons who had been Members of that Parliament which had threaten'd to accuse her of High Treason, not only congratulated her Return, but presented her Daughter who had accompany'd her in her Journey with 10,000 Pounds. But notwithstanding all the flattering Subserviency they cou'd shew, and all that they cou'd do to procure themselves to be thought fit for the Service of the Court, yet being not thoroughly principled to do the Work of the Church, they were acquainted when they met again in November, that they shou'd be dissolv'd on the 24th of December; against which Time it was desir'd that all Bills under Consideration might be made ready. And lest the People shou'd upon the Dissolution of this Assembly form a Body of Men, and assert their Liberties, it was pretended that a great Plot to seize the King and the Tower, to kill the Queen, with all those that shou'd be found of the French Nation, and to restore the Parliament, was carrying on throughout England." Under this Colour Major General Desborough, Major General Overton, Colonel Salmon, Colonel Duckenfield, Lieutenant Colonel Farley, Major Whitby, Major Anthony Morgan, were seiz'd and imprison'd, though it was not possible for any Man of common Sense to believe that these Gentlemen, who in the height of the Commonwealth Party were by no means the Men of Interest, shou'd now set themselves up against the King, the Army, the Fleet, and the Kingdom, while every Head was yet hot with Joy for his Majesty's Restoration.

During the Noise of this Conspiracy, the Queen, accompany'd with her Daughter and Jermyn, return'd to France, the latter having been a particular Favourite of hers for many Years. Some believ'd she was terrify'd by the Rumour of Designs against her Person; but, says Ludlow, "She who knew the Plot to be no more than a Fiction, had other real Grounds for her Departure. She had endeavour'd to persuade her Son to remove the Chancellor Hyde from his Councils, and finding she effected nothing by her continual Sollicitations, she soon grew weary of England; where, though by the Importunity of the King, she had at last admitted the new Dutchess of Tork into her Presence, yet by applying herself to other Company, not desiring her to sit, and taking the first Opportunity to withdraw from the Room, she abundantly shew'd that she thought her not worthy to be treated as a Daughter. These were the principal, if not the only Reasons that mov'd the Queen to quit the Court of her Son, and to retire into her own Country; though to give a better Colour to her Departure, and to conceal these Domestick Divisions, they made use of the Pretences before-mention'd."

In November, Lewis of Nassau, Lord of Be-Dutch verweert, Simon Van Hoorn, Michael Van Gogh, and Mr. de Ripperda, Ambassadors from the States General of the United Provinces, arriv'd at

A.D. 1660 London from Holland. They were receiv'd at the Tower by the Earl of Craven, having with him about twenty Coaches and six Horses, who conducted them to Sir Abraham Williams, Master of the Ceremonies, where their Expences were defray'd; and they were treated in all Respects, as well at their Audience, as on other Occasions, with the same Honours that are done to Ambassadors of Crown'd Heads. The King had as yet fresh in his Memory the Respect which had been shewn him in Holland, when he pass'd through that Province in order to his Imbarkation near the Hague, where the States of Holland had been at the Expence of 250,000 Crowns for his Entertainment; and this was the first Time that the Ambassadors of the States General were treated as the Ministers of Crown'd Heads.

King Charles's Match with Portugal,

The King of Portugal's Minister was early with his Master's Complements, and Proposals of a Marriage between the King and the Infanta Katharine of Portugal, which the King of Spain's Ministers endeavour'd to prevent: Nay, they went so far in it, as to offer two Millions Portion, if his Majesty wou'd make Choice of any other Princess for a Wife, even though she was a Protestant. Some say the Queen Mother's Errand to England was about this Match with Portugal, the French King engaging to pay 400,000 Pounds with her: Others tell us she came over to treat with her Son about marrying her Daughter to Monsieur the French King's Brother; and others again say it was about the Sale of Dunkirk.

Besides the Resident of France, there were in the Court of England Monsieur D'Estrades, and Monsieur Courtin, Ambassadors Extraordinary from the French King; and from the King of Spain, the Prince de Ligny, and the Baron de Batteville, to congratulate his Britannick Majesty on his Restoration, and promote their Masters several and different Interests. The French, who had driven the Royal Family of England out of France, found Means to be prefer'd in King Charles's Friendship, though it was apparently for his and the Kingdoms Interest to have cultivated a Friendship with Spain. The Case was much alter'd since Cromwel's Treaty with Mazarine, who dy'd about this Time. France was in Peace at Home and Abroad, under a Prince of great Ambition and Genius. Spain was govern'd by a sickly old King, without an Heir Male, and his Dominions were like to encrease the exorbitant Power of France, especially on the Side of Flanders, which is the Barrier of England. By the Treaty Cromwel made with France, the Commerce of England had a Credit Balance of 5 or 600,000 Pounds a Year, by lowering the Duty on Woollen Manufactures from England; which Treaty King Charles rejected, because 'twas made by an Usurper; and, says Coke, He never after made any other instead of it, but left his Subjects to be us'd even as the French pleas'd in their Trade to France. They rais'd the Duties on our Woollen Goods so high, that it imply'd a Prohibition of them, and the English lost above a Million a Year by the French Trade. And to render his Engagement with France still more ruinous and shameful, he sells Dunkirk for 400,000 Pounds, immediately after the Parliament had appropriated 60,000 Pounds of the Hereditary Excise for maintaining the Garrison there. Half of the Money for Dunkirk went with the Princess Henrietta Maria to the Duke of Orleans in Marriage, and 'tis suppos'd the rest was divided among the King and his Ministers; at least the People was so jealous of it, that the magnificent Palace which the Chancellor Hyde built afterwards, was from thence call'd Dunkirk-House.

Ruinous Trade with France.

Sells Dunkirk.

Such were the Beginnings of King Charles's Administration, with respect both to Foreigners and his own Subjects; and it mends not during the whole Continuance of it.

Among other Ambassadors came Count Brabie Spanish from the King of Sweden, at whose Entry happen'd a very dangerous Contest and Fray between French the Ambassadors of Spain and France for Precedence. 'Twas not by Accident, but a determined prepar'd Business. Both Spanish and French Ambassadors being to send their Coaches to meet Count Brabie, Ambassador from Sweden, on the Day of his Entry, the Ambassadors of Spain and France foreseeing the Contest, each of them took such Measures as he thought fit to procure the Advantage to his Side. The Baron de Batteville, Ambassador from Spain, sent for some Soldiers from Flanders, and made sure of several English. Instead of Traces, he caus'd Iron Chains of a moderate Thickness to be cover'd with Leather, that they might not be liable to be cut. The Count d'Estrades, the French Ambassador, had re-inforc'd his Equipage a little; but not expecting Things wou'd come to such Extremities, he had not taken all the Precaution which might have protected him from the Violence of others.

The Duke of York having Information that a Dispute was intended, caus'd a Troop of Horse and three Companies of Foot to be drawn out on Tower-Hill, where the Coaches were to meet those of the Swedish Ambassador; but the Officers having no Orders to meddle in the Quarrel of the Ambassadors, all they cou'd do was to be Spectators of the Fight and Confusion. Some of the French Ambassador's Coach-Horses were kill'd, as well as two or three of his People. Some of the Spanish Ambassador's Train lost also their Lives, but they carry'd the Day; for the Traces of D'Estrade's Coach being cut, it cou'd not move without Horses. It was in Consequence of this Disorder, and of Count D'Estrade's Complaints upon it, that King Charles order'd that no Foreign Ministers Coaches shou'd for the future attend at this kind of Ceremony. When the French King was inform'd of this Rencounter, he sent Orders to the Count de Fuenfaldagne, the Spanish Ambassador at his Court, to leave Paris in twenty-four Hours, and order'd the Archbishop of Embrun, his Ambassador at Madrid, to require Satisfaction; which was given, by ordering all the Ambassadors of Spain not to be present at the Ceremonies at which those of France assist.

I shou'd not have been so particular in any Account of this Scuffle, but that it is one of the most Military Actions in this Reign, Venner's Rising, a Rising or two in Scotland, and the two Dutch Wars excepted.

On the sixth of November the Parliament met according to the former Adjournment. When the Disbanding was debated, Mr. Prynne desir'd the House to be mindful not to do those Things that might bring them together again, which brought him into Danger of a very rough Reprehension. Then Mr. Echard tells us of their Active Proceedings, as settling 1,200,000 Pounds per An. on his Majesty, ordering the Bodies of Oliver Cromwel, John Bradshaw, Henry Ireton, and Thomas Pride, to be taken out of their Graves and hang'd up at Tyburn. Do generous Enemies always do so by the Carcasses of their Conquerors? They then attainted some Persons who were withdrawn out of the Kingdom, as John Lisie, Esq; William Say, Esq; Valentine Walton, Esq; Col. Barkstead, Esq; Commissary General Whalley, Daniel Blagrove, Esq; Sir Michael Livesay, Cornelius Holland, Esq; William Cowley, Esq; Thomas Challoner, Esq; Miles Corbet, Esq; Nicholas

A.D. 1660 cholas Love, Esq; Mr. Broughton, Mr. Denny, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Col. Okey, Col. Goffe,
 Col. Dixwell, Col. Hewson. They also impeach'd one Mr. William Drake, a Tradesman of London, for writing a Book call'd The long Parlia- ment reviv'd, and after a Session of about seven Weeks they were dissolv'd, December the 29th, the King having pass'd several Bills, and heard a Speech from the Speaker of a good Length, ending thus, We must needs be a happy Parlia- ment, a Reconciling and Peace-making Parliament, a Parliament propter Excellentiam, that may truly be call'd Parliamentissimum Parliamentum. The Speech which his Majesty made on this Occasion ought, says Echard, to be inserted without any Abridgment; so I refer the Reader to his History for it entire, and for Chancellor Hyde's in the next Page; of both which I shall only insert a Paragraph or two. His Majesty told them, "I pray let us resolve that this be for ever" call'd the Healing, the Blessed Parliament; and Chancellor Hyde told them, A Party of the late disbanded Officers and Soldiers, and others, full of Discontent and seditious Purposes, had resolv'd to attempt the Change of the present Go- vernment, and to erect a Common-wealth, in which Ludlow and other desperate Persons were concern'd. There does not in the whole Conduct of Ludlow's Life appear one Action, that only excepted wherein he with others became guilty of the King's Death, which does not argue a good Understanding, and as great Caution and Courage. It was not possible for so wise and intelligent a Man as he to engage with two or three Serjeants and Corporals, or with two or three broken Colonels and Captains, to overthrow the Government, and set up a Republick without Men, without Money, without Ships, without Arms, without Name and Interest; and this incredible Scandal taints the whole Speech so much, that I shall make use of no more of it.
 He was foisted into it to prepare the Way for a Militia Act, and to render some severe Acts against the Presbyterians necessary, under Pretence of Danger.

On the Twenty-fourth of December dy'd the beloved Princess of Orange of the Small-Pox, and with much Labour and Patience we are at last come to the End of this Wonderful Year, as it is call'd by Echard; and we shall not part with it till we have remembred, as Mr. Archdeacon has done, the Beginning of the Royal Society, the chief Promoters of which were Dr. Wilkins, Dr.
Wallis, Dr. Goddard, Dr. Bathurst, Dr. Wren, Lord Brouncker, Mr. Boyle, Sir William Petty, and Mr. Rooke. But when he comes to give an Account of the Beaux Esprits, the fine Wits of the Restoration Period, he omits telling us how Waller, Sprat, Dryden, South, had distinguish'd themselves by such Panegyrics upon Cromwel, that they out-did every thing which had till then been seen of English Poetry. Coke says, The Poets strain'd their Wits to that Pitch to celebrate his Encomiums, that they cou'd never after arrive to it. Dr. Sprat, Bishop of Rockester, and Dr.
South, Canon of Christ-church, strain'd higher than even Waller and Dryden in Praise of Oliver.
 To his List of polite Writers might have been added Wilkins and Bates; and as to D'avenant and L'Estrange's refining and improving our Tongue, he shew'd his Knowledge in Language to be as imperfect as in History. How came he to forget the immortal Milton, and the very witty Marvel? I suppose they were too Republican with him to have Politeness and Taste. His Function might have led him to treat of the Manners of the Court, and then he might have told us, if he wou'd, what was the Refinement and Improvement there, as Coke does.

"All sorts of Men endeavour'd to imitate the "Luxury and Prodigality of the Court, which "scarce entertain'd any but upon these Terms.
 "To humour the King, the publick Theatres
 "were stuff'd with most obscene Actions and "Interludes; and the more obscene pleas'd the "King the better, who grac'd the Opening of "them with his Presence at the first Notice of a "new Play." 'Twas observ'd and confest'd, that the English Gentlemen of the Cavalier Party in Cromwel's Time liv'd better under Sequestration, such was the Sobriety and Modesty then in Fashion, than after they were put in full Possession of their Estates, such was the Luxury and Profusion, such the Lewdness and Extravagance that came in with the King!

What further Improvements and Refinements the Court made in Taste and Manners, during all this Reign, will be seen in every Page of the History.

We shall now look a little into the Affairs of Ireland and Scotland. The Earl of Orrery, soon after the Restoration, return'd to Ireland, to take Care of his Concerns there, where he understood a Petition was preparing by the Irish Papists to be presented to the King for restoring their Estates. To prevent which a Counter Petition was drawn up by the Protestants, who chose Deputies, of whom my Lord Orrery was chief, to appear for them at Court, as the Irish Papists had done, the Chief of whose Deputies was Sir
Nicholas Plunket. The latter knowing the Lord
Orrery to be their most zealous Opponent, tempted him with an Offer of 8000 Pounds down, and an Estate of 7000 Pounds per Annum, when their Matters were settled, if he wou'd be silent in the Business; but that not succeeding, a Day was appointed for a Hearing of both Sides before the King and Council. Sir Nicholas Plunket, as for the Petitioners, was order'd to be heard first, and he took a great deal of Pains to set forth the Loyalty and Sufferings of the Irish Catholics under the late Usurpers, what Losses they had met with by their Transplantation, humbly praying Relief as to their Estates, Liberties, &c.
 My Lord Orrery answer'd Plunket, and having congratulated his Majesty on his Restoration, in the Name of all the Protestants in Ireland, he enlarg'd upon the Merit of their late Services, they being the first of all his Majesty's Subjects who declar'd for him effectually, and invited him into his Kingdom; on which Account they might hope for as much Favour as any other, and more than those who were declar'd Enemies to his late Majesty, and to be prosecuted with Fire and Sword. Here the King was pleas'd to bear Witness to what Lord Orrery had said of the early Appearance of the Protestants in Ireland for him, owning that the Earl of Orrery, in the Name, and by Commission of his Protestant Subjects in Ireland, was the first of all his Subjects who invited him to that Kingdom. I observe, as well in Manuscript History as the Common Histories, that every one is every where putting in for the Merit of the Restoration, for no other Reason certainly but that they may have the Reward, and the Author of the Manuscript Memoirs of the Lord Orrery does labour this Matter in a particular Manner. His Lordship then represented to the Board, that the English in Ireland had only fought in Defence of their Lives, Estates, Religion and Liberties, against those who, contrary to Law, Conscience and Right, wou'd have disspoil'd them of all. That the Irish Papists, after the Cessation of Arms, had sent no Assistance to the late King, as they had promis'd to do, and wou'd have cut off the Marquis of Ormond, his Majesty's Lord Lieutenant at Kilkenny, which Lord
Ormond

A.D. 1661 Ormond averr'd to be true, and that they refus'd to receive him into Limerick, but endeavour'd to intercept and murder him in his Return to Dublin. Then the Earl of Orrery produc'd a Paper sign'd by Plunket and several of the supreme Council of Kilkenny, asking him if it was not his Hand, and if the Hands of others of them then present were not of their Writing. The Marquis of Ormond seeing it cry'd, Sir Nicholas Plunket, that is certainly your Writing, which neither he nor the others could deny, and being read, it appear'd to be an Order of the Supream Council to prosecute the Marquis of Ormond by Name, then Lord Lieutenant, and his Party with Fire and Sword. Upon which the Earl of Orrery said, These must be very Loyal Subjects indeed, that had declar'd War against his Majesty's Commission'd Lieutenant! He added, It will be prov'd to this most Honourable Board, that the Irish did not only declare War against his Majesty's Lieutenant, but that Sir Nicholas Plunket himself had been empower'd by them by a Commission under the Hands of the Supream Council, which he also produc'd, and the Irish Commissioners cou'd not deny the Hand Writing of Plunket and others of them, to offer the Pope the Kingdom of Ireland: If he refus'd it, to offer it to the King of Spain; and in case he wou'd not accept of it, to make the same Offer to the King of France, the Duke of Lorraine, or any other Catholick Prince. Then his Lordship shew'd the Council another Paper subscrib'd as before, which I have seen in Print, and desir'd it might be read. It was a Petition drawn up by the Heads of the Irish Nation, about the Transplantation; wherein they gave the Common-wealth Parliament the Stile and Title of the supream Authority, acknowledging it to be justly and lawfully lodg'd in that Assembly to whom they submitted their Lives and Fortunes. The King was oblig'd to yield to so much Proof and Reason; the Irish Petition was rejected, and Plunket and the other Popish Deputies were forbidden his Presence and Court, pro Forma, but he had nevertheless Interest and Favour in it. The Earl of Montrath and the six other Protestant Commissioners were very inquisitive to know how Lord Orrery came by those Papers, and why he had not communicated them to his Fellow-Commissioners before the Hearing. His Lordship told them, He wou'd not trust his Brother with them for Fear; if 'twere known he had such original Papers the Papists, who were confident of Success without such Evidence against them, might use some Art or other to render them ineffectual, which, if they were surpris'd with them, they cou'd not do. He said, the Manner of his coming by such Originals was very extraordinary, "That upon his being nam'd one of the Deputies for the Protestants in Ireland, a plain, grave, Country Gentleman came to his House in Munster, and desir'd to speak with him in private;" which being admitted he said, He heard his Lordship was going to Court in such a Commission, and knowing him to be a Man of Integrity, he had brought some Papers, which he thought wou'd be useful to him for the English Interest against the Irish; that he wou'd not trust his own Son with them, and therefore came in Person to wait on his Lordship, and deliver them to him. My Lord ask'd how he got them! The Gentleman reply'd, He had had such a Command in the Army, and one of his Soldiers, in rising the House of an Irish Papist of Distinction, brought away these Papers, which he took from him, and laid them up safe to be made use of upon Occasion, and none cou'd be more proper than this. When the Earl of Orrery ask'd what his Name was, and where he liv'd, he desir'd to be excus'd; and having deliver'd the Papers to him, he went his Way; nor cou'd the Earl ever see him, or hear of him afterwards. A.D. 1661

Soon after the Earl of Orrery, the Earl of Montrath, and Sir Maurice Eustace, made Lord Chancellor of Ireland, were appointed Lords Justices of that Kingdom, and were directed to call and hold a Parliament there, in which pass'd the famous Act of Settlement, the Draft of which was prepar'd by the Earl of Orrery. The King, to whom the latter had deliver'd all the original Papers above-mention'd, by Command, gave the Earl a List of Papist's Names, whose Estates were to be excepted out of the Act; the Duke of Ormond did the same. By this Act the forfeited Estates were settled on the Purchasers, Officers and Soldiers who had them for their Arrears, and others who had them by Purchase; but the Court of Claims broke in upon it so much, in Favour of the Irish Papists, by Direction from England, that 'twas the Cause of a loud continual Clamour, till it was repeal'd in the Reign of this King's Brother, King James.

The Scots had very great Reason to hope that Scotland, the Kirk was coming into Halcyon Days, having a Covenanted King on the Throne; a King who had thrice taken that solemn League, in the most solemn Manner, and by a tremendous Appeal to the living God, that his Heart went with his Hand and his Lips in subscribing and pronouncing it. But their Hope, and their Covenant, vanish'd in a few Months, and a Set of cruel impious Governors were put over them both in Church and State.

In August the Earl of Glencairne was sent down to Scotland, to call the Committee of Estates, till the Parliament, which was to meet in January, cou'd sit. There met also at Edinburgh ten or twelve Ministers, who had a Paper before them, drawn up by Mr. Guthry, a very warm Man; in which, after some cold Complements to the King, on his Restoration, "they put him in Mind of the Covenant, which he had so solemnly sworn while among them; they lamented, that instead of pursuing the Ends of it in England, according to the Oaths he had taken, he had set up the Common-Prayer in his Chappel, and the Order of Bishops; upon which they made terrible Denunciations of heavy Judgments from God upon him, if he did not stand to the Covenant, which they call'd the Oath of God." The Earl of Glencairne having Notice of this Meeting, sent Officers who seiz'd every one of the Ministers, together with their Paper. The Government set the other Ministers at Liberty, after they had suffer'd some Severities in Prison; but Mr. Guthry, Minister of Sterling, when the King resided there, was kept close Prisoner, and was cited to answer for some Expressions in the Pulpit, which had offended the King and his Counsellors. He refus'd answering to any one but the Presbytery; he also protested for Remedy at Law against the King, for disturbing him in the Exercise of his Ministry; at which his Majesty was so irritated, that it was resolv'd to make an Example of him, and strike Terror into his Brethren.

The Committee of Estates summon'd great Numbers of Persons, who had been busy in the late Times, to appear before them, and give Bail for their forth Coming, at the Opening of the Parliament. Many saw that the Intentions of this, was to fright them into a Composition, and also into a Concurrence with the Measures that were to be taken; so they comply'd and redeem'd themselves by Presents from farther Vexation, which Presents fell mostly into the Hands of Sir

Archibald

A.D. 1661 Archibald Primrose and Sir John Fletcher. The Measures and Manners in Scotland cannot fail of being of a Piece with those in England. The Earl of Middleton is sent thither to open the Parliament, and see what Account Bishop Burnet gives of him, "His Way of Living was not only the most splendid the Nation had ever seen, but was likewise the most scandalous; for Vices of all Sorts were the open Practices of those about him. Drinking was the most notorious of all, which was often continu'd thro' the whole Night, till the next Morning, and many Disorders happening after those irregular Heats, the People, who had never before that time seen any thing like it, came to look with an ill Eye on every thing that was done by such a Set of lewd and vicious Men. This laid in all Mens Minds a new Prejudice against Episcopacy." The Parliament, in the Transport that seiz'd them, after reading the King's Letter, pass'd an Act, extending the King's Prerogative as far as Primrose, who drew it, had Words to extend it. They pass'd another Act, whereby all Leagues not made by the King's Authority, were declar'd illegal, which striking at the very Root of the Covenant, extremely troubled the Presbytery; for the Covenant was a League made with England 1643, which was thus condemn'd, and declar'd of no Force for the future. Mr. Macquair Minister of Glasgow, was banish'd the Kingdom for protesting against this Act. Another pass'd by this Parliament was to rescind all Parliaments held since the Year 1633, which tho' Episcopacy was not nam'd, imply'd, that it wou'd be re-establish'd, because it was suppress'd by Parliaments since that Time. The Earl of Crawford and Duke Hamilton argu'd much against this Bill, and it was so extravagant, the King himself did not like it: Upon which the Earl of Glencairne and Rothes were sent to London, to give the King a full Account of that Proceeding and others; and with them went Sharp, who had been so zealous for the Presbytery, to press the speedy setting up of Episcopacy, which Middleton and he perswaded the King, that the Scots Nation waited for with great Impatience, tho' of all the Synods in Scotland, that of Aberdeen was the only Body, who made an Address that look'd towards Episcopacy, and the forcing it upon these People, was the Occasion of all the Tumults and Divisions, with which they were afflicted from the Restoration to the Revolution. It was a mad roaring Time, says my Lord of Sarum, and no Wonder it was so, when the Men of Affairs were almost perpetually Drunk.

Marquis of Argyle. We have mention'd the Marquis of Argyle's being seiz'd at London, when he came to complement the King on his Return to Whitehall. He was imprison'd in the Tower, and from thence sent to Scotland, to be attainted by this Parliament, before whom he was accus'd of High Treason. The chief Articles were, joining with those who were for delivering up the late King to the English Army, and concurring with Cromwell, who had oblig'd the whole Scots Nation to concur with him, by Persuasion or Power. Then the King's Advocate put in the Military Executions done by his Forces in the late Wars, and some other Particulars, which made him accountable for the Blood that had been spilt in Defence of his Vassals and Country, against the Massacres and Devastations of the Macdonalds and other Papist Rebels, who came from Ireland on Purpose to waste and destroy his Territory. The Lord Argyle was a Man of excellent Sense, and a Genius superior to a hundred of the Glencairnes and Middletons, his implacable Enemies and Prosecutors; and it was an excellent Defence he

A.D. 1661 made, had not the Times been fallen into the last Degeneracy with respect to Virtue and Justice: He said, "He did not think himself bound to answer what was done before the Year 1651, all Things being then bury'd in the Act of Oblivion pass'd by the present King, whom he crown'd in Scotland: That he was at London, when most of the Barbarities his Men were charg'd with, were committed; nor did it appear that he gave any Orders about them, that it was well known great Outrages had been committed by the Macdonalds, and he believ'd his People, when they had the better of them, had taken cruel Revenges, which was to be imputed to the Heat of the Time, and the Temper of the People, who had been much provok'd by the Burning of his whole Country, and by much Blood that was shed. As to his complying with the Usurpation, he had stood out till the Nation was quite conquer'd, and in that Case, it was the receiv'd Opinion both of Divines and Lawyers, that Men might lawfully submit to Usurpers, when forc'd to it by an inevitable Necessity. It was an Epidemical Sin, and his Circumstances were such, that more than a bare Compliance was requir'd of him. What he did that way, was only to preserve himself and his Family, and was not done on design to oppose the King's Interest, nor did he suffer by any thing he did. As to Cromwell, he said, What cou'd he think of that Matter, after a Man so eminent in the Law as his Majesty's Advocate Sir John Fletcher had taken the Engagement." At which that mercenary Wretch was so enflam'd, that he call'd the Marquis of Argyle Impudent Villain, and was not so much as chid for that barbarous Treatment. The Marquis gravely reply'd, I have learn'd in my Affliction to bear Reproaches, but if the Parliament see no Cause to condemn me, I am less concern'd at the King's Advocate's railing. The Earl of Middleton, who thirsted after the Blood of the Marquis, sunk an Order from the King to have the whole Proceedings in Parliament against him transmitted to London, and made a vehement Speech, intimating, that the Lord Argyle was concern'd in the Death of the King. But Gilmore, President of the Session, who had been a zealous Royalist, answer'd him thirteen or fourteen Times, and with such Strength of Reason, that notwithstanding the Parliament was enough prejudic'd against the Marquis, they acquitted him of that Charge by a great Majority, at which the Lord Argyle express'd so much Joy, that he seem'd little concern'd at any thing which cou'd happen to him after that. His Defence was so good, that it stagger'd many Members of the Scots Parliament, till some Letters from the Marquis of Argyle, to the perfidious Monk, were produc'd. Read what the Bishop of Salisbury writes of that base Man, and then judge whether my Language is not worthy of him, "While it was very doubtful how it wou'd have gone, Monk by an inexcusable Baseness, had search'd among his Letters, and found some that were written by Argyle to himself, that were hearty and zealous on their Side, the Side that the false and ungrateful Monk was engag'd in, that of the Common-wealth and Cromwel. These he sent down to Scotland, and after they were read in Parliament, it cou'd not be pretended that his Compliance was feign'd or extorted from him. Every body blam'd Monk for sending these down: The Treason may be lov'd, but the Traitor is always hated. Since it was a betraying the Confidence they liv'd in, they were sent by an Express, and came to the Earl of Middleton after the Parliament

"Parliament was engag'd in the Debate, so he order'd the Letters to be read, which also was much blam'd, as contrary to the Forms of Justice, since Probation was clos'd on both Sides." Upon reading of these Letters, the Marquis's Friends went out, finding there was no room left to pretend that his Compliance was forc'd. It was very generous of the Marquis of Montrose, he went out too, and refus'd to Vote, owning He had too much Resentment to judge in that Matter. Upon this he was soon condemn'd, though there appears not any more Reason for it after the Letters came than before, unless they would make every one answerable who had comply'd with the Common-wealth and Cromwel. A Man may be forc'd to comply with a thing which he would not have done without Force, and yet after his Compliance, he may innocently enough express his Satisfaction in the Force that was put upon him; for that Expression may be feign'd to encrease, as his Compliance might have been to preserve his Interest. When he was condemn'd, 'twas design'd to execute him after the manner of Montrose's Execution, but it was carry'd that he shou'd be Beheaded, and he suffer'd May the 27th, with all the Composure of a Christian Hero. Echard, that has prais'd and flatter'd so many worthless Characters, cannot part with this without an infamous Reflection; He submitted his Head to the Block, upon which Head the Blood of several lay heavy. He spoke highly in Justification of the Covenant, calling it the Cause and Work of God, and express'd his Apprehension of sad Times to follow, which might have been justly apprehended by Persons of much less Foresight than the Marquis of Argyle had, in whose Murder the Archdeacon seems to take great Delight.

Argyle unjustly condemn'd.

Mr. Guthry the Minister hang'd.

Mr. Guthry, the Minister, was accus'd of Acceding to the Remonstrance when the King was in Scotland, and for a Book he had printed with the Title of the Causes of God's Wrath upon the Nation; in which the treating with the King, the tendring him the Covenant, and the admitting him to the Exercise of the Government, were aggravated as Acts of Apostacy. The reading of this Accusation only is sufficient to let us into the Issue of this Trial, especially when the Reader is told that Mr. Guthry had excommunicated the Earl of Middleton some Years before for his Enormities; and the People who approv'd not of Guthry's Warmth, detested Middleton's appearing in the Prosecution. The Minister was soon condemn'd to be hang'd, notwithstanding a very steady Opposition made by the Lord Tweeddale to the Sentence, in which are some Words, as if the Prosecution had flow'd from the King's Resentment of his Behaviour to himself. Bishop Burnet, who saw him suffer, tells us he was so far from expressing any Fear, that he rather express'd a Contempt of Death. He spoke an Hour upon the Ladder with the Composure of a Man who was delivering a Sermon rather than his last Words; he justify'd all he had done, and exhorted all People to adhere to the COVENANT, which he magnify'd highly.

One Govan was Executed at the same Time, for deserting to Cromwel's Army twelve Years before. Maccloud of Assin, who had betray'd Montrose, was let go without any Censure. The Bishop gives us the Reason of it; He struck up to a high pitch of Vice and Impiety, and gave great Entertainments in Prison, which notwithstanding the Baseness of the Man and his Crimes, begot him many Friends. The Laird of Warristoun being absent, was attainted. The Laird Swintoun, who was turn'd Quaker, so mov'd his Judges by the new Meekness of his Spirit, that they recommended him to the King for Mercy; A.D. 1661 the rather, because Middleton hated Lauderdale, who had a Grant of Swintoun's Estate. For after what we have read, and shall read of these Men, both as to Spirituals and Temporal, one cannot imagine they do one Act of Generosity out of a generous Principle, or one just Act for the sake of Justice.

We have mention'd another perfidious Parasite, Sharp, who was the Presbytery's Agent, and sent on their chief Errands by them to Holland and London, where he is now betraying their Cause and Covenant, and earnestly soliciting the King to set up Episcopacy in Scotland: The Earl of Lauderdale oppos'd it, telling the King that Sharp misrepresented the Disposition of the Scots Nation. Sharp alledg'd the general Bent was for Episcopacy. Lauderdale affirm'd that those who seem'd zealous for it, ran into it to gain Favour only. However, Sharp being back'd by Middleton, the King suffer'd them to set aside the Presbytery, though, says Bishop Burnet, with a visible Reluctancy. His Majesty, says he, remember'd when he was among them, that the Scots had an Aversion to an Hierarchy. The Earl of Clarendon and the Duke of Ormond supported Middleton and Sharp, the Earl of Crawford was of the same Opinion with Lauderdale; but the latter declaring against it only as 'twas unreasonable, and Duke Hamilton, and Sir Robert Murray making the same Declaration, Zeal got the better of Discretion, and a Letter being sent from the King to Scotland about it, the Earls of Middleton and Glencairne took Care to have such an Answer return'd by the Privy-Council there, as would effectually confound Presbytery. Accordingly, upon receipt of it, Persons were thought of to fill the Scottish Sees. Sydeserfe, the old Bishop of Galloway, was living, and translated to Orkney. Sharp was order'd to find out Persons to be made Bishops, and, according to Bishop Burnet, the Choice was generally very bad.

Fairfoul, who was made Bishop of Glasgow, was an insinuating crafty Man, a better Physician than a Divine, his Life was scarce free from Scandal, and he was eminent in nothing that belong'd to his own Function; he had not only sworn the Covenant, but had persuaded others to swear it. Soon after his Consecration, says the Bishop, his Parts so sunk that he became almost a Changeling. Hamilton, who was made Bishop of Galloway, had been wont when he gave the Sacrament to excommunicate all that were not true to the Covenant. Sharp was promoted to the Archbishoprick of St. Andrews, and protest- ed he submitted to that Post, on Design to moderate Matters, and to cover some good Men from a Storm. Bishop Burnet adds, So deeply did he still dissemble. Of Dr. Leighton, who was another of the new Bishops, the Bishop of Sarum gives the most Seraphick Character that one can meet with; among other things he says of him, "That having talk'd of some Points of Popery with the freedom of an abstracted and speculative Man, the Papists had some Hopes of him; yet he express'd another Sense of the Matter when he came to see it was really intended to be brought in among us." Which K. Charles being one of the main Points intended to be prov'd for Popery. by this History, I hope the Evidence of so divine a Person as Archbishop Leighton, for so he became, is sufficient in that Article. Sharp, as well as Leighton, had never had Episcopal Ordination; so before he was consecrated, he was privately ordain'd Priest and Deacon; which was perform'd in Westminster-Abbey by the Bishop of Winchester, and two other English Bishops; and to use Bishop Burnet's Words, "He who had for Popery.

A.D. 1661 "the greatest Hand in it, proceeded with so much Diffimulation, and the rest of the Order were so mean and so selfish, and the Earl of Middleton, with the other Secular Men who conducted it, were so openly impious and vitious, that it did cast a Reproach upon every thing relating to Religion, to see it manag'd by such Instruments." All the Steps that were made afterwards were of a Piece with this melancholy Beginning, as may be seen in almost every Instance of Ecclesiastical Matters from the Restoration, till the Church of Scotland was restor'd after the Revolution.

Middleton's Wickedness.

Venner
and his Rabble.

When we return to England, we shall find a parcel of mad Men got together in London with an extravagant Imagination that they shou'd be able to overturn the Government by fighting Two against Ten Thousand. There is so much Abuse of Scripture in the Accounts of this Insurrection, written by some of our Ecclesiastical Historians, that I dare not repeat it. The Chief of this Enthusiastical Rabble was one Venner, who had been a noisy crazy Fifth Monarchy Man in Cromwel's Time. If Oliver had sent him and his Followers to Bedlam, he had done an Act of Charity. These Fellows had certain Scriptural Phrases in their Mouths, which they repeated, as Oliver's Porter us'd to do in the same Hospital, King Jesus, Powers of the Earth, Kings in Chains, Nobles in Fetters, One chase a Thousand, Possess the Gate, Hissing and Cursing, Gideon, Daniel, and the Revelations, Captivity captive. These, as you will find it in Eckhard, were all shot out of a Conventicle like so many Granadoes out of a Mortar-piece; and Sir Richard Browne, the prudent and vigilant Lord Mayor, detach'd a Body of Militia to put an end to the War. Venner, the Wine-Cooper, besides the Army of Words above-mention'd, had forty or fifty Fellows with him as much in their Wits as he was; these routed the Lord Mayor's Troops, but were afterwards routed themselves, and their Garrison taken, as Eckhard has it. It was an Alehouse near Cripple-gate, and Col. Cox took an effectual Way to reduce it. He surrounded the House, and order'd it to be unti'd at the top, by which Means his Soldiers cou'd fire down upon the Garrison, who were posted in the Garret. At the same Time another Party of the Colonel's Soldiers mounted the Stairs, broke down the Door, and enter'd the Garret. Six of the Rebels were kill'd before, another refusing Quarter was knock'd down, and then shot with a Musket. The rest of the Garrison were taken Prisoners, as were Venner, Hodgkins, Gowler, Allen, Fym, Ashton, Prichard, Fall, Hopkins, Wells, and others, of whom about sixteen were hang'd at Tyburn. The Archdeacon and another Reverend Historian, and other such History Writers, do make the most of this Grand Rebellion, on purpose to blacken the Nonconformists, as if they had encourag'd it, and were conspiring to do the like. Therefore it is said, Venner held a Conventicle, Venner sally'd from a Meeting-house, Venner was hang'd over-against his Meeting-house, Venner's Plot justify'd the Proclamation, prohibiting unlawful Meetings under Pretence of Religious Worship! Now it begins; the Felicities of the Times are blooming, and the Reverend Historians rejoice in the Hopes of a rich Harvest.

The Happinesses of this Reign.

About a Month after, February the 14th, the Army was disbanded on Tower-Hill, Monk's Regiment of Foot and Life-Guard of Horse only excepted.

Coronation.

On the 23d of April, being St. George's Day, the King was Crown'd in Westminster-Abbey, having, as Mr. Archdeacon observes, pass'd from the Tower to Westminster through four Triumphal Arches, Emblems of his Majesty's Triumphs; for a Description of which, he refers his Reader, as I do mine, to that ingenious Poet Mr. John Ogilby.

The Splendor of this Solemnity was very glittering and costly, and to prepare for it there were several Promotions and Creations, as Knights of the Garter, and Knights of the Bath; Arthur, Lord Capel, was created Earl of Essex, Thomas, Lord Brudenel, Earl of Cardigan, Charles Howard, Earl of Carlisle, Sir John Greenwile, Earl of Bath, Sir George Booth, Lord Delamere, Sir Horatio Townsend, Baron of Lyn-Regis, John Crew, Esq; Lord Crew of Stene. Mr. Eckhard glorying in the Weather on this Occasion, informs us, that 'twas observ'd that the Day of Cavalcade, and the Day of Coronation, were the only Days clear from Rain; and others made an Observation, that as soon as the Solemnity was over, there fell such a Storm of Thunder, Lightning, and Rain, as had never been known at that Time of the Year; which, according to the Archdeacon himself, Several were ready to look upon as ominous, and portending some future Calamities.

The first Incident which follows in his History is the Savoy Conference, which the King issu'd his Commission for, to reconcile the Church of England and the Presbyterians, a very laudable Design! says the Reverend Historian, and no Doubt it wou'd have been very laudable, had there indeed been any such Design. By the King's Declaration Matters relating to Church Government were so regulated, that it wou'd certainly have produc'd a Comprehension at least, if not a Union. The Affair of the Liturgy was more difficult, because those who were for it, and those who were against it, were inflexible on that Head. It was by the Declaration to be receiv'd, reform'd, and new Forms drawn up in Scripture Phrase, suited to the several Parts of Worship, that Men might use which of them they please. In order to this the Conference at the Savoy was appointed, and Dr. Reynolds and Mr. Calamy were authoriz'd to name the Persons on the Presbyterian Side to confer with the Bishops and Doctors on the other Side. The King's Commission to both Sides is dated the 25th of March, and the Persons nominated were,

For the Bishops,

Dr. Gilbert Sheldon, Bishop of London; Dr. John Cosens, Bishop of Durham; Dr. John Warner, Bishop of Rochester; Dr. Henry King, Bishop of Chichester; Dr. Humphry Henselman, Bishop of Sarum; Dr. George Morley, Bishop of Worcester; Dr. Robert Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln; Dr. Benjamin Lany, Bishop of Peterborough; Dr. Bryan Walton, Bishop of Chester; Dr. Richard Sterne, Bishop of Carlisle; Dr. John Gauden, Bishop of Exeter; Dr. John Earl, Dean of Westminster; Dr. Peter Heylin, Dr. John Hacket, Dr. John Barwick, Dr. Peter Gunning, Dr. John Pierson, Dr. Thomas Pierce, Dr. Anthony Sparrow, Mr. Herbert Thorndyke.

For the Presbyterian Ministers,

Dr. Edward Reynolds, Bishop of Norwich, Dr. Anthony Tuckney, Dr. John Conant, Dr. William Spurstow, Dr. John Wallis, Dr. Thomas Manton, Mr. Edmund Calamy, Mr. Richard Baxter, Mr. Arthur Jackson, Mr. Thomas Case, Mr. Matthew Newcomen, Mr. Samuel Clarke, Dr. Thomas Horton, Dr. Thomas Jacomb, Dr. William Bates, Mr. John Rawlinson, Mr. William Cooper, Dr. John Lightfoot, Dr. John Collins, Dr. Benjamin Woodbridge, Mr. William Drake.

The

The Misnomer of Mr. William Drake for Dr. Roger Drake was the Reason that the latter did not assist at the Conference. The Commissioners met at the Bishop of London's Lodgings in the Savoy, where the Bishop of London told the Ministers, That they, and not the Bishops, had been Seekers of the Conference, being desirous of Alterations in the Liturgy, and that therefore there was nothing to be done till they had brought in all they had to say against it in Writing, and all the additional Forms and Alterations which they desir'd. The Ministers mov'd for an amicable Conference, according to the King's Commission. One of the Reasons they gave for it is worth observing, That their Cause and Conference might not be misrepresented and publish'd as the Conference at Hampton-Court was. But the Bishops insisted on the Bishop of London's Proposal, and Ministers were nam'd to draw up their Exceptions, which was done by Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Wallis, Mr. Calamy, Mr. Nexcomen, Dr. Bates, Mr. Clarke, Dr. Jacob, who in their Paper propos'd, "That the Prayers and Materials of the Liturgy might have nothing in them doubtful or question'd amongst pious, learned and Orthodox Persons." This Echard calls an impracticable Proposal, and thereby confesses that the Prayers and Materials of the Liturgy have Things in them doubtful, and question'd by pious, learned and Orthodox Persons, which I think is sufficient Argument for it's Amendment, and to say it is impracticable argues his Ignorance in his Function; for let the Prayers be in Scripture Phrase taken out of plain, clear Passages, and let the other Materials be the same, and then they cannot be question'd, without questioning the Truth of the Gospel and the Authority of the Bible.

The Presbyterian Ministers desir'd, That as the Reformers at first compos'd the Liturgy, as might be most likely to win upon the Papists, and draw them into their Church Communion, by varying as little, as well they cou'd, from the Romish Forms before in Use; so it might, according to the same Rule of Prudence, be then so compos'd as to gain upon the Judgment and Affection of all those who, in the Substantials of the Protestant Religion, are of the same Persuasion. This material Proposition is wholly omitted by the Compleat Historian, tho' it as much deserv'd to be taken notice of as the other. Dr. Calamy adds, I'll leave the Reader to guess at the Reason why that shou'd be pass'd by, when what went before and follows is particularly recited. This is more likely to have been a design'd than an accidental Thing.

The Ministers desir'd, That the Repetitions and Responses of Clerk and People might be omitted. Any one may observe, that those Repetitions and Responses are us'd by Men, Women and Children as Things said by Rote without Devotion or Attention, and to say that is the Abuse of it, and not the Use of it, is meer Sophistry, for those that say it know, if they know any thing, that the Imposition of Things, which are so liable to Abuse, is contrary to the Purity and Piety of God's Worship, and if not directly sinful, inexpedient and dangerous. Add to this, that the insisting upon such Things merely for the Vexation of Consciences truly scrupulous, is little consistent with Christian Charity, or indeed with Right Reason or Humane Prudence.

They desir'd, That the Petitions of the Litany might be cast into one solemn Prayer to be offer'd up by the Minister, and not so as that the Precatory Part shou'd be utter'd only by the People. In which Request, if they had not been entirely indulg'd, it might have been well enough, had other of their Proposals been comply'd with.

A.D. 1661

They desir'd, That there be nothing in the Liturgy countenancing the Observation of Lent as a religious Fast. And truly, considering what Work is made of that Fast, that it is very often the less Meat the more Drink, the less Flesh the more Fish, it wou'd not have been yielding too much to have own'd that there was more Temperance than Religion in the Observance of it.

They desir'd, That the religious Observation of Saints Days and Vigils be omitted.

That the Liturgy be not so impos'd as to exclude the Gift of Prayer in any Part of Publick Service.

That the new Translation of the Scriptures be us'd instead of the old Version, which in many Places is justly exceptionable.

That Apocryphal Lessons might be omitted. Instead of which more such Lessons were soon after added, particularly the Story of Bel and the Dragon, which is not much more sacred than that of St. George and the Dragon, considering that Saint has the Honour to be the Patron of England; and instead of lessening the Credit of the Saints Days and Vigils, two new Holidays were added, St. Barnabas and the Conversion of St. Paul. It can't be said we know not what Spirit these Men are of.

They desir'd, That the Minister be not requir'd to rehearse the Liturgy at the Communion Table; and why it shou'd be read there, where not half the Church can hear it, rather than in the Middle of the Church where all may hear it, is worthy the Wisdom of a Convocation to explain.

They desir'd, That the Word Priest and Curate throughout the Book be turn'd into that of Minister, and Sunday into Lord's Day; which indeed does not seem to be of the last Importance, and if desir'd or deny'd, must be done as much out of Pique and Prejudice, as Reason and Conscience.

That obsolete Words be chang'd into Words generally receiv'd and better understood. The next Desire is something like a Petition to make use of Sense instead of Nonsense; That no Portions of the Old Testament, or of the Book of the Acts, be stil'd or read as Epistles; or in other Words, that Leviticus and Deuteronomy might not be put on the same Epistolary Foot with the Colossians and Philippians.

That the Phrase which supposes all in Communion to be regenerated, while due Care is not taken about the Exercise of Discipline, might be reform'd. Does that need any Hesitation! Is the Act of Communion the Act of Regeneration! And is it absolutely necessary to affirm, when to hope is the most that Christians are allow'd in, That the Petitions in the Prayers might have a more orderly Connection, and the Forms be of a more competent Length, which wou'd be more to Edification, and tend to gain the Reverence of the People! Every one feels this as soon as he thinks of it; but the Truth of it is, it is thought of so little, that 'tis no Wonder there are so few edify'd.

That the Liturgy might be so contriv'd as to comprehend the Sum of all such Sins as are ordinarily to be confess'd in Prayer by the Church, and of such Petitions and Thanksgivings as are ordinarily to be put up to God, and the Catechism annex'd, might summarily comprehend all such Doctrines as are necessary to be heard, and those explicitly set down.

That Ceremonies not necessary in themselves, and that had for above 100 Years caus'd sad Divisions, and been the Fountain of manifold Evils, might not be impos'd by the Liturgy, but left at Liberty.

A.D. 1661

The Unreasonableness of these Requests is much amplify'd by the Archdeacon and the Compleat Historian, at which doubtless the Reader will be surpriz'd, when he finds nothing in them but what is reasonable and modest; for tho' a Man may with good Conscience conform to Laws, and reckon his Obedience due to the Constitution, yet he may with good Conscience and good Reason desire many Things to be alter'd which give Offence to scrupulous Minds; and others neither need it nor desire it; for their Consciences being without Scruple, they are ready to conform to every thing that shall be requir'd of them, especially if it touches their Interest, their Ease, their Vanity, or their Passions. It had been well if the Bishops and Doctors had weigh'd the following Argument at the Close of the Paper the Ministers gave them, containing their Objections.

"We know much hath been spoken and written by way of Apology, in Answer to many Things that have been objected, but yet the Doubts and Scruples of tender Consciences still continue, or rather are increas'd. We do humbly conceive it therefore a Work worthy of those Wonders of Salvation which God hath wrought for his Majesty now on the Throne, and for the whole Kingdom, and exceedingly becoming the Ministers of the Gospel of Peace, with all holy Moderation and Tenderneſs, to endeavour the Removal of every thing out of the Worship of God, which may justly offend or grieve the Spirits of sober and godly Persons: The Things themselves that are desir'd to be remov'd not being of the Foundation of Religion, nor the Essentials of publick Worship, nor the Removal of them any way tending to the Prejudice of the Church or State; therefore their Continuance and rigorous Imposition can no ways be able to countervail the laying aside of so many pious and able Ministers, and the inconceivable Grief that will arise to Multitudes of his Majesty's most loyal and peaceable Subjects, who upon all Occasions are ready to serve him with their Prayers, Estates and Lives. For the preventing of which Evils we humbly pray that these Particulars may be taken into Consideration.

Objections to the Liturgy.

After the general Proposals a great many particular Exceptions were added, as to the several Parts of the Liturgy and Passages in it, of which these that follow are the chief.

"As to the Morning and Evening Prayer, they excepted against that Part of the Rubrick, which speaking of Ornaments to be us'd in the Church, left Room to bring back the Cope, Albe and other Vestments." The Temper the Bishops and Doctors were in did not promise much Reformation; for Dr. Bates urging to Dr. Gunning, that on the same Reasons they so impos'd the Cross and Surplice, they might bring in Holy Water and Lights, and abundance of such Ceremonies, which we have cast out. Gunning reply'd, And so I think we ought to have more, and not fewer, if we do well.

What do these Men think of the Salvation of Souls? Are all the Ceremonies impos'd by the Church; are all the Ceremonies that Invention can contrive worth the saving of one Soul? And if one Soul only submitting to a Ceremony in divine Service, contrary to the Conviction of his Conscience, did in so doing hazard his eternal Salvation, can one think upon such an Imposition without Trembling! I put the Case, and doubt it is not in the Power of Sophistry to save it.

The Ministers excepted against "the leaving out the Doxology at the End of the Lord's Prayer, the frequent Repetition of Glory be to the Father, &c. the Singing of the Lessons, Epistles and Gospels; against the using of the Benedicite rather than a Psalm or Scripture Hymn. In the Litany they excepted against the Expression Deadly Sin, and mov'd it might be chang'd into Heinous or Grievous; against the Expression Sudden Death, which they mov'd to be chang'd into Dying suddenly and unpreparedly; against Praying for all that travel by Land and Water, &c. so universally, which they desir'd to have put indefinitely, those that travel, &c. In the Collect for Christmas-Day they excepted against the Word This Day us'd two or three Days successively. Would one think there should be Occasion given for such an Exception?

Concerning the Administration of the Sacrament, "they excepted against the Time assign'd for giving Notice to the Minister, as too short, when confin'd to over Night, or in the Morning, as to Persons who design'd to communicate. They excepted against the Rubrick about the Minister's keeping unqualify'd Persons from the Lord's Table, as not sufficiently clear and strong." But that Exception is now aggravated by forcing People to come to it, or to starve. There is not an Officer in the Army or Fleet, in the Customs, in the Excise, in Corporations and Parishes, but is oblig'd to communicate, or besides paying 500 Pounds to lose his Office, and be incapacitated for holding any as long as he lives. The Minister is so far from being at Liberty to refuse him the Sacrament, that he loads himself, if he does, with the Damages the Person refus'd sustains by it. This is not all yet; have I not known Persons living in open Adultery admitted? Did I ever know a Person refus'd but out of Pique by the Vicar or Curate; I put it to every Reader, whether these Things are not within his Knowledge? It was said for Answer to this Exception, that the Minister might refuse a Communicant, if he thought him unfit: That cannot be said now in Case of the Test. But what can be more notorious than that there is no where due Care taken about Fitness or Unfitness? And if to administer the Sacrament to Persons known to live in continu'd Acts of Lewdness, Dishonesty and Debauchery be a Sin, how necessary is it to remove all Temptations to it, and especially all Injunctions? Salvation is not to be forc'd upon People. Is it out of Care of their Souls that they are compell'd to communicate, fit or not fit, and to eat spiritual, or to want temporal Bread? What is it the Constitution would provide against? The Worship of God in Society is hop'd to be a Means of obtaining his Grace. Is that Society supported by Coercion and Compulsion, or by Persuasion and Conviction? Or is there any separate Interest which subsists only by the Being of that Society? If it is separate, it cannot be sacred, and then it has nothing to do with the most Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

It will easily be imagin'd why I am so mysterious, and it is not the greatest Felicity we enjoy, that there's Occasion for so much Mystery.

There were many other Exceptions, as may be seen at large in Mr. Baxter's Life, and in Dr. Calamy's Abridgment; but not one of them being amended, I shall not enlarge upon them here. The Example of the Hampton-Court Conference might have convinc'd the Ministers, that the Savoy Conference would only expose them to the Insults of their Enemies under Protection of the Court.

Mr. Baxter drew up a new Liturgy, consisting entirely of Scriptural Phrases. The Presbyterians are now beginning to pay for their bringing

A.D. 1661 ing in the King without Conditions. A Year ago not one of these Doctors wou'd have look'd them in the Face, but with Meekness and Humility; but the Air and the Tone are now alter'd, and are as lordly as the Title conferr'd upon them.

Baxter's Life.
P. 337. There were many Ministers at the Conference, besides those in the Commission, as on the Bishops Side Dr. Pory, Dr. Crowther, &c. and with the Ministers, as Auditors, were Mr. Miles, Mr. Tiltonson, &c.

After the Exceptions in general and in particular, had been sometime in a Paper Controversy, Bishop Reynolds and the Ministers, earnestly press'd for a Verbal Conference, and with much ado obtain'd it. Dr. Pearson, Dr. Gunning, Dr. Sparrow, were appointed for the Bishops; Dr. Bates, Dr. Jacomb, Mr. Baxter, for the Ministers.

When Mr. Baxter began to prove some of the Episcopal Impositions sinful, Dr. Cosens took Offence at the Word, saying, He condemn'd all the Churches of Christ, who all of them impos'd some Gesture or other. Mr. Baxter reply'd, Many of the Reform'd Churches impos'd none. He might have said, not one of the Reform'd Churches impos'd one Ceremony, as essential to Church Membership, or under any Penalty, much less under Pain of Loss of Living, and Cure of Souls. Bishop Lany told Mr. Baxter, that justify'd Persons have no Sin, and are no Sinners, because justification taketh it away. Mr. Baxter answer'd, Justification takes not away the Sin but the Guilt, which so confounded Lany, that according to Mr. B—— he unsaid all again, and knew not what he said. Dr. Morley continually interrupting Mr. Baxter, Dr. Bates cry'd, Pray, my Lord, give him Leave to speak, but he cou'd not obtain it, without frequent Interruption. Dr. Crowther, tho' no Commissioner, took up Mr. Baxter about Justification; and as Mr. Baxter himself writes, with a little Nonsense, wou'd have prov'd that Israel never sinn'd, till Jereboam made the Israelites to sin.

When the Bishops were desir'd to have Compassion on the Souls of their Brethren, and that they wou'd not unnecessarily cast so many out of the Ministry, Bishop Cosens said, What do you threaten us with Numbers? for my Part, I think the King wou'd do well to make you name them all; upon which Mr. B—— reflects thus, A charitable and wise Motion! to name all the Thousands of England, who dissented from them, and who had sworn the Covenant, and whom they wou'd afterwards persecute. In the Preface to the Ministers Exceptions against the Liturgy, it was said, That after twenty Years Calamity, they wou'd not yield to that, which several Bishops voluntarily offer'd twenty Years before, meaning the Corrections of the Liturgy, offer'd by those most pious, learned and reverend Fathers of our Church, Archbishop Usher, Archbishop Williams, Bishop Moreton, Bishop Prideaux, Bishop Hall, and many others. As soon as that Passage was read, cry'd Bishop Cosens, What do you threaten us with a new War! It is Time for the King to look to you. It is time to find out some Plot to take away their Liberties and Lives. I must confess, I cannot pity the Presbyterians as much as they seem to deserve, when I see them bully'd and brow-beaten: I think presently it was owing to themselves. How came those Bishops and Doctors to have Power over them? Cou'd any thing better be expected from such Men? Were they ever charg'd with Moderation, Humanity, or any of those divine Virtues that tend to Union and Peace? Mr. Baxter proceeds, "I had no Shelter from the Fury of Bishop Cosens, but to name Dr. Hammond, and tell him, I remember'd Dr.

Hammond insisted on the same Argument, A.D. 1661
"That twenty Years Calamity shou'd have taught Men more Charity, and brought them to Repentance and Brotherly Love; and that it is an Aggravation of their Sin to be unmerciful, after so long and heavy Warnings from God's Hand. Cosens reply'd, If that's your Meaning, all is well, and these were the most logical Discourses of that Bishop." Mr. Baxter entreating them not to cast out so many of their Brethren thro' the Nation. Dr. Sterne, Bishop of Carlisle, turn'd to the rest of the Bishops and cry'd, He will not say a Kingdom, lest he own a King. Mr. Baxter answer'd, Half the Charity which became so grave a Bishop, might have suffic'd to have help'd him to a better Exposition of the Word Nation, from the Mouths of such, who have so lately taken the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and sworn Fidelity to the King, as his Chaplains, and had such Testimonies from him as we have had, and that our Case was sad: If we cou'd plead by the King's Commission for Accommodation, upon no better Terms than to be noted as Traitors, every time we us'd such a Word as the NATION, which all Monarchical Writers use.

Mr. Baxter charges Bishop Morley with giving him perpetual Interruption when he offer'd to speak, and the Audience with laughing always in the wrong Place. He informs us, that a learned Doctor who was not in the Commission, desir'd to be heard, as if he had some unanswerable Argument; and it was a Question, Whether all that scrupled Conformity, whom we pleaded for, were not such as had been against the King? Here are the Fruits of the Act of Oblivion. All that pleaded for them had been for the King, or he had never been possess'd of the Kingdom. Mr. Baxter reply'd, "The King himself has given sufficient Testimony of many of them; there is not one Minister of twenty whom we plead for, that had ever any thing to do in the Wars against the King, most of them being then Boys at School or in the University. He added, Men on both Sides had been against the King." Upon which Bishop Morley ask'd, Whether Mr. Baxter ever knew a conformable Man for the Parliament? Yes, my Lord, said he, many a one. Name one, cry'd some of the Doctors. I will, reply'd Mr. Baxter, not only a Man, but a Bishop, nay an Archbishop, the Archbishop of York, Dr. Williams, some time Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, who was Commander of the Forces for the Parliament in Wales. At which the Bishops and Doctors were all silent.

He told them, if they cast out all the Nonconformists, there wou'd not be tolerable Ministers enough to supply the Congregations. Bishop Morley answer'd, So it was in the late Times, and that some Places had no Ministers at all through all those Times of Usurpation, naming Ailesbury, which he knew to have had none upon his own Knowledge. Enquiry being made into it, Ailesbury was found to have been well supply'd, either by a settled Incumbent, or the Preacher of the Garrison. You shou'd remember, says Morley, how you did by us, and that you talk'd not then as you do now. Mr. Baxter reply'd, "I am confident there is no Man here present, that had ever a Hand in silencing any of you. For my own part, I have been in Judgment for casting out utterly Insufficient and notoriously Scandalous indifferently, of what Opinion or Side soever; but I have publicly written against the silencing or displacing any worthy Man for being against the Parliament: And if it had been otherwise, you shou'd take warning by others
"Faults,

A.D. 1661 "Faults, and not imitate them, and do Evil because Cromwel did so.

Upon this Dr. Walton, Bishop of Chester, said, Indeed, Mr. Baxter did write against the casting of us out: But, Mr. Baxter, did you not say, if our Churches had no more than bare Liberty, as others had, without the Compulsion of the Sword, that none but Drunkards wou'd join in them? He answer'd, No, my-Lord, I did not; I only said, that as they had been order'd, if they had but equal Liberty for Voluntiers, they wou'd be like Ale-houses, where many honest Men may come; but the Number of worse Comers is so great, as makes it dishonourable.

The Bishops and Doctors spoke of the Antiquity of Liturgies; upon which Mr. Baxter entreated them to let true Antiquity be imitated by them, and desir'd any of them to prove that ever any Prince did impose one Form of Prayer or Liturgy for Uniformity on all the Churches in his Dominions, or even upon one Province or Country under him; or even that any Council, Synod, or Patriarchs, or Metropolitans, did impose one Liturgy upon all the Bishops and Churches under them? He prov'd to them, not only from the Instances of Basil and the Church of Neocæsarea, but from others, that every Bishop then chose what Forms he pleas'd for his own Church. Baxter adds, They cou'd deny nothing of all this; but Antiquity is nothing to them when it makes against them.

As the Conference was drawing to an End, Bishop Cofens produces a Paper as from a considerable Person, containing a Method to end the Controversy. The main Thing in it was a Motion to put the Complainers upon distinguishing between the Things they charg'd as sinful, and those which they oppos'd as inexpedient only. The three Disputants on the Ministers Side were desir'd to draw up an Answer to it against the next Morning, and they did so, and deliver'd it, but it was in their own Names only. Eight Things they in this their Reply charg'd as flatly sinful, and contrary to the Word of God: That no Minister be admitted to baptize without the prescrib'd Use of the transient Image of the Cross. That no Minister be admitted to read or pray, or exercise the other Parts of his Office, that dares not wear a Surplice. That none be admitted to Communion in the Lord's Supper, that dare not receive it kneeling; and that all Ministers be enjoin'd to deny it to such. That Ministers be forc'd to pronounce all baptiz'd Infants Regenerate by the Holy Ghost, whether Children of Christians or not. That Ministers be forc'd to deliver the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ unto the Unfit, both in Health and Sickness, and that with Personal Application, putting it into their Hands; and that such are forc'd to receive it, though against their Wills, in the Conscience of their Impenitency. That Ministers be forc'd to absolve the Unfit, and that in absolute Expressions. That they are forc'd to give Thanks for all whom they bury, as Brethren whom God hath deliver'd and taken to himself. And that none may be a Preacher that dare not subscribe that there is nothing in the Common Prayer Book, the Book of Ordination, and the Nine and Thirty Articles, that is contrary to the Word of God. And the Ministers undertook to prove as much.

Compleat History here, declares that the Fifth and Sixth Things mention'd were positively false in the Supposition of them. Dr. Calamy animadvertes upon it thus: "He must allow it to appear strange to others, that he shou'd say this with so much Assurance, when he himself cannot be insensible that there has all along been a Party in the Church, who have represented Ministers as under an Obligation to administer the Sacrament and Absolution to all that desire either, without Distinction; and that this Party have not wanted Power to run down those whose Apprehensions herein have been different from theirs.

The greatest Part of the Disputation on the Ministers Side fell to Mr. Baxter's Share, and to Dr. Gunning's on the Side of the Bishops. I can't tell what Writer Echard took his Label upon Mr. Baxter from, but it is of a Piece with the rest of his Authorities. "Baxter was either perplex'd in his Understanding, or indispos'd for closing the Difference. His Talent lay in retiring to Foreign Distinctions and Misapplications of the Rules of Logick. And it was hard to say, whether his involving an Argument and raising a Mist was Art or Infirmary, whether he was a Knave or a Fool." Dr. Glanville, one of the King's Chaplains, writing to Mr. Baxter, says, after having thank'd him for his excellent Performances, Those who have written against you seem to be set on by nothing but Spleen and Choler, nor have I been able to ascribe the engaging so many virulent Pens against you to any other Cause than the Endeavours of Satan, to binder the Success which your powerful Pen has had against his dark Kingdom. It was the great Abaddon that inspir'd their Undertaking. I shall conclude with this Profession, That the Freedom of your Spirit, the Impartiality of your Enquiries, the Catholickness of your Judgment and Affections, the Peaceableness and Moderation of your Principles, the publick Spiritdness of your Disposition, the exact uniform Holiness of your Life, and your indefatigable Industry for the Good of Souls, are Excellencies which I never knew so combin'd in one Man. One of those virulent Pens was Dr. Morley, who charg'd Mr. Baxter with asserting a Falshood destructive of all Authority Humane and Divine. Mr. Baxter's Reputation was so general, that nothing can be thought of more insolent than the touching of it by such a Pen as our Historian's. Bishop Wilkins said of him, He had cultivated every Subject he had handled. The very learned Dr. Barrow gives this Judgment of his Writings, His Practical Discourses were never mended, his Controversial ones seldom confuted. Bishop Burnet speaks of him as a Man of great Piety, and one of the most learned Men of the Age. And even A. Wood, that bitter Enemy to Moderation and Charity, calls him the Learned and most Eminent Non-conformist. Of his Opponent, Dr. Gunning, the Bishop of Sarum says, All the Arts of Sophistry were made use of by him upon all Occasions, in as confident a manner as if they had been sound Reasoning. He was unweariedly active to very little Purpose, much set on reconciling us to Popery: He had no sound Judgment nor Prudence in Affairs. The Question these two learned Men disputed, was, Whether it was lawful to determine the certain Use of Things indifferent in the Worship of God? The Bishops held the Ministers to this Point, and press'd them to shew that any of the Things impos'd were of themselves unlawful. The Ministers affirm'd, that other Circumstances might make it become unlawful to settle a peremptory Law about Things indifferent, which they apply'd particularly to kneeling at the Sacrament; and stood upon it, that a Law which excluded all that did not kneel from the Sacrament, was unlawful, as a Limitation in the Point of Communion put on the Laws of Christ, which ought to be the only Condition of those who had a Right to it. The Question is thus stated by Bishop Burnet, and I choose to make use of him

Things charg'd as sinful.

A.D. 1661 him in this Case on Account of his Function, which cou'd not bias him on the Presbyterian Side. Here it is agreed by both Sides, and by all Sides, that Christians under the best Preparation their Hearts are capable of, by using the proper Means towards it, have a Right to the holy Communion, which the Scripture no where directs to be received kneeling; but on the contrary, leaves the Posture the same as at common Suppers in the Eastern Countries in those Days. If therefore, since the Idoltry of the Host has been set up, and Communicants have been taught that the Bread is God himself, to whom they are to pay Adoration by kneeling at the Sacrament, which Heylin, and hundreds of other such Divines have asserted, scrupulous Persons cannot think otherwise of it than of Idoltry, and are refus'd the Communion because they cannot kneel. Whether the Minister, whose Duty it is to give them the Sacrament, sins in refusing to do it, let all the World judge, who make Scripture the Rule of their Faith. To say Human Laws may speak where the Scriptures are silent in Things of the last Concernment, as is Eternal Life or Death, is to say what I cannot spare Words to explain; and to suppose that a poor unhappy Soul has been oblig'd to kneel at the Lord's Supper, when he was afraid he was kneeling to an Idol only in the Material Bread, is in that Supposition to make him commit Sin when he was in the highest Act of Devotion. Add to all this, that since kneeling is no where directed in Holy Writ, and since, on the contrary, another Posture was practis'd at the first Institution of the Sacrament, and since also it is a Ceremony at best not essential to the well receiving of the Communion, What Necessity was there for the Bishops and Doctors to turn two or three thousand Ministers out of their Livings, and their Wives and Children out of their Houses, purely to satisfy the Obstinacy, Perverseness, Peevishness, and Resentment of Sheldon, Morley, Gunning, Stern, and other such Bishops and Doctors? Whoever have a Mind to see this Question in various Logical Shapes, are refer'd to the Dispute at large in Baxter's Folio Life, where they will soon discover on which Side the Scale turn'd.

Kneeling at the Sacrament objected against.

Mr. Baxter informs us, that after the Question was left to the before-mention'd Disputants, Three of a Side, most of the Bishops and Doctors still attended to fill up the Number of Voices, and the Divines on the Side of the Ministers absented themselves, as thinking their Three Disputants were only to manage it; but at the Close of all, the Bishops and Doctors, Dr. Sanderfon in the Chair, shorten'd the Matter by putting it to the Vote, Whether Dr. Gunning or Mr. Baxter had the better? And it pass'd, as every body will imagine, though Mr. Baxter's Reply to Gunning was heard; and after it was heard, Bishop Cosens put it to the Vote, All you that think Dr. Gunning hath prov'd his Argument, say I; upon which they all cry'd I, I. Mr. Baxter said very truly, I believe we knew your Opinion before; and if this is the Use you make of our Concession, that you shou'd all be present while our Ministers are all absent, it shews that your Cause is very needy of Defence, when your own Voices must go instead of Argument: But if you will go on upon such lamentable Reasoning, truly in my Opinion it may be call'd so, as you have us'd, to cast out the faithful Pastors, and the People, and divide the Church, and afflict your Brethren, the Day is coming when your own Votes shall not absolve you.

They then fell upon the Point of Charity and Compassion to the Church, and the frustrating the King's Commission, and the Kingdom's Hopes, by the Bishops and Doctors, at the same time A.D. 1661 that they profess'd their Desires of the Church's Peace; for which Mr. Baxter told them, You will not abate the smallest Thing, nor correct your grossest Error.

The very Choice of the Bishops and Doctors in the King's Commission was enough to shew what the End of the Conference wou'd be. They were the most obstinate, perverse, peevish and revengeful that made any Figure in the Church. Had such Men been employ'd as Bishop Griffith, Bishop Lucy, Bishop Nicholson, Bishop Lloyd, Dr. Whitchcot, Dr. Cudworth, Bishop Wilkins, Dr. More, Dr. Worthington, alike distinguish'd for Piety and Virtue, Learning and Abilities, the Peace of the Church had been establish'd instead of the Establishment procur'd by the Savoy Bishops and Doctors, of whom Bishop Burnet writes thus, "What the Bishops did with their great Pines was a Pattern to all the lower Dignitaries, who generally took more Care of themselves than of the Church. The Men of Service were loaded with many Livings, and many Dignities. With this great Accession of Wealth, there broke in upon the Church a great deal of Luxury and high Living on the Pretence of Hospitality: And with this Over-set of Wealth and Pomp that came on Men in the Decline of their Age, they who were now growing into old Age, became lazy and negligent in all the true Concerns of the Church."

Bp. Burnet's Account of the Bishops and Clergy.

By every Step taken in the Savoy Conference it is obvious, that those Bishops and Doctors thought the true Concerns of the Church were, Pomp, and Wealth, Power, Superstition and Ceremony: That Load of Livings was in all Probability the main Argument for turning so many pious, laborious, learned and able Ministers out of their Churches. I was told by a Friend of Mr. Baxter, that a Day or two before this Conference broke up, a Divine happen'd to offer it to one of the Bishops as a Thing reasonable, that those elder Presbyterian Ministers who were outed of their Benefices, and those younger who never had any, shou'd be provided for as Livings dropp'd. The Bishop took no Notice of it; and whatever the Ministers said afterwards was worse receiv'd even than what they had said before. But Bishop Burnet discovers something that reflects more on the approaching Statute of Uniformity, than any Dissenter can say; for every one knows it was the darling Act of the Lord Clarendon, and that all the Clergy of England, and all the Members of our two famous Universities, have ador'd him for his Care of the Church; whereas my Lord of Sarum assures us, his real Care was of them. The Lord Clarendon was heavily charg'd, as having shewn that he was more the Bishops Friend than the Church's.

The King did not seem very fond of having a Convocation, which was the only Thing wanting to fill up Echard's Measure of Felicity. He has got a rich Parliament chosen, which, without a religious Synod, wou'd have been like a Cripple without Crutches; and therefore he not only tells us, that some body was put upon writing to the King about it, but who that some body was too; it was the valuable Heylin, who wrote a Letter to a great Man to speak to his Majesty for a Convocation; and upon this single Letter, of a Man of no more Value than Peter Heylin, was that Convocation call'd, who gave their Sanction to the Bartholomew Bill. Dr. Calamy writes thus of it; "During this Interval the Convocation was chosen, which was politickly deferr'd till now. Had it been call'd when the King came in, the inferior Clergy wou'd have been against the Diocesan; but afterwards many Hundreds were turn'd

" turn'd out, that the old sequester'd Ministers,
" how meanly soever qualify'd, might come in.
" Those Ministers who had been ordain'd since " Episcopacy was laid aside twenty Years before,
" were deny'd Voices in the Election; by which " Means, and a great many Minister's Scruples,
" who thought it unlawful to have any thing to " do in choosing such a kind of Assembly, the " Diocesan Party wholly prevail'd.

But before we proceed any farther in Church History, we must return to that of the State. The new Parliament met the 8th of May, and are recommended to us by Echard as Persons to be prefer'd before all others, on account of their prodigious Fortunes. The Vanity and Falshood of his Recommendation appear in the same Paragraph of his History. They were call'd, and indeed they were, the Pensionary Parliament, as I shall prove presently; yet because they pass'd that severe Act, which upon one Day flung 2000 Ministers out of their Pulpits, they are to want no good Characters which he can bestow upon them. I confess, I am asham'd to mention so poor and worthless a History so often; but, as I have elsewhere observ'd, he and his Brother Historians have impos'd upon me the Office of a Scavenger, and I am forc'd to remove the Dirt and Filth as I go along, to make Way for my Reader. " This Parliament must in the main
" be said to have been excellently well and wise" ly chosen, for the good and peaceable Estab" lishment of the publick Affairs. The House " of Commons, consisting of the most considera" ble and eminent Persons for Birth, Estates, " Knowledge and Experience, that were to be " found in the three Kingdoms;" which is so false, as well as impertinent, that it cou'd not be; for he brags, that the Nine in Ten of them were for the Laudean Church, and not one in a thousand of such Men had been in any Place to learn Experience for almost twenty Years past.
As to their Estates and other fine Qualities, we shall see what they were in the State Tracts.
" The Friends to Arbitrary Power in the Begin" ning of King Charles the Second's Reign pur-
" su'd the same Design as in Strafford and Laud's " Time, of subverting our Constitution, but took " Methods quite different from what those be" fore us'd to effect it. They remembered the ill
" Success of Projects and Monopolies, and Pre" tentences of Prerogative to supply the Govern" ment with Money. They had found out and " felt by Experience, that a Free Parliament
" cou'd not be aw'd, and that the People in the " Intervals of Parliament wou'd not be forc'd to " pay Taxes which were not legally impos'd;
" yet there was an absolute Necessity for the " Crown to be supply'd, without which it cou'd " not subsist. 'Twas therefore resolv'd to attempt " that by Fraud which they cou'd not compass
" by Force, and in order thereunto they took the " Advantage of the present Temper of the Peo" ple, whose Heads were turn'd with the Arch" deacon's Felicities as well as his own, which " carry'd them, without considering what Con" sequences might be to every thing that was " agreeable to the Court." What follows relates to Echard's Birth, Estates, &c. " They recom" mended such to be chosen Members of the " House of Commons, whose Fortunes had been " most impair'd in the late Wars, and whose " Dependence on the Court might incline to a " Compliance with whatever shou'd be demand" ed of them. And these good-natur'd loyal " Gentlemen repeal'd the Act of the 16th of " Car. I. for Triennial Parliaments, while a few " worthy Patriots labour'd to defend it. Places " and Pensions were liberally bestow'd on all that

" cou'd be brought over to the Court; and 'tis
" no Wonder they gave such prodigious Sums " of Money out of the poor People's Purfes, when " a great Part was again refunded into their own."
This was sufficiently prov'd by Mr. Bertie and Sir Stephen Fox; tho', when Sir John Horham, Sir Robert Peyton, and Sir John Holman were sent by the House of Commons to fetch Sir Stephen's Books, the Lord Chamberlain came to them and said, No Books or Papers concerning the King shou'd be carry'd away. These Discoveries happen'd some Time after, but are proper to be mention'd here, to shew thro' what pure Hearts and clean Hands so many religious and useful Bills pass'd. The Names of a good Number of these illustrious Members are in

We shall enter into the Detail of the Pensioners when we come to that Period where the Pensions were settled, which they could not be at first; and some of these Members were Recruiters: However, they were chosen with as much Wisdom and Foresight as those who sat at the Opening of the Session, when the King made a Speech to both Houses of Parliament; a Word of which Mr. Archdeacon tells us is not to be spar'd, I suppose for the sake of this Passage, I do value my self much upon keeping my Word, upon making good whatsoever I do promise my Subjects. <sup>How the King kept his Word.</sup> His Majesty had three Times sworn the Solemn League and Covenant. He had promis'd to establish it in England, and some Days after this Speech he pass'd an Act to abolish it. The Lord Chancellor Hyde's Speech comes next, wherein he puts their Blood in a Ferment, by alarming them with Rumours of Plots, after he has set out the Tumult under Venner, as one of the most formidable Rebellions which had been ever known. "A little Time after the Dissolution of the last Parliament, while his Majesty accompanied his Mother to the Sea-side, the most desperate and prodigious Rebellion broke out in this City that had been heard of in any Age, and by the Multitude of intercepted Letters from and to all the Counties of England, in which the Time was set down wherein the Work of the Lord was to be done by the desperate Carriage of the Traitors themselves, and the bragging of their Friends, it might be concluded the Combination reach'd very far, and if the indefatigable Industry of the Lord Mayor had not prevented it, probably the Fury would not have been extinguish'd before this famous City, or a great Part of it, had been burnt to Ashes, and therefore it became their Wisdoms to provide new Remedies for new Diseases." We shall see by and by what sort of State Physicians this wonderful Senate were, and how much this poor Nation was indebted to their Wisdoms.

The House of Commons, as the Court directed, chose Sir Edward Turner the Duke of York's Solicitor for their Speaker, and he was led to the Chair by Sir Charles Berkley and Sir Heneage Finch. As soon as he was confirm'd by the King, he made a long Speech, and continu'd to make long Speeches upon all Occasions, till he was remov'd to the Upper House, where he sat as an Assistant, being sometime after made Lord Chief Baron. He is for his much speaking, term'd the Speech-Making Speaker. Echard preserves them all, as if they were as precious as the Orations of Cicero, but I know the

A.D. 1661 the Merit of them too well to follow his Example. After he had done, the Lord Chancellor made another Speech, wherein he painted the Monster Common-wealth in proper Colours, and told them the King was going to Worcester, to thank God for his Deliverance there, and to thank God even in those Cottages and Barns wherein he was shelter'd, and feasted, and preserv'd; and in the Close of that Progress, he hopes he shall find his Queen in his Arms: For the Parliament had receiv'd the Proposal of his Marriage with the Infanta of Portugal as joyfully as if his Majesty's Wedding-day was to have been their own. Then they order'd the solemn League and Covenant, and some Acts made in the late Times, to be burnt. They order'd a Bill to be brought in to enable his Majesty to send out Commissions to receive the free and voluntary Contributions of his People, which the King pass'd the 8th of July, with another Bill to confirm the Oblivion Act, and the Speaker made a Speech when he presented those Acts to him, in which he has a pretty Expression concerning the latter, That we might with some Chearfulness see your Majesty's Face, we have brought our Brother Benjamin with us; I mean your Act of Oblivion, &c. Then the King made a Speech too about that Bill. They proceeded still with great Vigour, and confiscated the Estates of those of the King's Judges who were dead, and of the Lord Mounson, Sir Henry Mildmay, Sir James Harrington, and Mr. John Phelps. The two first were degraded of their Titles, and together with Mr. Robert Wallop, order'd to be drawn upon Sledges from the Tower to Tyburn, with Ropes about their Necks, which, says Echard, was very solemnly done on the 30th of January following. About three Weeks after there were more Bills ready, and when the Speaker presented them, he had another Speech ready in Praise of those Acts. The first was to punish severely any Man who shou'd call the King Papist, tho' the Lord Clarendon, who promoted this Bill, knew he was a Papist. The next Bill was to restore the Bishops to their Seats in the House of Lords. The next, an Act to discourage Petitions and Addresses, A Declaration that the sole Right of the Militia be in the King. An Act concerning the Navy, for confiscating the above-mention'd Estates; and because the King had told them, he intended to take a Journey, the Speaker said, they had prepar'd a Bill for providing necessary Carriages in all his Royal Progresses and Removals. His Majesty answer'd this Speech also with another, and then the Parliament adjourn'd to the 20th of November.

Convocation.

The Convocation met on the 8th of May, Dr. Thomas Pierce preach'd a Latin Sermon, and Dr. Henry Fearn was chosen Prolocutor, which Business in our Times takes up the Session, but this Convocation did something more: For besides the two new Holidays, for which we are indebted to them, and the Lesson of Bell and the Dragon, for which they must also have Credit, Bishop Burnet informs us, "Two new Offices were drawn for two new Days, the Thirtieth of January, call'd King Charles the Martyr, and the Twenty-ninth of May, the Day of the King's Birth and Return. Sancroft drew for these some Offices of a very high Strain, yet others of a more moderate Strain were prefer'd to them: But he coming to be advanc'd to the See of Canterbury, got his Offices to be publish'd by the King's Authority, in a Time when so high a Style as was in them, did nor sound well in the Nation. Such Care was taken in the Choice and Return of the Members of the Convocation, that every thing went

" among them as was directed by Sheldon and Morley: We shall see what Directions they gave them in the Sequel.

This good Parliament rais'd the Discontents of the late Anarchy, according to Echard, and therefore new Designs are thought of. Councils were held, Meetings were held, and to prove the Truth of these dangerous Conspiracies, Mr. Praise God Barebone was taken. It is almost a Miracle that he escap'd hanging, considering his Christian Name. Alderman Ireton was also apprehended, very likely on Account of his Sirname. Mr. Samuel Moyer, Col. Salmon, Major Haines, and Major Wildman, were apprehended to keep the Plot in Countenance; the latter of an Understanding so superior to all his Prosecutors, that their Insolence raises ones Indignation more than Compassion. Echard cannot help saying, The Presbyterian Defenders alledge, that these were only sham Plots, to help forwards the severe Act of Uniformity, but others believe the contrary. Who are his others? L'Estrange, Nalson, Heylin, Warwick, Dugdale, himself, &c. Mr. Locke, at whose Names all this Fry vanish, as Goblins at the Appearance of Light, believ'd and affirm'd they were sham Plots, and that the People were sham'd by it into the several Acts.

" As the Top Stone of the whole Fabrick, a Mr. Des Pretence shall be taken from the Jealousies Maiz they themselves have rais'd by their sham Plots. Col. p. 59. Pray mind what Lord Clarendon said about the Conspiracies, &c. And a real Necessity from the Smallness of their Party Thirty to one," according to L'Estrange, "to encrease and keep up a standing Army, and then in due Time the Cavalier and Church Men will be made greater Tools, but as errant Slaves as the rest of the Nation. In Order to this, the first Step was made in the Act for regulating Corporations," of which we shall be oblig'd to say more in a Paragraph or two. For we must now follow the Earl of Sandwich, and his Vice-Admiral, Sir John Lawson, into the Mediterranean.

On July the 29th they came before Algier, The Fleet. and sent a Message to the Dey to come out and confirm the League with England. Echard makes a meer Dog-Turk of him: But though he did come out, the Archdeacon tells us he behav'd so insolently, that the English Admiral stood into the Harbour, but he steer'd out again, and found it advisable to bring off his Fleet, which had suffer'd extreamly in their Sails and Rigging. So he left Sir John Lawson to block them up if he cou'd, cross'd over to Spain, cross'd back again to Tangier, and thence back again to Lisbon. Mr. Archdeacon tells us, the Common-wealth's Men, out of meer Envy and Sedition, remark'd that the Naval Power of England wou'd never be so formidable under Monarchy as it had been under a Common-wealth: If he had reported their Remark right, it wou'd have had another Turn: That the Naval Power wou'd never be so formidable under King Charles or his Brother, as it had been under the Common-wealth. For when he wrote his History, Monarchy had been near thirty Years in the Hands of Princes equally great and good, under whom the Naval Power of England was the most formidable in the World.

On the Day appointed the Parliament met, and his Majesty made a very long Speech, the Close ment. of which was very promising, That the Happiness of his Government wou'd persuade our Neighbours to that Esteem and Value they had formerly had for us. If it had been added, from the death of Queen Elizabeth to the first Long Parliament, it had been very true and just.

They began with fresh Proceedings against the Regicides, and a Bill was brought in to hang up all

A.D. 1661 all that were reserv'd for Parliamentary Execution; but it dropp'd, and so they were all sent to several remote Prisons. Eckard tells us, It had like to have gone hard with them on Account of

More Plots. new Plots, Chancellor Hyde telling the Parliament, There had been a real Design forming ever since March last, he proceeded, says Eckard, to name the Conspirators, with the Manner and

Bast. Life. Contrivance of their barbarous Designs. I go no Vol. I. p. farther in the Fiction, but refer to Dr. Calamy.

181. These Plots were the general Cry. This all the Pamphlets printed at this Time ran upon, and it was in this very Session that the Bill of UNIFORMITY pass'd the House. And that the general Cry occasion'd by these Sham Plots much promoted it, will easily be judged by any one who will be at the Pains to peruse Capt. Yarrington's

p. 177. Narrative. Again, He who would pass a right Judgment concerning the Act of Uniformity, ought sedately to consider the scandalous Arts that were us'd to obtain it, and the bitter Fruits and Consequences which it produc'd. Again, Many worthy Ministers and sober Gentlemen were imprison'd in divers Counties throughout England. Sir John Packington carry'd on the Sham so far in Worcester, that Mr. Ambrose Sparry, a learned pious Divine, Mr. Osland, Mr. Moore, Mr. Brian, three other pious learned Divines, were seiz'd and kept by Soldiers rais'd by the Cathedral Men at Worcester, and commanded by a Paritor. They had double Pay, and were call'd the Clergy Band: This was while the Act was passing. These Infernal Wretches put a poor old Man to the Torture for asking one of the Soldiers how Mr. Osland the Minister did, and saying he was no Traitor, when one of the Clergy Band call'd him so. They put lighted Matches between his Fingers, and burnt them to the very Bone, to extort a Confession from him that there was a Plot. Captain Yarrington was seiz'd by a Troop of Horse, and imprison'd at Worcester, as were seventy or eighty sober Men for this Diabolical Forgery, which Mr. Yarrington at length found out by Acknowledgment of the Person employed by Packington to carry a Packet of

p. 179. A Man put to Torture on that score. counterfeit Letters to one Cole of Martley, in which were several directed to Capt. Yarrington, and other honest Gentlemen, containing treasonable Matters. These Letters were pretended to be intercepted by the Fellow who was hir'd to deliver them, and carry'd to Sir John Packington;

Capt. Yarrington's Sham Plot. upon which so many religious innocent Persons were thrown into Goals, and Packington intended to have had them prosecuted to the utmost. The Fellow confessing the Villany, Mrs. Yarrington gives Notice of it to her Husband in his Confinement, who immediately enters Actions against those that had imprison'd him. Being at last discharg'd, he went to London, and prevail'd with the Earl of Bristol, though a Papist, to acquaint the King how the Lord Clarendon, and his other Ministers, impos'd Sham Plots upon him. Upon which the Deputy-Lieutenants of Worcester-shire, and other Shires where the like Plots had been forg'd, were order'd to appear at the Council Board. They endeavour'd to clear themselves, and desir'd Time to consult their Friends in the Country. But afterwards Sir J. W. one of them, arrested Capt. Yarrington for High Treason, and he was releas'd upon the Earl of Bristol's procuring the King's Privy-Seal: For Papists, who were Men of Honour, detested these scandalous Arts, and the more, for that they were to carry on Designs which the Ministry durst not otherwise own. Yarrington, a Man of Spirit, prosecutes his Prosecutors; but within six Months, Persons were suborn'd to swear against him, That he had spoken Treasonable Words against the King and Government. For this he was Try'd at Worcester Assizes before Judge Twisden, and upon a full Hearing, was presently acquitted by the Jury. One of the Witnesses confess'd he had five Pounds given him for being an Evidence. What Coin must that be which comes out of such a Mint? I shall not touch upon the Sham Plots in Oxfordshire, Staffordshire, and Herefordshire, they being all as false and detestable as this in Worcester-shire. But they were tim'd like Things which are made on Purpose, and the Ministry put these Words into the King's Mouth. I am sorry to find that the general Temper and Affection of the Nation are not so well compos'd as I hop'd they would have been after so signal Blessings of God Almighty upon us all, and after so great Indulgence and Condescensions from me towards all Interests, there are many wicked Instruments still as active as ever, who labour Night and Day to disturb the Publick Peace, and to make People jealous of each other. It may be worthy your Care and Vigilance to provide proper Remedies for Diseases of that kind; and if you find new Diseases, you must find new Remedies, &c. Hyde knew all this was a Farce of his own Invention, or of the Invention of his Instruments. However, when the House of Commons after the Speech came to their Debates, up stands Sir John Packington, and with open Mouth cries out, a horrid Plot in his County of Worcester, a horrid, dangerous Presbyterian Plot, When she for which many Plotters were already in Goal! Then such wise and well-chosen Members gave the like Information for the Counties of Oxford, Hereford, and Stafford; and says Dr. Calamy, as above, 'Twas in this very Session that this Bill of Uniformity pass'd. I think it will not bear Reflection.

On the 29th of December the King pass'd some Bills; An Act for granting 1,260,000 Pounds; An Act about Leases for the Duchy of Cornwall; An Act for regulating Corporations. Eckard boasts, that the last prov'd a severe Morification and Blow to one Party, which consisted of every wise and honest Man in England. For he who contributes to the enslaving of his Country, must be as much a Fool as a Villain. This wretched History Writer, after all the Mischief which that odious Act was the Cause of, glories in it as a Triumph of the Faction which triumph'd over the Spiritual and Temporal Liberties of England. I'm pleas'd that Mr. Locke has touch'd upon this Enormity; for though he is insensible of Shame upon my Animadversion, he will be still more the Scorn of Mankind if he stands out against Mr. Locke's. In order to make one as Errant Slaves as the other, "The first Step they took was the Act for regulating Corporations; wisely beginning, that in those lesser Governments, which Eckard calls Nests of Sedition, which they meant afterwards to introduce upon the Government of the Nation, and making them swear to a Declaration and Belief of such Propositions as they themselves afterwards, upon Debate, were enforc'd to alter, and cou'd not justify in these Words."

I A. B. do declare and believe, that it is not a vile lawless upon any Pretence whatsoever, to take Oath in Arms against the King; and that I do abhor that Traiterous Position of taking Arms by his Authority against his Person, or against those that are commission'd by him.

All Persons bearing any Office of Magistracy, Place of Trust, or other Employment relating to the Government of any City, Corporation, Burrough, &c. were order'd to take this Oath; by which, says Mr. Locke, many of the wealthiest, worst, and soberest Men were thrust out, and are

A.D. 1661 are still kept out of the Magistracy. It was the same in Harley's Time, when the Schism Act, and Occasional Act, both now happily defunct, remov'd wealthy, worthy, and sober Men, to make room for the reverse of them. We have liv'd to see the Makers of that slavish Oath acting against it; and cou'd any thing bind a Man to destroy his Country, the taking Arms against King James the Second wou'd have render'd almost all that did it forsworn. And if the Dread of it had hinder'd them, what wou'd the Constitution of England have been by this Time? I have not in all my Reading met with an Assembly of Men so blind to the Publick Interest, and so ready to run their Necks into a Collar. We have seen what laudable Care they have taken of the Bodies of Men, and we shall soon see what Care they will take of their Souls. If I had not already given the Reader a List of some of the most remarkable ones among them, I wou'd here have inserted the Names of all of them. But it wou'd have been pity that a great Number of Gentlemen, who though not a Majority, were yet a very considerable Party, Strugglers against this Corporation Act, and that other unrighteous Act that is to follow it, shou'd any where appear in after times with those Names, that are a Dishonour to History.

1662. Archdeacon Echard ends the last Year as I begin this, with the Death of that religious, suffering, and belov'd Princess, the Queen of Bohemia, his present Majesty's Royal great Grandmother, Daughter of King James the First. She dy'd on the 13th of February, and was bury'd in Westminster-Abbey, in the same Vault with Prince Henry, her eldest Brother.

The Parliament had been adjourn'd to the 10th of January, and were farther alarm'd with Plots and Conspiracies, according to Echard. I have observ'd, that the Continuance of these Plots was a sad Piece of the Lord Chancellor's Policy: A sorry thin Disguise, which every one saw thro', but those who wink'd their Eyes and wou'd not see. The Chancellor's Speech on this Occasion wou'd be extremely diverting, as all merry Things are, when said with grave Faces, were it not for the dreadful Calamities which were the Effects of it. It is thus;

"There was found with Salmon, a List of 160 Officers of the late Army. It is further discover'd, that there shou'd have been a Meeting at London about the 10th of December, and that they intended about the End of January, to have made sure of Skrewsbury, Coventry and Bristol, and that they shou'd rise in several Parts at once, like Moles in Beds of Asparagus, that where they were prevalent, they shou'd begin with Assassination, which mov'd one of them to relate, That some of the late King's Judges were entertain'd in France, Holland and Germany," that many Arms were brought in Order to this Design. It is impossible to go thorough with it, and not be shock'd beyond Conception. Not a Word of it is credible, except it is where he says, The Duke of Albemarle has put two Troops into Shrewsbury, and as many into Coventry; what follows, is to let the Parliament see, that the immense Sums they lavish'd away, had a good Effect; which two Troops, by the Way, had taken twenty Thieves. Upon this Report, says the Archdeacon, the House resolv'd to proceed against Sir Henry Vane, Lieutenant General Lambert, Sir Hardesty Waller, and with exemplary Simplicity he confesses," Upon this Report, they proceeded with greater Activity in the Uniformity Act; in which they had a Spur from the King himself in a new Speech, "Gentlemen, I

"hear you are very zealous for the Church, and A.D. 1662
"very solicitous, and even jealous, that there "is not Expedition enough us'd in that Affair.
"I thank you for it, since I presume it proceeds "from a good Root of Piety and Devotion." Such Words from such a Prince! whose Vices wou'd have been a Scandal to the worst Religion in the World, if there cou'd be a worse than his own, that of Popery. "I know you will not take it unkindly, if I tell you I am as zealous for the Church of England as any of you can be, and am enough acquainted with the Enemies of it on all Sides, and have Prejudice to those who do not love it." He certainly does not mean the Papists, being a Papist himself, if any thing. "I am as much in love with the Book of Common-Prayer as you can wish: It is believ'd; and have Prejudice enough to those who do not love it. I do as much desire to see an Uniformity, you may rely upon me in it. I have transmitted the Book of Common-Prayer, which has been presented to me by the Convocation, to the House of Peers, with my Approbation, that the Act of Uniformity may relate to it, &c." Echard brags, that this Speech is not in Print; so I will rob him of no more of it.

Dr. Ferne, Prolocutor of the Convocation, being made Bishop of Chester, Dr. Barwick succeeded him as Prolocutor. They determin'd that Bishops might sit and judge in Cases of Blood, &c. and added a Prayer to the Liturgy for the High Court of Parliament, wherein the King is stil'd our most religious King. Neither Echard, nor King the Compleat Historian, nor any one of that sort Charles of Writers, observe the amazing Inconsistency stil'd a of that Term with the King's Life and Con- most religious King. versation, Bishop Burnet has a just Observation upon it. A Collect was drawn for the Parliament, in which a new Epithet was added to the King's Title, that gave great Offence, and occasion'd much Railery. He was stil'd our most religious King. It was not easy to give a proper Sense to this, and to make it go well down, since whatever the Signification of Religious might be in the Latin Word, as importing the Sacredness of the King's Party; yet in the English Language, it bore a Signification that was no way applicable to the King; and those who took great Liberty with him, have often ask'd him, what must all his People think, when they heard him pray'd for as their most religious King? Mr. Roger Coke takes this Notice of it; "The Parliament chm'd p. 120.
"in with the Church, and by the Act of Uniformity enjoin'd, that every one who holds any Ecclesiastical Promotion, shall publickly declare before his Congregation, his unfeign'd Assent and Consent to every thing contain'd and prescrib'd in the Book, entitled the Book of Common-Prayer, &c. Put these together, I L. E.
"do declare my unfeign'd Assent and Consent, that the King, Charles II. is my most religious King; if he be so, how came you to know it? and if you do not know it, how came you so unfeign'dly to assent and consent, that he is so? But tho' to get your Living, you tell the Congregation so, when you do not know it, I think it is dreadful for you to tell God Almighty so. Was God well pleas'd with these Things, The Happy-
"you shall soon see unjust Wars and dishonour- ness of his
"ble Peace: Such Judgments of Plague, Fire Reign.
"and Invasion into our Ports, as never before
"were heard of.

While this same Conformity Act went on so swimmingly, the Presbyterians had fair Words given to their Petitions and Addresses, nay a Promise of the Law's being dispenc'd with, tho' it was made, and in the making of it, it met with much Opposition. For the Bishops, instead of

A.D. 1662 using any moderate, softning Measures, had got the Act so worded by Keeling the Lawyer, that the Terms of Conformity were made harder than ever. Bishop Skeldon told Dr. Allen, a Member of the Convocation, who propos'd softning, moderate Measures, What will be done is resolv'd upon before, or during the Savoy Conference, &c. Sober Gentlemen telling another Bishop, It was Pity the Door was so strait, that many pious Ministers cou'd not have Admission, he reply'd, It is no Pity at all; if we had thought so many of them wou'd have conform'd, we wou'd have made it straiter, and the King himself was of the same Opinion.

Uniformity Act.

It is reported, that notwithstanding all the false Alarms of pretended Conspiracies, and all other scandalous Arts for procuring this uncharitable Act, when it was put to the Vote whether it shou'd pass or not, the Tale was wrong, it being thus, 186 Noes, 180 Yeas; tho' others with more Probability affirm the Tale to have been thus, 186 Yeas, 180 Noes, for the Numbers are the same in both Accounts. The very eminent Dr. Bates, as polite a Writer as his Friend Archbishop Tillotson, speaking of this Act in Mr. Baxter's Funeral Sermon, says, The old Clergy, from Wrath and Revenge, and the young Gentry, from their servile Compliance with the Court, were very active to carry it on and compleat it.

By this Act all Ministers were to read and publickly declare unfeigned Assent and Consent to all and every thing contain'd and prescrib'd in and by the Book of Common-Prayer before the Feast of St. Bartholomew then ensuing; on which Festival, just 90 Years before, above 100,000 Protestants were massacred in France. All Incumbents and Schoolmasters were oblig'd to swear the Corporation Oath, and to forswear the Covenant which they had sworn or not sworn; for several of the Bishops had taken that Oath, as Gauden, Ward, &c. The Author of the History which is entituled Compleat, and is one of the most ridiculous Misnomers one can meet with, tells us, *It was found necessary for the Peace and Safety of the State, as well as for the Good and Glory of the Church, to compel religious Ministers to attest before God and his Church, that King Charles II. was a most religious King to assent, consent and subscribe, 1. To the Doctrine of Real Baptismal Regeneration and certain Salvation. 2. To the Use of Godfathers and Godmothers. 3. To the Sign of the Cross in Baptism. 4. To the Gesture of Kneeling at the Sacrament. 5. That Bishops, Priests and Deacons are three distinct Orders in the Church by Divine Appointment. To pronounce all saw'd that are hurried, except the Unbaptiz'd, Excommunicate or Self-Murtherers. To read in Divine Service the Stories of Judith and Baruch, Tobit and his Dog, Bel and the Dragon, under the Title of the Holy Scripture. To assent and consent, and subscribe to St. Athanasius's Creed. To swear to the Canons, which to repeat is beyond my Patience, &c. All which Things, according to the Compleat Historian, was for the Peace of the State, and the Good and Glory of the Church. Tho' the Writer was an Ecclesiastical Person, I might have presum'd to have ask'd, Was it for the Peace of the State to lay religious Hardships upon a Million of Consciences? Was it for the Glory of the Church to lie under the Charge of Want of Charity and Humanity? But what does he, and what does Echard mean by the Glory of the Church? Has she any thing to glory in but Piety, Purity, Constancy, and all Christian Virtues, and all Christian Graces? What has she to do with any thing else? Has not her Lord and Master commanded her and her Sons to believe that his Kingdom is* not of this World? Are we not so taught by every Lesson in Holy Writ? And did not the Prelates, who promoted this deplorable Bill, prove, by every Action of their Lives, that their Kingdom was of this World?
